The magistrate was of opinion that he was bound by the decision that the Clown machine was a game of skill and not of chance, but he held for the purpose of the present proceedings that it was immaterial whether the game was one of skill or chance. He was further of opinion that in the circumstances stated the second appellant was knowingly permitting her premises to be used in contravention of s. 3 of the Betting Act, 1853, and that the first appellant was also using the premises wrongfully, and he accordingly convicted both appellants fining them 20s. each.

By the Betting Act, 1853, s. 1 provided:

"No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, or any person procured or employed by or acting for or on behalf of such owner, occupier, or keeper, or person using the same, or of any person having the care or management or in any manner conducting the business thereof betting with persons resorting thereto; or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid as or for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any . . . game . . . or as or for the consideration for securing the payment or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing on any such event or contingency as aforesaid. . . ."

"Any person who being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same, shall open, keep, or use the same for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned, or either of them; and any person who being the owner or occupier of any house, room, office, or other place shall knowingly and wilfully permit the same to be opened, kept, or used by any other person for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them; and any person having the care or management of or in any manner assisting in conducting the business of any house, office, room, or place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them, shall, on summary conviction thereof before any two justices of the peace, be liable to forfeit and pay such penalty, not exceeding one hundred pounds, as shall be adjudged by such justices. . . ."

Rigby Swift, K.C., and J. H. Layton for the respondent.

RIDLEY, J.—In this case the magistrate considered that he was bound by the decision in Pessers, Moody, Wraith and Gurr, Ltd. v. Catt (1), to hold that the game was a game of skill and not of chance, but he held that it was immaterial whether it was a game of skill or not, and that it was his duty to convict. The magistrate was mistaken in supposing that as a matter of law he was bound to hold that the game was one of skill. No doubt skill enters into the game to a considerable extent, but in every case, as is shown by Bracchi Bros. v. Rees (2), the question is one of fact, and it would have been open to the magistrate to find that it was a game of chance. We must assume, however, that he found that it was a game of skill, and the question is whether the appellants have brought themselves within s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853.

The word "bet" is not used in the second part of that section, under which these proceedings were taken, but nevertheless it covers betting in the strict sense of the word, and it also in my opinion includes transactions which may not in ordinary language be called betting. The first part of the section deals with betting, eo nomine, on credit. It was pointed out by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Bond v. Plumb (3) that the preamble to the Act clearly refers to two separate and distinct evils, which it was the object of the legislature to suppress, (i) the opening of betting houses, and (ii) the receipt of money in advance upon an undertaking to pay money in certain events. I think the fact that the Act was intended to deal with two separate and distinct offences ought not to be lost sight of.

It seems to me that the second part of s. 1 exactly covers what took place in this case when a person put a halfpenny into the slot and had the chance of getting 2d. worth of sweets. There is no reason why such a transaction should not be regarded as coming within the scope of the Act. In Fielding v. Turner (4), where the same question was raised as in this case—namely, whether a game carried on by means of an automatic machine was an unlawful game, LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., said ([1903] 1 K.B. at p. 871):

> "It was then argued that there was no unlawful gaming because there was no individual who competed or played a game with the person who inserted a penny in the slot. This, we think, involves a fallacy. There are many lotteries and games of chance in which only the persons who actually stake take part; but here the holder or owner of the machine may be said to back his chance of the money falling into one of the four compartments, in which case it will be retained without return, as against the centre compartment, out of which alone any prize can be drawn. The keeper or owner of any such machine backs his chance against the person who uses it."

I think that that is the proper way to regard what took place in the present instance. This is the simple case of what, without using the word "bet," I will call a wager (to employ an ambiguous term) between a person putting a halfpenny in the slot on the one hand and the owner of the machine and the occupier of the shop on the other. I think, therefore, that the magistrate's decision ought to be affirmed.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will assume, for the purpose of my judgment, that this was a game of skill—i.e., a game which affords scope for skill and is not a mere game of chance. It must be borne in mind, however, that even if a game is a game of skill everyone who plays it does not necessarily play it with skill. A person who plays billiards, a game of skill, may always miss what he aims at and may frequently cut the cloth. A person who plays cricket, which is also a game of skill, may be bowled by every straight ball or caught off the wicket. In neither case does the player show any skill, though he is playing a game in which there is scope for skill. I think it is important to bear that in mind when we are considering what it was that the magistrate had to decide.

He had before him the fact that in the course of twelve minutes in one day seventeen boys used the machines twenty-seven times, and he had to decide whether the user of the machines brought their owner and the occupier of the shop within the second part of s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853. That section applies to two different kinds of betting. The first part applies to persons who keep an office for the purpose of betting either on credit or for ready money with persons resorting to the office. The second part has been described as being aimed at ready money betting at an office which is kept for the purpose. But although the elliptical expression "ready money betting" has been applied to what the second part of the section is aimed at, yet it is important to remember that in that part the words "bet" and "betting" are not used but have been replaced by other words with a wider meaning, which apparently were employed in order to cover cases that might give rise to the contention that they did not constitute betting in the ordinary sense of the word. We have to determine whether there was any evidence on which the magistrate could find that the appellants were permitting the place to be used for the purpose of any money being received as the consideration for any promise, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event relating to a game.

I agree that if it was clear that the halfpennies paid by the boys were paid as entrance fees for the purpose of enabling them to take part in a game of skill, that would not constitute betting and would not be an offence under the first part of the section. But on the other hand, if it was clear that the consideration for the payment of the halfpenny was solely the promise on the part of the appellants to give 2d. worth of sweets if the ball fell into the clown's cap, that would be within the second part of the section. In the circumstances it was to my mind clearly open to the magistrate, although, following the decision in Pessers, Moody, Wraith & Gurr, Ltd. v. Catt (1), he came to the conclusion that he must treat this as a game of skill, to hold that the halfpennies were not paid as an entrance fee for taking part in a game of skill, but that the sole consideration for the halfpenny was the promise made by the appellants to give the boy 1d. or 2d. worth of sweets in the event of the ball falling into the clown's cap. I read the magistrate's finding as a finding to that effect when he says that, although the game was a game of skill and not of chance, yet that was immaterial because nevertheless the appellants were acting in contravention of the section. I take that to mean that in his opinion the boys were not in any sense paying their halfpennies as a consideration for the privilege of competing in a game of skill (and I do not for a moment believe that they were doing anything of the kind), but were simply gambling on the chance of getting 2d. worth of sweets. In the circumstances I think that the magistrate was right in holding that the case came within the second part of the section, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LUSH, J.—I regret to say that I have come to a different conclusion. These proceedings were taken, not under the Gaming Act, 1845, but under the Betting Act, 1853. I think that if they had been taken under the Gaming Act, 1845, there were materials on which the magistrate could have convicted, for I do not agree with his view that he was bound as a matter of law to hold that the game was a game of skill. But was he right in convicting under the Betting Act, 1853? That that is a betting Act, pure and simple, is in my opinion perfectly clear from the preamble, from the title, at which the court is entitled to look, and indeed from the language used in the various sections. The title of the Act is "An Act for the Suppression of Betting Houses," and the preamble recites that a kind of gaming had sprung up tending to injury by the opening of places called betting houses. That it is a Betting Act appears to have been recognised by the court in Bond v. Plumb (3) where the argument for the respondent was that s. 1 was disjunctive, the first part relating to opening, keeping, and using premises for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, and the second part relating to persons using such places for the purpose of receiving deposits on bets. It was not suggested that the Act had any further or wider scope, and I think the court accepted the view that it was an act for the suppression of betting.

Has the magistrate found that these premises were used for the purpose of betting, and if so, was it open to him, on the materials before him, so to find? I do not see that he has found that the premises were used for the purpose of betting. He makes no reference to betting or to the scope or purpose of the Act. Feeling himself obliged to hold that the game was a game of skill, he held that the premises were used for the purpose of money being received as a consideration for a promise to pay money on a game—i.e., a game of skill. In my view, unless on the materials before him the magistrate could and did find that the premises were used for the purpose of receiving deposits on bets or for betting purposes, there could be no conviction under this Act. It is certainly strange if, although under the Gaming Act, 1845, there could have been no conviction in respect of these transactions on the footing that the game was a game of skill, yet there could be a conviction under the Betting Act, 1853, for the same series of acts although the game was a game of skill.

In my view it is not necessary to decide whether, if the game were a game of pure chance, there could be a conviction under the Betting Act, 1853. I doubt very much whether there could be; it seems to me that the proper Act under which to proceed would be the Gaming Act, 1845. But if the game be a game of skill and not of chance, it seems to me impossible to describe the transaction as the use of premises for the purpose of money being received as the consideration for a promise to pay money on a contingency relating to a game.

What really happened was that the boys paid their halfpennies in order to compete, if I may use the expression, in what has now been held to be a game of skill, on the terms that if they were skilful enough to make the machine do what they desired they were to receive 2d. worth of sweets, but otherwise they were not to receive it. I cannot bring myself to see that they betted with anybody or that the transaction was in any sense a betting transaction. Of course it is quite possible for persons taking part in a game either of skill or of chance to bet as to whether they will succeed or fail. But there the money paid would be paid as the terms of the wager or of the bet. Here the halfpennies were paid, no doubt not for the certainty of obtaining the sweets, but for the purpose of obtaining them, because those who paid thought that they were skilful enough to be able to succeed in the game in which they were invited to compete. Unless this was a transaction in the nature of betting, I do not think that it comes within the Betting Act, 1853. In Fielding v. Turner (4) proceedings precisely the same as these were taken under the Gaming House Act, 1854, and not under the Betting Act, 1853, and though it may be a mischievous practice to invite boys to play with these machines, yet I do not think we are warranted in extending the terms of the Betting Act, 1853, so as to make the Act apply to a case which cannot properly be said to come within the description of betting or a transaction in the nature of betting. For these reasons I regret to say that the convictions were wrong.

Appeals dismissed.

Will—Construction—Bequest of "net profits" of company—Bequest of "net profits" of partnership—Gift indefinite in point of time—Gift of principal or only of income.

A testator made a bequest of the "net profits" of a limited company and one of the "net profits" of a partnership.

Held: (i) the rule that a gift of income indefinite in point of time carries the fund producing the income applied to a bequest of the "net profits" of a limited company, but not to one of the "net profits" of a partnership; (ii) "net profits" did not include debentures held by the testator nor moneys owing to him by the company as a creditor.

Adjourned Summons taken out by Charles Maurice to have his interests under the codicil ascertained.

Sir Charles Bennett Lawes-Wittewronge, after making his will and a first codicil thereto, the provisions of which are not material to be stated, made a second codicil, dated Oct. 5, 1911, to his will in these terms:

"I also make this further addition to my codicil and leave one-fifth share of the net profits in all my commercial undertakings, being John Bennett Lawes and Co., Ltd., the Millwall Rubber Co., Ltd., and the X. Rubber Co., to Charles Maurice, Manton Grange, Marlborough, Wilts."

The testator died on Oct. 6, 1911. John Bennett Lawes & Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called the chemical company), was formed by the father of the testator in the year 1890, and registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, as a company limited by shares for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on a business of chemical manufacturers. The capital of the company was £140,000, divided into shares of £100 each. At the time of his death the testator held 684 of these shares of the aggregate amount of £68,400. In 1910 the testator with Charles Maurice and another, who were then directors of the company, gave a joint and several guarantee to the Union of London and Smiths Bank, Ltd., for the repayment of an advance made to the chemical company of £22,000 and interest. In May, 1911, the testator also gave the bank a sole guarantee for the repayment of a further advance to be made to the company of £10,000 with interest, and these sums were still owing at his death. By way of security for these guarantees the chemical company issued to the testator in May, 1911, a debenture for the nominal amount of £16,000, and as further security the company deposited with him a lease of certain premises. The testator was at his death a creditor of the company for £8,540 in respect of advances made to them. The Millwall Rubber Co., Ltd., the second of the commercial undertakings mentioned in the codicil, was a registered company of which the testator held at his death 8,428 fully paid up shares. The testator had advanced to this company sums amounting to £25,000, and by way of security the company had issued to him a debenture for the same amount. On Oct. 31, 1911, the Millwall Rubber Co. went into voluntary liquidation, and on the same day the executors of the testator appointed a receiver of the undertaking and property of the company comprised in the debentures. The remaining commercial undertaking mentioned in the codicil, the X. Rubber Co., was a partnership entered into verbally by the testator with certain other persons who were the inventors of a pump. The testator was responsible for the debts of the partnership on the understanding that he was to have two-thirds of the assets of the partnership. He had advanced a sum of £1,485 on account of the partnership. After his death his executors advanced a further sum of £800 on the same account out of the estate of the testator. The executors entered into an agreement in May, 1912, with the remaining partners that the above advances were to be repaid out of the assets of the partnership, and that two-thirds of the profits were to belong to the testator's estate. The chemical company's undertaking was subsequently sold.

WARRINGTON, J.—The question in this case turns on the meaning and effect of a very few words in the second codicil to the will of the testator. [HIS LORDSHIP read the bequest and stated the facts as to the testator's interest in the three undertakings, and continued:] What is the meaning and effect of those words in the codicil? To deal in the first place with the testator's interests in John Bennett Lawes & Co. and the Millwall Rubber Co., the expression "share of the net profits" cannot, in my opinion, include moneys owing to the testator as a creditor. I think that the expression "one-fifth share of the net profits" means "one-fifth share of that which I receive from the net profits made by these undertakings," a share of the fund produced by the businesses after deducting the liabilities and expenses. Therefore, the plaintiff is not entitled to any part of the two loans of £8,540 and £25,000, or of the debenture of the Millwall Rubber Co.

Leaving the X. Rubber Co. to be dealt with separately, I have now to deal with the testator's remaining interests in the two limited companies, his holding of shares in those companies. What is the effect of the gift of a share of the net profits? It is an undoubted rule of law, or rather, perhaps, of construction, that a gift unlimited in point of time of the income of a fund is a gift of the fund itself, and the reason is obvious, for it would be absurd to say that the income arising from a fund was for all time to be paid to one person, while the corpus of the fund was to belong to someone else. What I have to consider is whether the rule is applicable to the case of dividends derived by a shareholder from shares in a limited company. I can see no reason why it should not. Dividends arising from a share in a limited company are the fruit of the share, and therefore a gift unlimited in time of the dividends on a share in a company is as much a gift of the share as a gift of the income of a sum of Consols is a gift of the sum itself. In the present case I find a gift of the testator's net profits in John Bennett Lawes & Co. and the Millwall Rubber Co. What can a gift of "net profits" in a limited company mean except a gift of that which the testator was entitled to receive on his shares in the company? A shareholder is entitled to the dividends which are duly declared according to the articles of association of the company, and therefore a gift of the profits of shares amounts to a gift of the dividends on them, and that amounts to a gift of the corpus of the shares. Since the testator's death his interest in John Bennett Lawes & Co. has been sold, and the plaintiff is accordingly entitled to one-fifth of the purchase moneys and second debentures now representing that interest, and also to one-fifth of the testator's share holding in the Millwall Rubber Co.

The case of the X. Rubber Co. is peculiar. That is a partnership firm, not a limited company. I cannot see how the net profits of a share in a partnership can come under the rule to which I have referred. The net profits of a partnership business are not the fruit of the capital employed in the business alone, but are the result of the employment of the capital and of the exertions of the partners as well; moreover, a partner's share of the profits may, and often does, bear no relation to the share in which he is interested in the capital of the partnership. Therefore, the rule does not apply to a gift of a share of the net profits of a partnership, and such a gift does not entitle the legatee to a share in the corpus of the assets; but the words of the gift must have some meaning and effect given to them, and the true meaning is that the legatee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, are entitled to receive a share of that part of the net profits which would otherwise have been payable to the executors of the testator so long as the partnership business is being carried on.

[Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Buckley and Phillimore, L.JJ.), February 17, 18, 1914]

Executor—Business of testator carried on—No interference by testator's creditors—Implication of assent—Right of executor to indemnity—Rights of creditors of business after testator's death.

Executors carried on the testator's business, although there was no provision in the will directing them to do so, for the benefit of one of themselves, a beneficiary. Creditors of the testator knew that the business was being carried on, but took no steps to interfere with it. The business having failed, creditors of the business in respect of debts arising after the testator's death sought a declaration that the executors were entitled to an indemnity out of the assets of the business in priority to the testator's own creditors, and that they (the new creditors) were entitled to the benefit of that indemnity.

Held: it was not to be inferred from the fact that the old creditors did not intervene and insist that the business should be stopped, but merely stood by and did not interfere, that they assented to the business being carried on for the benefit of the estate with the result that the executors were entitled to be indemnified out of the estate and the new creditors of the business were entitled to avail themselves of that indemnity.

Appeal from a decision of Joyce, J., on a summons by which the plaintiffs sought a declaration that the defendants, executors who had been carrying on the testator's business, were entitled to an indemnity out of the assets of the business in priority to the testator's own creditors, and that they (the plaintiffs), who were new creditors of the business, were entitled to the benefit of that indemnity.

The testator, a boilermaker, who died on Aug. 4, 1908, by his will dated May 19, 1908, after appointing his wife Mary Abigail and his son Charles Jacob Oxley joint executors thereof, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate unto his wife for her absolute use and benefit, subject to the payment by her of all his debts, funeral expenses, and the expenses and duties incidental to the proving of his will. After the death of the testator the executors continued to carry on the business as "executors of Barker Oxley" till the beginning of November, 1912, when, by an order in bankruptcy, dated Nov. 6, 1912, they were adjudicated bankrupt. This action was commenced by creditors of the testator at the time of his death, for the administration of the testator's estate, and by an order therein dated Nov. 7, 1912, a receiver of the testator's personal estate and manager of the business was appointed, and the usual accounts and inquiries in a creditor's administration action were ordered. On Mar. 8, 1913, this summons was taken out by the present creditors of the business of the testator as carried on by the executors between the death of the testator and November, 1912. The summons was adjourned into court and was heard on Dec. 4 and 5, 1913, before JOYCE, J., who held that mere standing by and non-interference by the testator's creditors were not sufficient, where one of the executors was the beneficial owner and the other her son, to give them a right of indemnity for debts contracted in carrying on the business. The executors had carried on the business for the benefit of themselves and not for the benefit of the old creditors, and, therefore, applying the decision in Re Millard, Ex parte Yates (3), the summons would be dismissed. The plaintiffs appealed.

Cunliffe, K.C., and Horace Freeman for the new creditors.
Hughes, K.C., and W. J. Whittaker for the executors.

COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of JOYCE, J., and it raises a point which has been presented to us as one of great difficulty. I am bound to say I do not feel pressed with any of the suggested difficulties.

The case is one in which a boilermaker made a will, and appointed as executors his widow and one of his sons. The widow was the sole residuary legatee. The estate as sworn to by the executors for the purposes of probate was solvent, and I have not heard anything to satisfy me or even to suggest the probability that the estate was not perfectly solvent at the death of the testator. The will contained no provision whatever about carrying on his business. There was no trust to that effect in the will. But the widow, who was obviously dependent upon what she could get from the business for her maintenance, carried the business on with the aid of the son, who was co-executor, and two other sons, I think, who were employed in the business and who received wages. The result was that the widow got, I think, it is said, £2 a week, but I am not quite sure of that figure, which supported her until the time arrived in the autumn of 1912, when the executors, who had carried on the business under the style of Executors of the Testator Barker Oxley, got into difficulties and execution was put in. That was followed by bankruptcy proceedings. It was also followed by an action commenced by Hornby & Sons on behalf of themselves and all other the creditors of the deceased against the executors. What was that action, and what was the decree that was made upon it? It was the commonest of common administration decrees. The only order that was made was for an account of the assets of the testator. I do not read the order because it is in a perfectly well-known common form. There is nothing whatever about assets which were produced by the trading subsequent to the death of the testator. It simply is a proceeding in which admitted creditors say that there are assets of the testator which are still bona testatoris in existence, and that the same must be applied to the payment of their debts. But then it is said that the executors carried on the testator's business for, roughly, three or four years; that they did it openly; and that they did it trading as executors. The creditors must have known those facts, and I assume they did know them. I think that it is proved that they did know that the business was being carried on by the executors. It is, therefore, said that there is something which entitles the executors to have a lien upon all the assets of the testator to indemnify them against the liabilities which they have incurred in carrying on this business, and it is said first of all that Dowse v. Gorton (4) decides this point in their favour.

Dowse v. Gorton (4) seems to me to be a case which is very strongly indeed against the present application, and certainly is not in favour of it. It was a case where there was a trust to carry on the testator's business—a trust which bound the beneficiaries under the will; to give, not a personal indemnity, but an indemnity out of the estate in favour of the trustees who in the due exercise of that trust carried on the business. Then came this question: Were the creditors bound to give the same indemnity? Had they put themselves in the true legal position of being beneficiaries or cestuis que trust under the trust contained in the will? It was held there that they had put themselves into that position, and that they could not in those proceedings, and having regard to the view which they had themselves taken in that action, be allowed to approbate and to reprobate at the same time. The proceedings which were there taken are briefly stated [1891] A.C. at p. 193. An originating summons was taken out by one of the true creditors of the testator, asking not merely that all the assets of the testator at the date of the testator's death, but everything which was in existence at the date when the business ceased to be carried on by the trustees should be applied in payment of the debts of the testator, and, further, that there should be no claim whatever for indemnity by the executors. That is to say, the summons sought to get the benefit of the subsequent trading without any provision for giving indemnity to the persons who had produced those assets. Anything more different than the present case from Dowse v. Gorton (4) I cannot imagine. The plaintiffs never claimed the subsequent assets. They had taken simply a common administration decree. But in that case the House of Lords, following the Court of Appeal except in one respect, went into the considerations which tended to show and did satisfy the court that there was an actual assent to the trustees carrying on this business for the benefit of the creditors. That being so, it was not difficult to arrive at the conclusion which seems to me inevitably to have followed that the creditor who had given that assent was in precisely the same position as a beneficiary under the will, and just as a beneficiary under the will could not take the subsequent assets without giving effect to the indemnity, so the creditor who deliberately elected to come in could not get the benefit of the subsequent assets without giving effect to the indemnity. That really is, I think, the substance of Dowse v. Gorton (4). LORD MACNAGHTEN gives a very elaborate and valuable judgment as to the rights of a creditor of a testator in a case like that, and he points out that if the creditor knows of the trading and is minded to do so, he can take proceedings against the trustees for a breach of trust for endangering the assets in carrying on the business more than was required for the necessary disposal of the assets of the business. To me it is quite startling to say that a creditor of a testator having a knowledge of that which he might claim to be a breach of trust is bound by abstaining from taking such proceedings to say that those proceedings were carried on by his assent, and that for all purposes he must be deemed to have assented to that breach of trust. Take any other breach of trust than this. I, a creditor, may know that the executors have invested £10,000 of the estates in an improper security which has been lost. Am I to be deemed to have acquiesced in that, and am I debarred from claiming to be paid out of the true assets of the testator's estate which were left after the breach of trust? I think that the proposition scarcely requires to be more than stated.

It is said that, assuming that you must establish that there has been assent or consent, it is sufficient to prove acquiescence—that is to say, not objecting for a considerable period of time. I am quite unable to concur in that view. I think that the passage in LORD HERSCHELL'S judgment in Dowse v. Gorton (4) ([1891] A.C. at p. 199) that puts that very clearly indeed subject only to the one point which counsel for the new creditors made upon the word "immediately." I do not think that there is any great stress laid upon that word. And if authority were wanted for the first time I should certainly be prepared to hold that merely standing by with knowledge of the trading—doing nothing, in other words—is not of itself sufficient to constitute the original creditor of the testator as a person entitled to the subsequent assents, and, therefore, bound to give effect to the indemnity. What, if any, are the acts of assent which are relied upon here? I do not think that any single act which has been done by any of the three creditors brings the case within the assent or consent which is required by Dowse v. Gorton (4).

> "the mere fact that a creditor stood by under such circumstances, and did not immediately take steps to enforce his debt, would not of itself entitle the executors, as against him, to be indemnified out of the estate,"

Then it is said that there is the judgment of KEKEWICH, J., in Re Brooke, Brooke v. Brooke (1), and likewise the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, to which I must also refer, in Re Hodges, Hodges v. Hodges (2). It is said that those two judgments do not interpret Dowse v. Gorton (4) in the way that I have stated, and lay down propositions that entitle the creditors in the present case to succeed. But with great respect to KEKEWICH, J., I cannot assent to the passages in his judgment which I am about to read. They do not seem to me to be the law. He says ([1894] 2 Ch. at p. 607):

> "In a case of this kind, where, after the death of trader, the business is carried on by the executor for some time, and then ultimately there is a conflict between the creditors, properly so called, of the testator, and the creditors of the business, that is, of the executor who carries on the business out of the assets of the testator, then it is for the creditors of the business to show, if they can, that the business was carried on with the assent of the creditors of the testator, or for the creditors of the testator to show the contrary. The creditors of the testator have their own remedy: they can step in at any time. They must be presumed to know of the death of the testator, and that the business is being carried on by the executor, and the law says that that cannot be done without their assent."

With great respect to the learned judge, that is a proposition which cannot be maintained. He goes on to say:

> "Therefore, if they have not interfered, they must be treated as having assented, and the indemnity of the executrix follows by reason of their assent."

In so far as that illustration—that mere standing by, mere knowledge, amounts to giving of assent—I cannot concur in that view; and I think that the dictum, or decision if you like, is one which cannot be the law. The Master of the Rolls in Ireland in Re Hodges, Hodges v. Hodges (2) really follows, I think, what KEKEWICH, J., said. He takes the same view that mere knowledge and abstaining from interference is sufficient, that the right of the creditor like any other right may be prejudiced, be lost by acquiescence and by neglect. And he says: "It may be a case where the creditors have forfeited their rights by laches or acquiescence." With great respect to the learned Master of the Rolls I think that in following the decision of KEKEWICH, J., he was following a decision which we ought not to consider as good law and which so far as it is necessary ought to be overruled by us.

I do not refer to the bankruptcy case of Re Millard, Ex parte Yates (3), in which two of the lords justices differing from LORD ESHER took a view which seems to me quite inconsistent with the new creditors' case here. There it was plain that there was acquiescence and knowledge. But this court, or the majority of this court, took the view that that was not such evidence of consent to the carrying on of a business for the benefit of the original creditors as was sufficient. They held there, and RIGBY, L.J., in particular, held there as I hold here, that the business was not carried on for the benefit of the creditors of the testator. I have no doubt that in the present case the business was carried on in good faith for the benefit of the widow and the family of the testator, who, for three or four years had been maintained out of the assets. Therefore, for the reasons that I have given, this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—Where a trader dies leaving assets including his business, and leaving creditors including his trade creditors, the rights of his creditors are to have his assets realised in due course of administration and applied in pay ment of their debts. The dead man may or may not by his will have directed or authorised his executors to carry on his business. Whether he has done so is to the creditors perfectly immaterial. The present is a case in which there was no direction in the will to carry on the business. But in point of fact, the executors have carried on the business, and there arises a contest as between creditors who have become such after the testator's death in carrying on the business, and those who were creditors at the time of the testator's death. The latter creditors claim to be paid in priority by virtue of the assertion of the right of the executors to indemnity out of the assets for the liabilities of the business. That is the question which has been argued before us.

I only propose to say something upon two points which have been argued. The first is this. It is said that by certain letters written in December a claim was made on behalf of the creditors of the old business to all the assets as they had become in carrying on the business after the death of the testator. No doubt if the old creditors—those who were creditors of the testator himself—make a claim, as they did in Dowse v. Gorton (4), to the assets of the business as carried on by the executors—if they claim to be entitled to the assets of the business as there found at a later date when executors have carried on the business—it may well be that by so doing they are adopting the acts of the executors in carrying on the business by saying that the assets thus acquired are their assets. That has not taken place in the present case. What took place was that the old creditors issued their writ for administration of the estate of their testator. They took a common administration judgment directing inquiries; an account of what was due to the creditors; an account of the funeral expenses; an account of the testator's personal estate coming to the hands of the executors of his will, and so on; and an inquiry as to the outstanding personal estate. They obtained an order for a receiver which was limited in the same way to a receivership of the assets of the testator. The letters which are relied upon are two, perhaps three, in which the receiver, I agree, put forward a claim to the assets as they were at the time after the carrying on of the business, and it is said that something arises upon that. To my mind nothing arises upon it at all. The receiver either was or was not entitled to those assets. In my view of the case, he was not entitled to those assets. He was a receiver of the assets of the testator at the time of his death and as now to be found, and the claim put forward by the receiver had no effect at all, as regards determining any question whether or not the old creditors had assented to the carrying on of the business. I put aside, therefore, any contention which is raised upon those letters of the receiver.

The second point is the main one of the present case. The death was in August, 1908, and the business was carried on until 1912, a period of four years. I agree that that was a substantial time. The proposition which has been argued before us may be expressed thus. If, with knowledge on the part of the old creditors, the business has been carried on and the old creditors have not interfered, that amounts to an assent to the business being carried on by the executors for the estate with the result that the executors are entitled to be indemnified out of the estate, and, consequently, the creditors of the subsequent business are entitled to avail themselves of that. In my opinion, there is no authority for that proposition at all. You must express the assent which is referred to in either one of three ways. You may mean assent to carrying on the business in fact; or you may mean assent to carrying on the business for the old creditors as agents of the old creditors; or you may mean assent to carrying on the business for the estate of which the old creditors are creditors, and against which they have a right to resort. The most you can get out of knowledge and absence of action of any kind is assent to carrying on the business in fact. The position is, that an old creditor is entitled to say: "You must not carry on this business; you are doing it wrongfully as against me." By doing nothing he is simply abstaining from exercising a right of action which he would have. He would be entitled to insist that the business should be stopped and sold, and that he should be paid. But there is a long step from saying that by not intervening and insisting upon the business being stopped he has assented to the executors carrying on the business either as agent for him so as to make him liable, or that he assented to its being carried on for the estate in the sense of acquiring further assets which would fall into the fund out of which he, as creditor, is entitled to be paid. The argument that mere knowledge and absence of action one way or the other in any way precludes the old creditor from saying that he stands upon his original rights, is altogether inconsistent with Dowse v. Gorton (4).

The Master of the Rolls has already made observations upon Re Brooke, Brooke v. Brooke (1), which is KEKEWICH, J.'s decision, and Re Hodges, Hodges v. Hodges (2), which is a decision in Ireland. I do not think it necessary that I should say more than that I entirely agree with what the Master of the Rolls has just said. KEKEWICH, J., says this ([1894] 2 Ch. at p. 607):

> "Therefore, if they [the creditors] have not interfered, they must be treated as having assented, and the indemnity of the executrix follows by reason of their assent."

With all respect to the learned judge, I do not think that that is a correct statement of the law. In order to introduce the principle of Dowse v. Gorton (4) you must establish that the old creditor has so acted either by claiming as he did in Dowse v. Gorton (4) the assets of the new business or by affirmative acts by which he adopts the act of the executors in carrying on the business as to show that he has abandoned that which is, primâ facie, his rights. That which has been asserted by the plaintiffs in the present case is to have the assets of their testator administered in due course for payment of their debts. Or, if the creditor has assented to another course—namely, that the fund to which he is entitled to look should be risked in trade with the result that there may be loss or there may be further additions made for his benefit, the principle of Dowse v. Gorton (4) will apply. It seems to me that you must show an active affirmative assent, and that merely standing by with knowledge and doing nothing is not sufficient. For these reasons this appeal fails.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I agree that this appeal fails. In Dowse v. Gorton (4) the Court of Appeal, and the House of Lords, affirming with a variation the order of the Court of Appeal, held that where a man carrying on business dies and leaves a will and the executors carry on the business in continuation the executors may in respect of liabilities which they incur in carrying on that business have a right to an indemnity out of the assets of the testator's estate, and new creditors with whom the executors contract may stand in the shoes of the executors by having that indemnity, and that indemnity is a charge upon the assets of the testator, which will come in priority to the claims of the testator's creditors. That will happen, in one event which is thus stated by LORD HERSCHELL and in slightly different language by LORD MACNAGHTEN in the House of Lords, LORD HANNEN, the third learned Lord concurring with the other judges. LORD HERSCHELL puts it in this way ((1891), A.C. at p. 200):

> "Under the circumstances I think the proper inference is that the businesses were not merely continued for the benefit of those interested under the will, but that they were also carried on with the assent of the representatives of Luke Turner [a creditor] for the purpose of securing the payment of the debt due to them."

LORD MACNAGHTEN states that the question is whether or not the testator's businesses were continued for the benefit of his creditors.

That is the principle of law, and we have to apply that principle of law to the facts of the present case. It must be done with the consent—or assent, if you like—of the testator's creditors recognising the business as being carried on for their benefit and assenting to its being so carried on. In Re Millard, Ex parte Yates (3) the members of the Court of Appeal differed as to the precise effect of the facts. But they all agreed that there must be consent of the creditor or that the business should be carried on. Unfortunately, in Re Brooke, Brooke v. Brooke (1), KEKEWICH, J., thought that there was a further canon implied by the House of Lords' decision, and that standing by with knowledge was to be deemed to be consent—not to be a portion of the evidence of consent, but to be deemed to be consent. And in Re Hodges, Hodges v. Hodges (2) the Master of the Rolls in Ireland thought it becoming to follow the decision of another court of first instance, that of KEKEWICH, J., in Re Brooke, Brooke v. Brooke (1). I agree with the other members of the court that those two decisions go a great deal further than is warranted by the decision of the House of Lords in Dowse v. Gorton (4). They laid down a canon which is not a true canon in these matters. It still remains a question of fact whether or not the old creditors of the testator have consented to the business being carried on for their advantage. That being a pure question of fact, I think that the learned judge in the court below came to a right decision in the present case. For it was not proved here that the old creditors of the testator had consented or assented to the carrying on of the testator's business at all. Much less had they assented to its being carried on for their advantage. Therefore, I agree with the judgment of JOYCE, J.

Appeal dismissed.

R. LESLIE, LTD. v. SHIELL

[Reported [1914] 3 K.B. 607; 83 L.J.K.B. 1145; 111 L.T. 106; 30 T.L.R. 460; 58 Sol. Jo. 453]

Infant—Tort—Liability for—Fraudulent misrepresentation—Tort directly connected with void contract—Loan obtained during infancy by representation that infant of full age—Money no longer in infant's possession—Recovery of amount of loan in action for money had and received—Equitable relief.

An infant obtained loans from a firm of moneylenders by a fraudulent misrepresentation that he was of full age.

Held: the infant was not liable to repay the loans either as damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, or as moneys had and received by him to the use of the lenders, or on the ground that he was compellable in equity to refund the moneys which he had obtained by fraud.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of HORRIDGE, J.

The plaintiffs, a registered firm of moneylenders, brought an action against the defendant claiming £475 as damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, and, alternatively, as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs. The action was tried before HORRIDGE, J., and a jury, and the jury, in answer to a question left to them by the learned judge, found that the plaintiffs were induced to make two loans of £200 each by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendant that he was of full age. On further consideration, HORRIDGE, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs, with costs, for £400, on the ground that a court of equity would not allow an infant to retain what he had obtained by fraud and would order restitution to be made by the infant. The defendant appealed.

H. Dobb for the defendant.

J. B. Matthews, K.C., for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 6, 1914. The following judgments were read.

LORD SUMNER.—At the time of the transaction in question the defendant was an infant; he succeeded in deceiving some moneylenders by telling them a lie about his age, and so got them to lend him £400 on the faith of his being adult. Perhaps they were simpler than moneylenders mostly are; perhaps this infant looked unusually mature. At any rate, when they awoke to the fact that they could not enforce their bargain and sought to recover the £400 paid, charging him with fraud, the jury found that the defendant had been guilty of fraud, and he does not now complain of the verdict. On further consideration HORRIDGE, J., gave judgment against him for the full amount of the money that he received. It is not a pretty story to begin life with, and one might have expected that the defendant's chief anxiety would have been to live it down, but money is money, and I suppose £400 is more than he cares to pay, or rather to repay, if he can manage to avoid it. Accordingly, he appeals, alleging that there is no process of law by which the moneylenders can get their money back from him, and if this is so he must succeed on this appeal.

The claim first pleaded is for the amount of principle and interest as damages sustained, because by his fraud the plaintiffs have been induced to make and act upon an unenforceable contract. As long ago as Johnson v. Pye (1) it was decided that, although an infant may be liable in tort generally, he is not answerable for a tort directly connected with a contract which, as an infant, he would be entitled to avoid.

> "One cannot make an infant liable for the breach of a contract by changing the form of action to one ex delicto":

per BYLES, J., in Burnard v. Haggis (2) (32 L.J.C.P. at p. 191). A married woman, says POLLOCK, C.B., in Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association v. Fairhurst (3) (9 Exch. at p. 429), speaking before the common law had been altered by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is > "liable for frauds committed by her on any person, as for any other personal wrongs. But when the fraud is directly connected with the contract with the wife, and is the means of affecting it, and parcel of the same transaction, the wife cannot be responsible, and the husband be sued for it together with the wife. If this were allowed it is obvious that the wife would lose the protection which the law gives her against contracts made by her during coverture, for there is not a contract of any kind which a feme covert could make, whilst she knew her husband to be alive, that could not be treated as a fraud. For every such contract would involve in itself a fraudulent representation of her capacity to sue. . . . In the case of an infant it was held, for a similar reason, that he could not be made liable for a fraudulent representation that he was of full age, whereby the plaintiff was induced to contract with him. . . . If the action should be maintainable 'all the pleas of infancy would be taken away, for such affirmations are in every contract.'"

The Chief Baron's quotation is from Johnson v. Pye (1). As LORD KENYON, C.J., says (8 Term. Rep. at pp. 336, 337) in Jennings v. Rundall (4) alluding to Zouch d. Abbot and Hallet v. Parsons (5):

> "This protection was to be used as a shield and not as a sword; therefore, if an infant commit an assault or utter slander, God forbid that he should not be answerable for it in a court of justice. But when an infant has made an improvident contract with a person who has been wicked enough to contract with him, such person cannot resort to a court of law to enforce such contract."

It is, perhaps, a pity that no exception was made where, as here, the infant's wickedness was at least equal to that of the person who innocently contracted with him, but so it is. It was thought necessary to safeguard the weakness of infants at large, even though here and there a juvenile rogue slipped through. The rule is well settled. No action of deceit lay against the present defendant, and this claim was abandoned, but for the purpose of this case it is important to observe the principles on which an infant's immunity is established in this regard. Nor does the other cause of action pleaded fare any better. To the claim for the principal moneys paid to the infant under the contract that failed as for money had and received to the plaintiffs' use there are at least two answers: the infancy itself was an answer before 1874 at common law, and the Infants Relief Act, 1874, is an answer now. An action for money had and received against an infant has been sustained where in substance the cause of action was ex delicto: Bristow v. Eastman (6), approved before 1874; Re Seager (7), and cited without disapproval in Cowern v. Nield (8). Even this has been doubted. But when the substance of the cause of action is contractual it is certainly otherwise. To money had and received and other indebitatus counts infancy was a defence just as to any other action in contract: Alton v. Midland Rail. Co. (9), per WILLES, J. (34 L.J.C.P. at pp. 297, 298); Re Jones, Ex parte Jones (10), per JESSEL, M.R. (18 Ch.D. at p. 118); DICEY ON PARTIES, p. 284; BULLEN AND LEAKE'S PRECEDENTS OF PLEADING (3rd Edn.), p. 605. Further, under the statute the principle which at common law relieved an infant from liability for a tort directly connected with a voidable contract—namely, that it was impossible to enforce in a roundabout way an unenforceable contract—equally forbids courts of law to allow, under the name of an implied contract or in the form of an action quasi ex contractu, a proceeding to enforce part of a contract which the statute declares to be wholly void. This has been recently illustrated in the closely analogous case of a claim on the footing of money had and received for moneys paid and irrecoverable under what in law was a lending and borrowing ultra vires: Sinclair v. Brougham (11).

The ground on which HORRIDGE, J., held the defendant liable was that by reason of his fraud he was compellable in equity to repay the money actually received and professedly borrowed and compellable too by a judgment in personam for the amount, not by any mere proprietary remedy. The rule in equity has been so stated at times by text-book writers, both remote and recent: FONBLANQUE'S EQUITY (1820, 5th Edn.), p. 177; ROSCOE'S NISI PRIUS (16th Edn.), 672; WACE ON BANKRUPTCY (1904), p. 6, but of authority for it there is very little. In Esron v. Nicholas (12), a decision of LORD KING'S, was much relied upon. He is reported to have said, "infants have no privilege to cheat men"—a wholesome truth indeed, but I should hardly call it a principle. The case was examined by KNIGHT BRUCE, V.C., in Stikeman v. Dawson (13), who concluded that the facts as reported do not support the decree as made. He procured the note in the registrar's book and found it impracticable to appreciate the decision without knowing the evidence and the pleadings in full. It is a case in which an infant stood by (apparently without actual fraud) while his guardians or a person purporting to be his guardian granted a lease. He received or took the benefit of the fine, but when he came of age he repudiated the lease. In a suit to compel him either to grant the plaintiff a new lease or refund the fine, the decree was that if he did not grant the lease he should pay back the fine. This seems to be the converse of a line of decisions, both at law and in equity, the gist of which is that a person who takes and keeps property cannot rely on infancy to release him from its burdens, especially if sued when of age as in some instances was the case: Year Book, 2 Hen. 6, 31 B.; Kirton v. Eliott (14); Earl of Buckinghamshire v. Drury (15); Evelyn v. Chichester (16); Lemprière v. Lange (17). Whatever may be thought of some of these decisions, they do not touch the present case. There is a long gap in the cases relied upon after Esron v. Nicholas (12).

For a very long time and in many forms equity has interfered to give relief against frauds committed by infants, or has refused it to infants guilty of fraud, but the practice and even the principles applicable to such cases were long ill-defined. KNIGHT BRUCE, V.C., in Stikeman v. Dawson (13), said (1 De G. & Sm. at p. 109):

> "An infant, however generally for his own sake protected by an incapacity to bind himself by contracts, may be doli capax in a civil sense, and for civil purposes, in the view of a court of equity, though perhaps only when pubertati proximus or older, and not, I suppose, at so early an age as in a criminal sense, and for criminal purposes, and may therefore commit a fraud for which, or for the consequence of which, he may after his majority be made civilly answerable in equity. . . . I agree that in what cases in particular a court of equity will thus exert itself is not easy to determine."

Though many cases have been decided on this subject none has been cited to us till one in last year, in which the decision has directly been that the defendant must pay back under a judgment purely in personam a sum equal to that which he obtained during infancy under a purported contract of lending or borrowing, which was entered into by the lender on the faith of the borrower's fraudulent assertion that he was of full age.

There are, however, some dicta of importance and some decisions which are alleged to bear indirectly on the point. In Nelson v. Stocker (18), TURNER, L.J., says (4 De G. & J. at p. 464):

"If the case had depended simply upon the point of the defendant having represented himself to be of age when he was not of age, I should have felt no doubt about it. . . . Infants are no more entitled than adults are to gain benefits to themselves by fraud, and had the case therefore depended upon this point alone I should have agreed more fully with the decision of the Vice-Chancellor," which was that the defendant should be decreed to pay £1,000 under his covenant made when an infant to place that sum in the hands of trustees contained in a marriage settlement executed by him and by other parties after he had fraudulently represented himself to be of full age. As, however, the party to the settlement who was most concerned, namely, the infant's wife, knew the truth, the lords justices allowed the appeal. It will be seen that the actual decision in Nelson v. Stocker (18) does not touch the present case, nor does the dictum if its principle be estoppel after majority against denying the truth of the statement made when under age, as explained by SIR FORD NORTH in Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (19) (L.R. 30 Ind. App. at p. 122): and see Wright v. Snowe (20). The observations of the Court of Appeal in Levene v. Brougham (21), that then there would be no such estoppel, were made apparently without a citation of any of these cases, but in any case the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, would be an answer to estoppel.

Much reliance was placed on Re King, Ex parte Unity Joint Stock Mutual Banking Association (22), with which should be read the comments on it in Re Jones, Ex parte Jones (10), by BACON, C.J. (18 Ch.D. at p. 115) (which are in point though his actual decision was overruled), and by BAGGALLAY, L.J. (ibid. at p. 123). In that case the debtor King, while under age, had obtained advances from the association by a fraudulent misrepresentation that he was of full age. He was adjudicated bankrupt after he came of age and the association was admitted to prove in the bankruptcy for the amount advanced. The lord justice arrived at this conclusion somewhat reluctantly on the authority of uncited decisions of LORD COWPER, LORD HARDWICKE and LORD THURLOW. LORD COWPER's case is probably Watts v. Creswell (23), in which he says that if an infant is old enough and cunning enough to carry on a fraud, he ought in a court of equity to make satisfaction for it. LORD HARDWICKE's opinion may be that in Earl of Buckinghamshire v. Drury (15) (2 Eden, at p. 71)—"minors are not allowed to take advantage of infancy to support a fraud"—against which should be set LORD MANSFIELD's more particular statement in the same case (ibid. at p. 72) that if the infant "took an estate, and was to pay rent for it, he should not hold the estate, and defend himself against payment of the rent, by pretence of infancy."

The allusion to LORD THURLOW, probably, is to Beckett v. Cordley (24), where he said (1 Bro. C.C. at p. 358), "if there was fraud, of which the infant was conusant, she would be bound as much as an adult." If these be the authorities relied on in Re King (22), and I can find none nearer, they hardly touch the decision in that case, nor do they or the decision itself in Re King (22) affect the case now before us. There the bankruptcy standing unchallenged and the question being how the assets should be administered among competing creditors or claimants, it was held that persons who had been defrauded by the bankrupt when under age and thereby induced to lend him money had a claim on his assets, not against him personally, which was available in competition with creditors in the full sense of the word. It is clear that JESSEL, M.R., thought the decision anomalous and one not to be extended Re Jones, Ex parte Jones (10). Since then it has been decided in R. v. Wilson (25) that an infant cannot be convicted under s. 12 of the Debtors' Act, 1869 [see now s. 159 of Bankruptcy Act, 1914], of quitting the country fraudulently with property that ought to be divided among his creditors, since in law he has none. Whatever may be said of Re King (22) now, it does not govern the present case, but it must be admitted that the language of the lords justices is hardly consistent with any other view than that the bankrupt was in equity personally liable to pay the debt in question. There is further language of a similar kind in Maclean v. Dummett (26) (22 L.T.R. at p. 711), where the Privy Council speaks of an infant as "contracting debts" in his trade by fraudulently asserting himself to be of full age, but this again is not necessary to the decision.

These seem to be all the material dicta. As to the cases, Clarke v. Cobley (27) was one in which the court restored the status quo affected by an infant's fraud by ordering him to return promissory notes, the surrender of which he had procured by falsely stating that he was of age and by putting him under terms not to plead the Statute of Limitations if sued upon them, but a decree against him to pay the amount of the notes, though he was now of age, was expressly refused. In Cory v. Gertcken (28), when SIR T. PLUMER, V.-C., says (2 Madd. at p. 49),

> "though in general a payment to an infant may be bad, yet if the infant practises a fraud he is liable for the consequences,"

he only decided that a person could not make his trustee pay over again a sum that he had got from him by fraudulently representing himself while still an infant to be already of full age, and in Chubb v. Griffiths (29) LORD ROMILLY, M.R., when saddling an infant defendant with costs who had been passing off his safes as "Chubb's safes," says that he does so on the principle laid down in Cory v. Gertcken (28). What he conceived this principle to be I can hardly tell, but at any rate it is not a general liability in equity for fraud. JESSEL, M.R., in Re Jones, Ex parte Jones (10) (18 Ch.D. at p. 118), regards Cory v. Gertcken (28) as a pure action of tort. The grounds of an infant defendant's liability for costs were again discussed in Woolf v. Woolf (30), another case of similar dishonesty, and the liability was rested on the above principle and authority also without any hint of a wider one that in equity an infant is generally liable for fraud. I think that the whole current of decisions down to 1913, apart from dicta which are inconclusive, went to show that when an infant obtained an advantage by falsely stating himself to be of full age, equity required him to restore his ill-gotten gains or to release the party received from obligations or acts in law induced by the fraud, but scrupulously stopped short of enforcing against him a contractual obligation entered into while he was an infant even by means of a fraud. This applies even to Re King (22). Restitution stopped where repayment began, as KINDERSLEY, V.-C., puts it in Vaughan v. Vandercstegen (31), an analogous case, "you take the property to pay the debt."

In 1914 in Stocks v. Wilson (32) an infant who had obtained furniture from the plaintiff by falsely stating that he was of age and had sold part of it for £30, was personally adjudged by LUSH, J., to pay this £30 as part of the relief granted to the plaintiff. This is the case which more than any other influenced HORRIDGE, J., in the court below. I think it is plain that LUSH, J., conceived himself to be merely applying the equitable principle of restitution. The form of the claim was that, by way of equitable relief, the infant should be ordered to pay the reasonable value of the goods which he could not restore because he had sold them. The argument was that equity would not allow him to keep the goods and not pay for them, that if he kept the property he must discharge the burden, and that he could not better his position by having put it out of his power to give up the property. LUSH, J., expressly said that it was a jurisdiction to compel the infant to make satisfaction, and the remedy was not on the contract. He said ([1913] 2 K.B. at pp. 242, 243):

> "What the court of equity has done in cases of this kind is to prevent the infant from retaining the benefit of what he has obtained by reason of his fraud. It has done no more than this, and this is a very different thing from making him liable to pay damages or compensation for the loss of the other party's bargain. If the infant has obtained property by fraud he can be compelled to restore it."

But now comes the proposition which applies to the present case, and is open to challenge. "if he has obtained money he can be compelled to refund it." The learned judge thought that the fundamental principle in Re King (22) was a liability to account for the money obtained by the fraudulent representation, and that in the case before him there must be a similar liability to account for the proceeds of the sale of the goods obtained by this fraud. If this be the ratio decidendi, though I have difficulty in seeing what liability to account there can be, and certainly none is named in Re King (22), the decision is distinguishable from the present case and is independent of the above dictum, and I need express no opinion about it. In the present case there is clearly no accounting. There is no fiduciary relation. The money was paid over in order to be used as the defendant's own, and he has so used and, I suppose, spent it. There is no question of tracing it, no possibility of restoring the very thing got by the fraud, nothing but a compulsion through a personal judgment to pay an equivalent sum out of his present or future resources, in a word nothing but a judgment in debt to repay the loan. I think this would be nothing but enforcing a void contract. So far as I can find the Court of Chancery never would have enforced any liability under circumstances like the present any more than a court of law would have done, and I think that no ground can be found for the present judgment, which would be an answer to the Infants Relief Act, 1874. Accordingly, the appeal succeeds. The judgment must be set aside and entered for the defendant. He will have the costs here, where he succeeded, and of the further consideration below where he ought to have succeeded. Further than this there should be no costs given him. He cannot be made to pay the costs of the action in which he was entitled to judgment, but I think as he was charged with fraud and found guilty of it, he must pay the costs of that issue to be set off against such costs as he gets, and as to any other general costs of the action which must be small, I think there is good ground for saying that there be no order for payment on either side.

KENNEDY, L.J.—The plaintiffs, a firm of moneylenders, sue in this action the defendant, an infant, claiming £475 and interest as damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, and, alternatively, £475 as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs. The alleged misrepresentation was a statement of the defendant that he was of age, made by him in order to induce the plaintiffs to lend him, as they did, two sums of £200 each in December, 1911. The case was heard by HORRIDGE, J., sitting with a common jury. The verdict was that the plaintiffs were induced to make both loans by the fraudulent misrepresentation. HORRIDGE, J., has held that an action ex delicto raising a claim for damages for fraud would not lie against an infant when, as in this case, the fraud was an inducement to the contract the non-performance of which was the basis of the pecuniary injury for which the plaintiffs claim compensation in damages. This, in my judgment, was clearly right. The law is well put by SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK in his PRINCIPLES OF CONTRACT (8th Edn.), p. 78:

> "He [i.e., the infant] cannot be sued for a wrong when the cause of action is in substance ex contractu, or is so directly connected with the contract that the action would be an indirect way of enforcing the contract—which, as in the analogous case of married women, the law does not allow. . . . But if an infant's wrongful act, though concerned with the subject-matter of a contract, and such that but for the contract there would have been no opportunity of committing it, is nevertheless independent of the contract in the sense of not being an act of the kind contemplated by it, then the infant is liable."

The first proposition was established as long ago as 1665 in Johnson v. Pye (1), and is dwelt upon by the judges of the King's Bench in Jennings v. Rundall (4). The second is illustrated, in regard to an infant, by Burnard v. Haggis (2) in 1863, and in regard to the analogous case of a married woman who has represented herself as a feme sole or sui juris by the judgments of the Court of Exchequer pronounced by POLLOCK, C.B., in Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association v. Fairhurst (3), in 1854.

In regard to the second and alternative claim in this action—a claim as pleaded for £475 as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs, which the learned judge has in his judgment reduced to £400, by the omission, I presume, of interest, I am equally of opinion that the plaintiff's case cannot be maintained. I venture, with all due deference to the fact of the citation of it with approval in 1889 by KAY, J., in Re Seager (7), and by my brother PHILLIMORE in 1912 in Cowern v. Nield (8), to doubt whether in Bristow v. Eastman (6), tried by LORD KENYON, where an infant had fraudulently converted moneys of the plaintiff to his own use, and, therefore, there was a good cause of action, and substantially ex delicto, and wholly independent of contract, the plaintiffs' claim if and so far as it depended on an indebitatus count upon which the plaintiff was entitled to succeed, ought to have prevailed against a plea of infancy. Be that as it may, I am certainly of opinion that in the present case, where the defendant is an infant and the cause of action is in substance ex contractu and is so directly connected with the contract of loan that the action would be an indirect way of enforcing that contract so far as regards the principal money lent, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover up their alternative common law claim for money had and received by the defendants for their use. I think that this would be so, as the law stood before 1874, and further that to hold otherwise now would be improperly to open the door to a serious inroad upon the statutory provisions of the Infants Relief Act, 1874, ss. 1 and 2, and the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892, s. 5. It appears to me that HORRIDGE, J., intended so to hold, and to dismiss the plaintiffs' claim not only so far as it rested on the claim for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, but also so far as it rested on the claim on an implied contract for money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs. I think that is so, although he gave judgment for the plaintiffs in an action in which those were the only claims pleaded, and so far as the report informs us, no amendment of the plaintiffs' pleadings was asked for or granted. Reading the concluding portion of the judgment commencing with the words

> "There remains, however, the question whether or not a court of equity would order restitution to be made by an infant who had obtained property by fraud"

(29 T.L.R. at p. 555), I think that the learned judge, having all the facts and the finding of the jury before him, held that the just and proper course was, without requiring any formal amendment, to treat the plaintiffs as entitled to base their claim upon an assertion such as was pleaded by the plaintiff in the recent case of Stocks v. Wilson (32), before LUSH, J., to which HORRIDGE, J., expressly refers in an earlier passage in his judgment. Such a course was, in my opinion, not only unobjectionable, but right.

We have, therefore, to consider in this court whether or not the defendant lay under such an equitable liability to the plaintiffs as entitled them to the judgment for £400 which the learned judge has entered in their favour. Now beyond all question there are cases in which a court of equity will interfere to prevent the fraud of an infant, such as an express misrepresentation of full age, from working an injustice. There is, at the same time, excellent authority for declining to define in positive terms the range of such interference. In Stikeman v. Dawson (13), a case in 1847 referred to by counsel in the course of their arguments, KNIGHT BRUCE, V.C., after quoting certain language of ULPIAN and PAULUS to show the view of the civil law in regard to the fraud of infants, proceeded thus (1 De G. & Sm. at p. 109):

> "Unquestionably it is the law of England, that an infant, however generally for his own sake protected by an incapacity to bind himself by contracts, may be doli capax in a civil sense, and for civil purposes, in the view of a court of equity, though perhaps only when pubertati proximus or older, and not, I suppose, at so early an age as in a criminal sense and for criminal purposes, and may, therefore, commit a fraud for which, or the consequence of which, he may after his majority be made civilly liable in equity. I am not now speaking of cases in which infants, if liable at all, are liable at law only, or in which adults, if suable in respect of acts done during infancy, are suable at law only. But as far as equity is concerned, the practical application of the rule or doctrine to which I have just been referring must not seldom, I conceive, be matter of much delicacy and difficulty. I agree with a learned author, who says, that in what cases in particular a court of equity will thus exert itself it is not easy to determine."

I shall certainly not embark upon an adventure of which so eminent a master of equity as KNIGHT BRUCE, V.C., has spoken thus discouragingly. Happily, it is not necessary to do so for the decision of the present case. We have not to discover to what other cases the rule or doctrine ought to be held to extend, but whether there is either apparent principle or binding judicial authority for its application to this particular case, in which the plaintiffs have been held by HORRIDGE, J., entitled in virtue of it to obtain by an action in personam repayment from an infant of the principal money owing to them under a contract of loan into which the lenders were induced to enter by a fraudulent representation of the borrower that he was of full age. After a careful consideration of the numerous reported decisions which have been brought to our attention by the industry of counsel, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment by HORRIDGE, J., cannot be supported.

I am not satisfied that the rule or doctrine of equity referred to by KNIGHT BRUCE, V.C., has ever been so applied. LORD SUMNER in his judgment, which I have had the opportunity of reading, has so fully and, in my humble judgment, so satisfactorily dealt with the equity cases and the judicial dicta on which the plaintiffs' counsel sought to find support from the judgment in their favour, as well as the recent judgment of LUSH, J., in Stocks v. Wilson (32), that it is quite needless for me to consider those cases or those dicta in detail. I desire, however, to add a few further observations. In the first place, it appears to me that while courts of equity have interfered to make an infant restore property found in his possession which he had obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation, as, e.g., the promissory notes in the old case of Clarke v. Cobley (27); to compel the recognition, in regard to property in his possession, of rights and interests of persons whom he has misled into entering into transactions in regard to it (cf. Watts v. Creswell (23)); and to prevent the payment over again to the infant of moneys of which he has procured the payment already by a representation of full age, as in Cory v. Gertcken (28), there is no case in which I can find that a court of equity has given judgment against an infant in circumstances like the present—that is to say, has interfered on the ground of the fraud of the infant whereby he induced the making of a contract of loan—to order the infant to pay the plaintiff a sum equal to the sum borrowed under the void contract, and so in effect, to the amount of the principal lent, to give validity as against the infant to a void contract. In the next place, I desire to say that in my view, while there are no doubt dicta in the judgments of the lords justices in Re King, Ex parte Unity Joint Stock Mutual Banking Association (22), upon which the plaintiffs in this case naturally lay stress, the decision ought, as I understand the judgment of LINDLEY, J., in Miller v. Blankley (33) (38 L.T. at p. 530)—and the language used by JESSEL, M.R., in the later case of Re Jones, Ex parte Jones (10) appears to me to be in accord—to be treated as expressing the law in bankruptcy and not as expressing a doctrine of general application. The action in Miller v. Blankley (33) was an action of debt against a builder for goods supplied. He pleaded infancy as a defence. The plaintiff's counsel relied upon Re King, Ex parte Unity Joint Stock Mutual Banking Association (22). In the course of his judgment LINDLEY, J., said (38 L.T. at p. 530):

"We are now asked to carry further the doctrine which TURNER, L.J., in Re King (22) expressed his reluctance to act upon. He concurred, however, in the judgment of KNIGHT BRUCE, V.C.; and no doubt that case must be taken to decide that where an infant borrows money upon a fraudulent misrepresentation, and subsequently becomes bankrupt, the debt is provable in his bankruptcy. I think that is still law in bankruptcy, but we should not take the doctrine any further."

In my judgment, the nature of the claim in the present case is not one to which the equitable rule or doctrine invoked by the plaintiffs applies so as to make the action maintainable, and this appeal must be allowed. As to costs, I concur in the special order stated by the president of this court in his judgment.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J.—The plaintiff sues for £475: first, as damages for deceit; secondly, for money had and received to his use. The plaintiff is a money-lender who made loans to the defendant while he was an infant. He was induced to do so upon the faith of false representations made by the defendant as to his age. The defendant pleads his infancy. It was admitted that upon the authorities the cause of action in deceit must fail: Johnson v. Pye (1); Bartlett v. Wells (34).

The defendant was of an age when he would be responsible criminally and also for his torts independent of contract, but not for frauds in obtaining a contract, because to hold him responsible in damages for such frauds would in effect be to hold him responsible for the contract so obtained. It would be a simple thing for those who prey upon infants to obtain from them materials which could be used to support a charge of fraud as easy as obtaining the usual promissory note. The result would be that the infant would have both to establish his infancy and to face a charge of fraud. It has been the policy of the law to protect infants; they have been held incapable of binding themselves by their contracts, with certain exceptions not material to this case. That this is the law was admitted, but it was urged for the plaintiff that these considerations do not affect the claim for "money had and received." HORRIDGE, J., was induced to take the view, following a decision of LUSH, J., in Stocks v. Wilson (32), that there was in equity a right to relief to the extent of the money actually received. It was said for the plaintiff that the action for money had and received was not founded upon a promise implied by law, but rested upon what was called by counsel a "doctrine of equity." I do not think this argument is well founded. There are, no doubt, many cases in which equity will find relief against frauds perpetrated by infants. Wherever the infant requires as a plaintiff the assistance of any court, it will be refused until he has made good his fraudulent representation. Wherever the infant is still in possession of any property which he has obtained by his fraud he will be made to restore it to its former owner. But I think it is incorrect to say that he can be made to repay money which he has spent, merely because he received it under a contract induced by his fraud.

The contracts of an infant which were formerly voidable only, are now by the Infants Relief Act, 1874, made absolutely void. He is further protected in respect of loans by the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892, ss. 3, 4, and 5. These statutes are as binding upon the equitable as they are upon the common law jurisdiction of the court. I do not think it is correct to say that the action for money had and received is wholly independent of contract. It arises wherever money has been received which ex aequo et bono belongs to the plaintiff. In such case the law implies a promise to pay it to the plaintiff, but where the express promise to repay the money is by statute "absolutely void," it is impossible to imply a promise to repay the same money: see observations of JESSEL, M.R., in Re Jones, Ex parte Jones (10) (18 Ch.D. at p. 118). To do so would be to (in large part) defeat the policy of the statute, and would violate the well-established principle that where there is an express promise no other like promise can be implied. LORD MANSFIELD in Moses v. Macferlan (35) excepted debts "contracted during infancy" from the operation of the action for money had and received, showing that he regarded it as an action depending upon an implied promise.

None of the authorities cited to us, in my opinion, extended to establish the plaintiff's claim in this case. The judgment in Stocks v. Wilson (32) seems to treat the subsequent sale of property by the infant as wrongful and as affording a foundation for treating the money obtained thereby as received to the plaintiffs' use. If this had been so, if it had been a wrong independent of contract, it would no doubt have made a case in which the plaintiff could by waiving the tort have afforded a consideration for the implied promise to pay over the proceeds, and he could have recovered in the common law court "for money had and received." But this is rendered impossible by the judge's finding that the property in the goods had passed to the infant before he disposed of them (and, as to the major portion thereof, that he did so with the concurrence of the plaintiffs in the action). The really wrongful act was the obtaining the goods under the contract of purchase by the pretence that he was of full age; as to that it was admitted that he could not be sued in tort for the fraud. There was, therefore, no actionable tort independent of contract which could be waived to form the consideration for an implied promise. In Watts v. Creswell (23), which was relied upon, the fraudulent infant was in possession of the lands as to which he had misrepresented the title, and was setting up a former settlement upon himself to defeat the mortgagee under that title. It was held that he could not do so in equity without making satisfaction for the fraud. This is a long way from establishing anything like an equity to sue as for money had and received. If when the action is brought both the property and the proceeds are gone, I see no ground upon which a court of equity could have founded its jurisdiction. In Esron v. Nicholas (12) (which is very imperfectly reported) the defendant was ordered to pay a premium received while he was an infant in respect of a lease granted by a person whom he had falsely represented to be his guardian. He was now claiming to receive the rents and profits reserved under a subsequent lease of this very property granted by himself after he came of age. KNIGHT BRUCE, V.C., does not seem to have approved of the case (see Stikeman v. Dawson (13)), but at least it can be said that the infant's possession of the property and claim to set up the later lease and to receive the rents and profits thereof afforded a ground for the intervention of the court of equity. In Stikeman v. Dawson (13) the Vice-Chancellor, it is true, refuses relief against the infant upon the ground that he had made express misrepresentation; but there the infant was seeking to recover a certificate of shares which he had sold and handed over to the purchasers. In such a case, if fraud were established against the infant, there would be ground for equity to interfere to restrain him from receiving the certificate without making compensation for the money obtained by the fraud.

The only case which has been cited to us which gives rise to any difficulty is Re King, Ex parte Unity Joint Stock Banking Association (22), where a proof in bankruptcy was allowed in respect of a loan made to the bankrupt when an infant on the faith of a fraudulent misrepresentation that he was of full age. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., treated himself as bound by authority and the court reluctantly allowed the proof. I have examined all the cases cited on that occasion and cannot find that any one of them goes to the length supposed. The case may be applicable in bankruptcy, but certainly ought not to be extended generally so as to impair the protection which the law affords to infants. I think it cannot now be regarded as of general application: see R. v. Wilson (25); Re Jones, Ex parte Jones (10); Lovell and Christmas v. Beauchamp (36). If the cause of action for money had and received existed, I should expect to find ample authority for it, as whenever an honest moneylender lends to an infant he has probably been deceived as to the age of the borrower. I think this appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant.

Arbitration—Stay of legal proceedings—Allegation of fraud by plaintiff—Right of defendants to stay.

A building contract which had been entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants for the construction of sewerage works contained an arbitration clause which provided that if at any time any question, dispute, or difference should arise between the parties upon or in relation to or in connection with the contract, the matter should be referred to arbitration. During the progress of the works disputes arose between the parties mainly as to the nature of the site upon which the works were to be carried out, which the plaintiff alleged was different from that which he had been led to believe by the specification. The plaintiff having brought an action against the defendants claiming (inter alia) damages for fraudulent misrepresentation whereby he was induced to enter into the contract, the defendants took out a summons asking that all proceedings in the action be stayed and the matter be referred to arbitration.

Held: the action, being based on fraud, referred to matters wholly outside the powers of the arbitrator, with which he could not possibly deal, and so could not be said to be a question, dispute, or difference upon or in relation to or in connection with the contract and as such referable to arbitration under the arbitration clause.

Notes. As to refusal of an application to stay proceedings because of an arbitration clause, see 2 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn.) 26 et seq.; and for cases see 2 Digest (Repl.) 486 et seq.

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order of Lord Coleridge, J., in chambers.

The plaintiff claimed (i) damages for fraudulent misrepresentation by the defendants whereby the plaintiff was induced to enter into a contract with the defendants for sewerage and other works and suffered loss; (ii) an injunction restraining the defendants from using or in any way dealing with the plaintiff's plant and materials now on the defendant's premises; (iii) remuneration for work and labour done, money expended, and materials supplied by the plaintiff at the defendants' request; and (iv) a declaration that the contract made between the plaintiff and the defendants was void and should be rescinded. The material clauses in the contract dated Feb. 16, 1914, between the parties were:

"Clause 4. A borehole has been sunk upon the site, and it has been ascertained that the top 18 ft. of the subsoil consists of somewhat wet, very loose sand and clay, and below this depth the stratum is of stiff clay.

"Clause 129. If at any time any question, dispute, or difference shall arise between the council or their engineer and the contractor upon or in relation to or in connection with the contract, the matter shall be referred to and determined by the engineer, Mr. Edmund Herbert Stevenson, of No. 38, Parliament Street, Westminster, or, failing him, by a person to be mutually agreed upon, or, failing agreement, to some person appointed by the president for the time being of the Institution of Civil Engineers. Work under the contract shall continue during the arbitration proceedings. The award of the arbitrators shall be final and binding upon the parties. . . ."

On July 18, 1914, the plaintiff commenced the present action, and on July 27, 1914, the defendants took out a summons asking "that all further proceedings in this action be stayed pursuant to s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889." In support of this application the clerk to the defendant council made an affidavit in which he said that the matters in dispute and difference in the action were within the scope of the agreement to submit to arbitration and were fit and proper to be referred to and decided by arbitration pursuant to the terms of the said agreement and by the arbitrator to be appointed thereunder, and that at the time when the action was commenced the defendant council were and still remained ready and willing to do and concur in all things necessary for causing the said matters to be decided by arbitration under the said agreement and for the proper conduct of such arbitration. In his affidavit in reply the plaintiff said that the fraudulent misrepresentations alleged by him to have been made by the defendants whereby he was induced to enter into the contract were that the specification contained the statement (set out in cl. 4) that subsequently to his entering into the said contract he discovered that the above statement was untrue and that no borehole had been sunk on the site of the present works, and that the borehole which had been sunk had been sunk upon a different site some distance from that referred to in the specification; that he believed that the statement in the specification was false to the knowledge of the defendants and repudiated the contract, and he submitted that it was no longer binding upon him, and that therefore there was good and sufficient reason that the action should not be stayed. On the hearing of the summons before the master on Dec. 15, 1914, the plaintiff was cross-examined upon his affidavit, and the master said that he did not think any primâ facie case had been made out at all which would justify him in treating the contract as being at an end and the arbitration clause as having no effect. He did not think the plaintiff had formed any precise opinion about the nature of the soil or that he (the plaintiff) had gone into it in a way which would enable him to justify a charge of legal fraud against the defendants. It was not such a case as would justify him in refusing to stay the action, and, the defendants agreeing that the matter should not go to their engineer, it seemed to him that they would get a very good tribunal otherwise. The master accordingly made an order in terms of the summons, the defendants consenting that the dispute should be referred to a referee to be agreed, or, in default, to be nominated by the President of the Institute of Civil Engineers.

On Jan. 15, 1915, LORD COLERIDGE, J., made an order dismissing the plaintiff's appeal, being of opinion that the effect of the correspondence was to show that the plaintiff had affirmed the contract.

Holman Gregory, K.C. (Hinde with him), for the plaintiff.
Schiller, K.C., and Richardson for the defendants.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I think that this appeal must be allowed. A contract was entered into on Feb. 16, 1914, between the plaintiff and the defendants for the construction of sewerage and other works at Bognor. It contained an arbitration clause which was in the following terms: [HIS LORDSHIP read cl. 129.] The plaintiff, the contractor, was of opinion that he had been misled by a statement made in the specification that a borehole had been sunk upon the site upon which he was to build. The words in the specification were: [HIS LORDSHIP read cl. 4.] The plaintiff alleged that that was a fraudulent statement, that no borehole had ever been sunk upon the site upon which he was to build, and that the condition of the ground upon the site where he had to work was very different from that represented to have existed in the borehole. On that ground he brings this action. The plaintiff's claim is "for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation by the defendants whereby the plaintiff was induced to enter into a contract with the defendants for sewerage and other works at Bognor and has suffered loss, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from using or in any way dealing with the plaintiff's plant and materials now on the defendant's premises."

The defendants would only have a right to deal with materials and plants under the contract, and the plaintiff is asking for an injunction to prevent them from doing so. The claim then goes on:

"The plaintiff also claims for work and labour done, money expended, and materials supplied by the plaintiff for the defendants at their request."

The following amendment was subsequently made: "The plaintiff also claims a declaration that the said contract is void and that it be rescinded." The defendants applied to stay the action and to have it referred to arbitration under the arbitration clause. They filed an affidavit to which the plaintiff filed another affidavit in reply. He was cross-examined upon that affidavit before the master, who came to the conclusion that there was no ground for the charge of fraud. Now, I do not think that that was a question for the master at all.

The question was whether this action should be stayed. In my opinion this is in no sense of the word an action upon the contract at all. It is an action for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation which induced the plaintiff to enter into the contract, and it is also an action for an injunction to prevent the defendants from using or in any way dealing with the plaintiff's plant and material, and then, in the alternative, although not in terms so expressed, there is a claim for work and labour done upon a quantum meruit which he could not maintain if his contract were in existence, because he could then only sue for any instalments that might be due according to the terms of the contract. It is, therefore, in no sense an action on the contract at all. Nor do I think that it is an action in relation to or in connection with the contract. In one sense it is an action in relation to or in connection with the contract, because if there had never been any contract there would never have been any cause of action, there would never have been any representation, and there would never have been any claim for damages. But it is not in relation to or in connection with the contract, in my opinion, within the meaning of the arbitration clause. That being so, I think the action is with reference to matters wholly outside the powers of the arbitrator and with which he could not possibly deal. It may be a very bad action; the master thinks it is. The defendants, if they have a sufficiently strong opinion about it, and if they have sufficient materials to do so, have the power to apply to stay the action or to dismiss it on the ground of it being frivolous and vexatious, or on the ground that the claim discloses no cause of action, or that it is an abuse of the process of the court. They have all those steps that they can take if they think fit to do so. But that is not the point that we have to decide. What we have to decide is whether this is an action that ought to be brought within the provisions of the arbitration clause by being stayed and the dispute raised on it referred to arbitration within that clause. I do not think that it is an action which comes within the arbitration clause at all, and therefore I think there was no power to stay it, and it ought not to have been stayed. I think the master proceeded on a wrong basis. He said:

"I do not think this is a well-founded action. I think there is no case of fraud, and therefore I will stay the action and send it to arbitration—that is to say, I will send to arbitration something that the arbitrator has no power to deal with at all."

Then the learned judge dealt with it on another ground, not at all on the same ground as the master had decided it on, but upon this ground, that the plaintiff could not maintain the action by reason of the fact that he had, by a letter dated June 24, elected to affirm the contract, and therefore, could not sue for damages for the fraudulent misrepresentation which he alleged had induced him to enter into it; still less could he sue for rescission. That seems to me to be a matter which, if it be correct, is a matter to be decided in the action. It may show that the action cannot be maintained, but it does not show that the action is one which falls within the terms of the arbitration clause. I think the learned judge was wrong, and that his decision should be set aside. I do not know that any of the authorities are exactly on all fours with this case, but the case to which BANKES, L.J., referred of Kennedy, Ltd. v. Barrow-in-Furness Corpn. (1) seems to me to be very much in point and in principle the same as this case. I think the appeal should be allowed.

BANKES, L.J.—I agree. It seems to me that a person who takes out a summons such as this to stay proceedings on the ground that the question which is thereby raised ought to be referred to arbitration has, as the first step, to establish that the matter in question in the legal proceedings is one which is within the scope of the submission to arbitration, and that is the real question which has to be decided here. In the first place, one has to see what the matter in question in the legal proceedings is, and then to consider whether it comes within the scope of the submission to arbitration. Here the plaintiff has brought an action and endorsed his claim upon the writ. The defendants, without waiting for the statement of claim, which I think they might have done, have elected to take out a summons at once to stay the action of which the claim has been indorsed on the writ. I do not think the plaintiff ought to be in a better position because he has amended the writ. At the same time, I do not think that the amendment alters the character of the claim. It is a claim for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation whereby the plaintiff was induced to enter into a contract, and there are also claims for consequential relief, one of which is put in the form of a claim for work and labour done, but the essence of the claim is that the plaintiff is asserting that he was induced by fraud to enter into the contract, and that therefore the contract never was binding. If that is the nature of the claim, it seems to me plain that it does not come within the scope of the submission to arbitration, and it is no answer to say that the plaintiff has mistaken his remedy and ought not to have brought this form of claim which he cannot substantiate, and, if you look into it, you will find that he ought to have brought a different action altogether, and, if he had, it would have been plain that it came within the submission to arbitration. It seems to me that it is of no use saying that. The only point which we have to consider is whether the claim which is brought—whether it is good, bad, or indifferent—comes within the submission to arbitration. I am not saying it by way of encouragement, but it may be there are grounds upon which the defendants could satisfy the proper tribunal that the plaintiff's claim was frivolous and vexatious. They may be able to do so upon the ground which seems to have induced the master to take the action he did, or they may do it on the ground which seems to have induced the learned judge to take the view he did. As I said before, I am not saying it by way of encouragement, but those considerations which seem to have affected the master and the learned judge were material only, as it seems to me, if the question they had to consider was whether the case made was a frivolous and vexatious one and ought to have had no weight at all upon the question as to what the plaintiff's claim in fact was. One can only find out what the plaintiff's claim is by looking at the writ, if the matter has not gone beyond the writ, or his statement of claim if it has arrived at that stage. I think that the decisions both of the master and of the learned judge were founded upon a misapprehension of the real question which had to be decided, and however inconvenient it may be to the defendants, who naturally desire that any dispute shall be settled by arbitration, it seems to me that our only course is to allow this appeal and to say that the plaintiff's present claim is not within the scope of the submission to arbitration.

Appeal allowed.

Mortgage—Ranking—Mortgage of expectancy—Bankruptcy of mortgagor—Mortgagees not proving in bankruptcy—Further assignment of expectancy—Priority between mortgage and further assignment.

L. mortgaged his expectancy of a share in his mother's personal estate on intestacy to the N. Co. in 1905, and to A. in 1908. Later in 1908 L. was adjudicated bankrupt. Neither the N. Co. nor A proved in the bankruptcy. After his discharge L. made a further assignment of his expectancy to the plaintiffs. L.'s mother died intestate in 1918. The plaintiffs contended that the mortgages to the N. Co. and A. were of no value as their rights amounted only to contracts to assure in the future, and because of the bankruptcy L. had been released from the mortgage debts.

Held: (i) an assignment for value of future property bound the property directly it was acquired, automatically on the happening of the event, and without any further act on the part of the assignor, and did not merely rest in and amount to a right in contract.

(ii) the mortgagees N. Co. and A. had elected to rely upon their security and not to prove, and, therefore, as mortgagees they stood outside the bankruptcy; moreover any contract contained in the mortgage deeds for vesting the future property in the mortgagees was ancillary, not to the debt, but to the mortgage by which the debt was secured: Thompson v. Cohen (6) (1872), L.R. 7 Q.B. 527; Cole v. Kernot (7) (1872), L.R. 7 Q.B. 534, n; and Collyer v. Isaacs (8) (1881), 19 Ch.D. 342, explained and distinguished; and, therefore, the N. Appeal from a judgment of WARRINGTON, J. ([1915] 1 Ch. 744), upon a Special Case.

WARRINGTON, J., decided that (i) the mortgages to the Norwich Union Life Insurance Society and to H. J. Arnold were valid and effectual mortgages by

H. J. L. Lind of his share of his expectancy in his mother's (Florence Lind's) personal estate on intestacy, and (ii) both the Norwich Union Life Insurance Society and H. J. Arnold were entitled to rank in priority to the plaintiffs, Industrials Finance Syndicate Ltd. The plaintiffs appealed. The facts are set out in the headnote and in the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, L.J.

Hughes, K.C., and R. E. Moore for the plaintiffs.
Coldridge, K.C., and Luxmoore for H. J. Arnold.
Tomlin, K.C., and Attwater for the Norwich Union Life Insurance Society.
F. Whinney for G. Lind, the administrator of the estate of Florence Lind.

July 9, 1915. The following judgments were read.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of WARRINGTON, J., upon a Special Case, in which the facts are fully stated. It will be sufficient to state that on Feb. 21, 1905, Florence Lind, widow, was absolutely entitled to one-third of the residuary personal estate of her late father, then represented by certain investments and cash set out in a schedule to a deed of that date; that Florence Lind was then of unsound mind, so found by inquisition, and had been continuously insane since the year 1895, and had not made any testamentary disposition of her property; and that if she were then to die her next-of-kin would be ten persons, of whom her son, Hugh Lind, would be one. Hugh Lind had thus a reasonable expectation of becoming entitled to a share of his mother's personal estate upon her death intestate. He had not any estate or interest, present or future, vested or contingent, in his mother's property; he had only a spes successionis, a possibility of becoming possessed in the future of a share of his mother's personal estate. On Feb. 21, 1905, he executed a mortgage for £800 to the Norwich Union Life Insurance Society of this possibility, by the description of

> "All that and those the share or shares, rights, estate and interest whatsoever of or to which the mortgagor as next-of-kin of the said Florence Lind, or one of them, or otherwise howsoever is or will be or may be at any time hereafter become possessed of or entitled to in any manner whatsoever expectant upon, or upon, the death of the said Florence Lind, of and in" her personal estate, whether specified in the schedule thereto or not, including her third share or other her share and interest in her father's residuary personal estate, together with power for the society in the name of the mortgagor or otherwise to demand, sue for, recover, and give effectual receipts for the mortgaged premises, or any part thereof and settle all accounts in respect thereof. On May 20, 1908, Hugh Lind executed a second mortgage upon the same premises in favour of H. L. Arnold to secure £1,500, and the security is expressed to be subject to the prior mortgage of Feb. 21, 1905. On Aug. 15, 1908, Hugh Lind was adjudicated a bankrupt, and on Oct. 12, 1910, obtained his discharge. Neither the Norwich Union nor Arnold proved in the bankruptcy. By a deed dated May 29, 1911, Hugh Lind, in consideration of £260, as beneficial owner, assigned his expectancy to the plaintiffs, subject to a trust thereby declared, as to one moiety thereof in favour of himself. On Feb. 15, 1914, Florence Lind died intestate. By a deed dated Mar. 6, 1914, and endorsed on the deed of May 29, 1914, Hugh Lind, by way of further assurance, assigned to the plaintiffs the share to which he was then actually entitled, and which had purported to be assigned by the therein-within written indenture, and the trust of one moiety for himself was repeated.

The plaintiffs contend that the securities of the Norwich Union and Arnold are of no value, and that the plaintiffs are now absolutely entitled to the share under their deeds of 1911 and 1914, free from any incumbrance. They base this claim upon the bankruptcy of Hugh Lind and his discharge while Florence Lind was still living. They say that the rights of the Norwich Union and Arnold rested only in contract, and amounted only to contracts to assure in the future, and by way of security for their mortgage debts; that by reason of the bankruptcy the bankrupt has been released from the mortgage debts; that the contracts to assure his expectant interest gave rise only to a right of proof which was not exercised; that any covenant for further assurance was only ancillary to and for the purpose of securing the mortgage debts, and that as the debts are discharged by the bankruptcy and discharge of the debtor, the covenant for further assurance is no longer in force. No question has been raised that any assignee took without notice of prior dealings, nor that any priority has been gained by any notice given after the death to Florence Lind's legal personal representative. These considerations do not arise in the present case.

Is the contention well founded that the rights of mortgagees of an expectancy rest only in contract, giving rise to a right of proof if the assignor shall become bankrupt before the expectancy vests in interest, but otherwise barred by the bankruptcy, and discharge of the bankrupt? In my opinion the answer must be in the negative; that the security of the mortgagee remains in force, and becomes effective whenever the expectancy vests in interest. In Metcalfe v. Archbishop of York (1) an incumbent duly charged his then present benefice with an annuity, and covenanted that if he should afterwards be preferred to any other benefice he would fully charge the same with the annuity, and that in the meantime the same should be charged and chargeable with the annuity. In 1811, when this transaction was entered into, it was lawful for an incumbent to charge his benefice; but no legal charge on the new benefice was executed until 1818, by which time it had become unlawful, as the Act of 13 Eliz., c. 20, prohibiting the charges on benefices, had then been revived. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Cottenham), affirming the Vice-Chancellor of England (Sir Lancelot Shadwell), held that the deed of 1811 constituted a good equitable charge which attached upon the new benefice as soon as it was acquired. He said it was contended that the covenant > "amounted only to a covenant for a legal charge, which had become illegal before any attempt was made to enforce it. I am clearly of opinion, however, that this is not the true construction of the deed of 1811, and that there is an equitable charge, independently of the covenant to execute a legal charge."

It was then said for the defendants that all equitable charges rest upon specific performance, and the right to have a legal charge. This is by no means so. The equitable incumbrancer has totally different remedies. What right has an equitable mortgagee, by the deposit of deeds, to ask for a legal mortgage? It will be observed that in this case the incumbent had no interest whatever in the new benefice at the date when he gave the equitable charge upon it, and yet so soon as the new benefice was acquired it was held that the equitable charge attached, without any further document having been executed. The case shows that an agreement to charge future property creates an immediate equitable charge upon the property coming into existence, independently of the contract to execute some further charge, and cannot be said to rest in contract only.

In Holroyd v. Marshall (2) it was held by the House of Lords that an assignment by way of mortgage of machinery to be acquired in the future gave a good title to such machinery from the moment when it was acquired, and without any novus actus interveniens. Lord Westbury, L.C., there said (10 H.L.Cas. at p. 211):

> "If a vendor or mortgagor agrees to sell or mortgage property, real or personal, of which he is not possessed at the time, and he receives the consideration for the contract, and afterwards becomes possessed of property answering the description in the contract, there is no doubt that a court of equity would compel him to perform the contract, and that the contract would, in equity, transfer the beneficial interest to the mortgagee or purchaser immediately on the property being acquired. This, of course, assumes that the supposed contract is one of that class of which a court of equity would decree the specific performance. If it be so, then, immediately on the acquisition of the property described, the vendor or mortgagor would hold it in trust for the purchaser or mortgagee according to the terms of the contract. For if a contract be in other respects good and fit to be performed, and the consideration has been received, incapacity to perform it at the time of its execution will be no answer when the means of doing so are afterwards obtained."

In the same case LORD CHELMSFORD considered the nature of the equity created by agreements to transfer or to charge future acquired property, whether it is a personal equity to be enforced by suit, or to be made available by some act to be done between the parties, or is in the nature of a trust attaching upon and binding the property at the instant of its coming into existence, and decided in favour of the latter view. He added (ibid. at p. 220):

"At law property non-existing, but to be acquired at a future time, is not assignable; in equity it is so. At law (as we have seen), although a power is given in the deed of assignment to take possession of after-acquired property, no interest is transferred, even as between the parties themselves, unless possession is actually taken; in equity it is not disputed that the moment the property comes into existence the agreement operates upon it."

In Tailby v. Official Receiver (5) LORD MACNAGHTEN stated that Holroyd v. Marshall (2) laid down no new law, nor did it extend the principles of equity in the slightest degree. Long before Holroyd v. Marshall (2) was determined it was well settled that an assignment of future property for value operates in equity by way of agreement, binding the conscience of the assignor, and so binding the property from the moment when the contract becomes capable of being performed, on the principle that equity considers as done that which ought to be done. LORD MACNAGHTEN then dealt with LORD WESTBURY, L.C.'s reference in Holroyd v. Marshall (2) to the subject of specific performance, and proceeded to point out that considerations applicable to suits for specific performance ought not to be transferred to cases of equitable assignment where nothing remained to be done in order to define the rights of the parties. He added (13 App. Cas. at p. 547):

"The truth is that cases of equitable assignment or specific lien, when the consideration has passed, depend on the real meaning of the agreement between the parties . . . When that is ascertained you have only to apply the principle that equity considers that done which ought to be done, if that principle is applicable under the circumstances of the case. The doctrines relating to specific performance do not, I think, afford a test or a measure of the rights created."

See also Lyde v. Mynn (3), Re Clarke (14), approved in the House of Lords as "unquestionably correct," and Re Reis (4). It is clear from these authorities that an assignment for value of future property actually binds the property itself directly it is acquired—automatically on the happening of the event, and without any further act on the part of the assignor, and does not merely rest in, and amount to, a right in contract, giving rise to an action. The assignor, having received the consideration, becomes in equity, on the happening of the event, trustee for the assignee of the property devolving upon or acquired by him, and which he had previously sold and been paid for.

It was urged by the appellants that having regard to the wide language of s. 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now s. 30, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914,] with regard to debts and liabilities provable in bankruptcy, all liability of the assignor of every kind, under the mortgages of 1905 and 1908, was provable; and that as the debts created by the mortgage deeds were extinguished by the bankruptcy, the contract relating to the future property, which was merely ancillary to and for the purpose of securing the debt, was also discharged. The answer is that the mortgagees under the deeds of 1905 and 1908 elected to rely upon their security, and not to prove, and therefore, as mortgagees they stand outside the bankruptcy; and, moreover, that any contract contained in those deeds for vesting the future property in the mortgagees was ancillary not to the debt, but to the mortgage by which the debt was secured; in like manner as the covenant not to revoke a will which had appointed a sum of money to a mortgagee was so held in Robinson v. Ommanney (9) both by KAY, J., and the Court of Appeal. In the same case it was also decided that such a covenant is not released by the bankruptcy of the covenantor, where (as here) there was no breach before the bankruptcy. KAY, J., instanced the case of an ordinary mortgage with the usual covenant for further assurance, where it could not be said that, because the covenantor became bankrupt and was discharged from personal liability for the debt, the consideration was merely gone, and the covenant for further assurance no longer enforceable.

The plaintiffs relied especially upon Thompson v. Cohen (6), Cole v. Kernot (7), and Collyer v. Isaacs (8) in support of their contention that a contract for the assignment of future property, however absolute in form, only amounts to a contract to assign, for the breach of which the assignor incurs a liability provable in bankruptcy, and from which he is released by the order of discharge. It must be remembered that before any of these cases was decided there was a well-established distinction in the case of instruments dealing with chattels, between an assignment of them and a mere licence to seize, between the creation of an interest and a mere licence to take possession; and this distinction carried with it important legal consequences. Carr v. Allatt (10) and Brown v. Bateman (11) are instances of the former, where the title of the assignee prevailed, the rule being that wherever there is a clear indication of intention to pass an interest the court will so construe the instrument as to give effect to that intention. Reeve v. Whitmore, Martin v. Whitmore (12) is an instance of the latter (a licence to seize). LORD WESTBURY, L.C., said (33 L.J.Ch. at p. 66):

> "The difference, therefore, is very clear and distinct with regard to the operation of the deed: it is the difference between a present contract that the mortgagee should have a right and an interest attaching immediately by force of the contract upon all that property which in futuro might be brought on the premises, and a contract that the mortgagee should have a power of entering upon the premises for the purpose of seizing and taking possession of that future property. The contract that he should have a power to seize appears to me to be perfectly distinct from a contract that he should have a present and immediate right which would attach instanter upon the property brought upon the premises without the act of seizure. I think he has no such thing. I think the true extent and operation of the deed was merely this, that he had passing to him by virtue of the contract a right and a security on, and an interest in, all the then existing property, and the security is accompanied by a power enabling him at any time to enter upon the premises, and take the future property that might be found there. But a power is a very different thing from an interest: and if the extent and limit of the contract be merely that he should have such a power, then an interest would not arise under the power till the power was exercised, subject, however, to the observations which I shall hereafter make with reference to the exercise of that right."

In this state of the law Thompson v. Cohen (6) arose for decision. It was held that the bill of sale in that case merely amounted to a licence to seize, BLACKBURN, J., saying (L.R. 7 Q.B. at p. 533) that there was nothing

> "amounting to an equitable mortgage, like the case of Holroyd v. Marshall (2). Here is a simple licence to seize after-acquired goods for the purpose of selling them and discharging the debt, and the debt being gone, we think the collateral licence to seize goes with the principal debt."

Cole v. Kernot (7) was dealt with by MELLOR, J., on the same footing; he said that the court were all satisfied that the two cases were identical in principle.

Therefore whatever the actual language of the instrument in Cole v. Kernot (7) the court must have construed it as amounting only to a licence to seize. Collyer v. Isaacs (8) may be explained in the same way. The bill of sale in question was given by a trader, at one time an engineer and tool maker, and subsequently a billiard-slate manufacturer, and it embraced all chattels then on the premises, or which at any time thereafter might be brought thereon, in addition or in substitution. Unless, therefore, the bill of sale were construed as a floating security, not extending to future chattels until seized, the debtor could not carry on his business: there was also an express power in the deed for the mortgagee to enter and take possession of the said goods and chattels, and this probably explains why JESSEL, M.R., referred to the deed as being "in form" an assignment, and LUSH, L.J., added:

> "but which in fact amounted to a contract that he would appropriate any chattels which he might bring upon the premises to an already existing security."

The document was construed as a licence to seize, but not as an actual assignment of future chattels. Having regard, however, to s. 4 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, the distinction between an assignment of future chattels and a licence to seize has become of less importance than formerly. I am of opinion that the judgment of WARRINGTON, J., was right, and that the Norwich Union and Arnold are both entitled to rank in priority to the plaintiffs, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I need not re-state the facts. We have to determine whether the assurances made by H. J. L. Lind by way of mortgage of his expectancy of a share in the personal estate of his mother operated so directly upon the property that after the mother's death the assignees could take it notwithstanding the intervening bankruptcy and discharge of H. J. L. Lind.

Assignments of property not then in existence pass, as such, nothing. "A man cannot in equity, any more than at law, assign what has no existence"; see per JESSEL, M.R., in Collyer v. Isaacs (8), 19 Ch.D. at p. 351. The assignment does, however, operate as a contract to assign if and when the property comes into existence, and to use the words of the same great judge,

> "when it has come into existence, equity, treating as done that which ought to be done, fastens upon that property, and the contract to assign thus becomes a complete assignment."

This is intelligible and workable if nothing happen between the date of the assignment (construed as a contract to assign) and the date when the property comes into existence; but if in the intervening period something happen which may affect the contract, as, for instance, a statutory discharge of the assignor from all his obligations, does the contract to assign still become in due course a complete assignment? If the assurance rests in contract and if by consequence the only way in which equity fastens upon the property be by the operation of the doctrine of specific performance, then the liability under the contract would be, as it seems to me, discharged by bankruptcy. This being an assurance by way of mortgage would not come within the class of cases excepted by s. 37 (6), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now see s. 30 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914], nor within the special classes of cases referred to by the EARL OF SELBORNE in Hardy v. Fothergill (13), (13 App. Cas. at p. 360), nor I think within the decision of the Court of Appeal upon a covenant to settle after-acquired property in Re Reis (4). That these later covenants may be exceptionally preserved is shown by the language of JESSEL, M.R., in Collyer v. Isaacs (8) (19 Ch.D. at p. 354). In order that the assignment may survive and have its effect, it must give to the assignee something more than a mere right in contract—something in the nature of an estate or interest.

The real question in this case is whether the assurances by H. J. L. Lind remained in contract, or whether upon the property coming into existence they automatically, and without any novus actus interveniens, passed his estate or interest in his share of his mother's personal estate to the assignees. That the assurances remain in contract might be inferred from some language of LORD WESTBURY, L.C., in Holroyd v. Marshall (2), which I venture to quote (10 H.L.Cas. at p. 211):

> "But if a vendor or mortgagor agrees to sell or mortgage property, real or personal, of which he is not possessed at the time, and he receives the consideration for the contract, and afterwards becomes possessed of property answering the description in the contract, there is no doubt that a court of equity would compel him to perform the contract, and that the contract would, in equity, transfer the beneficial interest to the mortgagee or purchaser, immediately on the property being acquired. This, of course, assumes that the supposed contract is one of that class of which a court of equity would decree the specific performance. If it be so, then immediately on the acquisition of the property described the vendor or mortgagor would hold it in trust for the purchaser or mortgagee, according to the terms of the contract. For if a contract be in other respects good and fit to be performed, and the consideration has been received, incapacity to perform it at the time of its execution will be no answer when the means of doing so are afterwards obtained."

These expressions, taken perhaps without sufficient regard to their context, have led to misapprehension in several cases (as pointed out by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Tailby v. Official Receiver (5) (13 App. Cas. at p. 544). Re Clarke (14) might have been added to his list, and in this connection the language used in Re Reis (4) even after LORD MACNAGHTEN's judgment must not be forgotten. If the right has to be enforced by a suit for specific performance of a contract, involving as it does "some of the nicest distinctions and most difficult questions that come before the Court" (see per LORD MACNAGHTEN, 13 App. Cas. at p. 547), then the right is in contract only and the statutory discharge in bankruptcy should operate, as BLACKBURN, J., observed in Thompson v. Cohen (6) and I think that we must take it that it was upon this ground that the Court of Appeal decided Collyer v. Isaacs (8) to which I shall refer later on. But notwithstanding these allusions to the doctrine of specific performance of contracts, it is I think well and long settled that the right of the assignee is a higher right than the right to have specific performance of a contract, that the assignment creates an equitable charge which arises immediately upon the property coming into existence. Either then no further act of assurance from the assignor is required, or if there be something necessary to be done by him to pass the legal estate or complete the title, he has to do it not by reason of a covenant for further assurance the persistence of which through bankruptcy it is unnecessary to discuss, but because it is due from him as trustee for his assignee.

Among the many cases which determine this, I select the following: Metcalfe v. Archbishop of York (1). The facts in that case were as follows. In 1803, the Act 43 Geo. 3, c. 84, repealed the Act 13 Eliz., c. 20, which prohibited the charging of benefices. In 1817 the Act 43 Geo. 3, c. 84, was repealed, and the effect of this repeal was to revive the Act of Elizabeth. In 1811 an incumbent charged his then present benefice with an annuity, and covenanted that if he should afterwards be preferred to any other benefice he would fully charge the same with the annuity, and that, in the meantime, it should be charged and chargeable with the annuity. In 1814 the incumbent was presented to another benefice, but no legal charge was executed upon it until the year 1818, when such charges had become again prohibited; yet it was held by the Vice-Chancellor and the Lord Chancellor that the deed of 1811 constituted a good equitable charge which attached upon the new benefice as soon as it was acquired. In this case LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., said (2 My. & Cr. at p. 556):

> "Suppose the deed of 1811 had not contained any covenant to execute a legal charge upon any newly acquired benefice, but merely a proviso and agreement that any such newly-acquired benefice should be charged and chargeable with and liable to the payment of the said annuity, could it be doubted that, upon

Mr. Warrington becoming vicar of Leake in 1814, that benefice became equitably chargeable with the annuity? If so, can the covenant to make a legal charge destroy the equitable charge? Can the covenant for further and better assurance destroy the assurance actually executed? On the part of the defendants, the appellants, this was hardly questioned; but it was contended that the covenant was all one, and that it amounted only to a covenant for a legal charge, which had become illegal before any attempt was made to enforce it. I am clearly of opinion, however, that this is not the true construction of the deed of 1811, and that there is an equitable charge independently of the covenant to execute a legal charge. It was then said for the defendants that all equitable charges rest upon specific performance, and the right to have a legal charge. This is by no means so. The equitable incumbrancer has totally different remedies. What right has an equitable mortgagee by a deposit of deeds to ask for a legal mortgage? I am, for this reason, of opinion that the Vice-Chancellor's judgment was correct in giving effect to this equitable charge upon the vicarage of Leake to secure the annuity."

In Holroyd v. Marshall (2) the judgment of LORD CHELMSFORD and the judgment of LORD WESTBURY, L.C., if taken in its entirety, are to the same effect; and this finally is the decision in Tailby v. Official Receiver (5).

As against this current of decisions we have to deal with three cases on bills of sale in which attempts to bind future household furniture and effects were frustrated. The two cases in the Queen's Bench, Thompson v. Cohen (6) and Cole v. Kernot (7), may be explained as decisions upon the construction of the particular bills of sale, it being inferred from the terms of the documents that the mortgagor made no assurance of future chattels, but merely gave a licence to seize as ancillary to the security for the debt; though that was not the view taken of them by BAGGALLAY, L.J., in Collyer v. Isaacs (8). But this last case cannot, in my opinion, be so explained. The reasoning by which the court arrived at its judgment is thus stated by JESSEL, M.R. (19 Ch.D. at p. 351):

> "Until the property comes into existence the contract remains only a contract by which the party entering into it will be bound, and when the property comes into existence it is a contract for the breach of which he will incur liability. That being so, when the party who contracts becomes bankrupt the liability in respect of that contract is a liability provable in the bankruptcy, but by the 49th section he is released, with certain exceptions, from every liability provable, and so, upon obtaining his discharge, the bankrupt will say, 'I am discharged from the liability; it was only a liability to which I was subject at the time of bankruptcy, and from that the discharge I have obtained releases me.' "

The very fact that the Master of the Rolls reserves his opinion as to the effect of one special form of assurance of after-required property—namely, a covenant in a marriage settlement—lends weight and point to his previous language. The actual decision may be supported, as WARRINGTON, J., thought it might (and as possibly the decisions in the Queen's Bench also might), on the ground that the security given by the bill of sale was like a debenture in the nature of a floating security. But this was not the process by which the Court of Appeal arrived at its conclusion. And I am bound to say that I think that the Court of Appeal in Collyer v. Isaacs (8) took the more logical view.

I do not understand an assignment which at the time only operates as a contract, but when the property comes into possession operates without more as an actual assurance; and even if this were intelligible I do not understand why in its chrysalis state it is not subject to the laws of a chrysalis, why, being still only a contract, it is not discharged by a discharge of contracts. And I may add that I think it would be better as matter of public policy that all assignments of bare futurities were made impossible. But the law is settled in the other sense by the highest authority, and therefore WARRINGTON, J., was right, and this appeal should be dismissed.

BANKES, L.J—The question for decision in this appeal is whether the discharge in bankruptcy of Hugh James Lawrence Lind put an end to all obligations and rights created by the indentures dated respectively Feb. 21, 1905, and May 20, 1908, and made between Hugh Lind on the one part and the Norwich Union Life Insurance Society and H. Lewis Arnold of the other part respectively.

The assignments were assignments of a mere expectancy, and I do not think it is material to discuss the nature of the expectancy. There is this, however, to be said, that the fund of which the mother was entitled to a share is set out in detail in the schedules to the deeds, and the assignor's interest was apparently fairly safe, as his mother was a lunatic, so found, and she had made no will. In speaking of assignments of a similar kind to the present, LORD HERSCHELL, in Tailby v. Official Receiver (5) said (13 App. Cas. at p. 530):

> "I confess I am unable to see any sound distinction between an instrument assigning future book debts which may become due to the assignor in any business carried on by him, and one assigning future bequests and devises to which he may under any will become entitled. The subjects of both assignments are equally wide, equally incapable of ascertainment at the time of the assignment, but equally capable of identification when the subject has come into existence and it is sought to enforce the security."

For the purpose of this judgment I propose to treat the assignments as if they were assignments of after-acquired property merely. It has long been settled that a court of equity will give effect to an assignment for good consideration of a mere expectancy though such an interest was not assignable at law. In Grey v. Kentish (15) LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., is reported to have said:

> "A husband cannot assign in law a possibility of the wife, nor a possibility of his own, but this court will notwithstanding support such an assignment for valuable consideration. . . ."

This passage is cited with approval by LORD LYNDHURST in Meek v. Kettlewell (16). One way in which equity supports such an assignment is by treating the transaction, though in form an assignment, as containing or importing a covenant to do that which is necessary to effect the validity of the assignment: see per COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in Re Mudge (17), [1914] 1 Ch. at p. 122. And one method by which a court of equity would compel the performance of such a covenant would, in a proper case, be by granting a decree for specific performance.

The argument for the plaintiffs has been rested on two grounds: first, that the covenant to assign, which must be read into each assignment, was ancillary only to the debt covenanted to be paid, and that as the said debt has been released by the discharge in bankruptcy, the security, if any, afforded by the covenant to assign has gone also; second, that the covenant to assign, being a mere personal obligation, was discharged by the discharge in bankruptcy.

The first question must depend upon the construction of the deeds themselves. I can find nothing in the language of the deeds to support this contention. On the contrary, if it be assumed that the deeds create some kind of security upon the debtor's interest as next-of-kin to his mother, it seems obvious that the security was intended to be in addition to that created by the personal covenant of the debtor to pay. If the plaintiff's argument is sound in the present case, I see no reason why it should not be applied to every mortgage executed to secure repayment of a loan. This question was dealt with in argument as though it was in some way affected by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. I cannot agree with this suggestion. If the argument is sound, it must be because of the provisions of the deed creating the security, or not at all. The covenant in my opinion, as was stated to be the case in Robinson v. Ommanney (9), is ancillary to the security and not to the debt. The second contention is the one on which the plaintiffs mainly relied. In support of this contention it was urged that the policy of the Bankruptcy Acts is that when a bankrupt obtains his discharge he is completely freed from all his obligations and put into a position to make a fresh start. This is quite true as regards his personal obligations, but it is not true as regards his property. The policy of the Bankruptcy Acts with regard to burthens placed upon his property by the bankrupt is that the property shall at the option of the secured creditor remain subject to all burthens legitimately placed upon it prior to the bankruptcy. The interests in question in the present case were not property within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts at any time during the assignor's bankruptcy, but, assuming that they had been, WARRINGTON, J., in deciding as he did, did nothing in violation of the policy of the bankruptcy laws.

This, however, is not the real question in this appeal. The real question is as to the exact effect which equity gives to the assignments in question and as to the operation of the Bankruptcy Acts upon the covenant which equity imports into them. I will deal with this last point first. There is no decision precisely in point, but there is a body of judicial opinion upon the question. The covenant which has to be considered is a covenant to assign after-acquired property. The question which has to be determined is whether the existence of that covenant at the date of the bankruptcy created without more a mere liability within the meaning of s. 37 (8) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now see s. 30, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914], which must be deemed to be a debt provable in the bankruptcy. If it did, then the discharge in bankruptcy operated as a discharge from all liability under the covenant. If it did not, then the matter is one outside the Bankruptcy Acts altogether, and the covenant is unaffected by the bankrupt's discharge. The authorities to which I will refer are Robinson v. Ommanney (9), where KAY, J., expressed the opinion that a covenant for further assurance in a mortgage deed could be enforced in spite of the discharge in bankruptcy of the mortgagor. In Hardy v. Fothergill (13) the EARL OF SELBORNE deals with this question in these words (13 App. Cas. at p. 360):

> "There may be contracts, such for example as a promise to marry (not broken), or a covenant not to molest, or not to carry on a particular trade within certain limits, &c.; which on a fair interpretation of these words [that is the words of s. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869] ought to be excluded as having a different object from the payment of money in any contingency; although if they were broken a jury might award damages for their breach. I must guard myself against being supposed to lay down any rule applicable to cases of that kind, or to any others in which an injunction or specific performance would be the most proper remedy."

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., in Re Reis (4) expresses no sort of doubt upon this latter question. He says ([1904] 2 K.B. at p. 777):

> "When once it has been decided that the covenant is one of which specific performance can be obtained, it follows that the right to specific performance is not barred by the bankruptcy."

STIRLING, L.J., says the same. But for the difficulty occasioned by Collyer v. Isaacs (8), to which I refer later, I should have had no hesitation in acting upon the opinion of the learned judges to which I have referred, and saying that the covenants to assign the after-acquired interests in his mother's property were not affected by the bankrupt's discharge in bankruptcy.

There remains the other question, whether these assignments do not in equity give the respondents an interest in the property itself. Upon this question there is again no decision precisely in point, if the question is regarded from the point of view of the effect of a discharge in bankruptcy, but there is in my opinion abundant authority which settles the question in principle. If the view of a Court of Equity on this point had been that the only way in which to do equity in the case of an assignment of after-acquired property was to construe the assignment as a covenant to assign it, then in cases where the property came into existence something would have had to be done by the covenantor to give effect to his covenant; but I find that time after time it has been laid down, perhaps not always in the same words, that directly the property comes into existence the assignment fastens on it and without any actus interveniens the property is regarded in equity as the property of the assignee. In support of this statement of the law I would refer to Metcalfe v. Archbishop of York (1), Smith v. Lucas (18), Pullan v. Koe (19), Tailby v. Official Receiver (5). The language of LORD WATSON and LORD MACNAGHTEN in this last-mentioned case is very emphatic. LORD WATSON says (13 App. Cas. at p. 533):

> "There is but one condition which must be fulfilled in order to make the assignee's right attach to a future chose in action, which is, that, on its coming into existence, it shall answer the description in the assignment, or, in other words, that it shall be capable of being identified as the thing, or as one of the very things assigned. When there is no uncertainty as to its identification, the beneficial interest will immediately vest in the assignee";

and LORD MACNAGHTEN says (ibid. at p. 546):

> "Long before Holroyd v. Marshall (2) was determined it was well settled that an assignment of future property for value operates in equity by way of agreement, binding the conscience of the assignor, and so binding the property from the moment when the contract becomes capable of being performed, on the principle that equity considers as done that which ought to be done, and in accordance with the maxim which LORD THURLOW said he took to be universal, 'that whenever persons agree concerning any particular subject, that, in a Court of Equity, as against the party himself, and any claiming under him, voluntarily or with notice, raises a trust'; Legard v. Hodges (20)."

It appears to me to be manifest from these statements of the law that equity regarded an assignment for value of future acquired property as containing an enforceable security as against the property assigned quite independent of the personal obligation of the assignor arising out of his imported covenant to assign. It is true that the security was not enforceable until the property came into existence, but nevertheless the security was there, the assignor was the bare trustee of the assignee to receive and hold the property for him when it came into existence. WARRINGTON, J., in the court below put his view into these words:

> "In the present case I am of opinion that the mortgagees were at the time of the bankruptcy entitled not merely to the benefit of a personal obligation on the part of the mortgagor resulting in a claim for damages, but to a prospective interest in the distributive share in question taking effect automatically on the death of Florence Lind."

For the reasons stated above, I think that there is a question whether the personal obligation on the part of the mortgagor in a case like the present results in a claim for damages, if by that is meant results only in a claim for damages, but I quite agree with the latter part of the learned judge's statement of the position of the mortgagees.

The only difficulty in the case to my mind is created by Collyer v. Isaacs (8). This was a decision of the Court of Appeal, which is binding upon us, and unless the case is distinguishable from the present we should be bound to follow it. In that case the security given was a bill of sale. It contained an assignment of after-acquired property and a licence to seize the property in certain events, one of which was the bankruptcy of the grantor of the bill of sale. The grantor instituted proceedings in bankruptcy for the liquidation of his own affairs and he obtained his discharge in the liquidation. The grantee did not prove, but relied on his security. After his discharge the grantor recommenced business and acquired new plant for the purposes of this business. The grantee entered and seized this plant, and the grantor then moved the court for an injunction to restrain the grantee from remaining in possession, or from removing or selling the plant. In the court below the argument for the grantor was that the debt having been discharged, no property acquired after the debt ceased to exist could be made available to secure it. For the grantee it was contended that the assignment was a valid assignment in equity which entitled the grantee to take the course he did. HALL, V.C., decided in favour of the grantee, stating in his judgment that courts of equity have treated instruments dealing with non-existent property as being transfers of property as effectual for non-existing as they were for existing property. In the Court of Appeal the arguments for the appellant were the same as were advanced in the present case. In giving their judgments none of the learned judges refer to the question of whether the covenant did or did not give a right to specific performance, nor did they deal in terms with the question of whether an assignment of after-acquired property could in equity create an interest in the property when acquired, and they based their decision entirely upon the operation of the Bankruptcy Act upon the particular bill of sale before them. JESSEL, M.R., treats the case as one where there was a general liability in respect of a debt which was barred by a discharge in bankruptcy with a liability in respect of a covenant to secure that debt. So limited, the decision is not an authority against the view taken by WARRINGTON, J., and which I think was right. There is one passage in the judgment of JESSEL, M.R., in which he says (19 Ch.D. at p. 351):

> "Until the property comes into existence the contract remains only a contract by which the party entering into it will be bound, and when the property comes into existence it is a contract for the breach of which he will incur liability."

This passage has been referred to as if it was a statement that the only remedy on the contract sounded in damages. I do not so read the passage, nor do I think, if the passage could be so read, that it is in accordance with the authorities to which I have referred. For the above reasons I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

Company—Debenture—Receiver—Application to disregard onerous sole agency agreement made by company—Goodwill of company not affected by agreement.

In a debenture-holder's action a receiver was appointed of the assets and property of the defendant company. The receiver claimed that he should be at liberty to disregard an agreement made between the defendant company and the M. company before the issue of the debentures under which the M. company were to be sole agents for the sale of copper and silver from the defendant company's mines on certain terms for a period of 15 years. The receiver claimed that this agreement was onerous and that he could do better if he was at liberty to sell the produce of the mines as he thought fit.

Held: as the agreement in no way affected the value of the goodwill of the business, there was no obligation on the receiver to carry the agreement into effect.

Adjourned Summons.

The plaintiff, who was the receiver of The Great Cobar, Ltd., the defendant company, applied for an order that he might disregard an agreement made between the defendant company and Henry R. Merton and Co., Ltd., on May 23, 1906, whereby it was agreed that the Merton company, for a period of 15 years, from Jan. 1, 1907, determinable as therein provided, should be the sole agent of the defendant company for the whole world for the sale of all the copper and silver from the defendant company's mines which for the time being the company might desire to sell, and the defendant company were to pay and the Merton company to retain out of the moneys payable to it a certain commission. The last clause of the agreement provided that:

"The company shall not by the sale of its business, by winding-up, reconstruction, or otherwise terminate or put an end to this agreement, but shall provide that any company or person to whom the company's mines or business shall be transferred shall be bound by the terms of this agreement, and shall enter into a supplementary agreement with the agent to give full effect thereto."

On May 24, 1906, the company issued first mortgage debentures secured by a charge on the freehold and leasehold properties of the company and by a charge on its whole undertaking. The prospectus which accompanied the issue of the debentures, and which also invited applications for shares under the heading of "contracts" mentioned (inter alia) this contract as follows:

"(10) Dated May 23, 1906, between the company of the one part and Henry R. Merton and Co., Ltd., of the other part, appointing the latter sole agent of the company for fifteen years for the sale of the company's copper and silver."

The plaintiff, a debenture-holder, had brought a debenture-holders' action against the company, the usual order had been made, and A. F. Whinney had been appointed receiver of the property and assets of the company, and to manage its business on behalf of the debenture-holders. The plaintiff now applied for an order that the receiver and manager might be at liberty to disregard the agreement of May 23, 1906.

WARRINGTON, J.—This is a debenture-holders' action. On April 6, 1914, Mr. Whinney was appointed receiver of the assets of the company and to manage its business. The plaintiff applies that the receiver and manager may be at liberty to disregard an agreement dated May 23, 1906, made between the defendant company of the one part and Henry R. Merton and Co., Ltd., of the other part whereby the last-named company was to be the sole agent of the defendant company for the sale of copper and silver from the company's mines on the terms and conditions therein set forth.

The facts are very short. The agreement in question was made on May 23, 1906, prior to the issue of the debentures. It was an agreement made between the company of the one part and the agent of the other part, and it provided that the agent should for a period of fifteen years from Jan. 1, 1907, be the sole agent of the company for the whole world for the sale of copper and silver from the company's mines which the company might desire to sell on certain terms as to commission, and it contained this provision in the final clause: [HIS LORDSHIP read the last clause of the agreement, and continued:] In the prospectus which accompanied the issue of the debentures the fact of the existence of this contract was stated, but the debentures were in no way made subject to the performance of the contract. The debentures are in the ordinary form of a charge on the undertaking of the company. The receiver has been appointed to manage the company's business, and it is clear upon the evidence that the equity of redemption is worthless; in fact, the company appears and does not oppose the plaintiff's application. It is opposed by the agents themselves, who had leave from JOYCE, J., to appear here. Now, is it or is it not right that the receiver should be at liberty to disregard this contract? He says that it is an onerous contract, and that he can do better if he is at liberty to sell the produce of the mines as he may think fit.

The only authority which I think is at all in point is Re Newdigate Colliery, Ltd. (1). In that case the business was that of a colliery company. The company before the appointment of the receiver had entered into a number of forward contracts for the supply of coal. The price of coal having in the meantime risen, the plaintiff in the action asked that the receiver and manager might be at liberty to disregard all these contracts so that he might be in a position to sell the coal at a higher price. The court refused that application in that general form, and did so on this ground, that a part of the security was the goodwill of the business, that the receiver was appointed to protect and keep up the value of the goodwill as much as any other part of the security, and that if he were to disregard all these contracts he would so damage the reputation of the company that he would practically destroy the goodwill. Having read the judgments in that case in full, I think that that was undoubtedly the ground on which the court refused the order in that case. COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in particular, and FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., not quite emphatically, both expressed the view that an objection to the application in that case at all events was the generality of the form in which it was put, and the Master of the Rolls expressly guarded himself against deciding that in a particular case it might not be proper to let a receiver disregard a contract entered into with the company.

What is the position in the present case? The agreement here was entered into with the company whilst it was carrying on business itself. The debenture-holders took their security without being bound by the contract; neither is the receiver and manager bound by it. He will not be incurring any liability at law or in equity to pay damages if he disregards it. I express no opinion for the moment on the question whether the contract has otherwise come to an end by the appointment of a manager, either on the theory applicable to contracts for service, or on the theory that the company are no longer selling any goods to which the contract relates. I think that it is much better not to express any opinion on that question isasmuch as it might possibly prejudice the rights of the parties hereafter. What I do say is that this contract in no way affects the value of the goodwill of the business. There is therefore no obligation on the receiver that I can see, morally or otherwise, to carry this company's contract into effect. He is appointed to manage the business of the company, and it is for him to determine through what agents, and generally in what way, the produce of the company's mines should be sold. I think, therefore, that I must make an order in accordance with the application that the receiver be at liberty to disregard the agreement.

Primâ facie it is improper for directors to make a call on part of a class of shareholders who stand in the same relations to the company as the other members of the class without making a similar call on all the other members of that class. Even though there may be power to make such a call the question is always whether in the circumstances it is proper to exercise the power.

Motion.

The plaintiffs, William Johnson Galloway and Oliver Standbrooke Holt, were members of the defendant society, which was formed in 1899 under the Companies Acts then in force as a company limited by guarantee. The memorandum of association provided, inter alia, that in the event of the society being wound-up each member should contribute to the assets for the payment of debts, etc., such amount as might be required not exceeding £5. By cl. 7 of the articles of association:

"Each member shall be liable to contribute and shall, when demanded, pay to the committee any sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of £100, which is hereinafter referred to as the contribution. The liability to the contribution shall be additional to and without prejudice to any liability in case of winding-up under the guarantee clause in the memorandum of association. The committee may from time to time make such calls as they think fit upon each member in respect of all moneys unpaid on his contributions, and each member shall pay the amount of every call so made upon him to the persons, in the manner, and at the time and places appointed by the committee."

By cl. 8:

"A call shall be deemed to have been made at the time when the resolution of the committee authorising such call was passed."

The plaintiffs who had differences with the defendant society either delayed or failed to pay certain calls. In consequence of this, the defendant society resolved on Mar. 31, 1915, that the plaintiffs' respective balances of contributions should be called up. In this action the plaintiffs claimed (i) a declaration that the resolution was invalid and that the calls made in pursuance of them were unenforceable; (ii) an injunction to restrain the defendant society from attempting to enforce them. This was a motion for an interim injunction, which by consent was treated as the trial of the action.

Clauson, K.C., and Sheldon for the plaintiffs.

Cyril Atkinson, K.C., and A. F. Topham for the defendants.

SARGANT, J.—This is a motion to restrain the defendants, the Hallé Concerts Society, from enforcing certain calls of £80 and £75 respectively made on the plaintiffs, William Johnson Galloway and Oliver Standbrooke Holt, as members of the society. There may be some difficulty in granting an injunction exactly in accordance with the notice of motion, because it might appear to be restraining persons from applying to the courts of law, including the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, for the purpose of enforcing their rights there, and of course that is not possible since the Judicature Act, but the parties desire to have the question determined before me to-day, and the writ asks for a declaration on the subject, that is to say, a declaration that certain resolutions passed by the committee of the defendant society making these calls were invalid and ultra vires, and that the calls were not enforceable against the plaintiffs or either of them. Therefore, I can deal now with the whole question between the parties.

The society is a company formed under the Companies Acts, and not for the purpose of private gain. It is a company limited by guarantee, and on the usual conditions the Board of Trade has dispensed with the addition to its title of the word "Ltd." It was formed for the purpose of promoting the Hallé Concerts, as those were carried on at the time and are now carried on in the City of Manchester. Under the memorandum of association each member is to contribute in the event of winding-up a sum of £5, and under the articles of association of the company it is provided by art. 7 that

Then the committee are to be empowered to make such calls as they think fit upon each member in respect of the moneys unpaid on the contributions, and those contributions are in addition to the sum of £5 that can be called up in the winding-up. It appears that for some time past the plaintiffs have not been in accord with the general policy of the society and have objected to certain calls that have been made by the society. They objected to a call made in June, 1911, of £7, and they appear not to have paid until December, 1912, or thereabouts. They objected to a call made of £3 in June, 1913, and in respect of that call county court proceedings were necessary and were successful. They objected also to a call of £10 made on each shareholder in 1914—as a matter of fact I am told their contributions in respect of that call were not paid until a day or two after the issue of the writ in these proceedings. That being so the committee passed a resolution to this effect. I will read it from the minutes:

> "The secretary reported that there were certain guarantors who had not paid the call of £10 made in June last [this was on Mar. 31 of 1915]. He desired especially to call attention to the cases of Mr. W. J. Galloway and Mr. O. S. Holt [those are the plaintiffs] who had refused to pay the call of £3 in June, 1913, and had even gone so far as to allow themselves to be sued in court for the amount. As it was evident that they did not intend to pay the call of £10 made in June, 1914, the society would have the trouble of again suing them for the amount [that does not appear to have been the case in the result] and it was resolved therefore that the sum of £80 be called up in respect of the contribution of Mr. W. J. Galloway and £75 in the case of Mr. O. S. Holt respectively, payable at Williams Deacon's Bank, Ltd., St. Ann's Street, on or before April 30, 1915. This amount to be in addition to the sum of £10 owing in respect of the call made in June, 1914, and Mr. Dunderdale was instructed to take the necessary steps to recover these moneys."

The question arises whether the society is entitled to call up the full amount uncalled on the shares of Mr. Galloway and Mr. Holt while making no similar call on the shares of the other members of the society, because they have given trouble in the past in securing and enforcing the payment of the previous calls made by them. It is said under the articles there is power to make calls on particular members without making corresponding calls on the other members, and then it is further said that if that is so this is a proper case in which to exercise that power. I do not think that I need determine under art. 7 whether there is a power to make a call on one member without making a similar call on another member who is in exactly the same position with regard to payment up on his shares. I do not see anything in the actual language of the article to prohibit it. The article of course was framed for the purpose of defining in this respect the relations between the members of the society as well as for the purpose of determining the relations between the members themselves. It may be in a proper case, which is the phrase used by the solicitor for the defendants, such power may be exercised—there may be such power—but I am still left with the obligation of considering whether this is a proper case. It seems to me that primâ facie, as was pointed out in the judgment of LORD MACNAGHTEN in British and American Trustee and Finance Corpn. v. Couper (1), that there is by virtue of the ordinary law of partnership an implied condition of equality between shareholders in a company, and that primâ facie it is entirely improper for the directors to make a call on part of a class of shareholders who stand in the same relation to the company as the other members of the class without making a similar call on all the other members of that class. The point was, as a matter of fact, as it seems to me, decided as long ago as Preston v. Grand Collier Dock Co. (2), and that case is referred to with approval and taken as being the law by LORD LINDLEY in his book on COMPANIES (6th Edn.) at p. 578. Is it right to make this call on these two persons only for this large amount merely because they have been dilatory in paying previous calls? It is said certain expense is caused to the society by the necessity of enforcing these repeated calls against them, and that less expense will be caused if the moneys can be called up in a lump sum. I do not think that is a sufficient reason. So far as legal expenses are concerned, those legal expenses can be recovered in the ordinary way, and I cannot think that the mere fact that letters have been written to the plaintiffs before the matter was put in the solicitors' hands is a sufficient reason for the course that has been adopted. In the present case the result might be more unfair to the plaintiffs than in an ordinary case, because as far as I can see under the memorandum of association on a winding-up of the company there is no certainty at all that the £80 and the £75 in question would come back to the plaintiffs in priority to the payments that would have to be made to the other members of the society. However that may be, it seems to me that the reason given by the committee of the society for making the calls on these two persons separately from any similar calls on the other members of the society is altogether insufficient, and accordingly I propose making a declaration substantially to the effect asked by the writ.

Originating Summons taken out by the National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty against the Attorney-General and the Official Trustee of Charity Lands to decide whether the objects of the National Trust as set out in the National Trust Act, 1907, were charitable, and whether the Trust was bound by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Acts, 1888–1891 [now repealed]. The case is only reported on the question whether the objects of the National Trust are charitable.

Charles Gurdon for the National Trust.
J. Austen-Cartmell for the Attorney-General.
W. R. Sheldon for the Official Trustee of Charity Lands.

ASTBURY, J.—The National Trust Act, 1907, which incorporated for the purposes of the Act the plaintiff trust, provided that the trust should be established > "for the purposes of promoting the permanent preservation for the benefit of the nation of lands and tenements (including buildings) of beauty or historic interest, and as regards lands for the preservation (so far as practicable) of their natural aspect, features, and animal and plant life."

The question I am asked to decide is whether the objects and purposes of this trust as so established are charitable or not.

It is contended on behalf of the trust itself that its purposes are not confined to what are known in the law as charitable purposes, and a number of authorities have been cited with the view of pressing that contention. Apart altogether from the authorities, I should have thought that primâ facie there could be little doubt that this national trust was essentially a charitable trust for the benefit of the nation generally. With regard to the authorities, the question is whether they do or do not support that view. In Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (1), LORD MACNAGHTEN, quoting largely from SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY's argument in the earlier case of Morice v. Bishop of Durham (2) (10 Ves. at p. 532), said ([1891] A.C. at p. 583):

> "How far then, it may be asked, does the popular meaning of the word 'charity' correspond with its legal meaning? 'Charity' in its legal sense comprises four principal divisions: trusts for the relief of poverty; trusts for the advancement of education; trusts for the advancement of religion; and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community, not falling under any of the preceding heads."

In terms there can be no question that the fourth head obviously and necessarily includes such a purpose as that defined by this Act of 1907. It is suggested that those words must be taken with qualification. In Re Foveaux, Cross v. London Anti-Vivisection Society (3), CHITTY, J., said ([1895] 2 Ch. at p. 504):

> "The method employed by the court is to consider the enumeration of charities in the statute of Elizabeth, bearing in mind that the enumeration is not exhaustive. Institutions whose objects are analogous to those mentioned in the statute are admitted to be charities; and again, institutions which are analogous to those already admitted by reported decisions are held to be charities. The pursuit of these analogies obviously requires caution and circumspection. After all, the best that can be done is to consider each case as it arises, upon its own special circumstances. To be a charity there must be some public purpose—something tending to the benefit of the community."

Then, again, within that test it seems to me that unquestionably this is and must be a charitable purpose. I have had a number of decisions quoted in which the gift in question was for purposes so defined as to include what the courts have held might or might not be charitable objects or purposes. For instance, in Re Macduff, Macduff v. Macduff (4) the headnote says ([1896] 2 Ch. 451):

> "A bequest of money 'for some one or more purposes, charitable, philanthropic, or ,' is not bad simply by reason of the existence of the blank, but must be treated as one 'for charitable or philanthropic purposes.' Such a bequest, however, is not a good charitable bequest, as there may be philanthropic purposes which are not charitable."

In the judgments in that case, although possibly there is some slight difference in the extent to which the opinions of the different judges who decided it went, there is nothing that I can find which throws any doubt upon the view I take in the present case. This case is not that the trustees should hold the property of this trust for the specific purposes or for some other purposes in their discretion. They are strictly limited to the specific objects and purposes referred to in the Act, which are plainly public purposes and which are expressly stated to be for the benefit of the nation.

There is no choice given to the trustees, as was the case in Re Macduff, Macduff v. Macduff (4), in Blair v. Duncan (5), in Perring v. Trail (6), or in Kendall v. Granger (7), and other cases that have been cited.

For these reasons it seems to me the objects and purposes of this society are plainly within the judgment of the House of Lords in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (1), and are charitable, and essentially so within the meaning and intention of a large number of authorities which exist on the subject. I therefore declare that the objects and purposes of this National Trust are charitable within the legal meaning of that term.

[In the case of the 238 acres of land in the parish of Wichen, in the county of Cambridge, devised by George Henry Verrall in 1911 to the National Trust, and as to which there had been no extension of time granted or any resolution passed under s. 21 (2), a retention order was made on the plaintiff's request, the Official Trustee of Charity Lands offering no opposition.]

Action tried by Pickford, J., in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs claimed from the defendants the sum of £296 13s. 11d. as acceptors of a bill of exchange for £290 5s. 2d. dated April 6, 1913, drawn by the Pensacola

Tar and Turpentine Co. upon the defendants in payment of some turpentine sold by the Pensacola company to the defendants, payable thirty days after sight to the order of the First National Bank, Pensacola, and endorsed to the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs claiming to be holders for value of the bill. The bill was discounted by the Pensacola Tar and Turpentine Co. and passed on to their bankers, the First National Bank, Pensacola, whose agents in New York were C. Schumacher & Co. On May 9, 1913, the bill was purchased by the plaintiffs from Schumacher & Co. for $1407.38. At the time the bill was bought by the plaintiffs it had not been accepted, and was in fact accepted by the defendants on May 20. The defendants desired to accept the bill subject to their approving the goods, but the plaintiffs' representatives in London refused to take such a qualified acceptance. Subsequently the defendants refused to meet the bill on the grounds that the consideration for the bill had failed and that they had a counter-claim for the amount of the bill. On July 24, 1913, Schumacher & Co. requested the plaintiffs to send the bill in to them, and said they would pay its face value, and cable charges and expenses. This was not done, and a correspondence subsequently took place between the plaintiffs, the first National Bank of Pensacola, and the Pensacola Tar and Turpentine Co., which resulted in an agreement that the plaintiffs should sue the defendants in their own name, the Pensacola company undertaking to pay all expenses and also the amount of the bill if the plaintiffs failed in their action. The object of this arrangement was that the defendants should not set up against the plaintiffs the defences which might have been open to them as against the Pensacola company.

Morton Smith for the defendants.
Harold Murphy for the plaintiffs.

PICKFORD, J. [after stating the facts, continued]: It was said that the plaintiffs are not holders for value in due course. A holder in due course can sue the acceptor of the bill free from the rights of the acceptor against the drawer. The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 29 (1), provides that > "a holder in due course is a holder who has taken a bill complete and regular on the face of it, under the following conditions—namely: (a) That he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonoured, if such was the fact; (b) that he took the bill in good faith and for value, and that at the time the bill was negotiated to him he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it," and by s. 38 a holder of a bill may sue in his own name, and

> "where he is a holder in due course, he holds the bill free from any defect of title of prior parties, as well as from mere personal defences available to prior parties among themselves, and may enforce payment against all parties liable to the bill."

It was contended on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiffs are not holders in due course, because at the time the bill was negotiated to them it had not been accepted, and, therefore, was not complete, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs are not entitled as holders in due course to sue the defendants as acceptors of the bill free from the rights which the defendants may have against the drawers of the bill. That contention, which puzzled me for some time, was based upon a misapprehension as to the nature of a bill of exchange. A bill of exchange is defined in s. 3 (1) of the Act as > "an unconditional order in writing, addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay on demand, or at a period or determinable future time, a sum certain in money to or to the order of a specified person, or to bearer."

The section, therefore, requires that a person shall draw the bill, and it shall be directed to some particular person, with a direction to that person as to the person to whom he shall pay the bill; but the section does not require that the person to whom the bill shall be addressed shall have accepted it. It, therefore, seems to me clear that this bill when taken by the plaintiffs was a complete bill, notwithstanding that it had not, at that time, been accepted. That is not new law, because PATTISON, J., held in R. v. Kinnear (1) that an instrument drawn by A. upon B., requiring him to pay to the order of C. a certain sum at a certain time, "without acceptance," was a bill of exchange, notwithstanding that the bill said that acceptance was not required. That was a criminal case, and therefore the definition of a bill of exchange would be applied very strictly. The same judge expressed the same view in the course of the argument in Davis v. Clarke (2), where he said that in Gray v. Milner (3) it was not a complete bill till the defendants accepted it, but here, being addressed to John Hart, it was a perfect bill. In my opinion, therefore, the defendants' first point fails.

The second point taken on behalf of the defendants is that, in consequence of the agreement between the plaintiffs and the drawers of the bill, the plaintiffs must be taken as suing merely as trustees for the sellers, the drawers of the bill, and that, therefore, the defendants are entitled to set up as against the plaintiffs the same defences as they would be entitled to set up against the sellers. The short answer to that point is that the plaintiffs are not suing as trustees for the drawers. A trustee would have to account for the money he recovered, but the plaintiffs are entitled to keep the money they recovered and are not bound to account to the drawers. The drawers only guaranteed to indemnify the plaintiffs against expenses and to pay the amount of the bill, if the plaintiffs sued the defendants instead of suing them. It is merely the case of a man having a just cause of action against two persons, one of whom says to him, "sue the other and if you do I will indemnify you against the costs, and if you do not succeed in your action I will pay you." That does not prevent the man bringing his action against the other and succeeding. Therefore that point fails also, and there must be judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Estate Agent—Commission—Effective cause of sale—Sale by owner to purchaser introduced by agents as a tenant three years previously.

The defendant gave instructions to the plaintiffs, estate agents, to obtain a tenant for his house at a yearly rent, or, alternatively, a purchaser. The plaintiffs obtained a tenant who took the house for three years, and the plaintiffs were paid their commission in respect of that matter. At the end of the three years and without any further intervention on the part of the plaintiffs, the defendant sold the house to the tenant's wife. The plaintiffs claimed commission on the sale.

Held: the proper test to be applied was that laid down by COLLINS, M.R., in Millar, Son & Co. v. Radford (1), namely, that "it was necessary to show that the introduction was an efficient cause in bringing about . . . the sale"; it had been found as a fact that the introduction by the plaintiffs was not the effective cause of the sale; and, therefore, the commission was not payable.

Appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (RIDLEY and AVORY, JJ.), reversing a decision of the county court judge sitting at Kingston in favour of the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiffs, who were house agents, claiming £44 10s. as balance of commission alleged to be due on the sale of the defendant's house.

Compston, K.C., and Merlin for the defendant.

J. I. Macpherson (Colam, K.C., with him) for the plaintiffs.

LORD READING, C.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of a Divisional Court ordering a new trial of an action in a County Court. The action was by the plaintiffs to recover commission on the sale of a house. It appeared that a house agent, named Terry, in 1908 received instructions from the defendant to find a person who would either take a lease of, or buy, his house. Terry since that date has assigned his business to one Thompson, who in turn assigned it to Nightingale and Phillips. They are all joined as plaintiffs, and so no question as to parties is raised. The mandate Terry received from the defendant was to let the house at a rent of £120 a year, or alternatively to sell it for £2,500. That, however, does not mean that no commisssion at all would be payable if the house were let or sold through the agency of Terry for a lower sum. In fact, in September, 1908, Terry succeeded in letting the house to a tenant, a Mr. Sounes, at a rent of £110 a year for three years, with an option to the tenant to continue the tenancy for a total term of five or seven years, and Terry was paid commission upon that letting. At the end of the three years the tenant said that he would not continue the tenancy unless the defendant made certain additions to the house. The defendant refused, and thereupon the question of purchasing the house arose, and Mrs. Soumes bought it from the defendant for the sum of £1,900. The plaintiffs claim commission in respect of that sale. It is not suggested that there was any active intervention by Terry, or any one of the plaintiffs, after the original letting in 1908. The facts are not in dispute. Terry had brought about the original letting, and nothing further was done by him. Mr. Soumes refused at that time to purchase the house. In my opinion the proper test in an action by a house agent to recover commission is that laid down by COLLINS, M.R., in Millar Son & Co. v. Radford (1), which apparently was concurred in by MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ.—namely, whether "the introduction was an efficient cause in bringing about the letting or the sale." In the present case the county court judge has found that "though the plaintiff introduced the property to Mr. and Mrs. Soumes, that introduction was not in my view the effective cause of the subsequent sale." That is a finding that the plaintiffs have not established that which is essential to their claim. The county court judge having found that fact, upon evidence which entitles him so to find, it is not open to the Divisional Court or to this court to interfere with that finding. It is not necessary to say whether we should have come to the same conclusion upon the evidence, though, speaking for myself, I think that I should have arrived at the same conclusion as the county court judge. In Walker, Fraser and Steele v. Fraser's Trustees (2) the test applied seems to me to have been really the same, although the language used by the judges may have been different. In my opinion the county court judge has applied the right principle of law, and has come to a conclusion of fact fatal to the plaintiffs' claim. The appeal must be allowed and the judgment of the county court judge destored.

KENNEDY, L.J.—I entirely agree with what my Lord has said, and I propose to add very little. The county court judge has found as a fact that, though the plaintiff Terry introduced the property to Mr. and Mrs. Soumes, that introduction was not the effective cause of the subsequent sale. We cannot review that finding of fact unless we come to the conclusion that there is no evidence to support it. There is here ample evidence, and that really disposes of the case.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The county court judge has found a certain fact, and there is really no dispute upon it. Terry, who was called for the plaintiffs, said that the defendant instructed him in 1908 "to find a tenant or purchaser"; that he "succeeded in letting, but failed to sell"; that he was paid commission on the letting, and the matter was closed so far as he was concerned. The county court judge has found that the introduction of the property by Terry to Mr. and Mrs. Soumes was not "the effective cause of the subsequent sale." To my mind the evidence upon that is all one way, but, be that as it may, we are bound by the finding of fact of the county court judge. In Millar, Son & Co. v. Radford (1), COLLINS, M.R., laid down the test applicable to this class of case. The facts in that case are practically identical with those in the present case. The defendant there employed the plaintiffs to find a purchaser or, failing a purchaser, a tenant for a certain property. The plaintiffs failed to find a purchaser, but found a tenant, and were paid commission in respect of the letting. After the tenant had been in possession for about fifteen months he purchased the property from the defendant. The plaintiffs thereupon claimed commission on the sale, but the court held that they were not entitled to it. In delivering judgment COLLINS, M.R., said (19 T.L.R. at p. 576):

> "The claim of house agents to be entitled to commission in circumstances like the present is a claim which is often made and is likely to continue to be made. It is, therefore, important to point out that the right to commission does not arise out of the mere fact that agents have introduced a tenant or a purchaser. It is not sufficient to show that the introduction was a causa sine qua non. It is necessary to show that the introduction was an efficient cause in bringing about the letting or the sale. Here the plaintiffs failed to establish what is a condition precedent to their right to commission—viz., that they brought about the sale. It is open to the defendant in an action like this to say either that, though the plaintiffs effected a sale, they were not his agents, or that, though they were his agents, they had not effected the sale. If the defendant proved either the one or the other, the plaintiffs failed to make out their case."

Every word of that is applicable to the present case. The plaintiff Terry did not effect the sale, though he did effect the original letting. The sale was not brought about by him in any effective way.

Appeal allowed.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Reading, C.J., Lord Coleridge and Sankey, JJ.) May 4, 11, 1914]

[Reported [1914] 3 K.B. 339; 83 L.J.K.B. 1801; 111 L.T. 638; 78 J.P. 390; 30 T.L.R. 521; 58 Sol. Jo. 673; 24 Cox, C.C. 406; 10 Cr. App. Rep. 180]

Criminal Law—Demanding money with menaces—Threat to injure property—Threat to attack company in newspaper—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 96), s. 45.

By s. 45 of the Larceny Act, 1861, [see now s. 30 of the Larceny Act, 1916,]: "Whosoever shall with menaces or by force demand any property, chattel, money, valuable security, or any other valuable thing of any person, with intent to steal the same, shall be guilty of felony . . ."

When a man, with intent to steal, threatens to commit acts calculated to injure the property or character of another, e.g., to publish in a periodical attacks on a company in which the prosecutor is interested, it is a menace within the meaning of the section.

Criminal Law—Evidence—Similar transaction—Previous transaction substantially similar to that charged.

The ground upon which evidence of similar transactions is admissible is that it is relevant on the question of the real intent of the accused in doing the act charged. Its object is to negative such a defence as mistake, or accident, or absence of criminal intent, and to prove the guilty mind which is the necessary ingredient.

Notes. Section 45 of the Larceny Act, 1861, has been replaced in almost identical terms by s. 30 of the Larceny Act, 1916.

May 11, 1914. The following judgment of the court was read by

LORD READING, C.J.—The appellants were indicted with another person under s. 45 of the Larceny Act, 1861, [now s. 30 of the Larceny Act, 1916], which makes it a felony to demand money with menaces, or by force, with intent to steal the same. After a lengthy trial the accused were convicted, Boyle being sentenced to five years' penal servitude and Marchant to eighteen months' imprisonment without hard labour. Both appellants appeal against their conviction upon two grounds: (i) That the facts, as proved, do not constitute the offence charged against them; (ii) that evidence was wrongfully admitted by the learned judge at the trial

With regard to the first point, the facts may be shortly stated as follows. The prosecutor, one Richard Whieldon Barnett, was chairman of a company known as the Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields, Ltd., which had an issued capital of over a million sterling. That company had been the subject of attacks in a paper known as "Rubber and Oil" upon July 28 and Aug. 20, 1913. In the following November the appellants threatened to continue the attacks upon the company. They represented that they had done very well from the market standpoint out of an attack upon a rival company, and that they thought a similar attack on the Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields company would easily reduce the market price of the shares by 5s. per £1 share. They demanded from Mr. Barnett the payment of a considerable sum of money and the delivery to them of a large number of shares as the price of their silence.

It was contended by counsel for the appellants that these facts did not bring the conduct of the prisoners within the words of s. 45 of the Larceny Act, 1861, [now s. 30 of the Larceny Act, 1916]. The answer to this contention depends upon the meaning to be attributed to the word "menaces" as used in that section. A number of old statutes and cases were cited to us with the object of establishing that a menace must either be a threat of physical violence or a threat of injury to character, and it was said that the threat used by the appellants did not come within either of these categories, inasmuch as it amounted, at most, to a threat to depreciate the market value of the property of the shareholders of the company by adverse criticism or comment, which would reduce the price obtainable in the market for shares in the company, but would not and could not affect the intrinsic value of the property of the company or its shareholders. We do not think that the meaning of the word "menaces" in the section is so restricted. Whatever may have been the view in earlier days under the older statutes and decisions, a wider meaning has been given to the word by later decisions, beginning with R. v. Walton and Ogden (1), decided by a very strong court more than fifty years ago. That case was argued before Erle, C.J., Blackburn and Keating, JJ., Wilde, B., and Mellor, J., on an indictment under the same section of the statute now under review. In delivering the considered judgment of that court Wilde, B., laid down what we think is the true test. He said:

> "Where, then, is the proper limit to the operation of this section? It is to be found in the words 'with intent to steal.' Nothing is said about 'violence' in conjunction with menaces, still less of violence to the person, as distinct from violence to property. There is no express limit except in the words 'with intent to steal.' "

He then proceeds to discuss the incidents attending the demand of money or property which are necessary to constitute stealing. In the result he arrives at the conclusion that, if a man is induced to part with his money or property through fear or alarm, he is no longer a free agent and is no longer capable of parting with the property with his consent. If the threat was of a character to produce in an ordinary man such a degree of fear or alarm as would and was made with that intent, it would constitute the offence under the section now under consideration notwithstanding that the threat was not of physical violence or of injury to character.

A similar view was taken of the meaning of the word as used in the previous section (s. 44) of the Larceny Act, 1861, by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved in R. v. Tomlinson (2). Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., delivered a judgment wherein he held that the word "menaces" must be construed in a wide sense, and, moreover, that it was not confined to a threat of injury to the person or property of the person threatened. Some of the expressions used by WILLS, J., in that case may have gone too far, but we agree with him that the doctrine that the threat must be of a nature to operate on a man of reasonably sound or ordinarily firm mind should receive a liberal construction in practice. We think it would be unwise to attempt to lay down any exhaustive definition of the words of the section. The degree of fear or alarm which a threat may be calculated to produce upon the mind of the person on whom it is intended to operate may vary in different cases and in different circumstances. A threat to injure a man's property may be more serious to him and have greater effect upon his mind than a threat of physical violence. When there is evidence of such a threat as is calculated to operate upon the mind of a person of ordinarily firm mind, and the jury have been properly directed, it is for them to determine whether in fact the conduct of the accused has brought them within the section, and whether in the particular case the "menace" is established. If the threat is of such a character that it is not calculated to deprive any person of reasonably sound and ordinarily firm mind of the free and voluntary action of his mind it would not be a menace within the meaning of the section. In our judgment, when a man, with intent to steal, threatens either to do violence to the person of another, or to commit acts calculated to injure the property or character of another, it is a menace within the meaning of the section. Although in this case there has been some criticism of part of the direction of the learned judge upon this point, we think that in substance, and viewing the summing up as a whole, his direction to the jury was in accordance with the views that we have expressed, and therefore any complaint of misdirection fails. In the judgment of this court there was ample evidence fit for the consideration of the jury at the close of the case for the prosecution that the appellants were guilty of the offence charged. The learned judge was right in not stopping the case at that stage, and eventually was right in submitting the case to the jury. The court is of opinion that the jury, upon a direction by the judge which we hold to have been proper and adequate, were entitled to find that the conduct of the appellants had brought them within the section, and the appeal on the first point therefore fails.

With regard to the second point, the facts may be stated as follows. It was complained, in respect of the charge that the payment of the money, £600, had been demanded in gold so as to conceal the names of the recipients and the transaction generally, that evidence had been admitted to prove that in the previous May a transaction of a character in all substantial respects similar to that charged had taken place, as a result of which one Newberry had paid over a sum of £80 in gold to a representative of the paper "Rubber and Oil" and of the appellants. It was contended that such evidence was not admissible in law, and that, having been admitted, it seriously prejudiced the appellants, and therefore the conviction should be quashed. We are of opinion that the contention is wrong, and that the evidence was properly admitted. The learned counsel for the prosecution anticipated that a defence would be set up that the paper "Rubber and Oil" was conducted in good faith and as a legitimate journalistic enterprise, and that the conduct of the accused, in relation thereto, was inconsistent with any criminal intent, whereas the case for the prosecution was that, upon the the true state of the facts, such a defence was wholly unfounded and untrue. That his anticipation was justified was shown by the cross-examination of the witnesses for the Crown. The law regulating the admission of such evidence was authoritatively laid down by LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., in Makin v. A.-G. for New South Wales (3) ([1894] A.C. at p. 65) in the following passage:

"In their Lordships' opinion the principles which must govern the decision of the case are clear, though the application of them is by no means free from difficulty. It is undoubtedly not competent for the prosecution to adduce evidence tending to show that the accused has been guilty of criminal acts other than those covered by the indictment, for the purpose of leading to the conclusion that the accused is a person likely, from his criminal conduct or character, to have committed the offence for which he is being tried. On the other hand, the mere fact that the evidence adduced tends to show the commission of other crimes does not render it inadmissible if it be relevant to an issue before the jury, and it may be so relevant if it bears upon the question whether the acts alleged to constitute the crime charged in the indictment were designed or accidental, or to rebut a defence which would otherwise be open to the accused. The statement of these general principles is easy, but it is obvious that it may often be very difficult to draw the line, and to decide whether a particular piece of evidence is on the one side or the other."

No doubt differences of judicial opinion have arisen with regard to the application of this principle in subsequent cases: see R. v. Ollis (4) and R. v. Bond (5). In the latter case the prisoner, a medical man, was indicted for feloniously using certain instruments on a certain woman with intent to procure her miscarriage. At the trial evidence was tendered on behalf of the prosecution to show that some nine months previously the prisoner had used similar instruments upon another woman with the avowed intention of bringing about her miscarriage, and that he had then used expressions tending to show that he was in the habit of performing similar operations for the same illegal purpose. The evidence was admitted, and the prisoner was convicted. We think that the ground upon which such evidence is admissible is that it is relevant to the question of the real intent of the accused in doing the acts. Its object is to negative such a defence as mistake, or accident, or absence of criminal intent, and to prove the guilty mind which is the necessary ingredient of the offence charged. There is, as is apparent from a consideration of the authorities, an essential difference between evidence tending to show generally that the accused has a fraudulent or dishonest mind, which evidence is not admissible, and evidence tending to show that he had a fraudulent or dishonest mind in the particular transaction the subject-matter of the charge then being investigated, which evidence is admissible. It has been laid down that there must be a nexus or connection between the act charged and the facts relating to previous or subsequent transactions which it is sought to give in evidence to make such evidence admissible: see R. v. Rhodes (6), per Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and R. v. Ellis (7). In the recent case of R. v. Mason (8) this court followed the decision in R. v. Rhodes (6), and came to the conclusion that the evidence of similar transactions subsequent to the charge was admissible in order to rebut the defence set up.

It would serve no useful purpose to discuss in detail the relevant facts in this particular case. It is sufficient to say that the case for the prosecution was that the paper "Rubber and Oil" was carried on by the appellants for the purpose of making and enforcing such demands for money as were made in this case, and that it was not carried on as a legitimate journalistic enterprise, and that various devices were resorted to for the purpose of concealing the connection of the appellants with the operations of this paper; whereas one of the defences was that "Rubber and Oil" was a financial newspaper existing for the purpose of dealing with undertakings connected with rubber and oil, and that one of its legitimate functions was to comment upon and criticise the affairs of the company in question and its management by the chairman. Again, the case for the prosecution was that Carter in demanding the payment of the money, and in gold, was acting as the agent of the appellants, whereas the defence was a denial of this fact. Carter had acted as the agent of Boyle in demanding the £80 from Newberry in gold. It became of distinct importance to determine which of these views was correct, and we are of opinion that, upon the above-mentioned principles of law, evidence was admissible of the circumstances of the payment of the £80 in gold and of Carter's having acted as agent for the appellants in the matters relating thereto, as such evidence tended to rebut the defences of the accused. We are not attempting in this case to lay down any new principles of law. We are merely applying well-established principles to the particular facts of this case. For these reasons we are of opinion that the appeal fails, and that the convictions must be affirmed.

Company—Winding-up—Reconstruction of company—Dissent—Rights of executor of deceased member—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 69), s. 192.

Notwithstanding that the executors of a deceased member of a company have not caused themselves to be registered as the owners of his shares, they have the same right to dissent from a scheme for the reconstruction of the company under s. 192 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [s. 287 of Companies Act, 1948], and to restrain the liquidator from carrying that scheme into effect without purchasing the deceased member's interest as the deceased member himself would have had if he had been still living. A provision in the articles of association of the company that executors are prohibited from exercising any of the rights and privileges of a member unless and until they shall have elected to be, and shall have been, registered as the holders of his shares, is confined to the exercise of the rights and privileges on their own behalf, and not on behalf of the estate of the deceased member.

Appeal from a decision of ASTBURY, J., on a summons taken out by the plaintiffs for an injunction directed to the liquidator of the defendant company.

The defendant company was incorporated on Mar. 5, 1910, with a capital of £120,000 in £1 shares. A. B. Lambe, who died on July 26, 1910, was at his death the registered owner of 5,000 £1 shares in the company. The executors of A. B. Lambe gave notice of his death to the company, and the probate of his will was entered upon the register of the company, but they did not cause themselves to be registered as owners of the shares. On Sept. 30, 1910, a final call of 2s. 6d. a share was made by the directors, and that was paid by the executors out of the estate of A. B. Lambe. At extraordinary general meetings of the company, held on Dec. 4 and 19, 1913, special resolutions were passed and confirmed that the company should be voluntarily wound-up for the purpose of reconstruction according to an approved scheme, and a liquidator was appointed with power to carry out the scheme. The scheme was for a sale of the assets of the company to a new company in consideration of the issue to the shareholders of the old company of shares in the new company, not fully-paid, which it was admitted could only be carried out under s. 192 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [see now s. 287 of Companies Act, 1948]. Notices of these meetings were sent to the executors, but they did not vote at either of the meetings. On Dec. 20, 1913, the executors gave notice to the liquidator of the company that they dissented from the special resolution confirmed on Dec. 19, and required him either to refrain from carrying that resolution into effect or to purchase the shares held by them as executors of A. B. Lambe at a price to be determined under s. 192 (3) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [s. 287 (3) of Act of 1948]. The liquidator gave notice to the executors that he refused to act upon their notice to him of Dec. 20 on the ground that they were not "members" of the company, and were, therefore, precluded by art. 37 of the company's articles from exercising any of the rights and privileges of members since they had failed to have themselves registered as members. The executors now moved for an injunction to restrain the liquidator in the terms of their notice to him of Dec. 20, 1913. On June 19, 1914, the motion came on to be heard before ASTBURY, J., who held that the expression "member" in s. 192 of the Act of 1908 included the estate of a deceased member and there was nothing in the articles of the company which prevented him giving effect to that view. Accordingly, he granted the injunction sought by the executors. The liquidator appealed.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of ASTBURY, J., restraining the defendant company and the liquidator from acting upon or carrying into effect the special resolutions proposed and carried at two extraordinary meetings of the company, and carrying out the agreement therein mentioned unless they should in the meantime have purchased the interest of the plaintiffs in the company pursuant to s. 192 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. The point is quite a short one, and the facts are not in dispute. A gentleman named Lambe was a shareholder in the company holding 5,000 £1 shares. He died in July, 1910. At the date of his death these shares were partly paid, 17s. 6d. being paid, and after his death there was an additional call of 2s. 6d. per share, amounting on these 5,000 shares to £625. This was paid by the plaintiffs, who were the executors of the deceased, and the shares were then fully paid. The plaintiffs, the executors, duly proved the will of the deceased and lodged the probate for registration with the defendant company. They never, however, became shareholders themselves in the company or members of the company or asked to be registered in their own names, but were content to leave these fully-paid shares in the name of the deceased with a note of the probate in the books of the company. In 1913 the company was minded to pass resolutions for a winding-up with a view to reconstruction. On Nov. 1 notices were sent round, and in December two extraordinary meetings were held, at which the special resolutions were duly passed and confirmed. On Dec. 20, the day after the second resolution was passed, the plaintiffs, as executors of the deceased, served notice of dissent under s. 192. There is no question as to the form of the notice, which was proper under the statute, and required the liquidator either to abstain from carrying the resolution into effect or to purchase their interest at a price to be determined by agreement or by arbitration. The contention is that the plaintiffs, being only executors of a deceased member, were not entitled to serve notice under s. 192. Accordingly the defendant company treated the notice as invalid, and the executors thereupon started this action to restrain the company from acting upon the resolutions. ASTBURY, J., granted an injunction as asked, and the liquidator of the defendant company now appeals.

The question raised is: Are the plaintiffs, as executors, entitled to this injunction, which depends on the question whether they have the right to dissent. It is beyond dispute that the word "member" used in the statute of 1908 and in the articles of association of this company is used sometimes as referring to a member on the register, and also sometimes as including and extending to a deceased member and the estate of a deceased member. It is beyond dispute that the word bears from time to time one or both of those meanings, and now one and now the other. The question is, therefore: Does it in s. 192 (3) include the estate of a deceased member? Section 192 (1) provides that, on a company transferring its property on a winding-up, the liquidator may receive, in consideration or part consideration for such transfer or sale, shares, policies, or other like interests in the transferee company for distribution among the members of the transferor company, or may enter into an arrangement whereby the members of the transferor company may, in lieu of receiving cash, shares, policies, or other like interests, or in addition thereto, participate in the profits of or receive any other benefit from the transferee company. In sub-s. (1) it is clear that the words "members of the transferor company" do include a deceased member's estate as well as a living member. "Distribution among the members," &c., extends to the estates of deceased members—that is not disputed. Then sub-s. (2) provides that any sale or arrangement in pursuance of this section shall be binding on the members of the transferor company. This obviously extends to deceased members' estates, which are bound by a sale pursuant to the section; such a sale is to be binding on the living as well as on the dead members. Then there is sub-s. (3). It would be strange, in a section which provides for distribution of proceeds of sale among members, including deceased members, and for deceased members being bound by such sales, if, where there is provision for the raising of objections to such sales, or requiring the interest of the dissentient member to be purchased, then this provision is not to extend to deceased members and the estates of deceased members. It is said in this case that the subsection can only refer to living members because it provides for the member not voting for the resolutions, and it is said that unless there is a living member there is no right to attend meetings and vote. The answer to that is, as regards the estate of a deceased member, that the executors could not vote because they have no right to attend the meetings.

On the question whether in such a case executors have a right to require their interest to be purchased, I think some light is thrown upon the way in which this section should be interpreted by James v. Buena Ventura Nitrate Grounds Syndicate, Ltd. (1), where the question was whether a deceased member was entitled to participate in new shares which were being created. RIGBY, L.J., says ([1896] 1 Ch. at p. 466):

> "Speaking generally, the executors of a deceased member of a limited company as representing his estate are entitled to all the profits and advantages attaching to the shares belonging to their testator, and subject to all the incidental liabilities, although in terms such profits, advantages, and liabilities would seem to attach to members only."

The provision of sub-s. (3) is an advantage attaching to the shares, enabling a request to be made to the liquidator to purchase the shares at a price to be determined by agreement or arbitration. Section 192 (1), therefore, in my opinion, extends to deceased members and enables a request to be made to purchase the interest of dissentient members, and is to be applied as well to deceased as to living members.

Then it is said, if this is so, the plaintiffs are excluded by art. 37. The short answer is, if they have a statutory right, they could not be excluded by the articles of association. In Baring-Gould v. Sharpington Combined Pick and Shovel Syndicate, Ltd. (2), where it was alleged that certain provisions in the articles of association amounted to an "agreement" so as to exclude a member from statutory rights, and it was held otherwise, LORD LINDLEY, M.R., said ([1899] 2 Ch. at p. 90):

> "Any contrary interpretation of that section would come to this, that the company could by the articles of association made beforehand—before there was any dispute with a dissentient member—bind all the members, and deprive them of the benefits conferred on them in the event of their becoming dissentient members under s. 162. I do not think that this can be done by the articles of association."

If the company could not by the articles of association exclude all the members from the rights conferred by the section, it will not be open to them to exclude any class of members who might be dissentient. But I do not think that that is the true construction of art. 37. That article provides:

> "A person entitled to a share in consequence of the death or bankruptcy of a member shall not be entitled to . . . attend or vote at meetings of the company, or . . . exercise any of the rights and privileges of membership unless and until he shall have elected to be and shall have been registered as the holder of the share."

The true construction of that article is that such a person may not exercise many of the ordinary privileges of membership such as requisitioning a meeting, or exercise the power of a member in forming one of a quorum or claim in respect of the shares held to qualify as a director. The article would exclude him from such rights, but would not preclude him from receiving every advantage to which the shares entitled him. He would be entitled thus to receive dividends, bonuses, and the like, and, as it was an advantage attaching to the shares, he would be entitled to requisition the liquidator either to buy out his interest or to abstain from carrying the resolutions into effect. For these reasons the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I agree.

Action.

The plaintiff brought this action against the vicar and churchwardens of Mytholmroyd claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from using for burials an extension of the churchyard which was within one hundred yards of dwelling-houses owned by him without his consent in writing.

The facts are set out in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 18, 1914. SARGANT, J.—In this action the plaintiff, as the owner of three dwelling-houses in Church Street, in the district parish of Mytholmroyd, in the county of York, and as occupier of one of these dwelling-houses, seeks to prohibit the defendants, as the vicar and churchwardens of the said district parish, from using or allowing to be used for burials an addition which has been recently made to the churchyard of the said district parish, and which is situated within a distance of 100 yards of the plaintiff's dwelling-houses.

The right to the prohibition is based on s. 9 of the Burial Act, 1855, but, in order to thoroughly understand that section, it is necessary also to refer to certain prior legislation. The first of these Acts is the Burial Act, 1852, which related exclusively to the metropolis as therein defined. By s. 2 of that Act, power was given to prescribe by Order in Council that burials should be discontinued, either wholly, or with any exception or qualification, in any part or parts of the metropolis, or in any burial ground or places of burial in the metropolis. By s. 9, it was enacted that no new burial ground or cemetery (parochial or non-parochial) should be provided or used in the metropolis or within two miles of any part thereof without the previous approval of one of the principal Secretaries of State. By ss. 10 to 24, provision was made for the formation of burial boards for the parishes in which the places of burial should appear to the ratepayers insufficient or dangerous to health (whether any Order in Council in relation to any burial ground in such parish had or had not been made), and, by s. 25, which is the vital section for the present purpose, it was enacted as follows:

> "Every burial board shall, with all convenient speed, proceed to provide a burial ground for the parish or parishes for which they are appointed to act, and to make arrangements for facilitating interments therein; and in providing such burial ground the board shall have reference to the convenience of access thereto from the parish or parishes for which the same is provided; and any such burial ground may be provided either within or without the limits of the parish, or all or any of the parishes, for which the same is provided; but no ground not already used as or appropriated for a cemetery shall be appropriated as a burial ground, or as an addition to a burial ground, under this Act, nearer than two hundred yards to any dwelling-house, without the consent in writing of the owner, lessee, and occupier of such dwelling-house."

The Burial Act, 1853, enabled the application to other populous parts of the country of provisions similar to those of the Act of 1852. By s. 1 of the Act, an Order in Council might prescribe that no new burial ground should be opened in any city or town, or within any other limits, without the previous approval of one of the principal Secretaries of State, or (as the case might require) that burials in any city or town, or within any limits, or in any burial grounds or places of burial, should be discontinued, either wholly or subject to any exceptions or qualifications. And by s. 7 of the Act, the provisions contained in ss. 10 to 42 inclusive, and in certain other sections of the Burial Act, 1852, were extended to extra-metropolitan parishes. By the Burial Act, 1854, s. 12, it was provided that s. 25 of the Act of 1852 was not to apply either to burial grounds provided under that Act or to burial grounds provided under the Act of 1853, and in lieu thereof it was enacted as follows, namely,

> "So much of the said Act of the fifteenth and sixteenth years of Her Majesty as enacts that 'no ground (not already used as or appropriated for a cemetery) shall be appropriated as a burial ground or as an addition to a burial ground under that Act nearer than two hundred yards to any dwelling-house, without the consent in writing of the owner, lessee, and occupier of such dwelling-house,' shall not extend or be applicable to or in respect of any burial grounds which have been or may be provided under the said Act of the last session and this Act, or either of them, or to or in respect of any addition which has been or may be so provided to any burial ground; but no ground not already used as or appropriated for a cemetery shall be appropriated under the said Act of the last session and this Act, or either of them, as a burial ground, or as an addition to a burial ground, nearer than one hundred yards to any dwelling-house, without such consent as aforesaid."

The Burial Act, 1855, made further additions to and amendments of the provisions of the Burial Acts of the three preceding years, and, by s. 9 of that Act, it was provided as follows:

> "So much of the said Act of the fifteenth and sixteenth years of Her Majesty as enacts that 'no ground (not already used as or appropriated for a cemetery) shall be appropriated as a burial ground, or as an addition to a burial ground, under that Act nearer than two hundred yards to any dwelling-house, without the consent in writing of the owner, lessee, and occupier of such dwelling-house,' shall be repealed; but no ground not already used as or appropriated for a cemetery shall be used for burials under the said Act or this Act, or either of them, within the distance of one hundred yards from any dwelling-house, without such consent as aforesaid."

It was held in Lord Cowley v. Byas (2) that this section in effect repealed s. 12 of the Burial Act, 1854, and since then this latter section, as well as the earlier part of s. 9 of the Burial Act, 1885, has been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892. The latter part of s. 9 of the Burial Act, 1855, has, therefore, been left as the only applicable legislation for the present purpose.

The facts of the present case are, except on one point, simple and undisputed. The district parish of Mytholmroyd was, by Order in Council dated Feb. 25, 1846, and made under the New Parishes Act, 1843, formed as a separate district for ecclesiastical purposes out of the ancient parish of Halifax, which was a parish of very great size, comprising some twenty-three townships forming one unit of administration for civil purposes, and also comprising as regards ecclesiastical purposes a large number of chapelries. It is clear from the provisions of the Act in question and the terms of the Order in Council that there was not, at the time, any actual church or chapel in the area constituted as the district parish of Mytholmroyd, but I understand that it is part of the common case of the parties that a church was soon afterwards built and consecrated as the parish church of the district parish in question; that such church had attached to it a churchyard which became the churchyard of the district parish, and that, from that time forward, the position has been the same, so far as ecclesiastical purposes are concerned, as if the church and churchyard had been those of an ancient parish comprising the district marked out by the Order in Council. In December, 1908, about a third of an acre of land adjoining the existing churchyard of the district parish was acquired by the vicar and churchwardens as and for an addition to and extension of the churchyard, and, under the Consecration of Churchyards Act, 1867, this piece of land was duly conveyed for the purpose in January, 1910, and consecrated in February, 1910. The whole of this land is within a hundred yards of the plaintiff's houses. The plaintiff did in fact at one time consent to that portion of the extension which was nearest to his houses being used for burials, but that portion has now, as I understand, been filled, and the defendants are now allowing and claiming the right to allow burials in parts of the rest of the extension as to which the plaintiff has not given any such consent. It is not pleaded or seriously urged that, as to the remainder of the extension, the plaintiff's rights have been prejudiced by the consent previously given by him, and, accordingly, I have to determine a bare question of law—namely, whether the prohibitory words of s. 9 of the Burial Act, 1855, extend to and comprise extensions of churchyards such as this, which are made independently of the provisions of the Burial Acts in question.

For this purpose, something may perhaps turn on a question of fact, as to which there has been some controversy between the parties—namely, whether the district parish of Mytholmroyd is within the area comprised in the Order in Council of Feb. 3, 1858—that is, whether it was a part of the parish of Halifax within the meaning of that order. It is said on behalf of the defendants that, inasmuch as the unit for civil purposes was not the ancient parish but one or other of the twenty-three townships, and inasmuch also as the district parish had become completely severed from the parish of Halifax for ecclesiastical purposes, the district was in no sense within the parish of Halifax; and a distinction is taken between this district and certain other districts, mentioned in the Order in Council and its amending orders as parts of the parish of Halifax, on the ground that those districts only had chapels of ease built for them, and had not been completely severed from the mother parish for ecclesiastical purposes. But, on the whole, I think that this argument is too refined, and does not really give any intelligible meaning to the phrase "parish of Halifax." It seems to me that the order and its amending orders are dealing with the whole of the area of the ancient parish of Halifax, and that it would be over-minute and really capricious to give to the language of what is obviously an order relating to matters of sanitation a meaning which would make the application, or non-application, of the order to depend on whether any district had been wholly or only partially divorced from the ancient parish for ecclesiastical purposes. I have, accordingly, to deal with a case in which the place of burial in question is within an area in which an Order in Council has been made enacting that no new burial ground shall be opened without the previous approval of the Local Government Board, and I have to determine whether, in such a case, an owner of buildings within a hundred yards has (altogether apart from, and independent of, the giving or withholding of the official consent) a separate individual right to object to and prohibit the user of the ground for burials without his consent in writing.

On the mere construction of the Acts in question, and apart from authority, I have come to a clear and definite conclusion that no such separate or individual right is given except in the case of land appropriated or used as a burial ground or an addition to a burial ground under the Acts themselves. Section 25 of the Burial Act, 1852, s. 12 of the Burial Act, 1854, and s. 9 of the Burial Act, 1855, all contained express words limiting their operation to burial grounds either appropriated or used under the Acts in question. And further, in the original section in which the words occur, namely, s. 25 of the Burial Act, 1852, the words are preceded by the word "but," and are obviously by way of qualification of, or limitation on, the large powers of forming burial grounds which are given to burial boards formed under that Act.

The Act in general was not an Act enabling burials, but an Act restraining burials, and the only part of the Act to which a prohibitory right of this kind would in any way be antagonistic is that part of the Act which gives powers for the formation of new burial grounds by new corporations under the Act in lieu of the burial grounds, the construction and user whereof were prohibited by the Act. Further, in the case of cemeteries constructed by companies for profit, a similar restriction was already common and had been provided for by s. 10 of the Cemeteries Clauses Act, 1847. Accordingly, I can see no reason why, in the case of other burial places, and particularly in the case of churchyards or additions to churchyards, the legislature should have given the owners of buildings a new and independent statutory right to restrain the opening of burial grounds which might be opened under the general law and did not offend against the common law as to nuisance. On the other hand, I can see very good reason why the legislature, when constituting new corporations whose duty was to provide burial grounds and giving them any wide general powers for the purpose both inside and outside their own parish, should give the owners of buildings a clear and definite right to restrain their operations within due limits.

Unfortunately—and this is the only reason why I reserved judgment in this case—there is authority to the contrary of the above view in the decision of MALINS, V.-C., in Greenwood v. Wadsworth (1). For, although that case dealt only with a burial ground provided by a particular religious sect, and not with an addition to, or extension of, a churchyard, the decision was given on the ground that the prohibition in question is a general prohibition and is not limited to burial grounds appropriated or used under the Burial Acts. When, however, the report is carefully examined, it appears that the decision is a most unsatisfactory one; that in it mistakes have been made in stating the material sections of the Acts, including s. 25 of the Act of 1852; and that it is only in the last sentence of the judgment that any reference is made to the words limiting the prohibition to burial grounds under the Burial Acts. And, further, the decision has been treated as wrong in the only or principal text-book on the subject—namely, BROOKE LITTLE'S LAW OF BURIALS (3rd Edn.), p. 208—and in the article on the subject in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND. I think, therefore, that I should not be bound to follow the decision of MALINS, V.-C., even if I were dealing with the exceptional case of such a burial ground as was dealt with by the learned Vice-Chancellor, and that I am even more clearly free when the question is one with regard to the somewhat different and far more common case of an addition to a churchyard. The decision is not one of that class on which titles depend, or which, for that or other like reasons, have their authority strengthened by the lapse of time. It has, indeed, been urged by counsel for the plaintiff that the decision in Greenwood v. Wadsworth (1) was approved or recognised by the Court of Appeal in Lord Cowley v. Byas (2). I cannot take this view. The successful appellants in that case had plenty of other material for questioning the decision of BACON, V.-C., in the court below, and, indeed, were stopped in the course of their argument. It was entirely unnecessary for them to question, or indeed consider, in any way the decision in Greenwood v. Wadsworth (1), which, indeed, does not appear even to have been cited to them.

Accordingly, I feel at liberty, and indeed bound, to deal with the matter on the footing of my own interpretation of the legislation in question, and I give judgment for the defendants with costs.

An advancement clause which is applicable to the members of a class prima facie entitled to an original share by substitution as joint tenants is a sufficient indication that the testator intended to cut down the joint tenancy and that the members are to take as tenants in common.

Adjourned Summons.

By her will, dated Sept. 18, 1872, the testatrix, Frances Dunn, gave all her estate to her trustees, upon trust for sale and conversion, and in the event, which happened, of her daughter, Frances Harriet, marrying she directed them to hold one-fifth of the annual income upon trust for such daughter for her sole and separate use for life independently of any husband, and after her decease upon trust for her children as she should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment upon trust for her children in equal shares, and if any such child or children should die leaving issue such issue should stand in loco parentis, and in case Frances Harriet died unmarried or having married, without leaving issue her surviving, her share was to be held upon the trusts of the shares of the four other children of the testatrix. The testatrix also directed that the residue of the income not thereby bequeathed to or for the benefit of her daughter Frances Harriet was to be held upon trust for her four other children, Emily Perkins, Henry Treffrey Dunn, Edith Hume, and Ellen Maria Carter in equal shares during their respective lives, and after the death of any or either of them the share of each of them so dying upon trust for his or her children as he or she should by deed or will appoint and in default of appointment for his or her children equally, and if any such child should die leaving issue such issue should stand in loco parentis, and if any or either of the four last-mentioned children died without leaving a child or children, "the share or shares of him or her so dying as well original as accrued shall go to his or her next-of-kin absolutely and in the case of any daughter exclusive of her husband."

The testatrix also declared:

> "that in case at any time 'any person or persons entitled to a benefit' under her will should be a minor or minors it should be lawful for the trustees at their discretion to apply the whole or any part of the income to which such minor or minors might be entitled in possession or expectancy for their respective maintenance and education, and also at the like discretion to apply the whole or part of the capital fund to which any such minor or minors should be so entitled as aforesaid for his or their advancement in the world or otherwise for his or their benefit."

The testatrix died on Dec. 12, 1900, and her four daughters all survived her, but Frances Harriet alone was living at the date of the summons, she having married before the death of the testatrix and had three children now living. Henry Treffrey Dunn, son of the testatrix, died in February, 1899, a bachelor and intestate.

Emily Perkins died on July 29, 1903, without having exercised the power of appointment given her, and left three children, the defendants Mabel Robinson, Hilda Gale Pedrick, and Harold Price Perkins; of these, Mabel Robinson and Harold Price Perkins had no children, but Hilda Gale Pedrick had one son, an infant, the defendant Francis Gale Pedrick. Edith Hume died on June 21, 1913, without children, and by her will gave her husband, the defendant Thomas Oliver Hume, the interest of all her money wherever it might be invested and everything belonging to her for his use during his life and on his death for her three sisters absolutely. Ellen Maria Carter died on July 27, 1913, leaving two children, and by her will appointed the defendants Thomas Oliver Hume and Albert Charles Macintosh executors, and directed that her interest in the capital and income coming to her as her share under the will of the testatrix should be divided between her two children. Reginald Henry Carter died on Feb. 7, 1911, and Thomas Oliver Hume, the surviving trustee, appointed Reginald Carter, the plaintiff, a new trustee of the will of the testatrix.

The plaintiff, Reginald Carter, as an executor of the will, issued this summons on June 10, 1915, to determine (inter alia) whether by reason of the death of Henry Treffrey Dunn, son of the testatrix, a bachelor in her lifetime, the share in the residuary estate given on trust for his benefit devolved on his four sisters as his next-of-kin absolutely, and, if so, whether as joint tenants or tenants in common. On the construction of the will the court held that the share of Henry Treffrey Dunn originally devolved on his four sisters absolutely as his nearest blood relations, treating him as having survived the testatrix. The question whether the four sisters took as joint tenants or tenants in common was then argued.

ASTBURY, J. (after stating the facts and reading the material parts of the will prior to the advancement clause), said: I have already decided that in the case of the son, Henry Treffrey Dunn, who died a bachelor in his mother's lifetime, the share given in trust for him in the testatrix's residuary estate devolved on his four sisters absolutely as his nearest relations in blood at the date of his mother's death, and the question is whether that class took as joint tenants or tenants in common. If the will had stopped there, they would clearly take as joint tenants, but the will contained an advancement clause. [His Lordship read the clause.] That clause expressly applies to "any person entitled to a benefit" under the will. In Taggart v. Taggart (1) Lord Redasdale said (1 Sch. & Lef. at p. 88):

> "Joint tenancy as a provision for the children of a marriage is an inconvenient mode of settlement, because during their minorities no use can be made of their portions for their advancement as the joint tenancy cannot be severed."

Though not directly applicable to the present case, that passage shows the inconvenience of construing a class gift as a joint tenancy, if the testator intended the power of advancement to apply to the members of the class. If, therefore, the power of advancement applies to the class taking the benefit of Henry Treffrey Dunn's share by substitution, as I think it clearly does, the question is whether there is sufficient to enable me to say there is a tenancy in common. In L'Estrange v. L'Estrange (1) the testator merely devised the residue of his property to trustees for the benefit of his six children, with power to his trustees to advance such sums as they might think fit for their education and advancement. That was a general power and did not refer in terms to the portion or share to which any child would be entitled. After reading the power of advancement, Lord Ashbourne, L.C., said ([1902] 1 Ir. R. at p. 468):

> "The question is, Does the use of these words indicate an intention on the part of the testator to cut down the joint tenancy to a tenancy in common? It is one of those clauses of which, when read for the first time, one may not see the full effect, or ascertain how far the words will go; but when read more closely it is clear that the words confer a power, not of maintenance, but of advancement. If a sum, perhaps of a considerable amount, were advanced for one child, it would be right to debit that sum against his or her share, and that debit could not be worked out if these children were joint tenants, and could not be done unless they were tenants in common."

He then held that the advancement clause was a sufficient indication that the children were to take as tenants in common. And I think that in the same way here the advancement clause enables me to say that the benefit that accrued to Henry Treffrey Dunn's nearest blood relations owing to his death in the testatrix's lifetime went to them as tenants in common. And I declare that they take as tenants in common and not as joint tenants.

Order accordingly.

PAINE v. BEVAN AND BEVAN

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Bailhache, J.), March 12, 1914]

Bill of Exchange—Cheque—Holder bonâ fide, but not for value—Cheque signed in blank—Completion by servant in excess of authority—Liability of drawer—Estoppel.

The plaintiff, a stockbroker, employed a confidential clerk. On settling days on the Stock Exchange it was the plaintiff's practice to sign a number of blank cheques and to hand them over to the clerk, giving him authority to fill in the names of persons with whom the plaintiff did business and whose accounts he wished to settle, and the amount of the sums due to them. The authority of the clerk was absolutely limited to this. The clerk had entered into betting transactions with the defendants and had incurred certain debts. To pay these debts he wrongfully filled in seven of the blank cheques with the name of the defendants, who took them in good faith, and certain sums which he owed them from time to time. The plaintiff sued the defendants for damages for the conversion of the cheques and their proceeds.

Held: when the holder of a negotiable instrument is not a holder for value, the drawer of the instrument is not estopped from saying as against such holder that the body of the instrument has been wrongfully filled up, and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed.

Action by the plaintiff, Reginald Stuart Paine, a stockbroker, against the defendants, who were bookmakers, claiming that the defendants had deprived him of certain cheques and converted them to their own use, and, alternatively, £247 9s. as the proceeds of the conversion. The defendants denied the conversion and pleaded that the plaintiff was estopped from denying that he authorised and was a party to the making of the payments to the defendants for the purposes for which they were made. It was admitted that the cheques were signed with the authority of the plaintiff, and that the defendants took the cheques in good faith and without notice of any fraud.

E. A. Harney for the defendants.

BAILHACHE, J.—In this case Mr. Paine, a stockbroker, brings an action against Messrs. Bevan and Bevan, who are bookmakers, to recover the sum of £247 9s., being the proceeds of seven cheques drawn by the plaintiff which came into the hands of Bevan and Bevan, apparently drawn in the favour of Bevan and Bevan, cashed by Bevan and Bevan, and Bevan and Bevan retained the proceeds to the extent I have mentioned.

Mr. Paine had a confidential clerk named Edwards, and on settling days on the Stock Exchange it was the practice of Mr. Paine to draw a sufficient number of blank cheques to meet payments which had to be made, and to hand these cheques already signed by him, or other persons having authority to sign his name, to this

Edwards, whose duty it was then to fill in the cheques with the names of the persons whose accounts Mr. Paine was desirous of settling, and to hand the cheques to those persons chiefly, of course, stockbrokers and stockholders, and clients who had balances to draw. Unfortunately Edwards got into the habit of betting, and, among others, he made bets with Messrs. Bevan and Bevan, and in his betting transactions with them he contracted debts to the amount of £247 9s., and he paid these debts with some of the cheques which Mr. Paine had entrusted to him for the purpose of paying the usual accounts that stockbrokers have to pay on settling days. Edwards filled in the name of Messrs. Bevan and Bevan on the face of the cheques, and he filled in on the counterfoils some other name, generally that of some person with whom Mr. Paine was in the habit of having some small account. He filled in the counterfoils with quite small sums, and made corresponding entries in the cash book, so that anybody looking at the cash book would merely see certain small items about which there was nothing to cause suspicion, and in fact they did so escape Mr. Paine's observation. When the returned cheques came back from the bank Edwards took care that they did not come under the eyes of Mr. Paine. These transactions were in June, July, and August, 1913, and it was not until September of that year that in consequence of something Edwards said Mr. Paine got suspicious, examined his pass-book, and discovered that these frauds had been practised upon him. He made a claim against Bevan and Bevan for the money the following month. A prosecution was instituted against Edwards in November, and Edwards was convicted and sentenced. It is not denied that Bevan and Bevan had this money, but they say that these cheques were cheques which were perfectly regular in form. They were drawn to their order and they made no inquiries as they saw no reason to do so. They took them without inquiry and in good faith, and counsel for the plaintiff in the course of his argument has not suggested that, suspicious though the facts may have been, there was anything in the circumstances to prevent Messrs. Bevan and Bevan saying that they took the cheques in good faith.

Messrs. Bevan and Bevan say: "We are the holders of these cheques. We are not holders in due course because we cannot say we gave value for the cheques," and they say, I think quite rightly, that a betting debt is not like a butcher's debt or a grocer's debt, as in the case of a betting debt there has been no valuable consideration at all, and they take the same position as if they had been donees of these cheques and as if the cheques had been given them by Edwards for no value. And they say that a donee of a cheque is a holder of a cheque not a holder in due course, but a holder who may deal with the cheque without fear of any consequences. He may transfer the cheque, if it is an order cheque by indorsement, or if it is a bearer cheque by delivery, to a transferee who gives value and then becomes a holder in due course, and he can convey to the transferee a perfect title to such a cheque. That no doubt is true. But whether a holder who does that renders himself liable to account for conversion is another matter. Counsel for the defendant argued his case in a way that interested me a great deal and advanced certain propositions which were new to me. He relied greatly on Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. Cooke (1), and on the decision that in that case there was an estoppel at common law under circumstances which are not materially distinguishable from those before me now. He put the case in this way. He says that a man who signs a cheque and hands it to a person to deal with gives authority to that person to put in as payee any name he pleases and to fill up the cheque for any amount that he pleases, and that when that person deals with the cheque and hands it to a third person, the drawer of the cheque, having enabled the person to whom he intrusted it to fill in any name or any amount he pleased, is estopped from saying as against the holder of that cheque that the cheque has been wrongly filled up. I do not think that is the case at all where the holder of the cheque is a holder who has not given value for the cheque. And as counsel for the defendant admits that a commission agent who takes a cheque under these circumstances is in no better position than a donee, I do not think the doctrine of estoppel applies. It seems to me that the donee of a cheque gets no better title to the cheque than that of the person who gives it him, and although it is true that a donee may by indorsing a cheque confer a good title, yet it does not show that a holder of a cheque who is not a holder for value though a holder in good faith can prevent himself from being liable for an action for conversion if he deals wrongfully with the cheque. It seems to me that in this case Bevan and Bevan's title to the cheque was no better than that of Edwards. I quite agree that for a decision in favour of the holder of a negotiable instrument and for him to acquire a better title than the last holder there must be not only good faith but also value. In this case Messrs. Bevan and Bevan did not indorse these cheques except so far as they indorsed them for the purpose of passing them through their banking account. Their bankers collected the money which remains in their hands, and in my judgment they have been guilty of the conversion of these cheques and are accountable for the money which they have received in respect of them. I must, therefore, give judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of his claim with costs.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Compulsory Purchase—Compensation—Expropriation of land—Development of water power under statutory powers—Value to owners.

Under a Canadian statute, the appellants were authorised to develop water power in and adjacent to a part of a river which included some rapids, and to expropriate lands actually required for that development. They also obtained the right to construct works in the bed of the river and to abstract water. The respondents owned two islands situate in the rapids, and rights, including water rights, over a promontory at the foot. The appellants gave notice of expropriation to the respondents in respect of their properties.

Held: in assessing the compensation payable to the respondents, the proper basis was the amount for which the properties would have been sold without the appellants, with their acquired powers, being in existence, but with the possibility of the appellants or some other company obtaining those powers.

Appeal by special leave from three judgments of the Superior Court of Quebec (43 Que. Sup. Ct. 410), dated Feb. 19, 1913, increasing the amount payable under two awards of arbitrators and setting aside a third award.

The appellants were a company incorporated by a statute of the Parliament of Canada in 1904, empowered to construct and develop water powers in or adjacent to the river St. Lawrence in the parish of St. Joseph of Soulanges in the Province of Quebec, and to take by way of expropriation lands within the parish actually required for such development. With a view to such development, the appellants served notices of expropriation on the respondents, who, as executors of the estate de Beaujeu, were proprietors of the subjects to which such notices applied. These subjects were three in number, to wit (i) the Ile aux Vaches, (ii) the Ile Bédard, and (iii) reserved rights over the Pointe du Moulin. For these subjects the appellants by the notices offered to pay respectively $2,800, $200, and $1,700, and named an arbitrator in the event of these sums not being accepted. The respondents did not accept these sums, and named on their part an arbitrator. The third arbitrator, or umpire, was named according to law by the judges of the Superior Court. The three arbitrators, after visiting the properties, heard witnesses and received documents, and finally, by a majority, consisting of the arbitrator appointed by the appellants and the arbitrator appointed by the judge of the Superior Court, awarded as compensation the sums offered by the appellants. The third arbitrator appointed by the respondents dissented, and intimated that he would have been prepared to award the sums of $62,000, $34,000, and $80,000 respectively. Against the findings for $2,800 for the Ile aux Vaches and $1,700 for the reserved rights at Pointe du Moulin, there lay, under the Canadian law, an appeal on the merits to the Superior Court of Quebec; and an appeal was taken by the respondents. Against the finding for the Ile Bédard, owing to the award being less than $600, no appeal lay. But a direct action in the Superior Court to set aside the award in toto, was brought by the respondents. The appeals and the direct action were heard together before DAVIDSON, C.J. He allowed the appeals and substituted for the sums awarded the sums proposed to be awarded by the dissenting arbitrator. In the case of the Ile Bédard he set aside the award and directed a new arbitration.

The Ile aux Vaches was an island situated to the north of the medium filum of the St. Lawrence River, at a point about forty miles above Montreal, of the extent of 28½ arpents—an arpent representing slightly more than one acre. Ile Bédard was a smaller island also to the north of the medium filum, having an area of 3½ acres, and situated 7,600 ft. down the river from the Ile aux Vaches. Further down again, and 700 ft. from the Ile Bédard, came the Pointe du Moulin, which was a point jutting out into the river to such an extent that approximately a straight line drawn from the southern side of the Ile aux Vaches through the Ile Bédard would cut the point in question. The whole of the riverain land at the Pointe du Moulin originally belonged to the respondents' predecessors. They sold all the lands at the Pointe du Moulin, subject to a reservation in the following terms:

> "Le vendeur, ès qualité, se réserve—1°. Un chemin de vingt quatre pieds de largeur sur toute la profondeur du susdit terrain depuis le chemin de la Reine jusqu 'au Fleuve St. Laurent. 2°. Un emplacement sur la susdite terre suffisamment grand pour la construction d'un moulin, d'une manufacture ou de toutes autres bâtisses propres à des fins industrielles. Ces deux réserves sont faites à perpétuité et l'acquéreur, ses hoirs et ayants cause seront obligés de payer toutes taxes municipales ou scolaires qui à l'avenir seront imposées sur les terrains ci-dessus réservés, sans pouvoir prétendre à aucune indemnité ou compensation. Le vendeur ès qualité aura le droit de prendre possession des réserves susmentionnées quand il le jugera à propos, et, de plus, il se réserve tous les débris de l'ancien moulin et le droit de les enlever en aucun temps sans que son passage à cet effet sur la terre susvendue soit considéré comme l'ouverture de l'exercice de la réserve en premier lieu mentionnée d'un chemin, &c. L'acquéreur, ses hoirs et ayants cause n'auront aucunement le droit de se servir des pouvoirs d'eau qui se trouvent sur le bord de la grève du St. Laurent dans le voisinage de la terre susvendue ou sur icelle, le vendeur ès qualité, en faisant, par les présentes, une réserve expresse."

The river being a navigable river, the bed belonged, according to the law of Canada, to the Crown, and no riparian owner could construct works in the bed without the consent of the Crown. The river at this place was in rapid. The total fall measured from the top of the Ile aux Vaches down to the lowest point of the Pointe du Moulin was about 28 ft. The scheme of the appellants' works was to construct a dyke in the bed of the river from Ile aux Vaches to Ile Bédard, and then on to the lowest point of the Pointe du Moulin. That would impound the whole waters of the river to the north of the dyke. To be able to do this they obtained, by agreement with the Dominion Government, a right to erect the works and to abstract the water. They further proposed to submerge, by cutting away, all jutting-out portions of the Pointe du Moulin till the last jutting-out piece, on which they were to erect their power-station, thus providing for an uninterrupted flow of the river towards their power-house, and availing themselves of the total fall of 28 ft.

Sir R. Finlay, K.C., Mignault, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Geoffrey Lawrence for the appellants.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C., Macmaster, K.C., Sir A. Lacoste, K.C., and A. Lacoste (the three latter of the Canadian Bar) for the respondents.

LORD DUNEDIN stated the facts and continued.—The law of Canada as regards the principles on which compensation for land taken is to be awarded is the same as the law of England, and it has been explained in numerous cases—nowhere with greater precision than in Re Lucas and Chesterfield Gas and Water Board (1), where VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and FLETCHER MOULTON, L.JJ., deal with the whole subject exhaustively and accurately.

For the present purpose it may be sufficient to state two brief propositions: (i) The value to be paid for is the value to the owner as it existed at the date of the taking, not the value to the taker; (ii) The value to the owner consists in all advantages which the land possesses, present or future, but it is the present value alone of such advantages that falls to be determined. Where, therefore, the element of value over and above the bare value of the ground itself (commonly spoken of as the agricultural value) consists in adaptability for a certain undertaking (though adaptability, as was pointed out by FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in the case cited, is really rather an unfortunate expression), the value is not a proportional part of the assumed value of the whole undertaking, but is merely the price, enhanced above the bare value of the ground, which possible intending undertakers would give. That price must be tested by the imaginary market which would have ruled had the land been exposed for sale before any undertakers had secured the powers or acquired the other subjects which made the undertaking as a whole a realised possibility.

Applying these principles, it is, in the opinion of their Lordships, impossible to support the judgment appealed against. The greater part of the judgment of the learned Chief Justice (DAVIDSON, C.J.) is concerned with demonstrating that the arbitrators in the award they had given had gone on evidence which went to agricultural value alone (using that term as including the water power of the mill used as an ordinary mill). In this criticism so far their Lordships think the learned Chief Justice was right. But when he comes to fix the value to be substituted for that given by the majority of the arbitrators, he accepts the figures given by the dissenting arbitrator and confessedly bases them on the evidence given by the witnesses for the respondents (appellants before him). Their Lordships have sought in vain in this testimony for any evidence directed to the true question as they have expressed it above. All the testimony is based on the fallacy that the value to the owner is a proportional part of the value of the realised undertaking as it exists in the hands of the undertaker. There are other fallacies as well, but that is the leading one, and is sufficient utterly to vitiate their testimony.

It would be tedious to quote too much of the evidence, but the following may be taken as samples: Exhibit A10 is a report from Isham Randolph, engineer. He was examined as a witness, and his evidence is really only a development and amplification of his report. His qualifications as an engineer are undoubted, and his opinion on engineering matters worthy of the greatest respect. But you need go no further than the first sentence to see how completely he has misunderstood the legal position:

> "I consider that as component parts of a hydro-electric power development having head works at Ile aux Vaches and power plant on the point indicated . . . the said Ile aux Vaches and the said point of land have very great value, and should make the owners participants in the earnings of the development, or else they should receive in advance a compensation based approximately upon the net earnings of the power development in the ratio of the head controlled by these two properties to the total head capable of being developed."

Arthur Surveyer, another engineering witness, deals separately with the different subjects. As to Ile aux Vaches, he deals with it thus: First, he says, if the island were not there and there were shoal water, it would cost $39,000 to build a dam, which would represent part of the island. Second, when that was done there would be a loss of 1·7 ft. of head, as compared with the present works, which would mean a loss to the company of an annual rent of $1,050, which, capitalised at five per cent., comes to $21,000. Third, he says, the protective value of the island to the works below it is absolute. To ensure the same result, if the island were not there, by means of an insurance, you would have to pay underwriters a premium, which, capitalised, amounts to $17,000; and, fourth, he estimates that the smooth water below it, which the presence of the Ile aux Vaches ensures, amounts to a saving during the construction of the works below it of $6,000. Adding these sums together, he puts the value of the Ile aux Vaches at $83,000.

It is difficult to conceive evidence more honeycombed by fallacy than this.

Besides the general fallacy already mentioned, it appropriates to an island the proprietorship of which carries with it no rights over the bed of the river, and no connection with the property on the bank opposite it, the whole value of the "head" of water which is ex adverso of it. It measures the value of the island by the cost of an opus manufactum, which might be made if the island was not there; and, lastly, it values both temporarily and permanently the "protective" action of the island, totally forgetful that the works might be stopped one foot short of the island, no part of the island taken, and yet the protective value would be there all the same. Dealing with the reserved rights at the Pointe, he bases his calculation on loss of profits to the taking company, and also forgets that the power to cut away the protruding parts of the other portions of the Pointe, which alone makes possible the unrestricted flow, is a power that flows from the government contract and the taking of the riparian lands, and has nothing to do with the reserved water rights of these claimants.

Mr. Robertson, another engineer, when asked as to the Ile aux Vaches, gave the following evidence: "Q. You were valuing it at the value it would possess for the Cedars Rapids Manufacturing Company?—A. Yes, that in my opinion would be the value to them." Further quotation is unnecessary. All the witnesses persist in looking at the three subjects as forming parts of a completed whole, and they estimate their value as proportional parts of that whole whose value they calculate by what it will bring in by way of profit to the undertakers. Their Lordships may quote the words of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in the case cited as applicable to this case ([1909] 1 K.B. at p. 28):

> "the element which the arbitrator may take into consideration is not the fact that the land has in fact been taken, and that the probability [i.e., of purchasers requiring the land for such purposes] has been realised by the promoters having obtained compulsory powers to take the land in question, but only the value of the probability as it existed before these promoters had obtained their powers . . . it appears that the umpire has treated the probability and the realised probability as identical for the purposes of valuation, he has gone on a wrong basis and that we ought to send the award back to him."

Indeed, the mistake goes further in this case even than in that. For in that case there was only one subject. Here there are three subjects detached, and the value which the witnesses attribute to them is only reached by joining them up, a process which depends on powers obtained not from the claimants, and for the enhanced value of which result the claimants have no right to be compensated.

The real question to be investigated was, for what would these three subjects have been sold, had they been put up to auction without the appellants being in existence with their acquired powers, but with the possibility of that or any other company coming into existence and obtaining powers? It is on account of the latter consideration that their Lordships, while unable to accept the judgments, under appeal, are also unable to restore the judgment of the arbitrators. Unfortunately, the appellants led no evidence except as to bare agricultural value. Now, with regard to the Ile aux Vaches and the reserved water rights, it seems possible that there may be some value over and above the bare value. If the situation be naturally favourable to the establishment of power works like those of the appellants, then it is possible that the respondents and others might have been prepared to offer an enhanced value on this account, taking the chances of a situation in which they might or might not obtain the requisite parliamentary powers to work out a commercial scheme. But the value emerging through a grant of such powers having been actually given cannot, after the event, be taken into account. And also with regard to the reserved water rights there must be no confusion made. It is not that the water power of the appellants will be derived from the reserved water rights, but it is that a water power like that of the appellants could not be developed and located to such advantage without extinguishing the reserved water rights of the respondents. These considerations, however, point to the possibility of something more being given for the subjects than the bare value; or, in other words, that, if they had been put up to auction as beforesaid, there was a probability of a purchaser who was looking out for special advantages being content to give this enhanced value in the hope that he would get the other powers and acquire the other rights which were necessary for a realised scheme. As regards the Ile Bédard, the Board is, however, satisfied that, on the materials placed before them, the arbitrators' conclusion was reasonable, and that the case as now presented does not leave any substantial ground for thinking that any enhancement for the possible reasons indicated would occur. This case, accordingly, ought to be ended now.

Their Lordships will, therefore, advise His Majesty to direct that, with regard to the Ile Bédard, the judgment complained of be reversed with costs in the court below to the appellants; and that, with regard to the Ile aux Vaches and the reserved power and mill site, the judgment complained of be set aside, and the court directed to remit the matter to the arbitrators to hear evidence and make an award in accordance with the principles herein set forth, no costs being allowed to either party in the arbitration already held or in the court below; and, further, that neither party ought to have costs before this Board.

Trade Union—Expulsion of member—Wrongful expulsion—Action by member for injunction and damages—Trade Union Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict., c. 31), s. 4.

Trade Union—Expulsion—Legality—"Misconduct calculated to damage character and reputation" of union—Member working in spare time at different trade—Printer on night duty working during day for carrier—Action by member against union—Competency—Claim for declaration that purported expulsion void and injunction.

The plaintiff, a printer's assistant and a member of the defendant trade union, was employed in the machine room of a newspaper printing office from 10.30 p.m. to 6.30 a.m. During the day time he worked for several hours each day for a firm of carriers, unknown to his employers at the printing office and to the officials of the union. On this becoming known to the union a resolution was passed for his expulsion. The resolution purported to be made under r. 26 (15) of the rules of the union which provided that "members guilty of misconduct calculated to damage the character and reputation of the society, in other respects than are specially mentioned in these rules, shall be dealt with at the discretion of their branch committee." The rules made express provision for the expulsion of members guilty of certain specific offences, but the act of misconduct alleged against the plaintiff was not specifically mentioned in the rules. In an action by the plaintiff for a declaration that his purported expulsion was void and for an injunction, the defendant union contended that the action was "instituted with the object of directly enforcing [an] agreement for the application of the funds of a trade union" in one of the ways specified in the Trade Union Act, 1871, s. 4 (3), and so was not maintainable.

Held: r. 26 (15) conferred no power to expel and so the plaintiff was wrongfully expelled; the action was merely to compel the trade union to accept and keep the plaintiff as a member, and would not directly enforce any agreement for the application of the union funds, and so was not barred by s. 4; and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to a declaration that the resolution expelling him was ultra vires and void, and an injunction restraining the trade union from enforcing it.

Notes. This decision was overruled, in so far as it held that a trade union member cannot claim damages against the union for wrongful expulsion, by the House of Lords in Bonsor v. Musicians Union, [1955] 3 All E.R. 518. It remains good law on the points covered by the headnote, to which this report is accordingly confined.

Appeal by the defendants, a registered trade union, from a decision of the Divisional Court (HORRIDGE and ROWLATT, JJ.), reported 112 L.T. 399, affirming the decision of a county court judge.

By the Trade Union Act, 1871, s. 4:

"Nothing in this Act shall enable any court to entertain any legal proceedings instituted with the object of directly enforcing or recovering damages for the breach of any of the following agreements, namely: (1) Any agreement between members of a trade union as such, concerning the conditions on which any members for the time being of such trade union shall or shall not sell their goods, transact business, employ, or be employed; (2) any agreement for the payment by any person of any subscription or penalty to a trade union; (3) any agreement for the application of the funds of a trade union (a) to provide benefits to members, or (b) to furnish contributions to any employer or workman not a member of such trade union, in consideration of such employer or workman acting in conformity with the rules or resolutions of such trade union, or (c) to discharge any fine imposed upon any person by sentence of a court of justice; or (4) any agreements made between one trade union and another; or (5) any bond to secure the performance of any of the above-mentioned agreements. But nothing in this section shall be deemed to constitute any of the above-mentioned agreements unlawful."

Holman Gregory, K.C., Harold Morris and Tristram Bercsford appeared for the trade union.

Rigby Swift, K.C., Clifford Penney and G. F. L. Bridgman appeared for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31. The following judgments were read.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—The plaintiff is a printer's assistant (a reel hand), and he complains that his expulsion from the defendant society was invalid, and he asks for a declaration to that effect and an injunction restraining the defendants from enforcing such expulsion, and for damages. The action was brought in the Clerkenwell County Court, where the plaintiff obtained the declaration and injunction he sought and judgment for £68 damages. On appeal by the defendants to the Divisional Court the judges were divided in opinion. HORRIDGE, J., was of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants. ROWLATT, J., was of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed. The appeal thus failed, and the defendants appeal to this court.

The plaintiff was employed as a reel hand in the office of the "Daily Mail," his hours of work being from 10.30 p.m. to 6.30 a.m.; at the latter hour he went home and to bed. Rising in the afternoon, he worked for Messrs. Sutton, the carriers, from 2.30 p.m. to 6.30 p.m. on five or six days a week. His wages at the "Daily Mail" were £1 14s. per week, and at Messrs. Sutton 2s. 9d. a day. Before Jan. 6, 1913, he had worked for the "Daily Mail" for a considerable period.

and during the whole part of that time had also worked for Messrs. Sutton. He is forty-three years of age. He said that he did not find the work of a reel hand heavy; he has two children, and a wife who is unfortunately a cripple; and for their sake and to provide for them he said that he worked as he did. Mr. McIntyre, the overseer of the machine department at the "Daily Mail," said that the plaintiff was a good average workman, and that he had noticed no deterioration in his work. There was no evidence nor any suggestion that the plaintiff was tired at any time during his work, or not in a fit and proper condition to perform his work properly. On Jan. 8, 1913, the plaintiff attended a meeting of the London branch committee of the society, when he was suspended from membership of the society pending further inquiry, the charge against him being "conduct detrimental to the interest of the society." This referred, and referred only, to his working at Messrs. Sutton, as well as for the "Daily Mail." On Mar. 19, 1913, a further meeting of the committee was held. The entry in their minutes is as follows:

> "This member was charged, on Jan. 8, 1913, with working five or six half-days per week in addition to his regular night's work at the "Daily Mail." Having admitted a portion of the charge against him (that of working at Messrs. Sutton), the committee, considering he had acted in a manner detrimental to the character and reputation of the society, apart from the fact that he had worked some hours each week in excess of the limit allowed by our rules, decided to suspend him from membership pending further inquiries."

The plaintiff, in answer to questions put to him, said that it was the fact that he was working for Messrs. Sutton, the carriers, but he had not done any excess or overtime work at the trade (i.e., in the printing trade). The resolution then passed by the branch committee was as follows:

> "In the opinion of this committee the action of Mr. Kelly in performing day work in addition to his regular work of six nights each week at the "Daily Mail" was detrimental to the safety of other members who had to work with him, and is also an act of misconduct calculated to damage the character and reputation of this society; and, acting under r. 26, cl. 15, we now expel him from membership."

The plaintiff contends that having regard to the rules, and the facts about which there is no dispute, the society is not entitled to expel him. The executive council confirmed what the branch committee had done. The plaintiff then instituted these proceedings, as soon as his impoverished condition enabled him to do so, the result of expelling him from the society and depriving him of his union ticket having been that he could no longer work in union printing shops, and that there was no work available at the one or two non-union newspaper offices in London. He ultimately obtained employment as a porter with Messrs. Hobbs, Hart & Co. at 26s. 6d. a week as a whole-time employee, and thus had to relinquish his half-time employment with Messrs. Sutton.

The questions raised by this appeal are whether the defendants are a society which would have been illegal but for the Trade Union Act, 1871, and if so, whether the plaintiff can obtain either an injunction or damages against it. If a legal remedy is open to him, the further question arises, to what relief (if any) is the plaintiff entitled upon the facts of the case? I concur in the view expressed by both the learned judges in the Divisional Court, that the society would have been an illegal association at common law, that certain of the rules to which they particularly referred were in general and unreasonable restraint of trade and involved the authorisation and direction of strikes, the withdrawal of the members from their work, the prevention of members working for any employer whose employees were on strike, whether such employees were members of the society or not, and although the employer was willing to pay full trade wages, the restriction of the hours of labour preventing the members from selling their labour as they pleased. These rules effected a restraint of trade which is unreasonable, oppressive, and destructive of individual liberty, and the consequence is to taint the whole constitution of the society and to make it an illegal society at common law: see Gosney v. Bristol Trade and Provident Society (1), per FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J. ([1909] 1 K.B. at p. 919). The next question is whether the injunction was properly granted. The plaintiff by his claim for an injunction is not seeking to enforce directly any of the several agreements specified in the Trade Union Act, 1871. His claim is that he has been wrongfully deprived of the status and position of a member of the society by persons purporting to act pursuant to the society's rules, but not in fact doing so: see Osborne v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (2).

A power to expel will not be implied; it must be found in the rules, and in plain and unambiguous language. Indeed, there is no inherent power in any club or society to alter its rules so as to introduce such a power. In Dawkins v. Antrobus (3) JESSEL, M.R., said that he was unaware of the existence of such a power, and was surprised to hear such a proposition put forward. He said (17 Ch.D. at pp. 620, 621):

> "There is no more inherent power in the members of a club to alter their rules so as to expel one of its members against the wishes of the minority, than there is in the members of any society or partnership which is founded on a contract, that written contract, of course, expressing the terms on which the members associate together; and it is intolerable to imagine that the majority should in such a case claim an inherent power of expelling the minority. I say that because that has been a matter pressed upon me as if capable of argument. I think it is not."

It is necessary to examine the rules of the society in order to determine whether the power of expulsion, which the branch committee purported to exercise, in fact existed. The rules contain provisions for imposing fines for various offences ranging from 6d. to £10. And in certain cases power is given to the branch committee to expel. Thus r. 26, cl. 7, enables a branch committee to expel a member making an accusation of dishonesty against another member, without in the opinion of the branch committee, sufficient foundation; cl. 9 in like manner enables the branch committee to expel a member resorting to any dishonest or dishonourable practice which may tend to prove detrimental to the interests of the society; and under cll. 11 and 12 the branch committee has the same power in the case of a member assisting any employer whose workpeople may be on strike, or transferring his card of membership. Rule 29 deals with working overtime, and, having regard to the various clauses of the rule, obviously deals only with overtime, at the trade or business of operative printer's assistant. A member infringing the provision against working overtime in cl. 2 is liable to a fine of 20s. for the first offence, and the power of the committee to expel for it only arises on a second offence. Where a member obtains any benefit by misrepresentation, the branch committee under r. 21, cl. 8, may suspend, but to the executive committee is given the right to expel. Certain minor offences are subject to small fines. Thus, under r. 16, cl. 22, if a committeeman is absent from a branch committee meeting without a satisfactory reason, he may be fined 6d.; by cl. 8 if the branch committee chairman is absent he may be fined 1s. Any member absenting himself from chapel meetings may, at the wish of his chapel, be summoned "before the branch committee and be dealt with": (r. 5, cl. 10). Again, a member duly elected refusing to hold the office of father of chapel "shall be dealt with by the branch committee" (r. 5, cl. 5). By r. 5 (1) every firm shall have a "chapel," to which every member must belong. The word "chapel" is thus used in the sense of a lodge or union of the workmen in a printing office, taking its title probably from the name of "chapel" given to a printer's workshop, and which has been said to have been so applied because Caxton set up his press in a chapel at Westminster. It appears from the instances which I have given that the phrase "be dealt with by the branch committee" is applied in the rules to certain minor matters analogous to those for which a fine of 6d. or 1s. is deemed sufficient, and, in my opinion, having regard to the construction of the rules as a whole, these words as used in r. 26 (15) do not give to the branch committee by implication a power to expel. Moreover in the present case there was no evidence of any misconduct on the part of the plaintiff, and certainly not of "misconduct calculated to damage the character and reputation of the society." The minute of the branch committee of Mar. 19, 1913, shows that a charge was preferred against the plaintiffs of having "worked some hours each week in excess of the limit allowed by our rules." Now the only limit is contained in r. 29, which relates to overtime in the trade. Mr. Isaacs, the general secretary, said that the plaintiff was told that he was summoned to give an explanation as to working at other work, "in excess of limit allowed by rules," and in cross-examination he said that the only offence which the plaintiff had committed was working at Sutton's, and that r. 29 (2) applied with other rules. Bispham also said that r. 29 (2) was first mentioned, and that if in the minutes of the meeting on Mar. 19, 1913, the rules had been mentioned, they would have been r. 26 (15) and r. 29 (2). The result is that the plaintiff has been expelled under a rule which gave no power to expel, and for an offence which he never committed, and is entitled to the injunction. There remains the question of damages. [HIS LORDSHIP considered this, came to the conclusion, since overruled as noted ante p. 577, that damages were not recoverable, and concluded:] For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Divisional Court must be varied, and so much of the judgment of the county court as adjudged that the defendants respectively should pay £68 damages be discharged. With this variation the appeal is dismissed, but this variation ought not to affect the incidence of costs, as the injunction was the important matter. The defendants must pay the costs of the appeal.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—The defendant society is a registered trade union coming under the Trade Union Acts, 1871 and 1876. Under s. 16 of the latter statute it does not matter whether or not the trade union would, but for the earlier statute, be deemed an unlawful combination by reason of some one or more of its purposes being in restraint of trade. Either way the restrictive provisions of s. 4 of the principal act apply to it, and no legal proceedings can be instituted with the object of directly enforcing or recovering damages for the breach of any of the agreements referred to in that section. But if it be of importance to determine whether the society is a trade union having purposes in restraint of trade, I am of opinion, agreeing in this respect with the learned county court judge, and with the learned judges in the Divisional Court, that the society is such a trade union. The rules upon which I particularly found my judgment are r. 20, the whole chapter, r. 26 (6) and (11), and r. 29, to which I may add all the rules giving discretionary power to the executive bodies, and particularly r. 91 (6). I may add that the very proceedings complained of were proceedings to enforce a restraint of trade. In this connection I have read and considered Swaine v. Wilson (4), Chamberlain's Wharf, Ltd. v. Smith (5), Gosney v. Bristol Trade and Provident Society (1), Osborne v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (2), and that which is the last case of authority on the subject, Russell v. Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners (6).

The next point for consideration is whether, notwithstanding that the trade union has these purposes, it and its trustees can be sued and declarations and an injunction such as were granted by the county court judge obtained against it. That a trade union can be sued in and by its registered name, and that, if the trustees in whom the property of the society is legally vested be added as parties, an order can be made for the payment by them out of the funds of the union of all costs and any damages legally recoverable, was settled by the House of Lords in Taff Vale Rail. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (14) and that for certain purposes an injunction can be obtained at the suit of a member was also settled by the House of Lords in South Yorkshire Miners' Association v. Howden (7) and in Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants v. Osborne (8). Whether or not one of the purposes for which an injunction can be obtained is to prevent the expulsion of a member from the union and to ensure his restoration to membership has been a matter of great doubt; but the Court of Appeal in Osborne v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (2) held that an action for a declaration that a resolution of the society purporting to expel the plaintiff was void, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from acting upon it, could be maintained, notwithstanding s. 4 of the Trade Union Act, 1871. The court held that it was not a legal proceeding instituted with the object of directly enforcing any agreement for the application of the funds of the trade union to provide benefits to members. FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J. ([1911] 1 Ch. at p. 559) gives—as I think—the governing reason for this decision. The suit would not directly enforce any agreement for the application of funds for the plaintiff's benefit, or even help him to enforce such an agreement in any future proceeding, and judgment, if obtained by the plaintiff, would merely compel the society or trade union to accept and keep him as a member. The executive can refuse to give to any member, notwithstanding his apparent title, any share in the funds of the union. Putting it in another way, as it seems to me, the only effect of such a judgment is to put the authorities of a trade union in an awkward and perhaps morally unjustifiable position, that of refusing to give to one of their members those benefits to which primâ facie under the rules he is entitled, not because they think that he, being a member, is disentitled, but because they wrongfully think that he is not a member. This declaration is binding upon us, and I think carries with it the plaintiff's right to have an enquiry made by the proper judicial tribunal whether he has been lawfully expelled, and if the enquiry result in his favour, to such a reinstatement as the declaration and injunction sought for in this case will give him.

Thirdly, comes the question on the construction of the rules. The expulsion of the plaintiff was carried out by a resolution of the branch committee purporting to be made under r. 26 (15):

> "Members guilty of misconduct calculated to damage the character and reputation of the society in other respects than are specially mentioned in these rules shall be dealt with at the discretion of their branch committee."

It is said on his behalf that he was not brought and could not be brought within that rule. He was not guilty, nay, there was no evidence that he was guilty of misconduct, still less of "misconduct calculated to damage the character and reputation of the society." Now the learned county court judge has not found that the proceedings of the committee were mala fide, so that objection to them is out of the way. This being so it has been contended that we cannot inquire into the evidence, and this is substantially the conclusion of HORRIDGE, J. There is force in the contention that the agreement between the parties to these rules, i.e., the several members of the trade union, is that the domestic forum with its hierarchy of appellate tribunals is to judge conclusively between the parties, and that fraud, mala fides, or the absence of such essentials of natural justice as hearing before condemning, being out of the way the conclusion of the domestic tribunal or tribunals is final. It was attempted on the contrary to liken this case to cases where the jurisdiction of inferior legal tribunals or courts of limited jurisdiction comes into question. It was said that if there is some statutory condition precedent to the exercise of jurisdiction the inferior or limited tribunal must no doubt in the first place decide for itself that the statutory condition precedent has been fulfilled before it goes on to determine the issue before it, but that in such preliminary decision the inferior or limited tribunal cannot give itself jurisdiction, and that it is open to the High Court of Justice to hold notwithstanding the the necessary statutory condition precedent has not been fulfilled, and to prohibit further proceedings by writ of prohibition, or to quash the decision by certiorari, or in some cases to disregard it on application for a writ of habeas corpus. All this is quite true, but here we are not dealing with jurisdiction in the true sense, something imposed upon the subject by the supreme power of the realm, but with a construction of conventions between subjects. I find it unnecessary to decide between these two contentions because I arrive at a conclusion favourable to the plaintiff on another ground which was taken in the case, though not very obtrusively, in the county court, and which was brought pointedly to the attention of counsel in the course of the argument before us. A power of expulsion, as the learned county court judge said, is not inherent in a voluntary association. It must be conferred by the rules and must be exercised in conformity with the rules. The penalty in r. 26 (15), is that the member shall be dealt with at the discretion of the branch committee. Similar expressions appear at other places in the rules. See, for instance, r. 5 (5) (9) and (10), and r. 16 (23), where it would seem unreasonable that the rules contemplated expulsion. Powers to suspend and expel appear in several of the rules. There are also powers to fine, and in certain cases the penalty may be vacation of any office or place upon the council. The branch secretary may, by r. 16 (13), for certain offences be expelled or fined at the discretion of the executive council. Rule 26 is the general rule as to punishments, and it is under sub-r. (15) of this rule, as already stated, that the plaintiff was expelled. Sub-rule (4) authorises fines. Sub-rule (5) authorises suspension. Sub-rule (6) authorises expulsion, the language being: "Any member shall cease to belong to the society and shall forfeit all money he has paid thereto." Under sub-rr. (7) (9) and (12) powers of expulsion are given in express words, but there is an alternative punishment. Sub-rule (11) gives power to expel if so determined. Under r. 29, which deals with a case germane to the present, sub-r. (2) and (4), the power of expulsion is given for a second offence, the first offence being punishable by a fine. With this express language so frequently occurring I do not think it possible to construe the words "dealt with at the discretion of their branch committee" as giving a power to expel; and if one may pay some regard to the particular charge it would seem fairly clear that it was never intended to make such an offence of a higher order than one under r. 29. I may further refer to para. (b) of sub-r. (6) of r. 26, which, I think, makes the rules sufficiently elastic. By this paragraph, disobedience to any order authorised to be given by the governing or executive council becomes a matter for expulsion.

Upon the whole, I conclude that there was no power under r. 26 (15), to expel; and it is the more favourable view for the society to take it that the branch committee acted as they purported to act under this rule. If, as the learned county court judge seems to have thought, they were really acting under r. 29 (2), the punishment of expulsion can only be for a second offence. Here I differ from HORRIDGE, J. The result is that the judgment of the county court judge, so far as it granted declarations, an injunction and costs, ought to stand, and the appeal from his judgment having been dismissed by the Divisional Court, owing to the two judges in that court disagreeing, was so far rightly dismissed, and equally the appeal to us so far fails.

There remains the question of damages. [HIS LORDSHIP considered this question, the decision whereon has since been overruled as noted ante p. 577, and concluded:] The judgment was wrong in awarding damages, and the appeal to that extent should succeed.

BANKES, L.J.—This is an appeal from a Divisional Court consisting of HORRIDGE and ROWLATT, JJ. The learned judges differed in opinion, and as a result the decision of the county court judge in favour of the plaintiff stood. The plaintiff's claim was for a declaration that he had been improperly expelled from the defendant society, and for an injunction and for damages. The learned county court judge granted the declaration and the injunction asked for, and awarded the plaintiff £68 damages with costs, to be paid out of the funds of the society.

A number of points have been raised, the first of which is whether the defendant society is an illegal society on the ground that its object is in unreasonable restraint of trade. The answer to that question must depend on a consideration of its purposes as manifested in its rules: see per LORD MACNAGHTEN, Russell v. Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners (6), [1912] A.C. at p. 430. The test is whether the real objects of the society or one of the real objects of the society is to unduly fetter trade: see Swaine v. Wilson (4). If it is, then the society is an illegal society, even though it may have some legitimate objects and many unobjectionable rules. The rules of the defendant society contemplate the possibility of strikes. Rule 20 deals with them under the head of Trade Movements, and the intervention of the society is provided for. This in itself is clearly legitimate, but I find in r. 26 (11) that it is made an offence punishable by compulsion for any member to assist any employer whose workpeople may be on strike, even though the full wage be offered and the persons on strike do not belong to the society. This alone, in my opinion, is sufficient to stamp this society as an illegal one, on the ground that its object is in reference to trade disputes in general, that none of its members shall be allowed to assist any employer whose workmen are on strike.

That being so, the next question is whether the plaintiff's claim comes within s. 4 of the Trades Union Act, 1871, as being a legal proceeding instituted with the object of directly enforcing or recovering damages for the breach of any of the agreements specified in the sub-sections to that section. In my opinion the claim for a declaration and for an injunction does not do so, and I content myself on this point with referring to the judgment of COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in Osborne v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (2) as supporting the conclusion at which I have arrived.

The next point is one raised in this court and not argued in the Divisional Court, and that is, that the society being a voluntary society, this court will not interfere with the action of the branch committee or of the executive council, provided they acted bonâ fide, and he referred to Inderwick v. Snell (9) and Dawkins v. Antrobus (3). I think that the foundation of the rule underlying the decisions in these and similar cases is to be found in a passage in the judgment of JAMES, L.J., in the latter case, where he says (17 Ch.D. at p. 628):

> "We have no right to sit as a Court of Appeal on the decision of the members of a club duly assembled."

There is, however, a great distinction between the functions of a Court of Appeal and a court of prohibition, and there are a number of cases in the books where the court has interfered to stay proceedings by the members of a voluntary association where the proceedings are without authority or contrary to natural justice. Russell v. Russell (10) is a good illustration of the class of case in which the court will not interfere. That was a case of a partnership, but the remarks of JESSEL, M.R., are appropriate. He says in his judgment that under the terms of the agreement between the parties the one partner was given a power to put an end to the partnership, a power which he might exercise at his will and pleasure capriciously or not capriciously, as he thought fit. The Master of the Rolls draws attention to the particular language of the clause in a way which has a bearing on the present case. He says it is not "If the conduct of the said H. Russell shall not be satisfactory," but "If the business shall not be managed and conducted to the satisfaction of W. A. Russell." In my opinion, the decisions in Inderwick v. Snell (9) and Dawkins v. Antrobus (3) are based on the same principle as Russell v. Russell (10). On the other hand, for statements of the law as to the grounds upon which the court will interfere I refer to Innes v. Wylie (11), where LORD DENMAN said that a party might complain that his expulsion from a voluntary society was contrary to the general principles of law; Forbes v. Eden (12), where the Lord Chancellor said that possession of a particular status, meaning by that term the capacity to perform certain functions and to hold certain offices, is a thing which the law will recognise as a patrimonial interest, and that no one can be deprived of its possession by the unauthorised and illegal act of another without having a legal remedy; Baird v. Wells (13), where STIRLING, J., in laying down the rules as to what questions the court can entertain, states the first to be whether the rules of the club have been observed; Dawkins v. Antrobus (3), where JESSEL, M.R., puts the point in this way. He says the law says, and rightly says, that in all these things people must act bonâ fide. Bonâ fide means that they shall act with some cause, or, as the law phrases it, with reasonable and probable cause. The rule to be deduced from these cases is, I think, this—that when the rules of a voluntary association leave the question of whether the conduct of a member does or does not, in the opinion of the members or a selected number of the members, warrant expulsion, the court will never interfere, however much they may disagree with the decision come to. Nor, again, will the court interfere in cases where, although the conduct justifying expulsion is precisely defined in the rules, there is any evidence that the member complained of has been guilty of the particular offence named in the rule. The case, however, is different where there is no evidence of the particular offence having been committed, or where the body complained of have acted in violation of or in defiance of the rules.

This makes it necessary in the present case to consider what the conduct of the plaintiff was that was complained of, and whether it afforded any evidence of any offence against the rules of the society, or any ground justifying expulsion under those rules. The facts as to this case can be stated very shortly. [HIS LORDSHIP stated them, and continued:] The expulsion is stated to be under r. 26, cl. 15, and by that decision the society must stand or fall. The rules which appear to have been referred to, besides the one last mentioned, are r. 29, cl. 2, and r. 26, cl. 9. The first of these deals with overtime, and it is agreed by the counsel for both parties that the rule only applies to overtime worked in the trade, and has no application to the plaintiff's alleged offence. The latter rule provides for the case of a member resorting to any dishonest or dishonourable practice which may tend to prove directly or indirectly detrimental to the interests of the society. On a point to which I shall refer later, it is to be noticed that the punishments are a fine or expulsion under the latter rule and a fine for first offence and expulsion for a second offence under the overtime rule. The branch committee appears to have craved both rules in aid, though they did not act upon them, and they must, one would think, have realised that neither rule applied to the plaintiff's case. The rule under which they acted is in these terms: [HIS LORDSHIP then read r. 26, cl. 15, which is printed ante, p. 582.]

The first question to decide is whether the rule can be said to define the offence. As was done by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Russell v. Russell (10), I draw a great distinction between the language actually used and what might have been used—between "misconduct calculated to damage the character and reputation of the society" and conduct which in the opinion of the branch committee might be calculated to have that effect. I think the rule when it speaks of misconduct means misconduct and misconduct of a kind calculated to damage the character and reputation of the society. Was there any evidence of any such misconduct, or of any misconduct at all? There was no evidence whatever that the plaintiff was in fact rendered less efficient, or less safe to work with, by reason of his employment during the day; and, in my opinion, there was no evidence whatever bringing the plaintiff within the operation of the rule. What he did may be obnoxious to the principles of trade unionism or of some trade unionists, but there is nothing in the rules themselves or apart from the rules rendering it misconduct. A further point was taken that the rule does not in any event justify expulsion. I feel some doubt about this; but bearing in mind the long accepted rule of law that there is no inherent or implied power of expulsion in a voluntary association such as this, and having regard to the language used with reference to punishments throughout the rules, I do not think that such vague language as "to be dealt with at the discretion of their branch committee" ought to be read as including such a serious punishment as expulsion. I think that it is a sound rule of construction to lay down that where a power of expulsion is intended to be given it must be stated in so many words.

There only remains for consideration the plaintiff's claim for damages. [His Lordship considered this claim and came to the conclusion, since overruled as noted ante p. 577, that it was not maintainable.]

Appeal against the grant of the declaration and injunction dismissed.

PEAKE v. CARTER

[Court of Appeal (Swinfen Eady and Pickford, L.JJ.), November 22, 23, December 10, 1915]

[Reported [1916] 1 K.B. 652; 85 L.J.K.B. 761; 114 L.T. 273]

Interpleader—Claim under title not proved—Right of claimant to rely on title found—Proof of interest in goods—Partnership interest.

In interpleader proceedings a claimant who has claimed under a title which he has failed to prove is not thereby precluded from relying on the title found.

Where a claim is laid to goods which have been seized by the sheriff in execution of a judgment it is not incumbent on the claimant in interpleader proceedings to prove that the goods are his absolute property. It is sufficient if he shows such a title to or an interest in the goods that the sheriff ought not to have seized them.

Per Pickford, L.J.: Interpleader proceedings can be taken to decide whether a claim to a partnership interest is well founded.

Appeal by the claimant from a decision of ROWLATT, J., on an interpleader issue, tried without a jury.

ROWLATT, J., held, without hearing the defendant, that he was bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Flude, Ltd. v. Goldberg (1) to hold that the claimant had not established his claim, and gave judgment for the execution creditor. The claimant appealed.

P. H. Pridham-Wippell for the claimant.

H. St. John Field for the execution creditor.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 10. The following judgments were read.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J., read the following judgment.—Joseph Carter, having on Mar. 8, 1915, obtained judgment against George Richard Bellamy, issued execution, and the sheriff of Devonshire seized certain goods consisting of mining machinery. These goods were claimed by Sydney Charles Peake, and the ordinary issue was directed to try the question whether the goods seized by the sheriff were at the time of the seizure the property of Sydney Charles Peak as against Joseph Carter. The issue came before ROWLATT, J., for trial without a jury. The notice of claim given on behalf of Peake to the sheriff states that the whole of the machinery and tin-dressing plant (being the goods seized in execution at the suit of Carter) are the property of Peake. The judge, after hearing the evidence of the claimant, acceded to the contention of the execution creditor that the claimant had not established his claim, and without calling on the execution creditor for any evidence gave judgment for him. It is from this judgment that Peake, the claimant, appeals.

It appears from correspondence in evidence that Bellamy negotiated for, and ultimately made an offer to purchase, a lease of china clay for £500 and a royalty of 6d. a ton on all clay sold, a lease of the Dimson tin mine and some plant belonging thereto for £2,000, and some tin-dressing plant and machinery at Rumleigh for £350. Bellamy apparently had not of his own the means requisite for carrying his proposal into effect; so he obtained money from Peake, part of which Peake in his turn borrowed from one Spender. As between Peake and Bellamy the correspondence shows that Peake was to find the money, that the machinery at Rumleigh was to be the joint property of Bellamy and Peake until taken over by a company intended to be formed, which was to purchase it for £700, and after repaying the £350 provided by Peake for its purchase the balance of £350 profit was to belong as to one half to Bellamy and the other half to Peake. Accordingly an agreement in writing was entered into between George Palmer, the vendor, of the one part, and Bellamy and Peake (therein called "the purchasers") of the other part. It is dated July 18, 1914, but was signed by the purchasers on July 23, and by the vendor on July 31. It provides for the purchasers buying the china clay lease, the Dimson mine, and the Rumleigh machinery on the terms I have mentioned. The sum of £50 is acknowledged as a deposit. This sum is apportioned by allotting £5 in respect of the £350 payable for the Rumleigh machinery and £45 between the other two items. The sum of £350, being the balance of the purchase money for the Rumleigh machinery, was to be paid on July 14, 1914 (then a past date), and on such payment being made "the purchasers" were to be entitled to the plant and machinery. The payment was made on or about July 14, and the Rumleigh machinery thus became the property of the purchasers, Bellamy and Peake. As between these co-adventurers, the terms on which they acquired it were that out of any proceeds of sale Peake was to be first repaid the £350 which he had provided for the joint adventure, and any surplus proceeds were to belong to the two parties in equal moieties. It appears that Peake did find the whole £350, and that, as between him and Bellamy, Peake paid for the whole cost of the machinery. Peake also subsequently found money for dismantling it. It was intended to move it from Rumleigh to Dimson. Palmer was not satisfied with Bellamy's offer to purchase, but had required a more substantial purchaser, and that was how Peake came in.

These are the proper inferences of fact to be drawn from the evidence adduced on behalf of the claimant, subject, of course, to being displaced by any evidence which Carter might call. Thus the legal position is that this machinery, which are the goods the subject of the interpleader, is the joint property of Bellamy and Peake, and the latter is entitled to be first repaid out of the proceeds of sale the sum of £350, and any surplus proceeds will belong to Bellamy and Peake equally. Upon this state of facts Peake has established that the goods are his as against the execution creditor—that is to say, that he has such an interest in the goods that they cannot be taken in execution by the sheriff. By s. 23 (1) of the Partnership Act, 1890, it is provided that a writ of execution shall not issue against partnership property, except on a judgment against the firm. Under sub-s. (2) any judgment creditor of a partner may obtain a charging order on that partner's interest in the partnership property. Previous to this enactment the sheriff under a judgment against a partner could seize and sell the interest of the partner in a partnership. Such a seizure was not adverse to the other partners; the sheriff only purported to deal with the share and interest of the partner who was the execution debtor, and it was for this reason that it was held that interpleader proceedings do not lie where the debtor's partner gives notice to the sheriff that the goods are partnership property, and alleges that the debtor has no beneficial interest in them, being indebted to the firm beyond the amount of his share in the effects. The sheriff's duty was to sell the share, though he might not have been able to ascertain the amount of actual interest: Holmes v. Mentze (2). If the execution creditor disputed that any particular chattels were in fact partnership property and alleged that they were the sole property of the execution debtor, the ordinary interpleader issue would be directed to try this question: Holmes v. Mentze (2); Dibb v. Brooke & Sons (3).

Under the present law, seeing that the sheriff is no longer entitled to seize in execution the share of a partner in a partnership, if on such a seizure a claim is made that the property is partnership property and this is not disputed, an order should be made at chambers for the sheriff to withdraw. If the execution creditor disputes the partnership with regard to particular chattels and claims that they are the sole property of the execution debtor, the other partner may maintain the claim of the partnership to the chattels upon an interpleader issue, and such a dispute will be the proper subject of an interpleader. If on the other hand the other partner maintains that certain chattels are his own property and do not belong to the partnership, this question does not properly fall to be determined on a sheriff's interpleader, as in neither case would the sheriff be right in seizing them under a judgment against the debtor partner. The dispute should be decided by an inquiry directed under s. 23 (2) of the Partnership Act, 1890, to ascertain the particulars of the partnership assets and of the debtor's share and interest therein.

In interpleader proceedings it has not been the practice of the court to treat the exact form of the issue as material, as "the issue is only a proceeding directed for the purpose of informing the conscience of the court": (per PARKE, B., Carne v. Brice (4) (7 M. & W. at p. 187). See also Gadsden v. Barrow (5) (9 Ex. at p. 517), per ALDERSON, B.; Edwards v. English (6) (7 E. & B. at p. 568), per LORD CAMPBELL, C.J.; Richards v. Jenkins (7) (17 Q.B.D. at p. 547), per WILLS, J. The form used in the present case is the usual and proper form where the goods at the time of seizure are in the judgment debtor's possession, as the question is not whether the goods or money are the property of the claimant or the execution debtor simply. Upon an issue directed in the form in the present case it is not incumbent upon a claimant to prove that the goods are his absolute property. It is sufficient if he show such a title to or interest in the goods that the sheriff ought not to have seized them.

In Green v. Stevens (8) the claimant, Mary Green, was not the owner of the goods; they belonged to a man named Williams, but he, not wishing her name to appear, allowed Green to let them as owner to the execution debtor. On a motion for a new trial of the interpleader issue it was urged that Mary Green, the claimant, not being in actual possession, was bound to show a title to the property in herself. But POLLOCK, C.B., intervening, said (2 H. & N. at pp. 146, 147):

> "The issue in the present case is, not whether the goods were the property of Mary Green absolutely, but whether they were hers as against the defendant. My impression is, that this form of issue has been adopted for the express purpose of enabling any person lawfully entitled to possession to sustain his claim."

And BRAMWELL, B., intervening, said (ibid. at p. 147):

> "Is not the question whether the claimant has such a title as would enable her to maintain an action against the sheriff?"

And in giving judgment, BRAMWELL, B., said (ibid. at pp. 147, 148):

> "In an interpleader issue the plaintiff must make out his title, but he may do so by showing that he has such a right to the goods that they cannot be taken from him by the execution creditor. In the present case the judge appears to have said that it was not necessary to show that the goods were absolutely the property of the claimant, if they were hers in any sense. I think that this was a just remark, and that if a claimant has any sort of title, it must be taken that he has a right to defend it until the contrary is shown. If it is shown that he has a lawful title to the possession that is enough."

Schroeder v. Hanrott (9) is to the same effect. BOVILL, C.J., said (28 L.T. at p. 704):

> "The issue is not whether the property abstractedly considered is in the plaintiff, but as to whether the plaintiff has a right to the goods as against the defendant."

Again, Plummer v. Price (10) was a decision of the Court of Appeal, reversing the Common Plea Division. A claimant in an interpleader issue claimed all the goods seized, and succeeded as to the bulk of them but failed as to the rest; it was held that the claimant had succeeded in substance. BRAMWELL, L.J., said (39 L.T. at p. 658):

> "I am clearly of opinion that the form of the issue is of no consequence, because it is directed for the purpose of informing the conscience of the court. The issue is not decided against the claimant if he claims all the goods and it turns out that he is only entitled to some of them, but it is to be taken distributively, and it means, are these goods, or part of them, and if so, what part, the property of the claimant?"

The practice in interpleader is well settled, and I have dwelt upon it because the judge, in deciding against the claimant in the present case, thought himself bound to do so, owing to the decision in Flude, Ltd. v. Goldberg (1). This view was erroneous. That decision of the Court of Appeal proceeded upon the facts of that particular case, and does not disturb the general rule that a claimant, having claimed under a title which he failed to prove, is not thereby precluded from relying on the title found. In Flude, Ltd. v. Goldberg (1) the claimant had filed particulars of his claim under the County Court Rules (1903–1914) Ord. 27, r. 5, by which a claimant is required to lodge particulars of the ground of his claim. He stated that

"the grounds of my claim are that the said goods and chattels were purchased by me out of my own proper moneys, or upon my own proper credit, from the following firms," whose names he proceeded to state. The partnership was strenuously denied by Isaacs, the claimant, both in his affidavit and in his evidence at the trial, while it was the execution creditor who insisted on the partnership, and that the goods were partnership goods and not that the goods were the sole property of Goldberg. This was the dispute between the parties. No application was made to amend the particulars, and the case proceeded at the trial on the claim as thus appearing on the record. It was under these circumstances that the Court of Appeal decided that the county court judge was right, having regard to the facts of the case, the course of the trial before him, and the conduction of the claimant, in keeping him to the record as it stood and as if limited by his particulars, and in holding that he had failed in his claim. Isaacs persisting in his claim to be sole owner of the goods, the question was left by the judge to the jury, "Were the goods in question the goods of Maurice Isaacs alone?" and the jury answered "No." This answer disposed of the claim. There was no application for leave to amend, and no application to the judge to put the question to the jury whether the goods in question were the goods of the claimant as against the execution creditor. The case must be regarded as having turned on the particular facts. Another instance of a claimant having been held bound by the particulars of his claim is Hockey v. Evans (11).

In the present case the claimant, although alleging that the goods seized are his absolute property, has exhibited a copy of the agreement of July 18, 1914, to which I have before referred, showing the purchase by himself and Bellamy jointly. It may be that in substance all the beneficial interest in the chattels belonged to him, as he found all the money to buy them, and they are said not to be worth or to have realised the amount of his lien. But technically the goods belong to the adventurers jointly. In my opinion the learned judge was wrong in deciding that he was bound by the case of Flude v. Goldberg (1) to hold that there was no case for the defendant to answer. The claimant has proved a primâ facie case that the sheriff was wrong in making the seizure. The judgment must be set aside and a new trial had. Any costs paid to be repaid. The appellant to have the costs of this appeal. The costs of the former trial and of the new trial to abide the event.

PICKFORD, L.J.—In this case certain machinery has been seized by the sheriff of Devonshire to satisfy a judgment obtained by Carter against one Bellamy. Peake claimed the said goods, and an interpleader issue was directed to try the question. The issue was in the usual form—i.e., whether the said goods were at the time of the seizure the property of Peake against Carter. In support of his claim Peake swore an affidavit in which he claimed the goods as his absolute property. In a later part of the affidavit he sets out the way in which he alleges the goods became his absolute property and exhibits the agreement under which he alleges that he purchased them. Primâ facie, this agreement and the other facts make a case of these goods being bought jointly by Bellamy and Peake for the purpose of a joint adventure and of Peake having provided all the purchase money. This money was borrowed by Peake, but that is immaterial; he alone was liable to the lender, and as between him and Bellamy the case was the same as if it had been his own money. In taking the accounts of the partnership Bellamy would not be entitled to any share until the lien of Peake upon the partnership assets had been satisfied. I say this is the primâ facie case, because it is said that it can be disproved by evidence which, owing to the course which the case took at the trial, was not heard.

The issue came on for trial before ROWLATT, J., and at the end of the plaintiff's case counsel for the defendant, the execution creditor, submitted that there was no case because the plaintiff had in his affidavit claimed the goods as his absolute property, and when that case failed in proof could not set up a claim as partner. In support of this contention he relied on the case of Flude, Ltd. v. Goldberg (1). ROWLATT, J., held that he was bound by that case to uphold the defendant's contention, and gave judgment accordingly. The learned judge had not the advantage of a full report of the case; if he had had, I think he would not have felt himself bound by it. It turned entirely upon the peculiar circumstances of that particular case. Something turned upon the nature of the proceedings in the county court and the County Court Rules, but the main ground of the decision was that the conduct of the claimant in that case had been such that he ought not to be allowed to set up a case other than that on which he made his claim in the first instance. This is apparent from the remarks of BANKES, L.J. The learned Lord Justice said ([1916] 1 K.B. at p. 664): "It is just one of those cases where a claimant ought to be bound by his particulars," and it is clear that he was speaking with reference to the special facts of the case. The case did not decide that in all cases the claimant must prove the exact interest which he has alleged in his claim. The affidavit is not a pleading, and the issue is not whether the claimant has proved that all he there swore is correct; it is whether the goods are his property as against the execution creditor, and to succeed in that issue it is sufficient for him to prove such an interest as will make it wrongful as against him that the goods should be seized to satisfy the debt due from the execution debtor. An interest as partner is in my opinion such an interest. Since the Partnership Act, 1890, partnership property cannot be seized to satisfy the debt of one partner; all that can be done is to make an order charging the partner's interest in the partnership property with payment of the amount of the judgment debt, and the share can only be ascertained after satisfying all the partnership liens and other claims.

The claimant must state proper materials to enable the judgment creditor to form a correct judgment of the nature of the claim: see per MAULE, J., in Webster v. Delafield (12) (7 C.B. at p. 191); 17 HALSBURY'S LAWS (1st Edn.) 597 [see now (3rd Edn.) vol. 22, p. 472], but it is nowhere decided that if he makes an incorrect statement or draws a wrong inference from those facts his claim must be dismissed. The decision of the Divisional Court in Flude, Ltd. v. Goldberg (1) established the contrary, and was only reversed on the special circumstances of the case. There may be cases in which the claimant may be prohibited from making any alteration in his claim because it is unjust to the execution creditor by reason of his being misled as for other reasons, as in Flude, Ltd. v. Goldberg (1); see also Hockey v. Evans (11). But in this case nothing of the kind exists. All the facts upon which the claimant relies are set out in the affidavit and exhibits, and all that can be said is that the claimant has stated a wrong conclusion from the facts, i.e., that the goods were his absolute property, and that he incorrectly stated that Bellamy had assisted him in the negotiations instead of stating that he was his partner. If the execution creditor had been willing to admit the partnership, some question as to costs might have arisen; but he is not so willing, he wishe to contest the fact of the partnership and to attempt to prove that the goods wer the absolute property of Bellamy. The execution creditor has been in no way misled, and there is no reason why the claimant should not have the advantag whatever it may be, of the legal result arising from the facts which he has stated

A further point was taken before us, i.e., that interpleader proceedings cann be taken and an issue cannot be granted where the claim is in respect of a partner ship. This is stated to be the case in some text-books, and the authority upon which it is so stated is Holmes v. Mentze (2). This case does not support the proposition According to the procedure then in force a rule was obtained calling on the claimant and the execution creditor to state their claims. The claimant alleged a partner ship; the execution creditor did nothing and did not contest it. The court dis charged the rule on the ground that there was no adverse claim, but on the case coming before it again on another point PATTESON, J., said that if on the first occasion the partnership had been contested the case would have been within the Interpleader Act, 1831, and the rule would have been granted. It is therefore n authority that even at that date a claim of partnership could not have been the subject of interpleader proceedings. But at that time there was power to seize goods for one partner's debt, and the result of proving a partnership was not that the sheriff was obliged to withdraw, but that he could only sell the partner's interest and not the absolute property in the goods. Since the Partnership Act, 1890, the partnership goods cannot be seized for a partner's debt, and therefore to prove an interest as partner is to prove that the seizure was wrongful as against the claimant and the sheriff must withdraw. A proper way of deciding whether the claim to such an interest is well founded is, in my opinion, by interpleader proceedings, and I can see no reason in principle or authority why such proceedings do not apply to such a claim. I think the order of ROWLATT, J., must be set aside, and as the execution creditor wishes to deny the existence of the partnership, there must be a new trial.

Appeal allowed. New trial ordered.

ien—Enemy—Tenant of premises within prohibited district—Alien not allowed to reside therein—Liability for rent.

In April, 1914, the landlords let to the tenant, an Austrian, a flat at W. for a term of three years. Under the agreement, the tenant was not to assign or underlet the premises without the consent of the landlords, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld. War broke out between Great Britain and Germany in August, 1914, and the tenant became an alien enemy. By an Order in Council, alien enemies were prohibited from residing in certain areas, of which W. was one. The tenant declined to pay the rent due for the flat after the date of the order.

Held: the right to personal occupation was not the foundation of the contract; as there were other rights left to the tenant, the agreement was not put an end to by the Order; and the tenant was, accordingly, liable for the rent.

Appeal from the Mayor's Court.

By an agreement dated April 19, 1914, the plaintiffs let to the defendant, an Austrian, a flat at Westcliff-on-Sea for a term of three years from Mar. 25, 1914, at a rent of £110 per year. The agreement contained covenants that the tenant would occupy the flat only as a private dwelling, and that he would not assign or underlet the premises without first obtaining the consent in writing of the landlords, which consent was not to be unreasonably withheld. There was also a covenant for quiet enjoyment. In 1914, war broke out and the tenant became an alien enemy. The Aliens Restriction (Consolidation) Order, 1914, made in pursuance of the Aliens Restriction Act, 1914, provided by s. 18 (1), that > "An alien enemy shall not enter, or reside or continue to reside, either temporarily or permanently, in any of the areas specified in the Second Schedule to this order (in this order referred to as prohibited areas) unless provided with a permit issued by the registration officer of the district, subject to the general or special instructions of the Secretary of State."

The municipal borough of Southend, in which Westcliff-on-Sea was included, had been declared a prohibited area. And by s. 28:

> "If any person aids or abets any person in any contravention of this order, or knowingly harbours any person whom he knows or has reasonable ground for supposing to have acted in contravention of this order, he shall be deemed himself to have acted in contravention of this order."

The defendant had failed to obtain the permit necessary to enable him to continue to reside on the premises; he, therefore, declined to pay the rent after the date of the order. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover one quarter's rent of the flat due on Mar. 25, 1915. The Common Serjeant gave judgment for the landlords, and the tenant appealed.

T. W. H. Inskip, K.C., and C. Wertheimer for the tenant.
J. B. Matthews, K.C., and P. M. Beachcroft for the landlords.

AVORY, J.—The question raised in this case is of particular interest at the present time. The agreement for the tenancy of the flat was made with an Austrian, who is now an alien enemy. After the agreement had been entered into, by reason of the Aliens Restriction Act, 1914, and of the Aliens Restriction (Consolidation) Order, 1914, it became unlawful for the tenant to reside either temporarily or permanently in the flat. It also became unlawful for any person to aid or abet the tenant in residing there either temporarily or permanently. The question, therefore, which we have to decide is whether that statute or the order has put an end to this agreement for tenancy so as to discharge the tenant from his obligation to pay the rent. The lucid argument of counsel for the tenant is based on the proposition that here is an Act of State which has put an end to this agreement, for he says that it was a term of that agreement that one of the parties to it should reside in the premises, and that the Act of Parliament has made it impossible for him to do so. I am content to adopt the words of the learned Common Serjeant in giving judgment in this case. He said:

> "By the lease the defendant had a right to the personal occupation of the premises, and the right to assign or sublet them to another person in the absence of any reasonable ground for objection. This latter right was of value and might even enable the defendant to let the premises at a profit to himself, and this right was not affected by the Aliens Restriction Order. That order and the statute under which it was made did not avoid the lease, or make it illegal for an alien enemy to hold a lease of land in a prohibited area. This being so the lease is not extinguished nor is the defendant's title as tenant under it put an end to, although his personal enjoyment of the premises under it is prohibited."

I doubt whether anything usefully can be added to that judgment, and I will only say this, that the right to sublet is only one of the rights left to the tenant, notwithstanding that he himself is prohibited from residing here. For if he has a family, or friends, there is nothing in the Aliens Restriction Act or the order to prevent him from letting his children or his friends reside there. In my opinion, therefore, the lease was not put an end to by this order, or by the statute under which it was made, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LUSH, J.—I agree. Even if we ought to regard the agreement as a contract merely, and not as a lease, in my opinion, counsel for the tenant's argument fails. In order to succeed, he would have to prove that his personal residence in the flat was, in the words of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in Krell v. Henry (1), "the foundation of the contract," and that the performance of the contract was prevented, because, by virtue of this Act and order, he was prevented personally from residing in the flat. In my opinion, it cannot be said that his personal residence was the foundation of the contract. The contract to take the flat—treating the lease as a contract and nothing more—was, no doubt, entered into by the tenant for the purpose of occupation by him, but that is not the interpretation of the words "foundation of the contract" as used in Krell v. Henry (1), where the parties contracted for one purpose only—namely, that the rooms were only to be occupied by the defendant in order to witness the Coronation procession, and, in the event of there being no such procession, he was not to have any right to occupy them at all. Here, the personal occupation was not the sole consideration for which the tenant agreed to pay the rent; he obtained the right to assign or sublet to other people, and, if he had chosen to have been out of possession during the whole of the term, the contract would not have been affected.

With regard to the second point, that performance of the contract was rendered impossible by the order, that clearly is not so if the contract could be performed by his assigning or subletting.

There is a third answer to the tenant's contention. It is not correct to speak of this agreement as a contract only. A term of years was created by the lease, which vested in the tenant, and was not affected by the statute or the order; that term of years constitutes a chattel interest which still continues to vest in the tenant, and has not been terminated by the order. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned Common Serjeant was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Court of Appeal (Lord Reading, C.J., Buckley and Pickford, L.JJ.), January 22, March 3, 4, 24, 1915]

[Reported [1915] 3 K.B. 106; 84 L.J.K.B. 1752; 113 L.T. 126; 79 J.P. 406; 31 T.L.R. 332; 59 Sol. Jo. 429; 13 L.G.R. 808]

Money Had and Received—Payment under pressure—Seizure or threat of seizure of goods—Recovery of sums paid.

From 1900 until 1912 the plaintiff carried on business as a dealer in a market, and throughout this period the defendant demanded and received payment from him of market tolls on goods sold. Disputes arose between the plaintiff and the defendant as to these tolls from time to time, and on these occasions the defendant seized or threatened to seize the plaintiff's goods for non-payment. The plaintiff on the advice of his solicitor then paid the tolls under protest. It was decided by the Court of Appeal in 1913 that the defendant was not entitled to demand tolls from the dealers in the market, and the plaintiff sued the defendant in an action for money had and received to recover the sums he had paid.

Held: as the plaintiff had never made the payments voluntarily, but had only paid under the pressure of actual or threatened seizure of his goods, he was entitled to recover the amount of those payments which he had made during the previous six years.

Per LORD READING, C.J., and PICKFORD, L.J.: The mere fact of payment under protest would not have been sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to succeed.

Appeal from a decision of ROWLATT, J. ([1915] 3 K.B. 106), in an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for money had and received. ROWLATT, J. gave judgment for the defendant and held that to recover money paid under mistake of fact the plaintiff has to prove a mistake, not merely as to his liability but as to the fact on which the liability depended, and that to recover money paid under protest there must have been an involuntary payment in order to avoid some immediate inconvenience, and notice must have been given that the person paying did not intend to surrender his rights. The plaintiff appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 24, 1915. The following judgments were read.

LORD READING, C.J.—From 1900 to 1912 the plaintiff carried on business in Spitalfields Market as a dealer in produce, and the defendant throughout that period demanded and received payment by the plaintiff of market tolls or ld by the plaintiff in the market. It was decided by the Court of Appeal in

-G. v. Horner (No. 2) (1) that the defendant Horner was not entitled to demand lls from the sellers, and it follows from this decision which has not been and could t be challenged in this court, that the plaintiff was never under legal obligation pay tolls to the defendant. The plaintiff, having, during this period of years, id a number of small sums of money as market tolls to the defendant, now sues recover these sums as money had and received by the defendant to the use of e plaintiff. The action came for trial before Rowlatt, J., who decided in favour the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals to this court for a reversal of this dgment.

The question is whether the plaintiff made these payments in such circumances as entitle him to recover them from the defendant in an action at law for oney had and received. The claim is put on two grounds: (i) That the plaintiff id the sums under a mistake of fact; (ii) that he paid them, not voluntarily, but nder the pressure of seizure of his goods. I will deal first with the claim under mistake of fact. It is an essential condition of the plaintiff's right to recover nder this head that he should establish that he paid the money in the belief that fact was true which was untrue. That fact is that at the time of the payments ne defendant was entitled to exact market tolls from the plaintiff. When the emand was first made the plaintiff at once consulted his solicitor, and, acting pon the advice given to him, made the first payment and all subsequent payments nder protest. Rowlatt, J., has found upon this and other evidence before him nat the plaintiff did not make these payments under the impression that the efendant was entitled to demand them from him. Upon an examination of the vidence I have arrived at the same conclusion. I am satisfied that he did not pay n the belief that he was liable to the defendant, but because he found that other ellers in the market had paid and were paying these tolls to the defendant and ecause he was, at least, in doubt as to his liability to pay these tolls and did not ish to be involved in litigation with the defendant. Therefore, even assuming nat such mistake was one of fact and not of law, the plaintiff cannot recover nder this head. Able and interesting arguments were addressed to us for and gainst the view that a mistake as to the ownership of private rights is regarded n law as a mistake of fact. As I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff did ot pay under a mistake, it becomes unnecessary to decide whether such mistake as of fact or of law. I express no opinion on the point.

Upon the second head of claim the plaintiff asserts that he paid the money, not oluntarily, but under the pressure of actual or threatened seizure of his goods, id that he is, therefore, entitled to recover it as money had and received. If e facts proved support this assertion, the plaintiff would, in my opinion, be titled to succeed in this action. If a person with knowledge of the fact pays oney which he is not in law bound to pay, and in circumstances implying that is paying it voluntarily to close the transaction, he cannot recover it. Such payment is in law like a gift, and the transaction cannot be reopened. If a rson pays money, which he is not bound to pay, under the compulsion of urgent d pressing necessity, or of seizure, actual or threatened, of his goods, he can over it as money had and received. The money is paid not under duress in e strict sense of the term, as that implies duress of person, but under the pressure seizure or detention of goods which is analogous to that of duress. Payment der such pressure establishes that the payment is not made voluntarily to close transaction: Atlee v. Backhouse (2), 3 M. & W. at p. 646, per Lord Abinger, B., and ibid. at p. 650, per Parke, B. The payment is made for the purpose of erting a threatened evil, and is made not with the intention of giving up a right, t under immediate necessity and with the intention of preserving the right to pute the legality of the demand: Valpy v. Manley (3), per Tindal, C.J., 1 C.B.
pp. 602 and 603. There are numerous instances in the books of successful claims this form of action to recover money paid to relieve goods from seizure.

Other familiar instances are cases such as Parker v. Great Western Rail. Co. (4), where the money was paid to the railway company under protest in order to induce them to carry goods which they were refusing to carry except at rates in excess of those they were legally entitled to demand. These payments were made throughout a period of twelve months, always accompanied by the assertion that they were made under protest, and it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the excess payments as money had and received, on the ground that the payments were made under the compulsion of urgent and pressing necessity. This case was approved in Great Western Rail. Co. v. Sutton (5), when the judges were summoned to the House of Lords to give their opinion. WILLES, J., in stating his view of the law, said (L.R. 4 H.L. at p. 249):

> "When a man pays more than he is bound to do by law for the performance of a duty which the law says is owed to him for nothing, or for less than he has paid, there is a compulsion or concussion in respect of which he is entitled to recover the excess by condictio indebiti, or action for money had and received. This is every day's practice as to excess freight."

That is a clear and accurate statement in accordance with the view expressed by BLACKBURN, J., in the same case and adopted by the House of Lords. It treats such claims made in this form of action as matters of ordinary practice and beyond discussion. (See also per LORD CHELMSFORD in Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail. Co. v. Gidlow (6) (L.R. 7 H.L. at p. 527).

This principle of law is so well settled that it cannot be challenged, and I find nothing in Brisbane v. Dacres (7) to the contrary. Indeed, the general proposition of law is not disputed, but it was contended, and the learned judge found that the plaintiff had not brought himself within it, mainly because (i) the payments were not accompanied by a declaration of assertion to the defendant that the plaintiff did not intend to give up his right to recover the money, and (ii) the protests for a period of years had degenerated into a sort of grumbling acquiescence and were ineffective. I doubt whether ROWLATT, J., intended to find that there must be anything in the shape of an express notice or declaration to the defendant of the plaintiff's intention to keep alive his right to recover. It is clear, and was indeed admitted at the Bar, that no express words are necessary, and that the circumstances attending the payments and the conduct of the plaintiff when making them may be a sufficient indication to the defendant that the payments were not made with the intention of closing the transactions. I do not think that the mere fact of a payment under protest would be sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to succeed; but I think that it affords some evidence, when accompanied by other circumstances, that the payment was not voluntarily made to end the matter. At the beginning of the dispute there was a definite assertion of right by the defendant to recover the tolls, and a denial of that right by the plaintiff, followed by an actual seizure of goods of the plaintiff. The plaintiff, upon the advice of his solicitor, then made the payment under protest. Subsequently, and during the long period of years whenever the plaintiff challenged the defendant's right, there was a seizure or a threat of seizure of the plaintiff's goods. A threat intended to be followed by seizure is equivalent for this purpose to a seizure: see Valpy v. Manley (3), per CRESSWELL, J., 1 C.B. at p. 606. Disputes arose both as to the right to exact the tolls and as to the amount in particular cases. Notable instances occurred in 1902, 1903, 1905, and 1909. The disputes always ended either in seizure or a threat to seize, and the plaintiff then paid under protest. The defendant first asserted his right to recover payment of the tolls by a distress levied upon the plaintiff's goods, and, if the defendant was legally entitled to the tolls, he could enforce payment by these means.

It appears to me upon the evidence that the plaintiff throughout the whole period of years believed that if he did not pay his goods would be seized. No doubt, as time progressed, and the protests were frequently repeated, they were at last made by the plaintiff's servants to the defendant's servants in a laughing and peculiar manner. The plaintiff had, however, given definite instructions that payments were never to be made except under protest, and these instructions were invariably followed. I cannot think that the protests lost their effectiveness by reason of the length of period during which they were persistently made, or because they were at times accompanied by a laugh or jest. The persistence during so long a period serves rather to show that the plaintiff would not acquiesce in the defendant's demands. I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff never intended to depart, and never did depart, from the course taken by him at the commencement of the dispute. In order to preserve his right to recover, it is not, in my opinion, necessary that on every occasion there should be a refusal to pay by the plaintiff followed by seizure. It was not necessary to go through this form. The circumstances of these payments and the conduct of the plaintiff throughout the period of years satisfy me that he never made the payments voluntarily, that he never intended to give up his right to recover the sums paid, and that he only paid because he knew that a refusal to pay would be immediately followed by seizure of his goods, as in fact did happen whenever he disputed the defendant's right and refused to pay. The pressure of seizure was always present to his mind, and never ceased to operate upon it whenever demand for tolls was made. I am also satisfied that the circumstances of the payments and the conduct of the plaintiff were a sufficient indication to the defendant that the plaintiff did not intend to give up his right to recover. If any assertion or declaration of his intentions was necessary, it was made to the defendant at the time and in the circumstances of the payments. Needless to say, I should not differ on inferences of fact from Rowlatt, J., if I thought these inferences depended upon the demeanour of witnesses. Where there was a conflict of evidence, Rowlatt, J., believed the plaintiff's witnesses, but he drew inferences from which I feel bound to differ.

One further point remains to be considered. Counsel for the defendant, contended that a payment of tolls under an actual or threatened seizure of goods should be treated like payment of a debt in an action or in consequence of a threat of action. There is no doubt that if a person pays in an action or under threat of action the money cannot be recovered by him, as the payment is made to avoid the litigation to determine the right to the money claimed. Such payment is not made to keep alive the right to recover it, inasmuch as the opportunity is thus afforded of contesting the demand, and payment in such circumstances is a payment to close the transaction and not to keep it open. Even if the money is paid in the action accompanied by a declaration that it is paid without prejudice to the payer's right to recover it, the payment is a voluntary payment, and the transaction is closed; Brown v. M'Kinally (8). It is argued that as unpaid tolls can be recovered by distress levied upon the goods of the person who fails to pay, the seizure is to be regarded like the issue of a writ, and therefore that a payment of tolls on seizure must be treated as a voluntary payment. I cannot agree with this contention. When goods are seized, the owner can only relieve them from seizure by payment. He has no opportunity of contesting the right to demand tolls from him except by allowing the seizure and detention of his goods to continue, or by making payment to protect them. Three cases were cited to us in support of this contention—Knibbs v. Hall (9), Lindon v. Hooper (10), and Gulliver v. Josens (11). Upon examination it will be found that they were decided in the main upon points of pleading and procedure. So far as they may be said to establish any proposition of general application, it is that where the distress levied has been for an excessive amount the appropriate remedy is by replevin and not by action for money had and received. In any event I do not think that these cases modify the broad and general principle of law stated by such eminent authorities in the cases to which I have already called attention. It is worthy of observation that Allee v. Backhouse (2), Lord Abinger, C.B. (3 M. & W. at p. 646) gave us as an instance of the right to recover for money had and received the case of a party whose goods have been seized on a demand for toll and more than is due is exacted and is paid to relieve the property from seizure. The present is a case à fortiori since the right to demand tolls was in itself in dispute, apart from amount.

The result is that in my opinion this appeal succeeds, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover the sums paid by him to the defendant for tolls during the last six years immediately preceding this action, the earlier payments being barred by the Statute of Limitations. If the parties have come to terms, as I understand is the case, judgment will be entered for the plaintiff for the agreed amount, failing agreement for an account to be taken. In my judgment the appeal must be allowed with costs.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—I do not rest my decision in this case upon mistake of fact. The mistake which the plaintiff alleges is that he believed, contrary to the fact, that the defendant was legally entitled to demand tolls from him. I reserve my opinion whether such a question is a question of fact. Assuming that it is, I think, upon the evidence, that the plaintiff made payment not because he thought that he was liable to pay, but because he was not sure whether he was liable to pay or not, and he was not prepared to fight the question whether the liability in fact existed.

But the plaintiff is entitled, I think, to recover upon the ground that the payments which he made were not made voluntarily, but were made under the pressure of the defendant's threat to seize and sell his goods in default of payment, and were made not without objection, but under protest. Counsel for the defendant in his argument largely rested his case upon the judgment of GIBBS, J., in Brisbane v. Dacres (7), and contended that the learned judge meant to lay down as a general proposition that under circumstances such as those in the present case the party called upon to make payment has an option either (i) to litigate the question or (ii) to submit and pay, and that, if he does the latter, the payment is by way of gift to the person to whom he pays and closes the transaction between them. Counsel for the defendant argues that that proposition is true in law. In my opinion, it is not the fact that there exist only those two alternatives of which the person called upon to make payment must elect one, and that, if he elects to pay, his payment is by way of gift and is voluntary. To say that it is a gift and is voluntary seems to me to beg the question. He may submit (in the sense of making the payment) because the consequences to himself will be so disagreeable if he does not pay that he prefers to pay and prevent the seizure of his goods, but at the same time to reserve the right to contend that the money has been obtained from him against his will. In Atlee v. Backhouse (2), LORD ABINGER (3 M. & W. at pp. 645, 646) said that in cases where property has been unlawfully seized or unlawfully detained for the purpose of enforcing the payment of money not due,

> "the party against whom the goods have been wrongfully seized or detained, is entitled, after payment of the money, to bring an action for money had and received," and PARKE, B., referring to an argument by Mr. Erle, said (ibid. at p. 650):

> "There is no doubt of the proposition laid down by Mr. Erle that if goods are wrongfully taken, and a sum of money is paid, simply for the purpose of obtaining possession of those goods again, without any agreement at all, especially if it be paid under protest, that money can be recovered back; not on the ground of duress, because I think that the law is clear, although there is some case in VINER'S ABRIDGMENT to the contrary, that, in order to avoid a contract by reason of duress, it must be duress of a man's person, not of his goods, and it is so laid down in SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE; but the ground is that it is not a voluntary payment. If my goods have been wrongfully detained and I pay money simply to obtain them again, that being paid under a species of duress or constraint may be recovered back."

The same is true, I think, when payment is made not to release goods seized, but to intercept a threat to seize them. When the defendant demanded payment of the plaintiff, the latter, if he refused payment, exposed himself to the seizure and sale, rightfully or wrongfully, of his goods. When he made payment to escape such seizure and sale, the payment was, I think, within PARKE, B.'s, words, not a voluntary payment. Further, if there be added to the above facts the further fact that the party making the payment protests that the money is being wrongfully taken from him, a further factor is added which goes to show that the payment was not voluntary.

The conclusion which I arrive at as to the facts in the present case is this: There is no question but that in September, 1900, the payment of tolls was demanded by the defendant as matter of right, that the plaintiff refused to pay, that the defendant threatened seizure and sale if he did not pay, that seizure in fact was made, and that thereupon the plaintiff paid under protest. In subsequent years, 1902, 1903, 1905, and 1909, similar threats and protests were made, but not as to tolls in general. The contest in each case was whether particular tolls demanded were for too large an amount or whether particular tolls were demandable at all for certain parcels of goods. It seems to me that the threat of 1900 remained a subsisting threat governing all the payments made, and the fact that the particular threat and protest in the later years were made as regards amount or description of goods is in no way inconsistent with a continuing threat and protest as to all classes of goods. The threat was made as regards particular goods based upon an assertion of a right as regards all goods. I am not at all impressed by the fact that the protests were said in course of time to have been regarded very much as matter of form, and to have become the subject of jesting expressions as between the collector of the defendant who came to demand payment and the servant of the plaintiff whom he saw. It is obvious, I think, that the plaintiff's attitude throughout was that he was not prepared to enter into litigation with such a person as Mr. Horner. But I do not find that he ever acquiesced in his demands with any such result as that his conduct amounted to a closing of the transaction between the two parties upon the footing that, whether the defendant was right or wrong, the plaintiff was minded to pay. The fact is that the defendant never was entitled to the tolls which the plaintiff in fact paid. Except as regard the last six years, the Statute of Limitations is a bar, but the plaintiff is, I think, entitled to recover within the period of the statute upon the ground that the payments which he made were made under what PARKE, B., in Atlee v. Backhouse (2) called a species of duress or constraint. Upon that ground I think that this appeal must be allowed, and judgment given for the plaintiff.

PICKFORD, L.J.– In this case the plaintiff sued to recover back money paid by him to the defendant for tolls. It has been determined in A.-G. v. Horner (1) that the defendant had no right to charge these tolls. The plaintiff based his claim on two grounds: (i) That he paid under a mistake of fact—that is, a mistaken belief that the defendant had a right to payment of the tolls. (ii) That the payments were made involuntarily to prevent seizure of his goods, and under protest. The two grounds seem to me inconsistent. If the plaintiff paid under the belief that the defendant had a right to the tolls, it is difficult to see why he waited for compulsion to make him pay and why he protested. But there is no reason why they should not be set up as alternative grounds of claim. I am of opinion that the plaintiff did not pay under any mistake. I think he knew that the defendant's right to the tolls was of a doubtful nature and that other persons were paying, and that he was not prepared to enter upon litigation to decide the question; but I do not think he ever was actuated in his payments by a belief that he was liable. It is not, therefore, necessary to decide whether such a mistake, if it existed, would have been a mistake of fact or of law.

The second ground of claim is that the payments were not voluntary payments, but were made under protest and to avoid seizure of the plaintiff's goods. I do not think that the mere fact that a payment is made under protest is enough to entitle the payer to recover it back, but if it be shown that it was made under circumstances which show that the payer intends to resist the claim and yields to it merely for the purpose of relieving himself from the inconvenience of having his goods sold, the money can be recovered back, and the fact of a protest is some indication that it is so made. I do not think there need be an express notice or declaration of the intention to resist if it is properly indicated by all the circumstances. Payment to avoid a seizure or (subject to a point taken by the defendant's counsel) a threatened seizure is an involuntary payment and can be recovered back: Valpy v. Manley (3). The point taken on behalf of the defendant was that as distress was the legal remedy for nonpayment of tolls, a threat to distrain was like a threat to bring an action, and a payment made in consequence of it could not be recovered back in an action for money had and received. In support of this contention Knibbs v. Hall (9), Lindon v. Hooper (10) and Gulliver v. Cosens (11) were cited. I do not think these cases support the proposition. So far as they are not decisions upon points of pleading and forms of action not now material, they only decide that in the case where there is a right to distrain, but a complaint that there was a distress for too much, replevin, and not money had and received, is the proper remedy. No case was cited to us in which it was held that money paid under a threat to distrain, when the person threatening had no right whatever to do so, could not be recovered back in such an action, and I see no principle which obliges us so to hold. It is also contrary to the dictum of LORD ABINGER in Atlee v. Backhouse (2). The case, therefore, resolves itself into a question of fact. Did the plaintiff make these payments under what has been called a quasi duress of goods—that is, to preserve them from a threatened seizure. I have had great doubts, not altogether removed, whether the plaintiff has proved that they were so paid, or whether, looking at all the circumstances, the length of time over which the transactions extended, the fact that after the first dispute the only threatened seizures were in respect not of disputes as to the general right to claim tolls, but as to matters relating to amount or other matters peculiar to the particular goods, the plaintiff had not really acquiesced in the defendant's right and allowed his protests to become merely what ROWLATT, J., calls a grumbling acquiescence. I do not, however, dissent from the conclusion arrived at by the other members of the court.

Appeal allowed.

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Reading, C.J., Scrutton and Low, JJ.). December 6, 17, 1915]

Criminal Law—Trial—Translation of evidence—Prisoner a foreigner ignorant of English.

When a foreigner is on trial for a criminal offence and he is ignorant of the English language and is undefended the evidence must be translated to him. If he states that he understands part of the evidence and does not wish that part translated, it need not be translated unless the judge in his discretion thinks otherwise, because the object of the translation is already achieved. If he does not understand the English language he cannot waive compliance with the rule that the evidence must be translated; he cannot dispense with that by express or implied consent. Where the foreigner accused is defended by counsel the evidence should be interpreted to him except where he or counsel on his behalf expresses a wish to dispense with the translation and the judge thinks fit to permit the omission, which he should not do unless he is of opinion, by reason of what has passed before the trial, that the accused sufficiently understands the evidence to be given and the case made against him.

Appeal on a point of law against a conviction before DARLING, J., at the Central Criminal Court, of murder.

The appellant was a foreigner and had been living with the deceased woman, a prostitute. She left him and went to live with another man. On Oct. 16 the appellant called to see the deceased at a certain house, and went with her into the back yard, where it was alleged, the murder was committed. At the trial the appellant was represented by counsel, and the evidence for the prosecution was not translated to him. The jury found the appellant guilty of wilful murder, and he was sentenced to death.

Tristram Beresford for the appellant.
A. H. Bodkin and E. C. P. Boyd for the Crown.

Dec. 17, 1915. LORD READING, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The appellant, Lee Kun, a Chinaman, was convicted of the murder of one Clara Thomas. He appeals to this court to quash the conviction on the ground that, being a foreigner and ignorant of the English language, he did not understand the evidence for the prosecution, which was not translated to him. His counsel contended that, notwithstanding that the appellant was represented by counsel at the trial and that no application was made for the translation of the evidence given on behalf of the Crown, the omission to have the evidence translated constituted an irregularity in the proceedings, and that in consequence the conviction should be quashed. The court is of opinion, having regard to the facts and circumstances of this case, that the appeal must be dismissed, whether or not there has been irregularity, as contended, in the proceedings on the ground that no substantial miscarriage of justice has actually occurred. If the evidence had been translated to the appellant the same verdict would have resulted.

The issue was quite simple. The case for the Crown was that the appellant inflicted the fatal wound on the deceased. For the defence the appellant gave evidence which was translated by an interpreter. At the police court proceedings the appellant was represented by a solicitor and counsel. All the evidence there given was translated to the appellant by an interpreter as and when it was written in the depositions. It is not suggested that the evidence given at the trial at the Central Criminal Court differed from that recorded in the depositions. Therefore, the appellant and his counsel before the trial of the indictment knew the case that would be presented by the Crown and the evidence to be given in support of it. At the trial the appellant was represented by the same solicitor and counsel. At the outset of the proceedings the charge in the indictment was translated to the appellant, and he was called upon through the interpreter to plead, and was informed of his right to challenge the jury. No request was made then or at any time during the trial by the appellant or his counsel for the assistance of the interpreter to translate the evidence for the Crown. Counsel has informed this court that it never occurred to him to ask that the evidence should be translated. After careful examination of the evidence and of the proceedings at the trial, and assuming there was irregularity as contended, this court is satisfied that no substantial miscarriage of justice has actually occurred, and, therefore, in accordance with the proviso to s. 4 (1), of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, the appeal should be dismissed.

Notwithstanding that we have arrived at this conclusion we think it advisable to deal with the abstract question raised. When a foreigner is on trial on an indictment for a criminal offence, and he is ignorant of the English language and is undefended, the evidence given at the trial must be translated to him. If he states that he understands part of the evidence and does not wish that part translated, it need not be translated unless the judge in his discretion thinks otherwise, because the object of the translation is already achieved. For example, if an agreement in writing signed by the accused is put in evidence by the Crown, it might well be that the accused knew the contents and did not wish a translation. He is not thereby admitting any part of the case against him, but merely that he understands that part of the evidence. If he does not understand the English language he cannot waive compliance with the rule that the evidence must be translated, he cannot dispense with it by express or implied consent, and it matters not that no application is made by him for the assistance of an interpreter. It is for the court to see that the means are adopted to convey the evidence to his intelligence, notwithstanding that, he makes no application to the court.

The reason is that the trial of a person for a criminal offence is not a contest of private interests in which the rights of parties can be waived at pleasure. The prosecution of criminals and the administration of the criminal law are matters which concern the State. Every citizen has an interest in seeing that persons are not convicted of crimes, and do not forfeit life or liberty except when tried under the safeguards so carefully provided by the law. No trial for felony can be had except in the presence of the accused, unless he creates a disturbance preventing a continuance of the trial: R. v. Berry (1) per Wills, J. Even in a charge of misdemeanour there must be very exceptional circumstances to justify proceeding with the trial in the absence of the accused. The reason why the accused should be present at the trial is that he may hear the case made against him and have the opportunity of answering it. The presence of the accused means not merely that he must be physically in attendance, but also that he must be capable of understanding the nature of the proceedings. The prisoner may be unable, through insanity or deafness or dumbness, or the combination of both conditions, to understand the proceedings or to hear them, either directly or by reading a record of them, or to answer them either by speech or writing. In these cases a jury is sworn to ascertain whether a prisoner is "fit to plead," which is interpreted by Alderson, B., in R. v. Pritchard (2) (7 C. & P. at pp. 304, 305) as meaning whether he is > " of sufficient intellect to comprehend the course of proceedings on the trial so as to make a proper defence . . . If you think there is no certain mode of communicating the details of the trial to the prisoner so that he can clearly understand them, and be able properly to make his defence to the charge, you ought to find that he is not of sane mind."

If the accused is found not fit to plead he is not tried, but is detained during His Majesty's pleasure.

The authorities dealing with the matter are all discussed in the recent case of R. v. Governor of Stafford Prison, Ex parte Emery (3). If the accused is fit to plead it may yet be that no communication can be made in the ordinary way; it may be that he is deaf and can only be approached by writing or signs, or dumb and can only make his views known by writing or signs, or a foreigner who cannot speak English and requires the assistance of an interpreter to understand the proceedings and make answer to them. In such cases the judge must see that proper means are taken to communicate to the accused the case made against him and to enable him to make his answer to it. In the case of a foreigner ignorant of the English language who is undefended no difficulty has arisen in practice. The evidence is always translated to him by an interpreter. The more difficult question arises when an accused foreigner ignorant of the English language is defended by counsel and no application is made to the court for the translation of the evidence. There is no rule of law to be found in the books on the subject, and, as the result of inquiry which we have made since the argument, it has become clear that the practice of the courts in this respect has varied considerably during the last fifty years. It was stated at the Bar by counsel for the Crown that the practice has been for the court not to require the translation of the evidence unless the accused or his counsel applied for it. There is no doubt that this practice has been followed by some judges; whereas other judges have inquired at the outset of the trial whether the accused or his counsel wished the translation to be made, and if the answer was in the negative they have permitted the trial to proceed without having the evidence interpreted to the accused. Again, some judges have always insisted upon the translation, except when the accused or his counsel stated that he did not wish it, and other judges have required translation notwithstanding such a statement. The only practice in this respect upon which there has been uniformity is that whenever any desire has been manifested by the accused or his counsel for the translation it has always been permitted.

We have come to the conclusion that the safer course, where the foreigner accused is defended by counsel, is that the evidence should be interpreted to him, except where he or counsel on his behalf expresses a wish to dispense with the translation, and the judge thinks fit to permit the omission; the judge should not permit it unless he is of opinion that by reason of what has passed before the trial the accused substantially understands the evidence to be given and the case to be made against him at the trial. To follow this practice may be inconvenient in some cases, and may cause some further expenditure of time; but such a procedure is more in consonance with that scrupulous care of the accused's interests which has distinguished the administration of justice in our criminal courts, and therefore it is better to adopt it. No injustice will be caused by permitting the exception above mentioned. Speaking generally, police court proceedings will have taken place, and the evidence will there have been translated to the accused before he has to stand his trial on the indictment, so that at the trial he knows the case to be made against him. He can instruct his counsel upon it, and he may leave his defence in counsel's hands without having the evidence again translated to explain to him that which he already knows, and there seems no reasonable objection to such a course. If there should be a substantial departure from the evidence recorded in the depositions, the judge would take care, even if counsel omitted to ask for it, that the variation or addition should be translated to the accused, so that he might throw any further light upon the case. The importance of the translation of any new or additional evidence cannot be doubted; such evidence may have a special significance to the accused, and may enable him to recollect facts till then forgotten, or to give additional information to his counsel for cross-examination. Further, he may wish to make a statement dealing with the evidence against him instead of himself giving evidence, and he should have all information for that purpose. Or, again, the variation from or addition to the evidence originally given at the police court may have a bearing upon the sentence. We think, therefore, that any substantial variation from the story originally told in the depositions, or any additional evidence should be translated to the accused, even though he may be indifferent upon the matter or might not wish it. It is not suggested in this case that any additional evidence could have been given or any light thrown upon the case had the evidence which, in fact, followed the depositions been again translated to the accused.

There is no authority in English law for the proposition that the omission to translate the evidence in the circumstances under consideration is an irregularity, or is an irregularity which vitiates the proceedings. It is, however, to be noted that in R. v. Lyons (4) (known as the Flowery Land Case), which was a prosecution for murder, tried in 1864 before BRAMWELL, B., the prisoners were foreigners who did not understand English, and were all represented by counsel. The prosecution was conducted by the SOLICITOR-GENERAL. The evidence was not interpreted, but upon the application of counsel for one of the prisoners, the interpreter to the Spanish Consul was permitted to sit near them in order to communicate with the prisoners as the trial proceeded. That the practice was not uniform at that time is shown by another case tried on the same day in 1864 before SHEE, J. (R. v. B (5)). The accused, who was deaf and dumb, was represented by counsel, and the evidence was interpreted to him. In 1872 Margaret Dixblanc, a Belgian, who did not understand English, and was defended by counsel, was tried before CHANNELL, B., for murder (R. v. Dixblanc (6)). The evidence was interpreted to her. In 1876 several foreigners, who did not understand English and were defended by counsel, were tried before BRETT, J., for murder on the high seas. The evidence was not interpreted to the prisoners (R. v. Cargalis (7)). In both of these cases the prosecution was conducted by the Law Officers. There are other cases in which the course pursued before Bramwell, B., and Brett, J., has been followed, and also others in which a different practice has prevailed.

Counsel for the appellant drew our attention to R. v. Kwok Leung (8), where a similar question was considered by the full court, which is the equivalent of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved in that colony. That case is, of course, not binding upon us, but we have the advantage of the judgment of Piggott, C.J., and Gompertz, J., and have been impressed by their reasoning. We think, however, that the question whether there was an irregularity in the proceedings by reason of the omission to translate when the accused is defended by counsel is not a matter of law, but of practice, in our courts, and that practice is not settled. In any event we could not, as a matter of law, even apart from the considerations under s. 4 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 hold that an irregularity had been committed at the trial which would justify the quashing of the conviction. It is to be observed that there was no such power in the Hong Kong court as is given to this court by virtue of the proviso to s. 4 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907. The result is that the appeal must be dismissed.

Criminal Law—Demanding money with menaces—"Demand"—Request imposing conditions—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 96), s. 45.

To constitute an offence of demanding money with menaces with intent to steal the language used may be only a request. It need not necessarily be an explicit demand. A mere request for money, if unaccompanied by conditions, would not amount to a demand within the statute, but it is for the jury to decide on the evidence before them whether there has been conduct amounting to a menace.

R. v. Robinson (1) (1796), 2 Leach 749, followed.

Notes. Section 45 of the Larceny Act, 1861, has been repealed by the Larceny Act, 1916; see now s. 30 of the 1916 Act which is in substantially the same words. As to extortion by threats, see 10 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn.) 797 et seq.; and for cases see 15 Digest (Repl.) 1121 et seq. For Larceny Act, 1916, see 5 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 1011.

Appeal on a point of law against a conviction at the Central Criminal Court, before the Common Serjeant, for demanding money with menaces with intent to steal.

Cecil Hayes for the appellant.
W. Frampton for the Crown.

Dec. 20, 1915. LORD READING, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—The appellant was convicted of demanding money with menaces with intent to steal. The prosecutor was of German birth, but became naturalised in England two or three years before the outbreak of war, and he carried on business as a wholesale druggist in the City. The appellant was his confidential clerk and general manager, and had access to all business papers. Before war broke out the prosecutor had had considerable business transactions with Germany and Austria. After August, 1914, the prosecutor was able to satisfy the authorities on questions relating to his nationality. A conversation between the prosecutor and the appellant showed that the appellant was apparently in a position to bring influence to bear on the police if he so wished. In May, 1915, the appellant stated that certain charges had been made against the prosecutor at Scotland Yard, and the latter suggested that the appellant should go there and obtain information. The appellant did not go to Scotland Yard, and the evidence showed that there was no foundation for his statement that a charge against the prosecutor was pending. The evidence at the trial was voluminous, but it is clear that fictitious telegrams were sent by the appellant to the prosecutor with the object of making him pay £250 to the appellant, who represented that a detective, who was in reality non-existent, would stay the proceedings on payment of that amount. A telegram on May 31, supposed to come from the detective in question, was opened by the prosecutor and was in these terms:

> "Thanks for kindness. Am doing my best. Matters serious. Superiors sure to act at any moment. Advise immediate clearance."

That telegram clearly meant that unless money was paid the superiors of the supposed detective would proceed, which would be a serious matter for the prosecutor. This telegram is said by the prosecution to constitute a demand, together with a menace with intent to steal.

The defence do not deny that the statements made by the appellant, and the telegrams supposed to have come from the detective, were all false; but they say that the offence was only that of attempting to obtain money by false pretences, for which the appellant was not tried. The entire question depends on whether the evidence warranted the jury in finding a verdict under the statute. When R. v. Robinson (1) is looked at it is clear that there was evidence of a demand. The language used may be only a request, it need not necessarily be an explicit demand. A mere request without conditions would not amount to a demand within the terms of the statute, but in the present case there was ample evidence of a demand. With regard to the question of menace, obviously the appellant acted with the intention of frightening the prosecutor, and there was clearly evidence from which the jury could say that the steps taken by the appellant amounted to a menace. Another point taken by the defence is that there was no intent to steal. This argument is based upon the fact that the appellant had put £1,000 into the prosecutor's business subject to withdrawal on twelve months' notice in writing, and it is urged that the appellant only wanted to recover the money which was owing to him. There is not a particle of evidence to show that this was the real object of the appellant, and in any case a jury would not look favourably on a defence of this kind. It is also said by the defence that at the trial the jury were not directed on questions relating to the intent to steal. It was suggested that the evidence relating to the £1,000 owing to the appellant negatived any intent to steal. The Common Serjeant pointed out to the jury that this point was not material, and that the fact that money was owing in the future made no difference. We think that on this point the proper direction was given. It was suggested that the Common Serjeant might have left this point to the jury to say whether they took the same view. The answer to that suggestion is that it is the province of the judge to say if there is any defence in law or not. We think that the Common Serjeant took the greatest care in trying the case, and took especial trouble to point out the important facts to the jury. He certainly did not take the case out of their hands. The court is of opinion that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

[Reported [1915] A.C. 372; 84 L.J.P.C. 86; 112 L.T. 737]

Power of Appointment—Exercise—Fraudulent exercise—Exercise for purpose not justified by instrument creating power—Benefit for appointor or person not object of power—Appointment on condition—Condition to be performed, not by appointee, but by third party—Presumption of validity.

A power of appointment is exercised fraudulently if it is exercised for a purpose or with an intention beyond the scope of, or not justified by, the instrument creating it, and it is enough that the appointor's purpose and intention is to secure a benefit for himself or some other person not an object of the power.

If a settlement gives the donee power to appoint upon a condition, the appointment is not made bad because it is made on a condition to be performed, not by an appointee, but by a third party, and a bargain or condition which leads to the fund going in default of appointment can never, therefore, defeat the donor's primary intention.

The general presumption which the law makes is in favour of the good faith and validity of transactions which have long stood unchallenged, and if the known facts and existing documents are, though such as to give rise to suspicion, nevertheless capable of a reasonable explanation, the court ought not to draw inferences against the integrity of persons who have long been dead, and cannot, therefore, defend themselves.

Appeal from a judgment of the Superior Number of the Royal Court of the island of Jersey, affirming a judgment of the Inferior Number of that court in an action wherein the respondents, Henry Paull, Maria Florence Paull (his wife), and Ellen Vatcher, were plaintiffs, and Eliza Frances Tonkin Higgs, the widow of Henry Vatcher, and Maria George Andrew, the widow of Henry Vatcher, jun., were defendants. The action was to set aside a contract, dated Aug. 18, 1886, on the ground that it was fraudulent and voidable, whereby for the considerations and on the conditions therein mentioned the respondent Maria Florence Paull, principal heiress to the hereditary succession of Henry Vatcher, sen., her grandfather, her sister, the respondent Ellen Vatcher, one of the co-heiresses, and her aunt, Margaret Torkington, now deceased, and another of the co-heiresses, ceded to the principal defendant, the widow of Henry Vatcher, sen., all their rights in the said hereditary succession, and whereby also the co-defendant ceded in favour of the principal defendant all her right of power in the heritages of Henry Vatcher, sen. The substantial question of law argued on appeal was whether the joint appointment made on Mar. 22, 1882, whereby the first appellant and her husband, Henry Vatcher, sen., appointed the settled fund in exercise of a power contained in a settlement upon their marriage, and dated April 6, 1846, in favour of their own family, with a proviso that if the issue of the first marriage should abandon their rights in the appointor's real estate the appointment should be void, was a fraud upon the power. The Inferior Number of the Royal Court gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, taking the view on the evidence that the contract of Aug. 18, 1886, had been induced by fraudulent misrepresentation, and incidentally that the joint appointment of 1882 was a fraud upon the power and invalid and the Superior Number affirmed that decision.

Dec. 17, 1914. LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—Two points arise for decision in the present case. The first is whether the appointment of Mar. 22, 1882, is a valid appointment, a question which is for the most part a question of law. The second is whether the contract of Aug. 18, 1886, was induced by fraud and ought therefore to be set aside, a question which is for the most part a question of fact.

The late Henry Vatcher, sen., who was born in England, was twice married, first to Margaret Way who died in 1843, and secondly to Eliza Frances Tonkin Higgs. There was issue of the first marriage, two children—namely, Margaret, who married a Mr. Torkington, and Henry, who married Maria George Andrew, spinster, and died in 1868, leaving issue the respondents, Maria Florence Paull and Ellen Vatcher. There was issue of the second marriage of Henry Vatcher, sen., six children—namely, the appellant, John Sidney Adolphus Vatcher, the appellant, Edith Mary Atkinson, Bessie Gertrude, who died in 1885 without issue, the respondent, Charles Gardner Vatcher, the appellant, James Raynold Morley Vatcher, and the appellant, Rose Ethel Monckton. By an indenture of settlement date April 6, 1846 (being a settlement made in contemplation of the second marriage of Henry Vatcher, sen.), certain funds of the value of £8,000 or thereabouts were settled upon trusts for the payment of the income thereof during the joint lives of Henry Vatcher, sen., and his second wife in manner therein provided, and after the death of Henry Vatcher, sen., in case his second wife should survive him, to the second wife during her life or until re-marriage. And subject as aforesaid in trust for the children of Henry Vatcher, sen., whether by his first or second marriage or the issue of such children born in the lifetime of Henry Vatcher, sen., and the second wife or of the survivor of them in such shares, upon such conditions, and in such manner as Henry Vatcher, sen., and his second wife should by writing appoint, and in default of such appointment as the survivor of them should by writing or by will appoint, and in default of any such appointment in trust for the children of the said Henry Vatcher, sen., by either marriage who being males should attain twenty-one years or being females should attain that age or marry and the issue of any male child who should die under twenty-one years of age leaving issue who should be living at that period of distribution, to be divided between them if more than one in equal shares the issue of any deceased male taking per stirpes and not per capita. By virtue of certain further indentures dated respectively Oct. 19, 1847, and May 19, 1855, certain further funds were settled upon trusts similar in all respects to those declared by April 6, 1846, except that there was no power of appointment conferred on the survivor of Henry Vatcher, sen., and his second wife. The aggregate value of the settled property at the death of Henry Vatcher, sen., was about £27,000. In 1857 Henry Vatcher, sen., with his wife and family, took up their abode in the island of Jersey. In 1863 he and his second wife purchased, jointly with benefit of survivorship, a residential property in the island known as Rosemount, and made their home there. Between the year 1865 and the time of his death Henry Vatcher, sen., made several further purchases of real property in the island. Some of the properties purchased were conveyed to Henry Vatcher, sen., some to Henry Vatcher, sen., and the appellant, John Sidney Adolphus Vatcher, jointly with benefit of survivorship, and some to Henry Vatcher, sen., and the appellant, John Sidney Adolphus Vatcher, jointly for themselves and their heirs. In every case the greater part of the purchase price was satisfied by the creation of "rentes" or incumbrances on the property then or previously purchased. By a deed of appointment, dated Mar. 22, 1882, Henry Vatcher, sen., and his second wife appointed that the funds settled by the said indentures of April 6, 1846, Oct. 19, 1847, and May 19, 1855, should be held by the respective trustees thereof after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Henry Vatcher, sen., and his second wife, upon trusts which were declared as follows, that is to say:

"To pay and divide the same unto, between, and among the child, children, or other issue of the said Henry Vatcher by his said wife, Eliza Frances Tonkin Vatcher, when and if they shall attain the age of twenty-one years, but so that such children shall take per stirpes and not per capita, it being our intention to exclude Margaret Torkington, a daughter of me, the said Henry Vatcher, and the children of Henry Vatcher, a son of me, the said Henry Vatcher, from all participation in any appointment hereby made. Provided, and we lastly declare, that this our appointment is to be revocable by us at any time, and that in case the said Margaret Torkington and the two children of the said Henry Vatcher, the son, shall upon the death of me, the said Henry Vatcher, and of me, the said Eliza Frances Tonkin Vatcher, absolutely renounce, decline, and abandon as tenants, by their procureur or otherwise, all rights and claim to which they or either of them may be entitled to or upon the real estate or freehold and leasehold property or lands and rents to which either of us at our death may be entitled under the law of Jersey or otherwise the appointment hereby made shall be at an end and absolutely void."

It was suggested in the evidence of English law before the Jersey courts that this appointment was void as infringing the English rule against perpetuities. The suggestion, however, was not pressed before their Lordships' Board; indeed, it is, in their Lordships' opinion, reasonably clear as a matter of construction that the issue to take under the appointment are issue living at the death of the survivor of Henry Vatcher, sen., and his second wife, and all such issue must necessarily attain the age of twenty-one years within the period allowed by the rule. The only objection to the appointment urged before their Lordships was that it constituted a fraud on the power.

The term "fraud" in connection with frauds on a power does not necessarily denote any conduct on the part of the appointor amounting to fraud in the common law meaning of the term or any conduct which could be properly termed dishonest or immoral. It merely means that the power has been exercised for a purpose, or with an intention, beyond the scope of or not justified by the instrument creating the power. Perhaps the most common instance of this is where the exercise is due to some bargain between the appointor and appointee, whereby the appointor, or some other person not an object of the power, is to derive a benefit. It is enough that the appointor's purpose and intention is to secure a benefit for himself, or some other person not an object of the power. In such a case the appointment is invalid, unless the court can clearly distinguish between the quantum of the benefit bonâ fide intended to be conferred on the appointee, and the quantum of the benefit intended to be derived by the appointor or to be conferred on a stranger: (see Sadler v. Pratt (1) and Re Perkins (2)). In the present case by the very terms of the settlement creating the power, the donee is entitled to appoint to one or more of the objects of the power exclusively of the others or other of them. He is also entitled to appoint upon condition. The mere fact, therefore, that he intended to benefit the issue of the second to the exclusion of the issue of the first marriage cannot be alleged against the validity of the execution of the power, nor is it any objection to the validity of such execution that the appointment is subject to a condition subsequent with a defeasance in case the condition be not performed. If, therefore, the appointment is open to any objection it must be by reason of the nature of the condition imposed.

It should be noticed that in the present case the condition is not one to be performed by the appointees; it is to be performed if at all by third parties over whose actions the appointees have no control. The case therefore is clearly distinguishable from Re Perkins (2) and also from Stroud v. Norman (3). It is also unlike these cases in another respect, namely, that the defeasance in case the condition is not fulfilled is not inserted with a view to an alternative appointment, but with the intention that on failure of the condition the funds are to go upon the trusts limited by the settlement in default of appointment. In their Lordships' opinion both grounds of distinction are of importance. Apart from cases of appointments made in pursuance of a bargain under which the appointor or person not an object of the power is to derive a benefit there is no authority for holding an appointment bad because it is made on a condition to be performed not by the appointee but a third party. The real vice of an appointment on condition that the appointee shall benefit the appointor or a third party is that the power is used not with the single purpose of benefiting its proper objects, but in order to induce the appointee to confer a benefit on a stranger, and obviously this vice is absent where the condition is not to be performed by the appointee. Nor is there any case in which a bargain to allow the funds to go in default of appointment or a condition the non-performance of which will leave the funds to go in default of appointment has ever been successfully impeached. The limitations in default of appointment may be looked upon as embodying the primary intention of the donor of the power. To defeat this intention the power must be bonâ fide exercised for the purpose for which it was given. A bargain or condition which leads to the fund going in default of appointment can never therefore defeat the donor's primary intention. Even in the case of a condition to be performed by the appointee the condition does not necessarily invalidate the appointment. As explained by SIR WILLIAM PAGE WOOD in Stroud v. Norman (3) it can only do so if the purpose of the appointor in imposing it is to benefit himself or a third person not an object of the power. It is not enough that the appointor or some person not an object of the power may conceivably derive some benefit. If this were not so no father could appoint in favour of an infant child, because if such infant died under twenty-one the father himself would take as next of kin. In order to avoid such appointment it must be proved affirmatively, or the inference to be drawn from the circumstances must be, that the purpose of the appointment is not to benefit the infant, but to benefit the appointor through the infant. This is the real answer to the powerful argument put forward by counsel for the respondents. Though, he said, the renunciation by the first family would enure for the benefit of the second family under the state of circumstances in which the appointment was made, it was none the less possible that the second family might all of them predecease the appointor, in which case it could enure only to the benefit of strangers. Nobody can doubt, however, that the real purpose of the condition was to ensure that the second family, all of them objects of the power, should either (i) take the whole of the settled funds or (ii) if the first family renounced the real estate in their favour, their share in such funds as in default of appointment. The mere fact that in some conceivable event the renunciation might benefit a stranger could not in their Lordships' opinion invalidate the appointment even if the persons to perform the condition had been appointees.

In the courts below the question of the validity of the appointment was a question of fact to be determined on evidence. On the evidence before them these courts could come to no other conclusion than that the appointment was void as constituting a fraud on the power. Their Lordships, however, have to determine the question as a question of law independent of the evidence which was before the courts below, and in their opinion the appointment was in all respects a good and valid appointment within the scope and intention of the power, and cannot be impeached as constituting a fraud thereon.

Their Lordships will now proceed to consider the second question which arises for decision, namely, whether the contract of Aug. 18, 1886, whereby Mrs. Torkington and the two children of Henry Vatcher, jun., renounced their inheritance in the Jersey property in order that the marriage settlement funds might go in default of appointment was induced by fraud and ought therefore to be set aside. Henry Vatcher, sen., died on Mar. 26, 1886, having by his will dated Nov. 4, 1885, bequeathed to his wife the one-third of his personal estate of which by the law of Jersey he was entitled to dispose in addition to the one-third to which she was entitled by Jersey law; the remaining one-third devolved by Jersey law on his children or their issue. He appointed his wife and his son-in-law, Mr. Atkinson, to be his executors. He also signed prior to his death a document entitled "Expression of my wishes for the guidance of my family in the division of my property." By that document he expressed the wish that in the partage of his real property in Jersey of which by Jersey law he had no power to dispose, Margaret Torkington and the children of Henry Vatcher, jun., should renounce all claim thereto, stating as his reason that the property was uncertain and heavily incumbered and would be an everlasting and unprofitable incumbrance. On the death of Mr. Vatcher, sen., Maria Florence Vatcher, the eldest daughter of Henry Vatcher, jun., became his principal heiress and as such entitled to take possession of his real estate in Jersey subject to the liability of dividing the same with her co-heirs, and of providing for the dower of the testator's widow and of her own mother. In this division her own share would by Jersey law be considerably greater than the share of any of the co-heirs, including her sister Ellen. Their Lordships will assume that the inheritance consisted of all the items set out on pp. 790 to 793 of the record, although it appears that as to the properties comprised in Sched. B they would not form part of the inheritance until the benefit of survivorship reserved to the widow of Henry Vatcher, sen., had been set aside in appropriate legal proceedings, and although as to the properties comprised in Scheds. C and D they did not really form part of the inheritance at all, the only right of the co-heirs being to have the price paid for them by Henry Vatcher, sen., brought into hotchpot in the division. Shortly after the death of Henry Vatcher, sen., negotiations took place between his widow and second family on the one hand and Mrs. Torkington and the two children of Henry Vatcher, jun., on the other hand, as to whether the latter should or should not renounce their shares in the inheritance, it being assumed by all parties and in their Lordships' judgment rightly assumed that if they did not do so the appointment of Mar. 22, 1882, would stand and they would therefore lose all interest in the settled funds. In these negotiations the widow of Henry Vatcher, sen., and his second family were represented by Mr. Coutanche, a Jersey lawyer of repute, and in part also by Mr. Atkinson, who had married a daughter of Henry Vatcher, sen., by his second wife, and was a clergyman. Mrs. Torkington was represented by M. Baudains, another Jersey lawyer, and Mrs. Henry Vatcher, jun., and her two daughters were represented by Mr. Graham, a solicitor, practising at Fowey in Cornwall, assisted at times by M. Baudains. It is alleged that in the course of these negotiations Mr. Coutanche and Mr. Atkinson fraudulently represented to Mr. Graham that the properties mentioned in the statement to which their Lordships have already referred were, having regard to the incumbrances thereon, of no value at all, and by means of such representation induced Mr. Graham to advise his clients to renounce their inheritance.

These proceedings were instituted on Nov. 12, 1910—that is to say, twenty-four years after the alleged fraud. Mr. Coutanche, Mr. Atkinson, and M. Baudains are all dead. The attitude which the court ought to adopt in considering charges of fraud made under such circumstances is well stated by BOWEN, L.J., in Re Postlethwaite (4). The general presumption which the law makes is in favour of the good faith and validity of transactions which have long stood unchallenged, and if the known facts and existing documents are, though such as to give rise to suspicion, nevertheless capable of a reasonable explanation, the court ought not to draw inferences against the integrity of persons who have long been dead, and cannot therefore defend themselves. Approaching the question in this way, and after a careful consideration of the evidence, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that no fraud has been established on the part of anyone. In order to establish fraud it must be proved (i) that a representation was made; (ii) that this representation was untrue; (iii) that it was untrue to the knowledge of the person making it; and (iv) that it induced the contract. Under no one of these four heads is the evidence really satisfactory. The evidence that Mr. Coutanche and Mr. Atkinson represented the property to be of no value consists entirely of the statements of Mr. Graham contained in his depositions, corroborated by the document No. 228 at p. 825 of the record. Mr. Graham's recollections as to the precise statements made in conversation which took place nearly a quarter of a century ago cannot be very reliable, and it must be remembered that the important point was not whether the property had any value at all, but whether it was sufficiently valuable to justify Mr. Graham's clients in abandoning their share in the settled fund, the amount of which was tolerably certain. Value, too, is a matter of opinion rather than of fact. If the statements made by Mr. Coutanche and Mr. Atkinson were to the effect that so far as they could judge the property was not of sufficient value to justify the abandonment by Mr. Graham's clients of all interest in the settled funds, the difficulty of proving fraud would be immensely increased. The respondents, however, attach great importance to the document at p. 825 of the record as corroborating Mr. Graham's oral testimony. Indeed, their counsel in effect admitted that without this document Mr. Graham's evidence could not after so great a lapse of time be treated as sufficient to prove that the statements relied on were made, or, if made, were made dishonestly. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider the history of this document in detail. The document consists of a schedule of the real property of Henry Vatcher, sen. It appears to have formed the subject of discussion between Mr. Graham and Mr. Coutanche in one of their interviews, in the course of which Mr. Coutanche or his clerk made certain additions in red ink. The document shows the particulars of the real estate and of the "rentes" or incumbrances charged thereon, and also the valuation for the assessment of taxes in the various parishes where the property was situated. The red ink additions show that if the "rentes" be subtracted from the valuation for assesment there will remain an apparent bonus of 157 quarters, which is stated to represent an annual income of £117. There follows a statement of further charges consisting of parochial rates, repairs, and annuities, showing that this annual value of £117 is more than exhausted. It is said that these red ink additions amounted to a representation that the property was valueless and that such representation must have been false to the knowledge of Mr. Coutanche for the following reason. Both the "rentes" and the assessment values are given in quarters of wheat, but though the conventional value of a quarter for assessment purposes is £1, the conventional value of a quarter for "rente" purposes is 14s. 9d., or, in some few cases, 15s. 11d. only. It is said, therefore, that Mr. Coutanche in subtracting the "rente" quarters from the assessment quarters knowingly took advantage of Mr. Graham's want of local knowledge and fraudulently brought out the annual value as £117, where as it should have been £326. On the other hand there is some evidence that the method pursued is not uncommon in Jersey when it is desired to arrive at an approximate annual value, the reason being that though the "rente" quarters are conventionally less in value than the assessment quarters the assessment valuation is always too high. On the whole although the document is one which in normal circumstances would call for some explanation their Lordships cannot treat it as conclusive evidence of fraud on the part of a deceased person.

Secondly, there is in their Lordships' opinion, no satisfactory evidence of the real value of the property at the date of the death of Henry Vatcher, sen. The incumbrances amounted to 652 quarters of "rente" or thereabouts, and there is no satisfactory evidence that the income derived from the property was anything like sufficient to defray the "rentes." The respondents rely mainly in this connection on the fact that Henry Vatcher, sen., was, at his death, working a quarry on the property which has since developed into a paying concern. The greater part of this quarry appears to have been situated on property which did not strictly form part of the inheritance, though the price paid for it might have had to be brought into hotchpot in the division. Quite apart, however, from this consideration, their Lordships are of opinion that there is no sufficient proof of the income which was being derived therefrom at the death of Henry Vatcher, sen. The result of the evidence appears to be that the quarry was still in an experimental stage and might or might not develop into a paying concern. Moreover, at Henry Vatcher's death, Jersey was passing through a financial crisis which had depreciated the value of real estate. The evidence taken as a whole points to the conclusion that though Henry Vatcher's real property may at his death have had some value, it must as an investment have been extremely speculative and uncertain. It should be noticed that concurrently with the renunciation of the inheritance on the part of Mrs. Torkington and the children of Henry Vatcher, jun., the other co-heirs ceded their rights therein to Mrs. Vatcher, sen., apparently because the property was in the nature of a damnosa hæreditas, and if it could be made profitable at all could only be made profitable by a person with sufficient capital to keep down the incumbrances, and to develop the quarry on the estate.

Thirdly, in the case of Mr. Atkinson there is no evidence at all that he believed the property to have any value even if he stated that it was valueless. On the contrary he allowed his wife to cede her interest in the inheritance to her mother without any consideration at all, which is only explicable on the footing that he thought the property had little or no value. With regard to Mr. Coutanche the only evidence that he knowingly made any misrepresentation is the document to which their Lordships have already adverted.

Lastly the evidence that Mr. Graham in advising his clients relied on the misrepresentations alleged is by no means satisfactory. It appears by the correspondence that both Mr. Graham and M. Baudains formed their own estimate as to the value of the property and were of opinion that it had at any rate some value. Indeed, M. Baudains had informed Mr. Graham that if the principle heiress could take the real estate without endangering her sister's share in the settled fund it would be worth her while so to do, but Mr. Graham did not think this was possible. He was in fact representing two persons with somewhat diverse interests and apparently treated the matter as one in which the interests of the two sisters must be considered together. Their Lordships do not blame him for this, but he was evidently aware that M. Baudains thought the property had some considerable value, and it is unexplained why he should attach more importance to the statement of Mr. Atkinson, a layman, and Mr. Coutanche, who was advising the other side, than to the statements of M. Baudains, whom he had consulted on behalf of his clients, and who was advising Mrs. Torkington. Moreover, it appears that the red ink additions in document No. 228 were made after and not before the final arrangements as to the terms in which Mr. Graham's client should renounce the inheritance.

On the question of fraud, therefore, their Lordships cannot take the view adopted by the courts below. It is true that as a general rule their Lordships' Board treat questions of fact on which there have been concurrent findings in the courts below as conclusively established, but the present case is a peculiar one. In the first place their Lordships cannot help thinking that the evidence to the effect that the appointment of Mar. 22, 1882, was a fraud on the power to some extent coloured the view taken by the courts below of other facts. The appointment seems to have been considered as in the nature of an overt act in a fraudulent conspiracy to deprive the first family of their inheritance, which could not lawfully be done according to Jersey law, and other acts of Henry Vatcher, sen., however innocent, are similarly treated. For example, the fact that so far from paying off the incumbrances on the property, he actually created new incumbrances, and the fact that he took no means to divest himself of what he stated was an onerous property, are in the judgment cited against him. Again, there is in the present proceedings less reason than is usually the case for refusing to go behind concurrent findings. There was no oral evidence at the trial. All the evidence was taken on deposition, and the courts below were in no better position to judge of its effect than is their Lordships' Board. And lastly, the respondents' counsel did not himself rely on the rule, but expressly invited their Lordships to go into the evidence and come to their own conclusions. This their Lordships have done, and though they regret to differ from the courts below, they cannot avoid some satisfaction in acquitting of all charges of fraud persons who have long been dead and against whom in their lifetime no such charge was ever made.

Their Lordships cannot help thinking on reference to the initial stages of these proceedings that no charge of fraud was originally intended to be made. It appears to have been developed in the course of the examination and cross-examination of witnesses for the purpose of the trial. And though in the present case there is no reason to suppose that the appellants were in any way taken by surprise or deprived of the opportunity of proving relevant facts, their Lordships are of opinion that where charges of fraud are intended to be made, full particulars thereof ought to be given in the pleadings, either as originally framed or as amended for that purpose. The courts below, in setting aside the contract of Aug. 18, 1886, appear to have been influenced to some extent by the fact that the respondent, Maria Florence Paull, though of full age by Jersey law was according to English law still an infant, and that the respondent, Ellen Vatcher, acted through Mr. Atkinson as her guardian, although his wife had an adverse interest. These points were not relied upon and were in effect abandoned before their Lordships' Board. They are mentioned only to show that their Lordships express no opinion thereon. Under the circumstances their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty to allow the appeal and to dismiss the action. With regard to costs their Lordships observe that the appellants produced no evidence of English law in the court of first instance, and under these circumstances they think that justice will be done if the respondents are ordered to pay the costs of this appeal and four-fifths only of the costs incurred in the courts below, and will humbly advise His Majesty to that effect.

Action tried by ROWLATT, J., without a jury. The plaintiffs, George Clare & Co., a firm of foreign bankers carrying on business in England, had an account with the Berlin branch of the defendant bank, and at the date of the outbreak of war between England and Germany there was a balance standing to their credit of 5,947 marks 5 pf. The Dresdner Bank, which was a foreign corporation incorporated under the laws of Germany, had its head office in Dresden, and had a branch both in Berlin and in London. On Dec. 1, 1914, the plaintiffs wrote to the London branch requesting the payment of the amount standing to their credit at the Berlin branch. They did not write or make any demand for payment at the head office or the Berlin branch. The money was not paid, and the plaintiffs thereupon brought this action to recover as money had and received by the defendants to their use, the amount of the balance standing to the credit of their account. The writ was served at the office of the London branch, and an application at chambers by the defendant bank to set aside the service was dismissed.

D. M. Hogg for the plaintiffs.

C. W. Lilley for the defendants.

ROWLATT, J.—I think that this action fails. [HIS LORDSHIP having stated the facts, continued.] Counsel for the plaintiffs contends that the relation of banker and customer is simply that of debtor and creditor, with a superadded obligation to honour his customer's cheques. That, no doubt, is quite right. Then he contends that the customer need not make any demand for payment to entitle him to sue the banker. It seems to me, however, that locality is an essential part of the debt owing by a banker to his customer, and that his liability to pay is limited to the place where the account is opened. As a general rule, no doubt, a debtor has to seek out his creditor and pay him; but in the case of a bank with several branches I do not think that that rule can apply. Money has a different value in different parts of the world, even although it is expressed in the same currency, and I cannot conceive it possible that a man with £1,000 to his credit at a bank in New Zealand could come to London and demand payment of that sum from a London branch of that bank without giving any consideration for that convenience, or without giving time to the branch in London to ascertain whether he was in fact a customer of the New Zealand bank and had that amount to the credit of his account there. I come to the conclusion, therefore, although the question does not seem ever to have been raised before, that there is no obligation on a bank with branches in different countries to pay in one country a debt due to a customer on current account at a branch in another country

Counsel for the plaintiffs has referred me to Leader, Plunket, and Leader v. Direction der Disconto-Gesellschaft (1) decided by SCRUTTON, J., as supporting his contention. In that case, however, the plaintiffs had made a request to the branch in Berlin, where their account was kept, to remit the money to the London branch. The bank had refused this request, and that refusal amounted to a refusal to perform their obligation to pay where the account was opened, and the plaintiffs had a cause of action which they could enforce in this country or wherever the bank could be found. In this case there has not been any request made to the Berlin branch to remit, and consequently no dishonouring by the Berlin branch of the obligation to pay on demand. I cannot assume whether they would or would not have dishonoured; I can only deal with the facts before me. Those facts are that the London branch had been asked to pay here in London money deposited at their branch in Berlin. I do not think that it would be in accordance with either law or business to hold that they were liable to do this. I must therefore give judgment for the defendants.

Judgment for defendants.

Appeal against a conviction of larceny at the West Riding Quarter Sessions.

The appellant married a widow who was in possession of a houseful of furniture. They took a house, and the furniture was moved into it. The wife, soon after her marriage, became ill and went to live with her parents. The appellant joined his wife there, and the house, with the furniture in it, was locked up. Shortly afterwards the appellant, without the knowledge of his wife, removed the furniture from the house and sold it. He continued to live with his wife at her parents' house for some weeks after the sale and then left his wife. On discovering his sale of the furniture, the wife prosecuted her husband for larceny.

H. R. Bramley for the appellant.
G. E. C. Yarborough for the Crown.

BANKES, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This is an appeal against a conviction on a point of law. The appellant was charged at the instance of his wife with stealing a quantity of furniture belonging to her. He alleges as a matter of law that he ought to have been acquitted on this charge. By s. 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a married woman may prosecute her husband for stealing her property provided that the facts of the case fit in with the conditions prescribed by the proviso to the last part of the section. The question as to the right construction of the section came before the court for Crown Cases Reserved in R. v. James (1). That case decided that the latter part of the section is not in the nature of an exception, but of a proviso; so that where a husband is prosecuted by his wife it does not lie upon the prosecution to satisfy the jury that the case does not come within the terms of the proviso, but the defence may prove facts which bring the case within its terms.

[His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:] Under s. 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the time at which criminal proceedings are taken is the real point to consider. If at that time the parties were living together there is a complete defence under the section. If the parties were not living together at that time, and the offence complained of was committed while they were living together, a question arises whether the property was taken by the husband "when leaving or deserting or about to leave or desert his wife." It has been argued that there was misdirection on the part of the chairman on the point whether, when the appellant disposed of the furniture, he was about to leave or desert his wife, and a number of authorities have been quoted which have dealt with the meaning of the word "about," but in circumstances entirely different from those in the present case. There is no special meaning in law attached to the word—its meaning must be gathered from the subject-matter and circumstances of the case.

It was also contended that there was no evidence that the appellant was about to leave his wife. The jury had before them all the circumstances: they were told the position in life occupied by the parties, the amount and value of the furniture, and the way in which it was disposed of and the fact that the wife regarded the furniture as a provision of some value for their children was also put before them. Having regard to all these matters, it was open for the jury to find that the appellant knew that his wife could not continue to live with him after she discovered the theft, and that he would be obliged to leave or desert her. They were justified in finding that the wife must soon discover what had taken place and that the appellant was about to leave her. The court is of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal Law -Evidence Corroboration—Accomplice—Charge of living on immoral earnings—Need of corroboration of prostitute's evidence.

On a charge of living upon the earnings of prostitution, the women concerned are not in the position of accomplices of the accused. Corroboration of their evidence is not, therefore, essential as a matter of law, but the jury may, at the discretion of the judge, be expressly warned against accepting such evidence without some corroboration.

Notes. As to corroboration, see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 458 et seq.; and for cases see 14 DIGEST (Repl.) 527 et seq.

Appeal against conviction at the County of London Sessions for living on the earnings of prostitution, and a sentence of twelve months imprisonment with hard labour.

W. G. Hawtin for the appellant.

H. W. Roome for the Crown.

Mar. 30, 1914. LORD READING, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—The appellant was convicted on two charges of living on the earnings of prostitution of two women and was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour on each indictment, the sentences to run consecutively. Leave to appeal was granted in order that the question which was raised as to the necessity for corroboration in such cases might be argued. Counsel for the appellant has directed our attention to the only piece of evidence which may be regarded as material corroboration in the case. This was the answer to the constable given by the appellant, who, when he was arrested, said in answer to the charge, "Quite right." The jury were directed by the deputy-chairman that this answer was an admission of guilt. There was undoubtedly some evidence of an admission, and the jury were quite able to decide for themselves whether the words were used in that sense. We cannot say that there was no corroboration and it was pointed out generally by the deputy-chairman that the evidence of any woman with regard to a story like the present one should be corroborated. But it is argued that the woman in this case was an accomplice in the offence with which the appellant was charged. It is enough to say that there is no evidence on this point and that it does not necessarily follow. The only possible argument is that in doing what she did, in order to carry out the intention of the appellant, she must have been guilty of the offence of soliciting. But we cannot hold that she is therefore an accomplice in the crime charged against the appellant.

Then the court is asked to lay down a rule that in cases like the present, there must be corroboration and that the jury must receive a caution to that effect. In the opinion of the court no such rule can be laid down; there is nothing to justify it either by statute or at common law. The only argument on this point which could be put forward was to rely on the analogy of other offences created by statute where by the terms of the statute corroboration is necessary. It would in our opinion be most dangerous to lay down any rule in cases like the present. On the other hand a judge is justified in warning the jury not to accept without corroboration the evidence of a woman, who is leading a life of the kind described, against a man. That is entirely a matter for the discretion of the judge, and a warning was given in the case before us. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

SINCLAIR v. BROUGHAM AND OTHERS

[House of Lords (Viscount Haldane, L.C., Lord Dunedin, Lord Atkinson, Lord Parker of Waddington and Lord Sumner), December 8, 9, 10, 12, 15, 1913. February 12, 1914]

[Reported [1914] A.C. 398; 83 L.J.Ch. 465; 111 L.T. 1; 30 T.L.R. 315; 58 Sol. Jo. 302]

A building society, established under the Building Societies Act, 1836 [repealed], and having borrowing powers, established and developed, in addition to the legitimate business of a building society, a banking business, which was admitted to be ultra vires. In connection with this banking business customers deposited sums of money in the usual way. An order winding-up the society was made, and the assets of the society, after payment in full of the outside creditors and the costs, were found to be sufficient to pay the unadvanced shareholders in full, but were not sufficient to pay in full them and also the customers of the bank on deposit and current accounts.

Held: (i) the doctrine of ultra vires excluded any claim in personam based on the circumstance that the society had been improperly enriched at the expense of the depositors with the bank, and so the depositors could not recover their money unless, adopting the dealings by the society with the money and claiming in rem, they could trace their money into the hands of the society as actually existing assets; at law money could be followed not only where a fiduciary relationship existed, but in any case where the property in the money had not passed and the money could be earmarked in the hands of the recipient or traced into assets acquired with it, and that was true where money had been paid under an ultra vires contract under which no property could pass; in equity, when money had been paid to a person who had wrongfully obtained it, the court would declare that there was a charge on the fund in the bank with which the money had been mixed, and that doctrine applied in the case of money acquired under a transaction which was ultra vires the recipient; accordingly, in the present case the depositors had the right to follow the money so far as it was invalidly converted into the, possibly depreciated, assets in which it had been invested, whether those assets were mere debts due to the society or ordinary securities: (ii) no action for money paid under a mistake of fact or for money had and received would lie to enable the depositors to recover their money: (iii) subject to the payment of all proper costs, charges, and expenses, the liquidator, in distributing the remaining assets of the society between the depositors and the unadvanced shareholders, should proceed on the principle of distributing them pari passu in proportion to the amounts properly credited to them respectively in the books of the society in respect of their advances at the date of the commencement of the winding-up.

Feb. 12. VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C.—In the opinion which I am about to deliver LORD ATKINSON desires me to state he concurs.

In June, 1911, an order was made for the winding-up of the Birkbeck Permanent Benefit Building Society. The society was formed in 1851, under the Building Societies Act, 1836 [repealed], with rules which, with certain amendments subsequently made, were duly certified and enrolled. The object of the society, according to these rules, was to enable the members to raise a fund out of which they might be individually enabled to buy or build houses. Rule 35 conferred on the directors a power to borrow without limit, but it is clear that the power so given could not extend beyond borrowing for the legitimate purposes of the society. There were two classes of shareholders, those to whom loans were granted and those who were mere investors. Under an amendment rule the investing shares were divided into two classes, A shares and B shares, differing mainly in this respect, that the A shares matured and were to be paid off after a certain period, while the B shares were permanent. The shareholder could, however, in either case give notice and withdraw the amount of his share. During the earlier period of the society's existence the funds, which were derived both from shares and from loans by depositors, were laid out in mortgages to members. Later on, while the society continued its business as a building society, it began gradually to increase its deposits and to do the business of a banker. In the balance-sheet of Mar. 31, 1910, the liabilities to shareholders are stated to amount to £1,053,728, while the liabilities to depositors are £10,784,323. The assets are stated to include mortgages from advanced members, loans, and property in hand, amounting to £726,610; money at call, short loans and advances to customers, £995,466; investments in various kinds of stocks, shares, and debentures, £8,740,788; ground rents, £433,826; and cash at the bankers and in hand, £1,069,753. The society had begun, about 1871, to call itself the Birkbeck Bank. Many of its business documents came to be so headed, and it is obvious that at the time when it was wound-up it had, while still retaining its business as a building society, turned much the larger part of its enterprise into that of a bank. Notwithstanding that the Act of 1836 does not incorporate the building societies registered under it, its provisions make it clear that such a course as the Birkbeck Society took was contrary to these statutory provisions, and the apparent action of the society in carrying on the business of banking and in borrowing for that purpose was, therefore, ultra vires, and was not in contemplation of law the action of the society. The contracts entered into for the purposes of this business were accordingly, so far as the society was concerned, void.

The questions which now arise are in substance how the liquidator is to dispose of the mass of assets in his hands. He raised these questions before NEVILLE, J., on a summons. The learned judge ordered the assets to be applied—first, in payment of costs; secondly (as I gather), by general consent in paying debts properly incurred to outside creditors; thirdly, in paying the unadvanced members or shareholders, the amounts due to them in respect of the subscriptions paid on their shares, including any bonus and interest to which they were entitled by the rules; and, fourthly, in distribution of the balance among the customers of the society on deposit or current account (for brevity I shall speak of these as depositors) in proportion to the amounts standing to their credit in the books. The majority in the Court of Appeal (COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and BUCKLEY, L.J., FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., dissenting) took the same view. The decision of that majority was based on the following grounds. They held, first of all, that the rule enabling borrowing did not authorise the society to engage in banking business, and that its action in so doing was altogether ultra vires.

I think that on this point there is no doubt that the courts below were right, and that they carried their view to its proper conclusion when they held that every receipt on deposit for the purposes of such business was ultra vires. The majority went on to hold that in so far as the legitimate indebtedness of the society was not increased, for the reason that the money borrowed was applied in the payment of legitimate debts, the depositors could be treated as subrogated to the rights of these debtors, at all events to the extent of their debts as distinguished from any securities for these debts. They also thought that if the depositors could identify their money as earmarked they could follow it under what is called a tracing judgment. But they held that unless the depositors could bring themselves within one or other of these propositions they could not claim to be creditors either at law or in equity, and that their only right was to an order such as was made in Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (1), which would give them the surplus assets after payment of all legitimate debts and of 20s. in the pound to the members or shareholders. It was the order made in that case which NEVILLE, J., had followed. BUCKLEY, L.J., referred to difficulties which he felt in understanding the decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL in that case. He was unable to see why, if the assets belonged to the society, the members were not held entitled not only to 20s. in the pound, but to the share in the surplus which the rules gave them. But he considered that the Court of Appeal were bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case. For reasons to which I will refer later on, it will appear that I share the difficulty in understanding it which BUCKLEY, L.J., experienced. FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., was of opinion that the principle which the authorities had laid down carried with it the consequence that the court would not, even in the case of an ultra vires transaction which could give rise to no debt as between the parties to the transaction, permit the one who had wrongfully received the money to keep it merely because he was in possession of it. He thought that as the money must be taken to have been received by the misrepresentation or carelessness of its agents, the society could not keep it as against the depositors. This seemed to him to be implied in what was laid down in Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (1), not merely in the Court of Appeal, but in the subsequent decision on appeal to the House of Lords (Murray v. Scott (1)). He held that not until the society had made restitution of this money (which was never really part of the assets) to the depositors, could there be assets belonging to the society which ought to be distributed on the principle laid down by SIR GEORGE JESSEL in the Guardian Society's Case (1). To proceed otherwise would be to look at possession only, and to disregard rights of property. He, therefore, dissented, holding that the depositors should be paid in priority to the B shareholders. With the A shareholders a settlement had been come to, and as to their title no question was then, or is now, raised.

The question before the House is whether NEVILLE, J., and the majority in the Court of Appeal, arrived at a conclusion which was right in point of principle, apart from the authorities, and whether, if your Lordships should be disposed to differ from them, we are so bound by the authorities, and particularly by the cases decided in this House, that we are precluded from arriving at a different conclusion. It is contended for the appellants that they are entitled to succeed in recovering their deposits either on the footing of being money had and received by the society to their use, or as being money which never truly formed part of the assets, and which can now be followed in the hands of the society's agents and the liquidator. I propose to consider in the first place the question whether an action for money had and received would have lain against the society on the footing that, although its conduct in receiving the depositors' money was ultra vires, it had become improperly, as between itself and the depositors, enriched thereby, so that the amount so received was money held to the depositors' use and recoverable as a debt, independently of any right to trace and follow. Two authorities were cited in support of the argument that such an action could have been brought successfully. One of these was a judgment of SIR WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, V.-C., in Re Phœnix Life Assurance Co. (4). The other was a decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland which followed his judgment, in Flood v. Irish Provident Assurance Co. (5). In these cases the principle of tracing was not relied on, but it was apparently held that the amount of certain premiums which had been paid in respect of policies, the issue of which was ultra vires, could be recovered as money had and received. If these decisions had related to the recovery of borrowed money, I should find it difficult to reconcile them with principle. If it be outside the power of a statutory society to enter into the relation of debtor and creditor in a particular transaction, the only possible remedy for the person who was paid the money would on principle appear to be one in rem and not in personam, a claim to follow and recover specifically money which could be earmarked as never having ceased to be his property. To hold that a remedy will lie in personam of a statutory society, which by hypothesis cannot in the case in question have become a debtor, or entered into any contract for repayment, is to strike at the root of the doctrine of ultra vires as established in the jurisprudence of this country. That doctrine belongs to substantive law and is the outcome of statute, and cannot be made different by any choice of form in procedure.

It is, therefore, binding both at law and in equity. In the jurisprudence of England the doctrine of ultra vires must now be treated as established in a stringent form by Acts of the legislature and decisions of great authority which have interpreted these Acts. This is a principle which it appears to me must today be taken as a governing one, not only at law but in equity. I think it excludes from the law of England any claim in personam based even on the circumstance that the defendant has been improperly enriched at the expense of the plaintiff by a transaction which is ultra vires. All analogies drawn from other systems, such as that of the Roman law, appear to me to be qualified in their application by two considerations. The first is that, broadly speaking, so far as proceedings in personam are concerned, the law of England really recognises (unlike the Roman law) only actions of two classes, those founded on contract and those founded on tort. When it speaks of actions arising quasi ex contractu it refers merely to a class of action in theory based on a contract which is imputed to the defendant by a fiction of law. The fiction can only be set up with effect if such a contract would be valid if it really existed. This is a point to which I shall have to return later on in what I have to say. The second consideration is that where an Act of Parliament imposes a restriction on capacity, that restriction is binding in equity as much as at law, the principles of which equity follows.

Nor does the difficulty of extending the scope of the judgments of SIR WILLIAM PAGE WOOD and the Irish Court of Appeal to cases of borrowing appear less when the foundation of the action for money had and received is investigated. Consideration of the authorities has led me to the conclusion that the action was in principle one which rested on a promise to pay, either actual or imputed by law. Moses v. Macfarlan (6) is the leading case on the point. It was an action on the case for money had and received under circumstances where any notion of an actual contract was excluded. But LORD MANSFIELD explained how in such circumstances the law treated the defendant as being in the same position as if he had incurred a debt (2 Burr. at p. 1009):

> "If the defendant be under an obligation, from the ties of natural justice, to refund, the law implies a debt, and gives this action, founded in the equity of the plaintiff's case, as it were upon a contract."

The claim in Moses v. Macfarlan (6) was one of assumpsit—in the form of the common indebitatus assumpsit count. This was a form of claim which had been very gradually evolved. The researches of recent writers appear to me to have placed its origin in its true light. The basis of actions of this kind was originally tort, a writ having been framed in consimili casu under the provisions of c. 24 of the Statute of Westminster (13 Edw. 1). By degrees, out of this action on the case and, as one of its forms, a new form which was soon to diverge wholly from tort, the action of assumpsit arose. In Slade's Case (7), the judges resolved that "every contract executory imports in itself an assumpsit," with the result that it became no longer necessary or desirable to use as the remedy where money was due the action of debt which was embarrassing because it let in the right to a "wager of law." Then came the extension of indebitatus assumpsit to cases in which it was clear that no express promise could be proved. For, as LORD MANSFIELD points out, the law is ready to imply a debt in such cases arising quasi ex contractu. The promise to pay which created the right of action might have been a pure fiction of law. In many cases no such promise could possibly have been established. Yet it took some time before the judges brought themselves to go so far.

Starke v. Cheesman (8) was a claim on a bill of exchange by the holder against the drawer on the allegation that the drawee had refused to accept. It was held that an actual promise must be implied. But what is remarkable is the language of the judgment in which the declaration, which contained an indebitatus assumpsit count, was held good. HOLT, C.J., is reported to have said (1 Ld. Raym. at p. 538):

> "that the notion of promises in law was a metaphysical notion, for the law makes no promise but where there is a promise of the party."

Yet, the observation of HOLT, C.J., notwithstanding, a little later on this "metaphysical notion" became firmly established. For it was just the fiction of attributing a promise in a multitude of cases where in reality there was none which finally gave the action its comprehensive range, and made it available even where no fact importing or implying privity of contract could be proved. The history of the action of assumpsit has been described by a writer to whom lawyers and historians alike owe much, the late PROFESSOR AMES of Harvard University, in language which shows how easily the fiction of a promise grew into part of the law. Speaking of the action of assumpsit generally he says (LECTURES ON LEGAL HISTORY at p. 166):

> "In its origin an action of tort, it was soon transformed into an action of contract, becoming afterwards a remedy where there was neither tort nor contract. Based at first only upon an express promise, it was afterwards supported upon an implied promise, and even upon a fictitious promise. Introduced as a special manifestion of the action on the case, it soon acquired the dignity of a distinct form of action, which superseded debt, became concurrent with account, with case upon a bailment, a warranty, and bills of exchange, and competed with equity in the case of the essentially equitable quasi-contracts growing out of the principle of unjust enrichment."

Notwithstanding the wide scope of the remedy so described, I think that it must be taken to have been given only, as I have already said, where the law could consistently impute to the defendant at least the fiction of a promise. And it appears to me that as matter of principle the law of England cannot now, consistently with the interpretation which the courts have placed on the statutes which determine the capacity of statutory societies, impute the fiction of such a promise where it would have been ultra vires to give it. The fiction becomes, in other words, inapplicable where substantive law, as distinguished from that of procedure, makes the defendant incapable of undertaking contractual liability. For to impute a fictitious promise is simply to presume the existence of a state of facts, and the presumption can give rise to no higher right than would result if the facts were actual.

I am, accordingly, of opinion that while the decisions of SIR WILLIAM PAGE WOOD and of the Irish Court of Appeal, to which I have referred, may possibly, notwithstanding that the issue of the policies was ultra vires, be supported on the ground that they related merely to the failure of consideration for the premiums paid (a question on which it is unnecessary for me to express any opinion) they cannot be invoked as authorities for the proposition that an action for money had and received would have lain in a case of borrowing ultra vires. It follows that the depositors in the present case will not succeed unless they are able to trace their money into the hands of the society or its agents as actually existing assets. The question is whether they are able to establish enough to succeed upon this footing. Their claim cannot be in personam and must be in rem, a claim to follow and recover property with which, in equity at all events, they had never really parted.

I proceed, therefore, to consider the case on this restricted footing. The evidence is very scanty, but it must be taken that the depositors' money was used on a large scale in acquiring the assets now in the liquidator's hands, for the value of these assets is far in excess of the contributions of the shareholders, and much of it can be due to the money of the depositors alone. The difficulty of establishing a title in rem in this case arises from the apparent difficulty of following money. In most cases money cannot be followed. When sovereigns or bank notes are paid over as currency, so far as the payer is concerned, they cease ipso facto to be the subjects of specific title as chattels. If a sovereign or bank note be offered in payment it is, under ordinary circumstances, no part of the duty of the person receiving it to inquire into title. The reason of this is that chattels of such a kind form part of what the law recognises as currency, and treats as passing from hand to hand in point, not merely of possession, but of property. It would cause great inconvenience to commerce if in this class of chattel an exception were not made to the general requirement of the law as to title. But the exception is not extended beyond the limits which necessity imposes. If money in a bag is stolen, and can be identified in the form in which it was stolen, it can be recovered in specie. Even if it has been expended by the person who has wrongfully taken it in purchasing some particular asset, that asset, if capable of being earmarked as purchased with the money, can be claimed by the true owner of the money. This is a principle not merely of equity but of the common law. It is explained in the judgment of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in Taylor v. Plummer (9), who pointed out that there was no reason why the doctrine that money could not be followed should apply to circumstances in which a broker had wrongfully invested money of his principal in purchasing securities into which it could be traced. The reason of this is plain. The broker could not in these circumstances set up as against his principal the rule which applies to what has been paid over as currency, that ordinarily transfer of possession is transfer of property. So long as the money which the principal has handed to his agent to be applied specifically, and not on a debtor and creditor account, can be traced into what has been procured with it, the principal can waive his right of action for damages for tort, and, affirming the proceeding of the broker, claim that his money is invested in a specific thing, which is his. But LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., laid down, as a limit to this proposition, that if the money had become incapable of being traced, as, for instance, when it had been paid into the broker's general account with his bankers, the principal had no remedy excepting to prove as a creditor for money had and received. The explanation was, of course, that a relation of debtor and creditor had arisen between the banker and his client, the broker, which precluded the notion of following the money.

That seems to be, so far as the doctrine of the common law is concerned, the limit to which the exception to the rule about currency was carried—whether the case be that of a thief or of a fraudulent broker, or of money paid under mistake of fact, you can, even at law, follow, but only so long as the relation of debtor and creditor has not superseded the right in rem. This is well put by BRAMWELL, L.J., in Ex parte Cooke (10), who explains why the principal in Taylor v. Plummer (9) could claim the money (4 Ch.D. at p. 128):

> "Because the money was paid to the broker, not as trustee in the strict sense of the word, so that no action at law could be maintained against him, and he would only be liable to have a bill filed against him, but was handed to him in a fiduciary character, so as not to create the mere relation of debtor and creditor between him and his principal."

THESIGER, L.J., in Re Hallett's Estate (3), states the principle in other words, but to the same effect (13 Ch.D. at pp. 723, 724):

> "All cases where it has been held that moneys mixed and confounded, but still existing in a mass, cannot be followed, may, I think, be resolved into cases where, although there may have been a trust with reference to the disposition of the particular chattel which those moneys subsequently represented, there was no trust, no duty, in reference to the moneys themselves beyond the ordinary duty of a man to pay his debts—in other words, that they were cases where the relationship of debtor and creditor had been constituted, instead of the relation either of trustee and cestui que trust, or of principal and agent."

It is, in my opinion, impossible to confine the right at law to follow to cases where there was a fiduciary relationship. The principle appears to me to cover all cases where the property in the money has not passed, and the money itself can be earmarked in the hands of the person who has wrongfully obtained it. A person standing in a fiduciary relation may be in this position, but it is not because of his trust or fiduciary duty. The common law, which we are now considering, did not take cognisance of such duties. It looked simply to the question whether the property had passed, and if it had not, for instance, where no relationship of debtor and creditor had intervened, the money could be followed, notwithstanding its normal character as currency, provided it could be earmarked or traced into assets acquired with it. And this appears to me to be, on ground of principle, as true of money paid under mistake of fact or on an ultra vires contract, under which no property could pass or relation of debtor be constituted, as it is true in the case of a broker or bailee.

But while the common law gave the remedy I have stated, it gave no remedy when the money had been paid by the wrongdoer into his account with his banker, who simply owed him a debt, so that no money was or could be, in the contemplation of a court of law, earmarked. Here equity which had so far exercised a concurrent jurisdiction based upon trust, gave a further remedy. The Court of Chancery could and would declare, even as against the general creditors of the wrongdoer, that there was what it called a charge on the banker's debt to the person whose money had been paid into the latter's bank account in favour of the person whose money it really was. And, as JESSEL, M.R., pointed out in Re Hallett's Estate (3), this equity was not confined to cases of trust in the strict sense, but applied, at all events, to every case where there was a fiduciary relationship. It was, as I think, merely an additional right, which could be enforced by the Court of Chancery in the exercise of its auxiliary jurisdiction, wherever money was held to belong in equity to the plaintiff. If so, subject to certain qualifications which I shall presently make, I see no reason why the remedy explained by JESSEL, M.R., in Re Hallett's Estate (3) of declaring a charge on the investment in a debt due from bankers on balance, or on any mass of money or securities with which the plaintiff's money had been mixed, should not apply in the case of a transaction that is ultra vires. The property was never converted into a debt, in equity at all events, and there has been throughout a resulting trust, not of an active character, but sufficient, in my opinion, to bring the transaction within the general principle.

There was another point which was decided in Re Hallett's Estate (3). JESSEL, M.R., and BAGGALLAY, L.J., held that the rule in Clayton's Case (11) did not apply so as to determine by reference to dates the appropriations of cheques drawn on the bank account, inasmuch as they considered that a person standing in a fiduciary relationship must be taken to have intended to draw cheques for his own purposes only on so much of the balance as was his. On this second point THESIGER, L.J., dissented from the majority. He thought that he was bound by the decision in Pennell v. Deffell (12) and the subsequent authorities which had followed it. He said (13 Ch.D. at p. 752):

> "Equity has gone very far in aid of trust creditors when it holds that they may follow and obtain, in priority to general creditors, moneys paid to a banker, and therefore no longer existing in specie as moneys numbered and earmarked, but converted into a debt, and it may be that the distinguished judges I have referred to may have thought that equity had gone far enough, and that in the absence of express appropriation, the general rule of appropriation of payments in and out of a banker's account should apply to that debt when forming part of a larger debt, made up as to the rest of moneys, not trust moneys, paid into the bank."

As all the outside creditors have been paid off by consent, we have not in the appeal before the House to consider the decision in Re Hallett's Estate (3) on this second point. I do not desire to be taken as indicating any opinion on a question which is not before us, and to which I have only referred for the purpose of making this clear.

I now proceed to apply these conclusions to the case we have to deal with. I must begin by pointing out that the circumstances here are in material points different from those in Re Hallett's Estate (3). There the agent had in breach of his duty paid the money of his principal into his bank, so that it formed part of a general debt due to him on current account with the bankers. It was held that the money of the principal must be paid to him out of the debt so due. To call the right of the principal a charge on the debt, as JESSEL, M.R., did, was only to express compendiously, but somewhat loosely, that the indebtedness was for a single sum of which the amount of the principal's money formed an integral part, and that the agent could not draw on account of the single sum, in which he had improperly mixed his own funds with the money of his principal, until he had made good the amount of that money. For the purpose of the question before us the really relevant part of the judgment in Re Hallett's Estate (3) is that which shows how the difficulty of following money into a debtor and creditor account like a banker's is got over in equity. The loan to the bankers was regarded as an investment pro tanto of the principal's money, and the latter was treated as entitled to waive the breach of duty by his agent, and to claim the investment to the extent of the amount due to him as made on his behalf. The agent could not set up that any part of the money in the bank was his until he had made good his breach of duty, and in that sense there was a charge. In the present case the investment was not made in breach of a fiduciary duty on the part of the society, and it was actually made with the authority of the depositors, although on the supposition that a banking business was ultra vires. What was a material point in Re Hallett's Estate (3), therefore, does not occur here. No doubt it was ultra vires of the society to undertake to repay the money. But it was none the less intended that in consideration of giving such an undertaking the society should be entitled to deal with it freely as its own. The consideration failed and the depositors had the right to follow the money so far as invalidly borrowed into the assets in which it had been invested, whether these assets were mere debts due to the society or ordinary securities, but that was their only right. As to the part of the assets which was acquired with money paid by the shareholders, the case appears to me to be free from difficulty. The money paid to the society by the shareholders was paid as the consideration for the shares which were issued to them. That money, therefore, beyond question, became the money of the society. A large part of it has probably been applied ultra vires in the acquisition of the assets of the banking business. These assets can accordingly be claimed only by the society itself as belonging to it, and the shareholders have no direct title to them.

The total mass of assets which the liquidator has to distribute thus represents in part money which the depositors are entitled to follow and in part money which the society is entitled to follow. If the present value of these assets was equivalent to the total amount of such money, there would be no difficulty; the assets would be apportioned according to the sources from which they came. Does it make a difference that the value has shrunk so that the two sets of claimants cannot be paid in full? I do not think so. The position of the society is different from that of the agent in Re Hallett's Estate (3). The depositors have no alternative right in this case to disaffirm the transaction to the extent of claiming on the footing that their money has been applied in breach of trust. All they can do is to adopt the dealing with the money that they handed over, under circumstances in which it never really ceased to be theirs, and claim the part of the mass of assets which represents it as belonging to them in equity. There has been no breach of fiduciary duty on the part of the society, and it appears to me that this circumstance is material in distinguishing the consequences here from those which followed in Re Hallett's Estate (3) on the footing that there the agent could not gain, at the expense of the principal, an advantage for himself or his general creditors by in effect setting up a breach of duty. The depositors can, in my opinion, only claim the depreciated assets which represent their money, and nothing more. It follows that the principle to be adopted in the distribution must be apportionment on the footing that depreciation and loss are to be borne pro rata. I am of course assuming in saying this that specific tracing is not now possible.

What is there must be apportioned accordingly among those whose money it represents, and the question of how the apportionment should be made is one of fact. In the present case the working out of a proper apportionment based on the principle of tracing not only would involve immense labour, but would be unlikely to end in any reliable result. The records necessary for tracing the dealings with the funds do not exist. We have, therefore, treating the question as one of presumption of fact, to give such a direction to the liquidator as is calculated to bring about a result consistent with the principles already laid down. I think that this direction should be that, without disturbing anything that has up to now been settled or agreed, he should apportion the entirety of the remaining assets (including mortgages and loans) between the depositors and the shareholders in proportion to the amounts paid by the depositors and by the shareholders respectively. In this way I am of opinion that the nearest approach practicable to substantial justice will be done. I think that this is the utmost extent to which, consistently with well-established principles, a court of justice can go in compelling the society to restore that of which it has become possessed through its ultra vires transactions. In his dissenting judgment in the Court of Appeal, FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., proposed to go further, and to apply the assets in paying the depositors before the shareholders received anything. For reasons which result from what I have already stated, I think that to do this would really be inconsistent with settled law as to the effect of ultra vires transactions. What I propose is, I think, not at variance with what this House actually decided in Murray v. Scott (1) and in such cases as Cunliffe Brooks & Co. v. Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society (14), and Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Co. (13). It is not the method of distribution directed in Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (1), where the Court of Appeal said that not only the creditors of the society, but the unadvanced members, must be paid in the first instance, and the balance only divided among the lenders from whom advances had been obtained without legal authority. But I do not think that the decision there upon this point can be upheld unless on the facts in that case no reliable attempt to trace was held to be possible. If such presumptions as to the sources of the assets could have been made, as I think must be made, in the present case, the method of distribution adopted would not have been justifiable on the assumption that the principle I have stated is the right one. There is much force in the criticism of the judgments in that case, made by FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., and by BUCKLEY, L.J., in the present case. The reasoning implied in those judgments appears to me to have been pushed to an extent which, unless carefully qualified, establishes, not its conclusion, but either too much or too little. The agents of the society in the present case, unlike the Guardian Society, have acted ultra vires in the application not only of the depositors' but of the society's own money, by lending it to customers with whom it dealt as a banker, and in investing it in securities for banking purposes. And we are not dealing with any question in which the shareholders are seeking to claim against the society on a footing inconsistent with their true contract as quasi partners. It is in their case, as in that of the depositors', a question only of a right to follow, and in a distribution by a liquidator based on this principle I see no reason why either set of claimants should have priority over the other. The contest does not arise between shareholders as such and creditors of the society. It arises between persons, each of whom claims that, so far as the point at present in dispute is concerned, certain moneys were his, and never ceased to be his, and are now represented by specific assets.

The only authorities to which I wish to make further reference specifically are Cunliffe Brooks & Co. v. Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society (14), which I have already mentioned, and the subsequent decision in Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society v. Cunliffe Brooks & Co. (2). In the first of these cases this House laid down the principle, affirming the Court of Appeal, that where securities had been deposited with bankers for overdrafts which were ultra vires, the bankers could not hold the securities. That seems to have been obviously right on the facts before the House. In the subsequent case the Court of Appeal took a further step, and held that the liquidator could recover from the bankers moneys paid to them by the society and applied in discharge of the money which they had lent to it by way of overdraft and so lent ultra vires. I think that decision, which was not brought before this House for review, was wrong, under the circumstances of the case, in the absence of proof by the society, who by the fact of repayment had made an admission to the contrary effect, that the money advanced by the bankers had been lost, and could not be treated as charged. The society ought, in my opinion, to have been regarded, in the absence of evidence to this effect, as having simply returned to the bankers the latter's own money. For the same reason I entertain considerable doubt whether Ex parte Watson (15) was rightly decided. I have examined the other authorities cited by the learned counsel on both sides in the course of the argument, but except in so far as I have already referred to these authorities I do not think it necessary to comment on them. For it is only on the points which I have mentioned that I find anything in what I am about to propose that is not really in harmony with them. I move that the judgments of the court below be varied so as to give effect to a declaration, subject to matters which have already been settled by the consent of the parties, and subject to any application which may be made by any individual depositors or shareholders with a view of tracing his own money into any particular asset, and subject to the payment of all proper costs, charges, and expenses, the liquidator ought to proceed in distributing the remaining assets of the society between the depositors and the unadvanced shareholders on the principle of distributing them pari passu in proportion to the amounts properly credited to them respectively in the books of the society in respect of their advances at the date of the commencement of the winding-up, and that the case be remitted to the court of first instance to apply this principle. As the appeal is one of an unusual character, and the litigation was essential for ascertaining the rights of all parties, I think we should not disturb the orders of the courts below in regard to costs, and that the costs of all parties to this appeal should be paid out of the assets on the same footing as in the court below.

LORD DUNEDIN.—The Birkbeck Permanent Benefit Building Society, established in 1851 under the Building Societies Act, 1836, and having for its proper object the usual purposes of a building society, started and developed a banking business. On June 20, 1911, a winding-up order was pronounced. The outside creditors, to use a convenient term, were inconsiderable in number and value, and have been paid. There remains the claims of the bank customers or depositors and the shareholders. The exact figures are not available, but an approximate idea may be gathered from the balance-sheet of Mar. 31, 1910, from which it appears that in rough figures, the claims of the shareholders represented a little over one million pounds, those of the depositors ten and three-quarter millions. The shareholders are divided into two classes, A and B. The A shareholders made an arrangement with the depositors, and, accordingly, no question arises in respect of them. The B shareholders elected to stand on their legal rights. For the purposes of this case it is enough to describe the B shareholders in the terms which have become familiar through cases decided in your Lordships' House as unadvanced shareholders, who had not at the date of the winding-up given notice of withdrawal. On June 30, 1911, the liquidator by summons directed against persons representative of each class of claimants, asked for directions from the court as to how the assets were to be applied. The assets were not sufficient to pay all claimants in full, but they were more than sufficient to pay the outside creditors and the shareholders. This summons after certain amendments was finally disposed of by an order of NEVILLE, J., of Nov. 6, 1911. By this time the arrangement already mentioned between the A shareholders and the depositors had been come to. The order ranked the claimants and directed the assets of the society to be distributed as follows:—(i) Costs of winding-up, including costs of scheme of arrangement between A shareholders and depositors. (ii) Payment of outside creditors. (iii) Payment to unadvanced members of all sums due, including interest and bonus. (iv) Balance to depositors in proportion to sums at their credit. This order has the effect, so far as the B shareholders are concerned, of paying them in full. Against this order an appeal was taken, and the order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., dissenting. Appeal has now been taken to your Lordships' House.

I do not propose to occupy your Lordships' time by discussing the question whether the accepting of the depositors' money on a contract to repay was ultra vires. I think it clearly was ultra vires, and I agree with the learned judges of the Court of Appeal in the reasons they give for so holding. The order as made is admittedly made on the authority of the order made by the Court of Appeal in Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (1). In itself the order obtains but scant praise from the learned judges who felt bound to pronounce it. The Master of the Rolls says that the Guardian order is binding upon him, but adds ([1912] 2 Ch. at p. 209):

> "I feel a difficulty in discovering the principle on which it was based. It seems to me a rough and ready tracing judgment, illogical, but possessing the merit of attempting to do partial justice to the lenders."

BUCKLEY, L.J., explains this illogicality in a very pertinent passage which I need not quote. Apart from the fact that the Guardian order was framed by eminent judges—SIR GEORGE JESSEL, COTTON, and BOWEN, L.JJ.—it seems to me that its authority is somewhat scant, and, in particular, that there is no possibility of saying it has in any way received the approval of your Lordships' House.

I should like to make this clear by a brief examination of that case. There were two sets of questions—one as to the position of the lenders of money, the other as to the position of certain paid-up preference shareholders who had taken shares under a certain r. 32 of the society. The society in that case had by its rules a power to borrow without any limit as to extent. The Court of Appeal held that a power to borrow without limitation as to amount was ultra vires; that consequently the lender of money had no legal or equitable claim of debt against the society; and they then made the order in question. As in question with the other shareholders they admitted the claim of the preference shareholders, but this—although valuable from another point of view in the discussion of these matters—is for the moment beside the question. The ranking under the order, therefore, was—first, outside creditors; second, shareholders; third, balance to lenders of money. The case was taken to your Lordships' House on two points—by the lenders of money as against the order postponing them, and by the ordinary shareholders as against the preference shareholders. Their Lordships in this House held that the Court of Appeal was wrong in holding that a power to borrow was ultra vires because unlimited, and, no question being raised as to the borrowing having been for anything but legitimate objects of the society, the result was that the lenders became ordinary creditors, and as such ranked before all shareholders. As regards the preference shareholders, they affirmed the Court of Appeal. It appears plainly from this that the result of this was entirely to sweep away the order—not upon an expressed opinion that the order was itself wrong, but because it affirmed the true facts to be such as to make the order inapplicable to the facts of the case. Consequently this House had really no opportunity of considering whether the order itself was right.

It was strenuously contended, however, at your Lordships' Bar, that the Guardian order was at least inferentially approved by the House in the subsequent, but nearly contemporaneous, case of Cunliffe Brooks & Co. v. Blackburn and District

Benefit Building Society (14). This is, I think, a misconception of the case. In that case a bank had made advances to the society upon deposit of securities as in ordinary bankers' practice, the securities being held by the bank to meet the overdraft. The suit was one at the instance of the liquidator of the society to recover the securities. The Court of Appeal held that the overdraft was a borrowing and was ultra vires, but said that if the bank could show that the moneys paid upon the overdraft, or any part of them, could be shown to have been expended in paying the just debts of the society, the bank would pro tanto be entitled to the benefit of the securities. The bank appealed. The liquidator presented no cross-appeal. This House held that the decision of the Court of Appeal was right in so far as it held that an overdraft was a borrowing and was ultra vires, with the resulting consequence that the bank could not hold the securities in respect in contract. As regards the equity which was conceded to them by the order, they pointed out that no appeal was made against that order. Now, it will be observed that this case dealt with the retention of the securities alone, and the moment that contract was gone the right to the securities was gone, for to hold them it was necessary to hold them against all the world, i.e., against the ordinary creditors of the society. But the question was not raised, and could not be raised in that litigation, of what would be the fate of a claim at the instance of the bank against the general funds in the liquidation, and if that claim was made, what would be its ranking or position as in a question with shareholders. This is clear from the mere statement of the case. But it was clearly seen by LORD WATSON, who in the course of his judgment expressed himself as follows (9 App. Cas. at p. 871):

> "It it were possible in the present suit, to determine the whole questions which have arisen, or may yet arise, between the parties in regard to these advances by way of overdraft, your Lordships would have many important questions to consider. But the sole object of these proceedings at the instance of the liquidators is to recover certain assets of the society, which are held by the appellants, in security of the advances made by them."

I, therefore, come to the conclusion that not only is the Guardian order not binding on this House, but that it does not bear with it any evidence that the question in its broad aspect was very carefully argued.

Now, I think it is clear that all ideas of natural justice are against allowing A. to keep the property of B., which has somehow got into A.'s possession without any intention on the part of B. to make a gift to A. Where there is contract the solution is according to the contract, or you might say the position truly does not arise. Such are the cases of a bailment of a chattel or of a loan of money. But there are many cases where the position does arise and where there is no contract. The case of a chattel is easy. A shopkeeper delivers an article at the house of B. in mistake for the house of A. An action would lie against B. for restitution. Such an action could easily be founded on the right of property. To use the Roman phraseology, there would be a jus in re. And where there was a jus in re there would not be, I take it, any difficulty in finding a form of common law action to fit the situation. But the moment you come to deal with what is called a fungible [a movable effect which perishes by being used and which is estimated by weight, number and measure], and especially when you deal with money, then the jus in re may disappear, and with it the appropriateness of such common law action. The familiar case is the paying of money by A. to B. under the mistaken impression in fact that a debt was due, when in truth there was no debt due. It was to fit cases of this sort that the common law evolved the action for money had and received. I think one cannot help feeling that this action was truly the putting of an equitable doctrine under a legal form. I am using the word equitable in a non-technical sense, for I am not suggesting for a moment that the action was borrowed from technical equity. My noble and learned friend LORD SUMNER, in his opinion, which I have had the advantage of seeing, has conclusively shown that it was not. But being a legal form, it does not admit, in spite of Lord Mansfield's dictum that such an action was very beneficial and to be encouraged, of being stretched beyond its capacity. What concerns my view, however, is only this, that it is a contrivance which is introduced to meet an equitable idea, which idea is a wider idea than that expressed by the proposition that when there is a jus in re an action will lie, and when there is not such a jus it will not. This follows from the undoubted fact that where money is in question under modern conditions (by which I mean not put into bags or a stocking), there never will be a jus in re, there can at most be only a jus ad rem.

Viewing, as I do, the equity as based on inherent ideas of justice, it is, I think, very instructive to see how it is dealt with in other systems. I, therefore, make no apology for going to the Roman law, not as an authority, for such it is not, but as instructive as to how these matters may be dealt with, and as suggestive, as I shall afterwards show, as to the true answer to the difficulties of the present case. The English common law has various actions which, under a classification which I understand to be really one of modern growth, are divided into actions in respect of contract and of tort. But in the Roman law the actions covering the same field are actions ex contractu and quasi ex contractu, action ex delicto and quasi ex delicto. The class we are dealing with are obviously actions quasi ex contractu. Accordingly we find in the case of a chattel that while the actio commodati covered the case where there was a contract, i.e., a bailment, there was also an actio utilis where there was no contract. And coming to the case of money, while mutuum was proper loan pro-mutuum covered the cases where money was had and received without contract, and a special form of action for the common case of the payment of a supposed but non-existing debt was known as condictio indebiti. Now, the English law having no quasi contract, got over the difficulty in such cases as the action for money had and received by the fiction of a contract. It is, I think, obvious that the distinction between the fiction of a real contract on the one hand, and the existence of a quasi contract on the other, is a distinction of a most metaphysical description. Both systems, at any rate in the case of money paid under a mistake in fact, recognise the obligation to repay where there is no jus in re. Both systems, I think, recognise the equitable rule, and proceed to carry it out according to the forms of their own development. Now, that there is an obligation to restore, binding the defendant to pay in an action for money had and received, does not, I think, admit of doubt. The result is that it is a real debt, and as such entitled to take its place along with the debts of all proper creditors. To put an example. Suppose a sum of money was paid by A. to the credit of B. at his bankers, under the mistaken idea that a debt was due. Suppose that the next day, before A. had discovered the mistake, B. drew out the whole balance at his credit and spent the cash, and went bankrupt the same day. Can it be doubted that A. would have a claim in B.'s bankruptcy which would rank equally with all B.'s ordinary creditors?

Up to this time I have been putting cases where the recipient of the money does not receive it under an ultra vires contract. Let me now examine the position where the money is received under a contract to repay and where that contract is found to be ultra vires. That there can be no resulting proper contractual obligation is clear from the decisions of this House in Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche (6) and Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Co. (15). It is here that the difficulty comes in in extending the action for money had and received to such a case. For, in the first place, if that action lay it would have the effect of bringing in A., who has, ex hypothesi, no binding contract to urge against B., pari passu with the ordinary creditors of B. who have got binding contracts; and in the second, how is it possible to say that there is a fictional contract which is binding in circumstances in which a real contract is not binding? I confess that for a person not bred to the common law to express an opinion as to the true meaning and extent of common law actions is to handle periculosae plenum opus aleae.

But to the best of my comprehension, and notwithstanding Re Phœnix Life Assurance Co. (4), I have come to the conclusion that the action for money had and received cannot be stretched to meet the situation.

It is not, however, necessary that the claim should be one capable of being made good by action at law. It will suffice if there is an equitable remedy. Precisely the same difficulty was felt and met in the Roman law. True, there was then no doctrine of ultra vires in the modern sense of the word. But after all the only effect of the doctrine of ultra vires is to render contracts which are ultra vires a nullity. You cannot have more than a nullity, and such a nullity was equally found in the Roman law in the case of the contracts of pupils, who were totally incapable of contracting. Now, the Roman law met the situation by recognising that there was the super-eminent equity with which I started, and proceeded to apply it, while giving full effect to the doctrine of there being no contract. The super-eminent equity was expressed by the Roman jurists in the brocard nemo debet locupletari jactura aliena. When, therefore, the advance was made to the pupil, there was no longer, as in the case of the ordinary person, an obligation to restore—a debt taking its place along with other debts—but the pupil was bound to give up in quantum locupletior; that is to say, to give up the superfluity which he was possessing. But only a superfluity—that is to say, something which if he kept would be pure gain to him. I cite authority for what I have said:

> "Dig. 13.6. Commodati vel contra:—1 (ULPIAN). Impuberes commodati actione non tenentur quoniam nec constitit commodatum in pupilli persona sine tutoris auctoritate usque adeo, ut, etiamis pubes factus dolum aut culpam admiserit, hac actione non tenetur, quia ab initio non constitit."

Cf. the doctrine that an ultra vires contract of a company cannot be ratified even by all the members.

> "3. (ULPIAN). Sed mihi videtur, si locupletior pupillus factus sit dandam utilem commodati actionem secundum divi Pii rescriptum. Dig. 26.8. De auctoritate et consensu tutorum et curatorm:—5 (ULPIAN). Pupillus obligari tutori eo auctore non potest. . . . Sed et cum tutor mutuam pecuniam pupillo dederit vel ab eo stipuletur, non erit obligatus tutori. Naturaliter tamen obligabitur in quantum locupletior factus est: nam in pupillum non tantum tutori verum cuivis actionem in quantum locupletior factus est, dandam divus Pius rescripsit."

POTHIER, the great French jurist, took the same kind of view. In his "TRAITÉ DES OBLIGATIONS," after dealing with contracts, he goes on to consider "Des autres causes des obligations," and he puts first in this category quasi contracts. On these he comments as follows:

> "Section 114. Dans les contrats, c'est le consentement des parties contractantes qui produit l'obligation: dans les quasi contrats il n'intervient aucun consentement, et c'est la loi seule ou l'équité naturelle qui produit l'obligation en rendant obligatoire le fait d'où elle résulte. 115. Toutes personnes, même les enfants et les insensés, qui ne sont pas capables de consentement, peuvent par le quasi contrat qui résulte d'un fait d'un autre être obligées envers lui et l'obliger envers elles; car ce n'est pas le consentement qui forme ces obligations, et elles se contractent par le fait d'un autre, sans aucun fait de notre part."

I have made these citations to show that other great systems of law have not been unable to solve the problem arising where the equity of restitution comes in contact with the doctrine of nullity of contract.

Is English equity to retire defeated from the task which other systems of equity have conquered? Let us for a moment examine what the argument on the other side is. There being no contract, it is impossible, it is said, to have any obligation on the part of the society to restore what it has taken from the depositors. The only right of the despositors is a right to vindicate property; or, in other words, when you have a jus in re you can enforce it, but if the thing has so disappeared that a jus in re is no longer to be found (and this must practically always be so in the case of money), then your remedy is gone. The sole relief which equity can give is that if you can show that your money has paid a just debt, in which case you shall have action. This comes to this, that having got hold of property which does not belong to you, if only you are wise or lucky enough to change its form you may enjoy the proceeds unmolested. Such a plea on the face of it seems only worthy of the Pharisee who shook himself free of his natural obligations by saying Corban. In the words of technical equity it is unconscionable. The appalling result in this very case would be that the society shareholders having got proceeds of the depositors' money in the form of investment, so that each individual depositor is utterly unable to trace his money, are enriched to the extent of some 500 per cent. I am aware that the order under review shrinking from that result provides that when the shareholders get 20s. in the pound the rest may go to the depositors. But as to that there is, to my mind, no possible answer to the terse and inexorable logic of BUCKLEY, L.J. Even as it is the result is that illegitimate banking guarantees the shareholders 20s. in the pound. But further, the whole strength of this argument lies in the idea that the jus in re represents the depositors' only right: that there can be no obligation on the other side at all. It is here that I think the importance of the action for money had and received comes in. That cannot be founded on a jus in re, for you cannot have a jus in re in currency. It shows that both an action founded on a jus in re, such as an action to get back a specific chattel, and an action for money had and received are just different forms of working out the higher equity that no one has a right to keep either property or the proceeds of property which does not belong to him.

It is the case that the common law, as I have already said, works by means of a fiction which becomes inapplicable when the money has been received under an ultra vires contract. All, therefore, that is left to it is to vindicate in forma specifica, and its forms of action fail when the thing can no longer be identified. Equity—I am now speaking of technical equity—has already found itself able, in the exercise of its auxiliary jurisdiction, as the respondents admit, to deal with the situation when the money has gone to pay a just debt. Is its action limited to that situation? I think not. I think it can always, in the exercise of the same jurisdiction, help the common law by tracing, and can say that if the proceeds of property can be shown to be what I have called a superfluity in the person of the recipient, then it will hold that that property is traced just as surely as if it was still in the original form. To do this is to give full effect to the doctrine of ultra vires—for the party receiving is not ordered to pay as a debt the equivalent of what he originally got, but ordered merely to surrender what he still has as a superfluity, an enrichment which, but for the original reception of the money, he would have been without.

It, therefore, in each case becomes a question of evidence. Now, that the society, in the present case, has got a superfluity is obvious. The assets, shrunk as they are owing to the fall in the value of investments, are still far beyond all moneys contributed by the shareholders. But what is the measure of the superfluity? The outside creditors here were actually paid, because their claims were inconsiderable. In my judgment, they were rightly paid, under the circumstances of the actual case, and had they not been, they would stand, after expenses of the liquidation, as first in the ranking. For, in a question with shareholders, we are told that they were debts of a character which the directors had a power to make. And in a question with the depositors, they were incurred in a business, illegally carried on no doubt, as for the society, but yet one which the depositors had been willing that the directors should carry on. Now, what is the position of the shareholders? I take it to be clear that the shareholders are not creditors of the society, but are merely the persons who are entitled on a winding-up to share the assets of the society among them. This is, I think, quite settled by the decision of your Lordship's House in Walton v. Edge (17), where an unadvanced member who had given notice of withdrawal was held entitled in the liquidation to be paid in full before his fellow unadvanced members who had given no such notice. The position, therefore, comes to this. The shareholders are entitled to share among them the proper assets of the society. But they are not entitled to be made rich at the expense of the depositors by swelling the assets of the society by means of the proceeds of moneys which they themselves never contributed. There is a mixed mass of assets as to the precise composition of which as to source it is impossible to pronounce. Had the assets never shrunk there would be enough to pay both in full. But they have shrunk, and someone must bear the loss. Now, there are certain situations, of which Re Hallett's Estate (3) is an example, where the one sharing party has a right to say to the other: It is not in your mouth to say that the assets are not all mine, to the extent of my full claim. I do not think this is one of those positions. Neither party is here in any fiduciary position to the other. It is a mere question of evidence. What has happened is truly this. The directors of the society have taken the moneys of the shareholders which they had a right to receive, and the moneys of the depositors which they had not, and mixed them so that they cannot be discriminated from each other, and have put them, so to speak, in the society's strong box, where the mixed mass is found by the liquidator. It is here, and here only, that I differ from my noble and learned friend, LORD MOULTON, in his dissenting judgment in the court below—a judgment which really follows the extremely able judgment of BRISTOWE, V.-C., of the County Palatine Court of Lancaster, in Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (sub nom. Crace-Calvert's Case) (1). There being no direct evidence, the only equitable means is to let each party bear the shrinkage proportionately to the amount originally contributed, and this is the judgment of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, in which I concur.

I wish to remark, in conclusion, that it sems to me that this line of reasoning gives full effect to the doctrine of ultra vires, even in the somewhat rigid form in which it has been adopted by your Lordships' House in Ashbury Railway and Iron Co. v. Riche (16). To go further, as the respondents' argument seeks to do, is, I think, to run the doctrine mad. It was a doctrine which was introduced in order to let societies keep their own money, not to appropriate other people's. I have dealt with the whole matter rather on principle than on authority. But I ought to say that I concur with the LORD CHANCELLOR in thinking that Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society v. Cunliffe Brooks & Co. (2) was wrongly decided, and for the reason he gives; and that I agree with FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in thinking that the decision of this House in Murray v. Scott (1) being the second question in Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (1) is really an affirmation of the principle that there may be an equity when there is no contract, for the contract under which the £30 shares were issued before the amendment of r. 32 was made was null and void, the rule not having been certified by the certifying barrister.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—The Birkbeck Permanent Benefit Building Society is an association formed under and regulated by the Building Societies Act, 1836. It is not incorporated, but acts through its directors, and acquires and holds property in the names of the trustees. Its objects are defined by its rules, and do not, and, indeed, having regard to the statute, could not, properly include the carrying on of the business of bankers. It was, therefore, ultra vires for the society to carry on a banking business. Nevertheless, for many years prior to its liquidation its directors and agents, affecting to act on its behalf, had carried on an extensive banking business, popularly known as the Birkbeck Bank, and in the course of such business had received many millions of pounds on deposit or current account. Moneys so received are in contemplation of law borrowed moneys, and although the society had under its rules power to borrow for the purposes of its legitimate business, it, of course, had no power to borrow for the purposes which were ultra vires. It is reasonably clear, having regard to the documents in evidence, that all those persons from whom the directors and agents of the society received money on deposit or current account must have been aware that the borrowing thus constituted was borrowing in the normal course and for the purposes of a banking business, and not for the legitimate purposes of the society. None of such persons, therefore, can rely on the borrowing powers conferred by the society's rules.

It has been settled in Re National Permanent Benefit Building Society (18), Cunliffe Brooks & Co. v. Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society (14), and Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Co. (13), that an ultra vires borrowing by persons affecting to act on behalf of a company or other statutory association does not give rise to any indebtedness either at law or in equity on the part of such company or association. It is not, therefore, open to the House to hold that in such a case the lender has an action against the company or association for money had and received. To do so would in effect validate the transaction so far as it embodied a contract to repay the money lent. The implied promise on which the action for money had and received is based would be precisely that promise which the company or association could not lawfully make. At the same time there seems to be nothing in those decisions which would bind the House if they were considering whether an action would lie in law or in equity to recover money paid under any ultra vires contract which was not a contract of borrowing—for example, money paid to a company or association for the purchase of land which the company had no power to sell and the sale of which was therefore void, or money paid to the company or association by way of subscription for shares which it had no power to issue. In such cases the implied promise on which the action for money had and received depends would form no part of, but would be merely collateral to, the ultra vires contract. It will, therefore, be well to postpone consideration of such cases as Re Phœnix Life Assurance Co. (4) and Flood v. Irish Provident Assurance Co. (5) till the question actually arises.

Accepting the principle that no action or suit lies at law or in equity to recover money lent to a company or association which has no power to borrow, the question remains whether the lender has any other remedies. On this point the result of the authorities may be stated as follows: First, it appears to be well settled that if the borrowed money be applied in paying off legitimate indebtedness of the company or association (whether the indebtedness be incurred before or after the money was borrowed), the lenders are entitled to rank as creditors of the company or association to the extent to which the money has been so applied. There appears to be some doubt whether this result is arrived at by treating the contract of loan as validated to the extent to which the borrowed money is so applied, on the ground that to this extent there is no increase in the indebtedness of the company or association, in which case, if the contract of loan involves a security for the money borrowed, the security would be validated to a like extent; or whether the better view is that the lenders are subrogated to the rights of the legitimate creditors who have been paid off: see Cunliffe Brooks & Co. v. Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society (14), Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Co. (13), and Wrexham, Mold and Connah's Quay Rail. Co. (19). It is still open to your Lordships' House to adopt either view, should the question actually come up for determination. Secondly, it appears to be also well settled that the lender in an ultra vires loan transaction has a right to what is known as a tracing order. A company or other statutory association cannot by itself or through an agent be party to an ultra vires act. If its directors or agents affecting to act on its behalf borrow money which it has no power to borrow, the money borrowed is in their hands the property of the lender. At law, therefore, the lender can recover the money, so long as he can identify it, and even if it has been employed in purchasing property, there may be cases in which, by ratifying the action of those who have so employed it, he may recover the property purchased.

Equity, however, treated the matter from a different standpoint. It considered that the relationship between the directors or agents and the lender was a fiduciary relationship, and that the money in their hands was for all practical purposes trust money. Starting from a personal equity, based on the consideration that it would be unconscionable for anyone who could not plead purchase for value without notice, to retain an advantage derived from the misapplication of trust money, it ended, as was so often the case, in creating what were in effect rights of property, though not recognised as such by the common law. The principle on which, and the extent to which, trust money can be followed in equity is discussed at length in Re Hallett's Estate (3) by SIR GEORGE JESSEL. He gives two instances. First, he supposes the case of property being purchased by means of trust money alone. In such a case the beneficiary may either take the property itself or claim a lien on it for the amount of the money expended in the purchase. Secondly, he supposes the case of the purchase having been made partly with the trust money and partly with money of the trustee. In such a case the beneficiary can only claim a charge on the property for the amount of the trust money expended in the purchase. The trustee is precluded by his own misconduct from asserting any interest in the property until such amount has been refunded. By the actual decision in the case, this principle was held applicable when the trust money had been paid into the trustee's banking account. I will add two further illustrations which have some bearing on the present case. Suppose the property is acquired by means of money, part of which belongs to one owner and part to another, the purchaser being in a fiduciary relationship to both. Clearly each owner has an equal equity. Each is entitled to a charge on the property for his own money, and neither can claim priority over the other. It follows that their charges must rank pari passu according to their respective amounts. Further, I think that as against the fiduciary agent they could by agreement claim to take the property itself, in which case they would become tenants in common in shares proportioned to amounts for which either could claim a charge. Suppose, again, that the fiduciary agent parts with the money to a third party who cannot plead purchase for value without notice, and that the third party invests it with money of his own in the purchase of property. If the third party had notice that the money was held in a fiduciary capacity, he would be in exactly the same position as the fiduciary agent, and could not, therefore, assert any interest in the property until the money misapplied had been refunded. But if he had no such notice this would not be the case. There would on his part be no misconduct at all. On the other hand, I cannot at present see why he should have any priority as against the property over the owner of the money which had, in fact, been misapplied.

It remains to mention Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (Crace-Calvert's Case) (1) which has in the present case been followed by NEVILLE, J., and the Court of Appeal. It is worth while to call attention to the facts of this case, which differ in some important particulars from the facts of the case your Lordships have to decide. There the society was, like the society in the present case, formed under and regulated by the Building Societies Act, 1836, and, according to the rules, had an unlimited power of borrowing money when required for its legitimate purposes. The Court of Appeal first decided that such an unlimited power to borrow was void, so that the society had in effect no power to borrow at all, a decision subsequently reversed in this House: Murray v. Scott (1). The directors of the society had affected to borrow money from various lenders, but no lender was able to prove that his money had gone in discharge of any legitimate indebtedness of the society, or to trace his money into any particular asset of the society. Part of it had been applied in paying off loans previously contracted and the remainder, together with the loans so paid off, had in some way or other been used for the legitimate purposes of the society and found its way into the society's assets. The society was in liquidation, and it was treated by SIR GEORGE JESSEL as fully established that its assets had been increased by and to a large though undefined extent represented the borrowed moneys. He therefore held that after paying thereout the costs of the liquidation and all debts and everything to which the members were entitled by way of return of capital, interest, and bonus, the surplus ought, "on the plainest possible principles of equity," to be returned to the people who advanced the money. No doubt at first sight it is difficult to be certain as to the principles of equity to which SIR GEORGE JESSEL referred. But I think the difficulty may be solved by disentangling the equity itself from the directions by means of which the court endeavoured to give effect to it. The equity lay in this, that it would be unconscionable for the society to retain the amount by which its assets had been increased by, and in fact still represented, the borrowed money. It would be inequitable for the society to take advantage of the misapplication by its agents of money belonging to others and held by them in a fiduciary capacity. In other words, it was the same equity as that on which a tracing order is based. I cannot, however, disguise from myself that the directions given by the court with the object of working out this equity are open to considerable criticism, at any rate if they be treated as proper to be given in every case, and not depending on the particular facts then before the court.

Suppose that when the moneys were advanced, the assets of the society were insufficient to pay the creditors of the society in full, or to pay anything to the contributories, but that by means of the ultra vires loans, such assets had at the date of the winding-up been so increased that both creditors and contributories could be paid in full, the creditors and contributories remaining the same. Would it be in accordance with equity and good conscience that these creditors or contributories should claim to be paid in full? I cannot think that it would. It seems to me that in equity and good conscience the amount of increase in the assets due to the ultra vires borrowings ought to be restored to the lenders. Neither creditors nor contributories ought in equity to be allowed to retain an advantage derived by reason of the misapplication by the society's agents of moneys which were in the position of trust moneys. Counsel sought to explain Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (Cracc-Calvert's Case) (1) in the following way. It was clear, they put it, that the money of the ultra vires lenders, or at any rate some part of it (the exact amount being unascertained), was in the mass of assets in the hands of the liquidator. If the legal claims of all persons having any possible claim on the assets were first satisfied, what then remained would clearly represent the borrowed money. This money would, in fact, be identified as the lenders' money, not by any positive evidence, but by a process of exclusion. This explanation fails in at least one important respect. The legal claims of the society's members were not confined to payments of the principal of their shares with interest and bonus. The members were legally entitled to all the assets, except such part thereof as the lenders could identify as belonging in equity to them, subject, of course, to the claims of the society's creditors. Logically, therefore, it would be impossible to arrive at what in equity belonged to the lenders by first satisfying the legal claims of the creditors and members. It was said that in Crace-Calvert's Case (1) there were admittedly no profits; but why, if this be assumed, should the members be entitled to interest or bonus? It seems to me that the actual directions given in that case must be considered merely as a rough and ready way of ascertaining in the particular case before the court the extent to which the assets had been increased by and represented this borrowed money, and not as capable of logical justification. If the court had, as it might have done, directed an inquiry on the point, material facts, not before the court, might have been disclosed. It might have been shown that the debts due to the ordinary creditors had really been incurred in preserving the bulk of assets in which the shareholders and ultra vires lenders were alike interested.

in which case it might be equitable that these debts should be first paid out of the fund. On the other hand, it might have been shown that these debts were incurred before the ultra vires borrowing, in which case I cannot at present see how the creditors could claim to be in a better position because of the ultra vires borrowing. And again, the true facts with regard to profits might have come out. The answer to the inquiry would have thus depended largely on the facts put in evidence. One question of principle only would, I think, have been involved. Could the society be considered as having itself been a party to any breach of fiduciary duty so as to preclude it from asserting any interest in the assets, until the ultra vires lenders had been fully repaid thereout? or was the society in the position of a person who had innocently received from a fiduciary agent money belonging to another and invested it with money of its own? My present opinion is that the first of these questions should be answered in the negative and the latter in the affirmative, in which case the society and ultra vires lenders would, as against the assets, rank pari passu and without any priority the one over the other. It is, however, unnecessary to decide this point, because the facts of Crace-Calvert's Case (1) are distinguishable from the facts of the case now before your Lordships.

It is important to observe that in Crace-Calvert's Case (1) the money was borrowed for and applied to the legitimate purposes of the society, the loan being ultra vires because the society, according to the Court of Appeal, had no power to borrow at all even for its legitimate purposes. In the present case the society had power to borrow for its legitimate purposes, and the borrowing in question is ultra vires only because, to the knowledge of the lenders, it was for a purpose not authorised by the society's constitution. This distinction is, I think, of considerable importance. In the first place, if the agents of a society, having power to borrow, borrow money intending, to the knowledge of the lenders, to apply it for an illegitimate purpose, but in fact apply it for the legitimate purposes of the society, there seems no reason, either in law or in equity, why the loan to the extent to which it is so utilised should not be treated as valid. In the next place, if the money be in fact utilised for the illegitimate purpose for which it is borrowed, say the carrying on of an ultra vires banking business, to whom does this business belong? Whose are the assets and whose are the liabilities? The society cannot be a party to any transaction or series of transactions not within its powers. The society, therefore, is neither entitled to the assets nor subject to the liabilities acquired or incurred in the business. No doubt, if the business is a financial success, the directors or agents who carried it on would have to account to the society for the profits or surplus assets, for equity will not allow a director or other agent to make a profit out of his directorship or agency. It is quite clear, however, that the society could not be entitled to anything except the profits or surplus. It could not claim to be entitled to the assets of the business, and exempt from its liabilities on any plea of ultra vires, and for this purpose the borrowed moneys would be a liability of the business. But suppose that the illegitimate business is carried on in part only with the borrowed money and in part with money belonging to the society. Even in this case the business will not belong to the society, nor will the society be entitled to its assets or subject to its liabilities, any more than it would have been the case if the only money employed in the business had been the borrowed money. Further, the society's right in equity to take the assets subject to the liabilities if the business were successful would be similarly unaffected. But the fact that the society's own money had been employed by its directors or agents in an ultra vires business would entitle the company to an additional equity. It would be entitled, on the principles of Re Hallett's Estate (3), to follow the money as long as it or any property acquired by its means could be identified. In other words, it would have exactly the same equities in this respect as the ultra vires lender, including the equity which in my opinion underlies Crace-Calvert's Case (1). It follows from this that it would be entitled to take or claim a lien on any assets of the business acquired exclusively with its money, and to a lien or charge on any asset or mass of assets acquired partly only with its money, subject nevertheless to this, that if the ultra vires lenders could establish a similar lien or charge, the two liens or charges would rank pari passu. Moreover, this right on the part of the society would not be affected by the question whether the business had been carried on at a profit or at a loss.

The present case is not quite so simple as the one I have supposed for this reason. The legitimate business of the society included the making of loans to members to enable them to acquire houses or land. Many such loans were, in fact, made, but it is impossible to say how far the money lent was the money of the society or the money of the ultra vires lenders. The question is whether these facts in any way affect the situation. Of course, if the society could trace its own money into any of these loans the security for the loan would undoubtedly belong to the society, but no such tracing appears to be possible. And again, if any ultra vires lender could trace his money into any of these loans, he would not only be entitled to the security, but might claim to be a secured creditor of the society on the ground that the ultra vires borrowing was validated by the use of the money for purposes for which there was a valid borrowing power in the society, but no ultra vires lender can so trace his money. There does not appear to be any presumption of law as to whose money was utilised for the purposes of those loans. Moreover, the directors treated the loans in question as part of the banking business and included them in the balance-sheet which was posted up in the bank premises and supplied to customers who asked for it. Under these circumstances I think the fact that those loans were within the legitimate purposes of the society cannot affect the situation in any way. The case, therefore, presents itself in this way: Here is a mass of assets arising in the course of an ultra vires business carried on by the directors and agents of the society. There are, on the other hand, liabilities, how or for what purpose incurred, is not in evidence. No one claims any interest in the assets except the ultra vires lenders, the members of the society and the creditors, in respect of the liabilities to which I have referred. The ultra vires lenders and the members are willing that these liabilities and the costs of the liquidation, which are in effect costs of administering the fund, shall be first paid. If this is done, what is left may be taken to represent in part the moneys of the ultra vires lenders and in part the moneys of the society wrongfully employed in the business. The equities of the ultra vires lenders and of the society are equal, and it follows that the remainder of the assets ought to be divided between the ultra vires lenders and the society rateably, according to the capital amount contributed by such lenders and the society respectively. This mode of distribution gives effect to all the equities of the parties, and there is in it nothing necessarily inconsistent with the decision in Crase-Calvert's Case (1), for there the business actually carried on was intra vires, and thus belonged to the society, except in so far as the ultra vires lenders could establish any equitable claim. It depends solely on the fact that the assets for distribution, being assets not for a legitimate, but an ultra vires business, are not the assets of the society except in so far as they can substantiate some equity to them, and that such equity as they have can arise only from an application of the same principle to which the ultra vires lenders are themselves entitled to have recourse.

There are two further points which arose in the course of the argument before your Lordships' House and which I desire to mention. In the first place, there is the decision of the Court of Appeal in Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society v. Cunliffe Brooks & Co. (2). Speaking for myself, I am by no means satisfied that a statutory company or association whose agents have borrowed money on its behalf, though it has no power to borrow, can in no circumstances repay the loan. It may well be that if the money does not come into the coffers of such company or association or, if so coming, it is subsequently lost, there may be no power of repayment. But if the money can be traced, or if the circumstances are such that if the society were in liquidation there would be an equity such as that to which effect was given in Crace-Calvert's Case (1), why should not the company or association repay the money so far as it represented by assets in their hands? As at present advised, I see no reason why it should not; nor, indeed, am I satisfied that the equity to which effect is being given in this case is necessarily confined to a liquidation. It is, however, unnecessary for your Lordships to decide these points. In the second place there is Murray v. Scott (1), which constitutes the basis of the dissenting judgment of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in the present case. With this judgment I find myself, in all respects except one, in substantial agreement. I agree that so far as the distributable assets represent the money of the ultra vires lenders they are not in equity the assets of the society. The distributable assets must be purged to this extent before it can be ascertained what in equity belongs to the society. The point on which I differ is this. Whereas FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., was of opinion that the amount to which the assets must be purged is the amount of the moneys lent, I think the true view is that the amount to which the assets must be purged is the amount only to which they have been increased by and still represent the borrowed money. It is only in this connection that Murray v. Scott (1) requires consideration. In that case the society had issued £30 preference shares which they had no power to issue, and received from the subscribers the full amount thereof. The society had subsequently obtained power to issue £1 preference shares and had accepted a surrender of each £30 preference share in consideration of the issue to the holder of thirty £1 preference shares. It was held that though the latter transaction could not stand at law, yet the society were in equity bound to treat the subscribers, either as holders of validly issued £1 preference shares or creditors for the amounts they had subscribed. It is clear that in either case they would, according to the actual decision in Crace-Calvert's Case (1), be paid before the ultra vires lenders got anything, so that the equity was not the Crace-Calvert equity. The equity is, in the judgments of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., and COTTON and BOWEN, L.JJ., based upon the misrepresentation of the society's agents in that they had printed in the rules of the society a clause expressly empowering the issue of £30 preference shares, though such clause had been disallowed by the barrister, and, therefore, did not in fact form part of such rules. The decision was affirmed by this House, SIR GEORGE JESSEL'S reasons being approved by LORD BLACKBURN. Now, undoubtedly if the agents of a society affect to borrow money in the course of a banking business, there is not only an express representation of authority, but an implied representation of (i) a power to borrow, and (ii) a power to borrow for banking purposes, for without such powers the authority could not be given. Yet the same judges had just decided Crace-Calvert's Case (1) and clearly did not intend to go back on their decision. I can hardly think they intended to base their decision on the particular manner in which the misrepresentation had been made. It seems to follow, therefore, that in the case of an ultra vires borrowing the nature of the transaction precluding, as it did, the creation of a debt at law or in equity, no such equity could, in their opinion, arise as that which they held to arise in Murray v. Scott (1), which was an ultra vires issue of shares. I doubt, therefore, whether Murray v. Scott (1) can be relied on as any authority in the present case, and, if so relied on, it is contrary to Crace-Calvert's Case (1) and other cases which decide that no debt can arise out of an ultra vires borrowing. It is to be observed that COTTON, L.J., refers to the equity as arising not only if the ultra vires transaction is brought about by the misrepresentation, but if it be brought about by "the carelessness or otherwise" of the company's agents. In other words, he seems to me to be dealing with it simply as a case of total failure of consideration from whatever cause. I am not satisfied that total failure of consideration would not have afforded ample ground for the actual decision, and, as I have already said, there is nothing to preclude this House from deciding that, under the circumstances of Murray v. Scott (1), an action lay at law for money had and received. The appeal having in part succeeded and in part failed I think the reasonable course would be that the costs of all parties should be treated as costs of the liquidation and paid out of the assets.

LORD SUMNER.—I agree that the whole banking business of the Birkbeck Society was ultra vires; that the banking contracts of loan, which ostensibly arose in the course of it, were void; that the funds procured alike from shareholders investing in the building society business and the customers of the banking business have been inextricably confused, and have been indiscriminately employed in acquiring assets, which cannot now be attributed to the one branch rather than to the other; and that everybody concerned—customers, shareholders, and officers—must all be taken to have known of the legal invalidity both of the acquisition of the depositers' funds and of the disposition of any funds in a banking business. Probably very few of them knew or suspected it in fact, but the knowledge that a banking business was being carried on was common to all, and all had notice of the rules. All must equally abide by the legal consequences of this invalidity.

The depositors' case has been put, first of all, as consisting in a right enforceable in a common law action. It is said that they paid their money under a mistake of fact, or for a consideration that has wholly failed, or that it has been had and received by the society to their use. In my opinion, no such actions could succeed. To hold otherwise would be indirectly to sanction an ultra vires borrowing. All these causes of action are common species of the genus assumpsit. All now rest, and long have rested, upon a notional or imputed promise to repay. The law cannot de jure impute promises to repay, whether for money had and received or otherwise, which, if made de facto, it would inexorably avoid. To the other difficulties of such claims I will allude shortly. There was no mistake of fact. The facts were fully known so far as was material. The rules and objects of the society were accessible to all. The only mistake made was a mistake as to the law, or that mistake of conduct to which all of us are prone, of doing as others do and chancing the law. There was no failure of consideration. As BOWEN, L.J., says in Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (1) (23 Ch.D. at p. 470):

> "Those who deal with a society, which professes to have power to borrow, have equal means of knowledge with the society itself of the statutory powers of the company; they are put, so to speak, upon inquiry whether the company really can borrow validly or not, and if they choose to lend their money to a company, which cannot properly borrow, it cannot be said there is a failure of consideration. The company has got their money, it is true, but they must be taken to have known what they bought and to have been willing to pay their money on the chance."

Further, the depositors' money was not had and received by the society, but by its officers, and receipt is an essential, Prince v. Oriental Bank Corpn. (20). If it was ultra vires for the society to take customers' accounts—that is, in the eye of the law, to borrow the money on its promise to repay, it was ultra vires for it to authorise its officers to do so on its behalf. The money, cheques, bills, and so forth, have no doubt reached the society's coffers, and thereafter have been dealt with as the depositors were willing and intended that it should be dealt with, and, so far as has appeared in this case, the officers of the society are not now chargeable. The society has the proceeds, or rather the liquidator has them, in that sense of possession which is necessary to found "tracing orders" and otherwise for the purpose of the winding-up, but it has not got them and there is no receipt of them in the sense which is necessary to raise the implication of a promise to repay, that would bind the society.

In these straits, LORD MANSFIELD's celebrated account of the action of money had and received in Moses v. Macferlan (6) was, of course, relied upon. It was said that for anyone to keep the depositors' money as against them would be unconscientious, while that they should get it back would be eminently ex æquo et bono, though it appeared also that conscience had nothing to say against payment of the depositors in full at the expense of the shareholders, though all must be deemed alike cognisant of the invalidity of the society's banking business. Burgess and Stocks' Case in Phœnix Life Assurance Co. (4), which was relied on, is irrelevant if treated as a case of an intra vires borrowing of the amounts of the premiums in question, which seems to have been the ratio decidendi of PAGE WOOD, V.-C. If the decision is supposed to be that in every case where money is paid under a contract which proves to be ultra vires it may be recovered as upon a consideration that has wholly failed, I think it goes too far, for the reasons I have already given. There may have been special facts to justify such an opinion in that case, though I think not, for the effect of it must, in any view, have been to bind the society in fact to a contract which in law was not binding at all. The other cases cited seems to me insufficient to support the appellant's claim to any common law right. The action for money had and received cannot now be extended beyond the principles illustrated in the decided cases, and although it is hard to reduce to one common formula the conditions under which the law will imply a promise to repay money received to the plaintiff's use, I think it is clear that no authority extends them far enough to help the appellant now.

Resort was then had to equity, and, as I understood it, the argument was that the action for money had and received was founded on equity and good conscience, and imported a head of equity (apart altogether from its possibly too limited application at law)—namely, that whenever it is ex æquo et bono for A. to repay money which he has received from B., and would be against conscience for B. to keep it, then A. has an equity to have B. decreed to repay it. For this again LORD MANSFIELD's authority in the same case was invoked. I cannot but think that LORD MANSFIELD's language has been completely misunderstood. Historically, the action for money had and received was not devised by the Court of Chancery, nor was it applied there either in form or in substance. It was a form of assumpsit, already old in LORD MANSFIELD's time, and his own citation of earlier actions of this sort should be enough to show, if that were necessary, that he never thought otherwise. It was said to be a "liberal" action in that it was attended by a minimum of formality, and was elastic and readily capable of being adapted to new circumstances. The action has been described as "liberal" because "the party waives all torts, trespasses, and damages": Anon. (1772) Lofft. 320. In and after LORD MANSFIELD's time its liberality in point of practice is shown by the fact that the plaintiff declared with a minimum of particulars and the defendant pleaded the general issue, under which he could prove almost anything: see 2 WILLIAMS SAUNDERS 120, notes to Chandler v. Vilett (21); Orton v. Butler (22); Owen v. Challis (23). No doubt it gave scope (at least in days when reported cases were less multitudinous than now) for decisions to meet what is called the "justice of the case." These features attracted LORD MANSFIELD, chafing already at the rigidity of the older forms of action, and emulous, no doubt, of the adaptability and growth which characterised the doctrines of equity in his time. He, and BULLER, J., spoke of the action in somewhat varying terms from time to time: see Weston v. Downes (24); Longchamp v. Kenny (25); Sadler v. Evans (26); Straton v. Rastall (27). LORD MANSFIELD, who in Clarke v. Shee (28) merely described the action as "a liberal action in the nature of a bill in equity," in Towers v. Barrett (29), says it is "founded on principles of eternal justice." In Straton v. Rastall (27) BULLER, J., says (2 Term Rep. at p. 370) that

> "of late years this court has very properly extended the action for money had and received. It is founded on principles of justice . . . but it must be remembered that it was extended on the principle of its being considered like a bill in equity. And therefore, in order to recover money in this form of action, the party must show that he has equity and conscience on his side, and that he could recover in a court of equity."

But the reported cases do not show how, if at all, this obligation was enforced. I think it is evident that LORD MANSFIELD did not conceive himself to be deciding that this action was one in which the courts of common law administered "an equity" in the sense in which it was understood in the Courts of Chancery: see observation of FARWELL, L.J., in Baylis v. Bishop of London (30), and the cases actually decided show that the description of the action as being founded in the æquum et bonum is very far from being precise. Even the decision in Moses v. Macferlan (6) which has since been dissented from, for some time unsettled the law: see SMITH'S LEADING CASES (11th Edn.), notes to Marriot v. Hampton (31), and this last-mentioned case is one which illustrates the proposition that money is not thus recoverable in all cases where it is unconscientious for the defendant to retain it, for no one could doubt that Hampton's retention of the money in that case was very like sharp practice. Crockford v. Winter (32) and Martin v. Morgan (33) are instances, on the other hand, which show that LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., and DALLAS, C.J., respectively understood that in that form of action the court strove to do what was just and not to administer equity. With whatever complacency the Court of King's Bench might regard the views expressed in Moses v. Macferlan (6), protests were very early made against it in the Common Pleas: Johnson v. Johnson (34), and in Miller v. Atlee (35), POLLOCK, C.B., bluntly declared the notion that the action for money had and received was an equitable action to be "exploded," and PARKE, B., sitting by him did not say him nay. This episode is reported only in 13 Jurist., but it smacks of truth. Since, then, allusions have been made from time to time to the connection between this cause of action and equity or the æquum et bonum (though they are not precisely the same things) —for example, in Smith v. Jones (36), Tregoning v. Attenborough (37), Rogers v. Ingham (42), Phillips v. London School Board (38), and Lodge v. National Union Investment Co. (39)—but I take them all to be merely descriptive of the undoubtedly wide scope of this essentially common law action. There is now no ground left for suggesting as a recognisable "equity" the right to recover money in personam merely because it would be the right and fair thing that it should be refunded to the payer.

The appellant next submitted that, even though the money of the depositors might not be repayable in full, the order made by NEVILLE, J., for convenience called the Guardian order, was inapplicable in the present case, and, indeed, that the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Crace-Calvert's Case (1) in Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (1) was wrong. I think that in any case that order is not applicable in the case now before your Lordships. There the money was borrowed by the directors, and it does not appear that the shareholders as a body were in fact cognisant of the borrowing. Here the fact that a banking business was being carried on was a matter of notoriety and even of pride. There the money, when received, was applied to the legitimate purposes of a building society, and the only business carried on was that of a building society; here the money was applied on a very large scale for the purposes of the ultra vires banking branch; here, further, the shareholders' money, paid in respect of shares they held, was very largely applied in the same way. For the reasons pointed out by my noble and learned friend LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON I think that this substantially and sufficiently differentiates Crace-Calvert's Case (1). The majority of the Court of Appeal, while deeming themselves bound to follow and apply Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (1), did not conceal their doubts of its correctness. Should that case come before your Lordships' House directly for review, as it clearly is open to review, I confess that I should be slow in arriving at the conclusion that I could not assent to the decision of so strong a court. In that case assets were found, to which no doubt Mrs. Crace-Calvert's money had con-

A tributed, but which were employed in the business legitimately carried on by the society. Primâ facie they were the society's assets, and out of them the unadvanced shareholders were by the rules entitled to be repaid the amount of their shares severally. This at least was their legal right. No one could show what particular assets were the fruits of the borrowed money. Against this legal right, who had an equity that should prevail? Not, at any rate, the ultra vires lenders, who had B no legal right at all, who had certainly lent their money in order that it might be invested in the building society business, and who also, in the view of the court, which I think was right, were to be deemed in law to have lent on the chance (doubtless, as they thought, without risk) that all would be well and that the contract would be performed. I think the order made was rightly described by COZENS-HARDY, M.R., as a rough tracing order. A ruthless logic would have given C all to the shareholders, principal, interest, bonus, and surplus, but this would have held the shareholders entitled to approbate the gains, while bound in law to reprobate the borrowing by which they were acquired. It is plain that JESSEL, M.R., thought that, by giving what was given to the shareholders, the court had eliminated all but the proceeds of the ultra vires borrowing, and I should hesitate to reject this view, if the only alternative were to find the shareholders entitled to every- D thing, though I recognise that it was not more than approximately exact.

I think the present case must be decided upon equitable principles upon which there is no direct authority. Of equitable principles I hesitate to speak confidently, for did not JESSEL, M.R., say that the principle of the Guardian order, which has given so much trouble, was one of the plainest of them? Yet, perhaps, I may say of myself what THESIGER, L.J., said of BRAMWELL, B., in Re Hallett's Estate E (3) (13 Ch.D. at p. 722), that > "even to the mind of a common law judge the principles of law, which have been applied now for some time in equity, have been made perfectly plain."

What ought to be done I think is clear; the only difficulty is how to describe the F principle and how to affiliate it to other legal or equitable rules. The question is one of administration. The liquidator, an officer of the court, who has to discharge himself of the assets that have come to his hands, asks for directions, and, after hearing all parties concerned, the court has the right and the duty to direct him how to distribute all the assets. No part of them can remain undistributed as res nullius. No one has ventured to argue before your Lordships that the shareholders take G everything, to the exclusion of the depositors, and so make a huge windfall. In my opinion, if precedent fails, the most just distribution of the whole must be directed, so only that no recognised rule of law or equity be disregarded. In this case neither the shareholders nor the depositors have the better equity; the money of each has, with the consent of all, been indiscriminately applied in acquiring assets beyond as well as within the society's powers, the former in much the H larger measure. The claims of each class are equal, and, I think, for the present purpose identical. Analogous cases have been decided with regard to chattels. They differ, no doubt, because of the fact that the property in the chattels remained unchanged, though indentification and even identity of the subject-matter of the property failed, whereas here, except as to currency, and even there only in a restricted sense, the term property as we use that term of chattels does not apply, I and, at least as far as intention could do it, both depositors and shareholders had given up the right to call the money or its proceeds their own, and had taken instead personal claims on the society. In Buckley v. Gross (40), where tallow in burning warehouses melted and ran down a sewer, and a stranger collected it, BLACKBURN, J., says (3 B. & S. at pp. 574, 575):

> "The tallow of the different owners was mixed up into a molten mass, so that it might be difficult to apportion it among them; but I dissent from the doctrine that, because the property of different persons is confused together, that entitles a third party to steal it with impunity. Probably the legal effect of such a mixture would be to make the owners tenants in common in equal portions of the mass."

Again, Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (41) is a case where cotton in bales belonging to different consignees was so damaged by sea perils that it arrived with marks obliterated and otherwise injured, and after delivery to the respective consignees of all that could be specifically identified as theirs, a mass of unidentifiable damaged cotton remained. There, as here, no doubt one bale, in fact, represented A.'s money and another B.'s; there as here all were depreciated, but probably not each in the same degree, but no one could say which bale was any particular person's property, or who, therefore, should bear the greater and who the less depreciation. The goods could not be treated as bona vacantia, they could not fall into the hands of the first person who reduced them into possession, and on principles and analogies derived from Roman law the court treated the consignees as tenants in common of the unidentifiable cotton, in the proportion borne by the numbers originally shipped by them to the number remaining. This decision has never been questioned for nearly fifty years. I agree, without recapitulating reasons, that the principle on which Re Hallett's Estate (3) is founded justifies an order allowing the appellant to follow the assets, not merely to the verge of actual identification, but even somewhat further in a case like the present, where, after a process of exclusion, only two classes or groups of persons, having equal claims, are left in, and all superior claims have been eliminated. Tracing in a sense it is not, for we know that the money coming from A. bought one security, and that coming from B. another, and that the two securities did not probably depreciate exactly in the same percentage, and we know further that no one will ever know any more. Still, I think this well within the "tracing" equity, and that among persons making up these two groups, the principle of rateable division of the assets is sound. I agree in the decision proposed, both as to the order to be substituted for that of the Court of Appeal and as to the costs.

Licensing—Club—Supply of liquor to members—Property in liquor vested in trustees for members—Club not conducted in good faith—Frequent drunkenness on premises—Licensing (Consolidation) Act 1910 (10 Edw. 7 & 1 Geo. 5, c. 24), ss. 65, 91, 95.

Where a club is duly formed in accordance with its rules and forms a real association of persons governed by and carried on under those rules, one of which provides that the property of the club, including intoxicating liquor, shall be vested in trustees representing and acting for all the members of the club, the supply of intoxicating liquor to members of the club for payment is a distribution of the liquor among the members of the club, and is not a "sale" of such liquor within s. 65 (1) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, [see now s. 120 (1) of the Licensing Act, 1953: 33 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 142] even though the club is liable to be struck off the register of clubs under s. 95 (1) (b) and (c) of the Act [see s. 144 (1) (b) and (c) of the Act of 1953] upon the ground that it is not conducted in good faith as a club and there is frequent drunkenness on the premises.

Per LUSH, J.: The fact that a club is not conducted in good faith cannot affect the question whether there is a distribution of liquor among the members as distinct from a sale.

Case Stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Pontypridd, Glamorgan.

G

On Dec. 5, 1912, an information was laid by the respondent, a superintendent of police, against the appellants for that each of them on Oct. 5, 1912, at Tonypandy, Glamorgan, unlawfully did sell by retail intoxicating liquor which they were not then licensed to sell by retail, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and summonses were issued accordingly. At the hearing counsel for the respondent intimated that the charge he proposed to make against the appellant Metford was that of aiding and abetting the other appellants in the commission of the offence charged against them.

H

Upon the hearing of the information on Dec. 19, 1912, the following facts were admitted or proved. (a) On Feb. 6, 1911, the Tonypandy County Working Men's Club and Institute (hereinafter called "the club") was duly registered with the clerk to the justices of the petty sessional division in which the club premises were situated and in accordance with ss. 91 and 92 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, and on Mar. 7, 1911, the club was registered with the Registrar of Friendly Societies under the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. (b) On Jan. 22, 1912, a return was made by the secretary of the club to the clerk to the justices of the petty sessional division in which the club was situated in accordance with s. 92 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act. (c) On Oct. 5, 1912, the club was entered by the police, who purported to act under the powers of a search warrant granted under s. 96 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act. (d) On Oct. 5, 1912, the club premises consisted of two cottages which were in a dirty and dilapidated condition and quite unfit for use as club premises. One of the rooms on the ground floor of the cottages was fitted up as a public-house bar, and, at the time when the police entered, sixteen persons were in the room, each of them provided with intoxicating liquor, and the steward of the club—namely, the appellant Metford—and his wife were standing behind the bar serving intoxicating liquor to those who were on the premises and receiving money in exchange therefor. (e) On the same day, Oct. 5, 1912, the stock of intoxicating liquor upon the club premises consisted of eight barrels of beer, 532 bottles of wine and spirits, 204 bottles of beer and stout, and 20 gallons of cider. (f) At the time when the police entered the club premises on Oct. 5, 1912, there were fifty-nine persons present on the club premises, all of whom were provided with intoxicating liquor and six of whom were drunk and five under the influence of drink. One of the persons under the influence of drink was the vice-chairman of the club. (g) Out of the fifty-nine persons present at the time of the raid, fourteen were persons of whose election as members of the club there was no record in the minutes, although their names appeared on nomination forms. (h) The books of account found on the club premises showed that during the twelve months preceding the raid the bar takings in respect of intoxicating liquor amounted to £1,684 13s. 3d., and that members' subscriptions for the same period amounted to £46 15s. (i) Forty-four persons were seen leaving the club premises in a drunken condition on different days in the months of July, August, and September, 1912. (j) On Nov. 6, 1912, complaint was made by the respondent (i) that the club was not conducted in good faith as a club; (ii) that there was frequent drunkenness on the premises of the club; (iii) that illegal sales of intoxicating liquor had taken place on the premises of the club; (iv) that persons who were not members were habitually admitted to the club merely for the purpose of obtaining intoxicating liquor; (v) that persons were habitually admitted as members of the club without an interval of at least forty-eight hours between their nomination and admission; and (vi) that the supply of intoxicating liquor was not under the control of the members (or the committee appointed by the members), and on Nov. 6 a summons was issued summoning the club to answer the complaints and to show cause why the club should not be struck off the register. (k) On Nov. 28, 1912, the complaint came on for hearing before the justices, who found that the club was not conducted in good faith as a club and that there had been frequent drunkenness on the premises of the club, and they ordered that the club be struck off the register of clubs for a period of twelve months. (l) The appellants (eighteen in number) held official positions in connection with the club, being respectively the steward, chairman, vice-chairman, secretary, treasurer, committee-men, and trustee. The appellant Metford (the steward) was paid a wage of £2 10s. per week. On Oct. 5 when the police entered there were thirteen of the appellants on the club premises, and the other five appellants had attended committee meetings from time to time.

The respondent contended that the appellants other than the appellant Metford were guilty of unlawfully selling by retail certain intoxicating liquor which they were not then licensed to sell by retail on Oct. 5, 1912, and that the appellant Metford, the steward of the club, was guilty of aiding and abetting the other appellants in the commission of the offence. The appellants contended that there had been no sale of intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910; that inasmuch as the club was registered in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and at the date of the alleged offence—namely Oct. 5, 1912—the club had not been removed from the register, the club was a legal entity and the members of its committee could not be held individually responsible for the offence alleged against them; that in law there had been no sale of any intoxicating liquor by or on behalf of the appellants; that there was no evidence that the appellants knew that the club was carried on otherwise than as a bona fide club; that, as regards the appellant Metford, inasmuch as no offence had been committed by the other appellants, Metford was not guilty of any offence.

A The magistrate accepted the contentions of the respondent and convicted all the appellants.

The case having been sent back for re-statement on certain points, the magistrate stated that there was no evidence that any sales were made to non-members of the club, and he did not find as a fact that there had been any such sales. He was not satisfied that persons were habitually admitted as members of the club B without an interval of at least forty-eight hours between their nomination and admission, and he did not find that there had been any breach of s. 95 (g) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, and, in answer to the question whether sales were made to alleged members of the club, and, if so, whom the liquors sold belonged to, he said that certain alleged members of the club who were present on the club premises on Oct. 5 when the police entered were heard ordering liquors C from the steward and were handed such liquors by the steward to whom they handed money, and from the evidence given as to the general method of conducting the club he found as a fact that the liquors with which the persons were supplied when the police entered had been ordered, delivered, and paid for in the manner described, but there was no evidence to identify the persons who had so ordered or paid for the liquors or to show whether they were members of the club or non-D members. The liquors formed part of the general property of the club, and as such were vested by r. 14 in the trustees of the club, representing and acting for the whole of the members of the club.

The case was again remitted to the magistrate that he might give his reasons (i) for finding whether the club was or was not on Oct. 5, 1912, a bona fide club, and (ii) why he came to the conclusion that the sale of liquor on that day was illegal. E He found that on Oct. 5, 1912, the club was not conducted in good faith as a club and was not a bona fide club, and his reasons for so finding were that on the hearing before nim on Dec. 19 the order of the justices on Nov. 28 ordering that the club be struck off the register was referred to, and counsel for the respondent stated that the grounds on which the order was founded was that the justices found as a fact that the club was on Oct. 5 not conducted in good faith as a club, that there F was frequent drunkenness on the premises, and that counsel for the appellants practically admitted that as his submission was that, as the club had been registered and was on Oct. 5, 1912, still on the register, there had been no illegal sale of liquor on that day, even though the club was on that day not a bonâ fide club and there had been frequent drunkenness on the premises. Further, from the evidence taken before him, he came to the conclusion that the club was not being conducted for G any of the objects stated in its rules—namely, "to afford to its members the means of social intercourse, mutual helpfulness, mental and moral improvement, and rational recreation"—but that its sole object was to provide means for its frequenters (irrespective of whether they were duly elected members or not) to purchase intoxicating liquor in a place other than a licensed house and during H prohibited hours. He also inferred that the state of things when the police entered was of common occurrence and was in no way exceptional. The reason why he came to the conclusion that the sale of liquor at the club on Oct. 5 was illegal was that he found as a fact that the liquor with which each person present when the police entered had been supplied was supplied by or on behalf of the steward in consideration of payments of money made to him. He held that such I a transaction constituted a sale by retail of such liquor, and as the club was not a bona fide club, but was conducted for the purpose of enabling its frequenters to purchase liquor as above mentioned, he held that the registration of the club afforded no protection to the appellants against the provisions of the Licensing Acts.

By the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 65 (1) [see now s. 120 (1) of the Licensing Act, 1953] :

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, a person shall not sell or expose for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor unless he holds a justices' licence authorising him to hold an excise licence for the sale of that intoxicating liquor, nor at any place except that for which the justices' licence authorises him to hold an excise licence for the sale of that liquor."

Section 91 [s. 143 of Act of 1953] imposes upon the secretary of every club in which any intoxicating liquor is supplied to members or their guests the obligation to have the club registered, but such registration shall not constitute the club licensed premises; and by s. 95 [s. 144 of Act of 1953], where a club has been duly registered, it may be struck off the register upon all or any of the grounds therein specified, among which are (b) that it is not conducted in good faith as a club, or that it is kept or habitually used for any unlawful purpose; or (c) that there is frequent drunkenness on the club premises.

George Elliott, K.C., for the appellants.
The respondent did not appear.

BANKES, J.—This Special Case raises a very important point, and it is a great pity that nobody has appeared on the part of the respondent to put some other view of the matter before us.

The matter arises in this way. In December, 1912, proceedings were taken before the stipendiary magistrate against a number of persons who were officers and members of what was called the Tonypandy County Working Men's Club and Institute for an alleged breach of s. 65 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, in selling intoxicating liquor by retail without holding a justices' licence. The learned magistrate originally stated a Case, and, in answer to a request by the court, he has on two further occasions supplemented his original finding, and, as a result of a perusal of those three Cases, the conclusions I come to with regard to his findings are that there was a club called the Tonypandy County Working Men's Club and Institute, it was not a sham, it was not a mere name, it was an association of persons together under the rules which form part of the Case, and to some of which we have been referred. Those rules provide for the starting, if I may use that expression, of a club which shall consist of ordinary members and honorary members. It provides for an association of persons. There are a number of rules which deal with the constitution of the club, but there are two only which seem to me to be material to which I need refer, and those have reference to the property of the club. Rule 25 provides that all moneys received on account of the club from any source shall be applied or invested towards the carrying out of the objects of the club; and r. 14 provides that all the property of the club shall be vested in trustees representing and acting for the whole of the members of the club. It was, of course, competent for the magistrate, if he thought the facts warranted it, to have found that there was no real association of members at all, that there was no real club at all, that there was no association which was governed by, or carried on under, these rules. But, in my view, and this is an important point, he has not found that. He has, in my view, found that there was a club, but that it was not conducted in good faith, as it was intended to be conducted, and consequently he finds that it was not a bona fide club. When he uses the words "was not a bona fide club" I understand him to say that he found that it was a real association of persons governed by the rules, but that it was not conducted in accordance with the rules, and in that sense was not conducted in good faith as a club. If that is the proper interpretation of the learned magistrate's finding—and I think it must be so, having regard to what he said in the second supplemental Case, where he finds that the intoxicating liquors formed part of the general property of the club, and as such were by virtue of r. 14 vested in the trustees of the club representing and acting for the whole of the members of the club—that finding, in my opinion, goes the whole length of finding that, although it was not properly conducted, it was a real association of persons who could properly be called a club, that it was governed by the rules, and that the property was vested

A in the trustees and was the property of the club. If that is so, the liquor which these persons were charged with selling without a licence was liquor which was the property of the club, and the selling, which was complained of, was a transfer, if I may use that expression, of the liquor, the property of the club, by the duly appointed officers of the club to members of the club.

There is no finding here that there was any supply of liquor to any person who B was not a member. Therefore, the only question that we have to decide is whether, assuming the existence of a real club, and assuming the liquor to be the property of that club, and assuming the transaction complained of to be a transfer of that liquor by the officers to the members, does that constitute a "sale" within s. 65 of the Licensing Act of 1910? In my opinion, it does not. I think that that transfer is what is called in the statute itself, when it speaks of clubs, a supply C of liquor to a member, and, if it is a supply, it is not a sale within the meaning of the section. Why I say that is this. Section 91, the section which deals with the registration of clubs, provides that "the secretary of every club which occupies a house or part of a house which is habitually used for the purposes of a club, and in which any intoxicating liquor is supplied to members or their guests . . . shall cause the club to be registered." In speaking of a transfer of liquor to a member D it speaks of it as a supply to the member, and sub-s. (2) of the section provides: "The registration of a club under this Act shall not constitute the club premises licensed premises, or authorise any sale of intoxicating liquor therein which would otherwise be illegal." As I read that subsection it means that if there is a sale of intoxicating liquor upon the premises of a club, however bona fide that club may be, to use one expression, or however old established or respectable that club E may be, if the transaction with regard to any intoxicating liquor upon the premises of that club constitutes a sale as opposed to the supply to a member, it is not protected by reason of the registration.

If that is a correct view of the statute, how is it applicable to this case? It seems to me to follow if one assumes the existence of a real association of persons who own the liquor, and a transfer only of that liquor to a member of the associa- F tion, that it is a supply of liquor, and is not a sale. On those grounds, in my opinion, the learned magistrate was wrong in coming to the conclusion to which he did come as stated in the last Case, namely, that the transaction constituted a sale by retail of such intoxicating liquor, and that, as the club was not a bonâ fide club, but was conducted solely for the purpose of enabling the frequenters of the club (whether duly elected members or not) to purchase intoxicating liquor G in a place other than in a licensed house and during prohibited hours, he held that the registration of the club afforded no protection to the appellants against the provisions of the Licensing Act of 1910. I only desire to say in conclusion that nothing I have said would apply to a case where there is no real association of persons owning the club, and if upon the facts in any particular case it is found that any individual, or body of individuals, under the name of a club or supply- H ing their own liquor to persons for payment, in my opinion, that transaction would constitute a sale, and would come within the provisions of the Licensing Act.

AVORY, J.—Upon the facts which were before the learned magistrate in this case I think that he might properly have come to the conclusion that there was a I sale of intoxicating liquor prohibited by s. 65 of the Licensing Act. I am not sure that in this case the result which the court has arrived at is not due to the learned magistrate having given the wrong reasons for his judgment. I have been inclined to think that his judgment was right, but that the reasons for it are wrong, and if he had founded it upon other reasons I believe it might have been supported. I say that for this reason, that, in the Case which he last re-stated to this court, in answer to questions which were submitted to him, he says:

"I held that such a transaction constituted a sale by retail of such intoxicating liquor, and I take this to be a finding of fact which he might have arrived at] as the club was not a bona fide club, but was conducted solely for the purpose of enabling the frequenters of the club, whether duly elected members or not, to purchase intoxicating liquor in a place other than in a licensed house, and during prohibited hours, I held that the registration of the club afforded no protection to the appellants."

If that had been the only finding by the magistrate in the case, that this club was conducted solely for the purpose of enabling frequenters, whether members or not, to purchase intoxicating liquors in a place other than in a licensed house, and during prohibited hours, I think there would have been nothing to be said against his conclusion that that amounted to a sale within the meaning of s. 65. As I have intimated, I think he might fairly have come to that conclusion upon the facts of this case; but he has, in answer to the questions which were originally submitted to him by this court, undoubtedly also found as a fact that the intoxicating liquor which was supplied formed part of the general property of the club, and as such was by virtue of r. 14 vested in the trustees of the club representing and acting for the whole of the members of the club. In other words, he has found that the liquor which was sold in this case was the property of the members of the club, to whom in fact it was supplied, and, if he has so found, then it is clear that Graff v. Evans (1) is an authority that such a transaction does not amount to a sale within the meaning of the Licensing Act. I think that the learned magistrate, as soon as he came to the conclusion that this was not a bona fide club, but was conducted for the purposes which he has described, might also have gone on to say that in his opinion, not being a bona fide club, the rules were not bona fide—in fact were nothing but a blind to cloak an illegal transaction, namely, the sale of intoxicating liquor that was going on. If he had so held, there would have been no vesting of the property in the trustees or in the members of the club, and if there had been no vesting of the property in the trustees for the benefit of the members generally, then, in my opinion, the transaction would clearly have amounted to a sale; but in face of this finding by the learned magistrate—which I agree is contradictory, to some extent, at all events, of the later findings—I am certainly unable to differ from the conclusion which has been already expressed.

LUSH, J.—In order to justify this conviction it must be shown that there was a sale by retail of intoxicating liquor, and the question is whether, upon the findings that the learned magistrate has made, the facts established that there had been such a sale. In my opinion, there was no sale. It is quite clear that if this had been what has been called a bona fide club there was no sale, and I want to point out why, if this had been a bona fide club, it must have been conceded that there was no sale. In Graff v. Evans (1), which was the case of a bona fide club, it was held that the supply of liquors to members of the club was not a sale, and the reason appears to me to be that where the members of a bona fide club are the owners of the intoxicating liquor, and merely distribute it among themselves, that is a case of distribution and not a case of sale. It appears to me that that conclusion equally follows although the club is not what has been called a bona fide club. The language of s. 95, sub-s. 1, of the Act is that where a club has been registered in pursuance of the Act, a court of summary jurisdiction under certain conditions may make an order directing the club to be struck off the register on all or any of the grounds specified, the ground in para. (b) being that the club is not conducted in good faith as a club. The fact that the club was not conducted in good faith cannot, in my view, affect the question whether there was a distribution as distinct from a sale. If it is a club, then, if the members are the proprietors and owners of the intoxicating liquor, they just as much distribute it among themselves as they would have done if the club had been conducted in good faith. The penalty which the Act prescribes in the case of a club not being conducted in good faith is that the club may be taken off the register. That is the penalty, but the fact that it is conducted in good faith cannot affect the question whether, if it is a club, as the magistrate finds this is, the members have distributed their own intoxicating liquor among themselves in contra-distinction to the fact of it being a sale. There is this further penalty provided by s. 93, that if a club has been taken off the register, and intoxicating liquors are afterwards supplied to members, a penalty is imposed, although the distribution exists just as much in the case of the one club as in the case of the other. For these reasons I think, upon the findings of the learned magistrate, which include the finding that the intoxicating liquor was the general property of the club, this conviction cannot be sustained, and the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal against a conviction.

The appellant described himself as the principal of the "British Health Institute," and issued advertisements stating that arrangements had been made for testing urine, if desired, at a nominal fee of 1s. 6d. Two individuals, who suspected the genuineness of the advertisement, forwarded to the appellant a solution of water with colouring ingredients mixed with soap, and asked for an analysis of their "water." Letters were received from the appellant advising a course of treatment to cost not less than one guinea in each case. He was convicted before the Recorder at the Central Criminal Court of attempting to obtain money by false pretences.

Charles Doughty for the appellant.
R. D. Muir for the Crown.

ROWLATT, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—On the point of law raised in this case, it was argued that, where a charge of attempting to obtain money is preferred, a conviction cannot be obtained unless the prosecutor believes the false pretence made. It is quite clear that, on a charge of obtaining goods or money by false pretences, no conviction is possible unless it is shown that the mind of the prosecutor was misled by the false pretence, and that he was thereby induced to part with his money or goods. But it is a fallacy to suppose that the same principle applies when an attempt only is charged. A man makes false pretences with the intention of obtaining money, and uses the false pretences in endeavouring to obtain money. The prosecutor may not believe the false statement and does not part with his money, or he may part with his money intending to carry the matter further. In each of these cases, the appellant has made false pretences with the object of obtaining money, and has failed because the prosecutor has not been misled. There is, as it seems to us, no difficulty in deciding that, under these circumstances, a man is guilty of attempting to obtain property or money by false pretences. The point was determined in R. v. Hensler (1), and is covered by that case. There is no ground for saying that the jury were not properly directed in the present case, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Case Stated by Kent justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Tonbridge, an information was preferred by the respondent, Edgar Thomas Jeffery, of Southborough, an inspector of nuisances under the Public Health Act, 1875, against the appellant, Edward Kates, also of Southborough, charging that, on Nov. 17, 1913, he had in his possession for the purpose of sale or of preparation for sale and intended for the food of man a carcase of a cow which was unfit for human food. It was proved or admitted that on Nov. 17, 1913, the respondent, whilst acting in his capacity as an inspector of nuisances for the urban district of Southborough, inspected and examined the carcase of a cow which was at that time in the possession of the appellant, and as the meat then appeared to him to be diseased and unfit for the food of man, he seized and carried away the same in order that the carcase might be dealt with by a justice. The meat was subsequently examined by a justice, and was adjudged by him to be unfit for human food. It was consequently condemned and ordered to be destroyed in pursuance of the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875. The meat was destroyed in accordance with the order. When giving evidence in support of the information, the respondent swore that he was an inspector of nuisances for the urban district of Southborough, and this was not questioned by the appellant until the close of the case for the prosecution, nor was he cross-examined on the point, and the case for the prosecution proceeded on the assumption that the respondent was an inspector of nuisances and the appellant raised no point thereon.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that, before any conviction could take place, it was necessary that the appointment of the respondent as inspector of nuisances, and the approval of his appointment by the Local Government Board, should have been formally proved in evidence, and that the mere evidence of the respondent on this point in the witness-box was insufficient. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that, as there was no cross-examination on the point, the evidence of himself that he was an inspector of nuisances and had been duly appointed and approved, and that he was acting within the scope of his authority was sufficient to establish the fact; as the point was never raised at the hearing of the information, the appellant had waived any objection.

The justices convicted the appellant who now appealed.

Barrington-Ward for the appellant.

Rowland Harker for the respondent.

DARLING, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. With regard to the first point, that is, whether there was sufficient evidence of the appointment of the respondent and of the approval of his appointment by the Local Government Board, which was the only point raised before the justices in the court below, this has now been abandoned by counsel for the appellant. There is not the least ground for suggesting that there was not sufficient evidence that the respondent was a properly appointed sanitary inspector.

But then another point is now raised, and that is that there was no evidence given before the justices that the sanitary inspector was authorised by the local authority in such a manner as was necessary to enable him to take proceedings against the appellant. This point was not taken when the case was before the justices. If it had been taken, in all probability the justices would have adjourned the case, if necessary, in order that such evidence might have been produced, and would have proceeded with the hearing when the evidence was forthcoming. In Knight v. Halliwell (1) BLACKBURN, J., said (L.R. 9 Q.B. at p. 417), after referring to Purkis v. Huxtable (2), and observing that, if the point which was attempted to be raised before the Court of Queen's Bench in that case had been taken before the justices, evidence with regard to it could have been supplied, "here a question of law, which no evidence could alter, arises on the statement of facts." And I have no doubt that, in Giebler v. Manning (3), LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., was speaking in the same sense, and that his language was equivalent to that of BLACKBURN, J.,—although there is some difference in the reports—namely, that a question of law arising on the facts stated by justices, but not taken before them, can only be taken before this court if it is one which no evidence could alter.

In my view, if this court sees that there is a question of law arising from the facts of a Case Stated which no evidence could possibly alter, this court is entitled to take the point and to deal with the question of law, even though it was not raised in any way before the justices. And again, the court cannot refuse to raise such a point merely because it was not taken by one of the parties in the court below. For example, if a Case Stated by justices should allege that a lease for a limited number of years was an estate in fee simple, this court would not only be entitled but would be bound to take the point of law. But no such point of law arises on the facts stated in the present case. The question whether the respondent was duly authorised to take proceedings against the appellant was a pure question of fact, and if the point of law had been taken that, without evidence of that fact, the prosecution would not lie, the justices might, and no doubt would, have adjourned the hearing of the case in order that the authority of the sanitary inspector might have been produced. As I have said, the whole thing was a question of fact, and, that being so, it is not now open to the appellant to raise it before us, and, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Case Stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

At the Westminster Police Court sitting on Dec. 4, 1913, the respondents, the London County Council, preferred an information against the appellants, Evans & Co., Ltd., charging that, during the week ending Oct. 25, 1913, being the occupiers of a shop known as Nos. 197–201, Brompton Road, in the county of London and within the metropolitan police district, they did not close the shop for the service of customers not later than one o'clock in the afternoon on one weekday in the aforesaid week, as required by the Shops Act, 1912, s. 4 (1).

The following facts were proved or admitted: The appellants were a corporation, to wit, a limited liability company, duly incorporated and registered under the Companies Acts, and carried on business as milliners, fancy drapers and ladies' outfitters at the aforesaid premises. An inspector employed by the respondents under the Shops Act, 1912, inspected the premises every day during the week ending Oct. 25, 1913, and the premises were open on each day during the week for the service of customers after 1 p.m., and customers were served therein after 1 p.m. on each of such days.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that, being a limited company, they were not an "occupier" within the meaning of s. 4 of the Shops Act, 1912. The word "occupier" as therein used applied to an individual only, and not to a corporate body. A limited company was not a "person" within the meaning of ss. 1 and 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the words "occupier" and "person" included a limited company.

The magistrate was of opinion that the appellants were "occupiers" within the meaning of s. 4, and that, under the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 2 (1), the Summary Jurisdiction Acts were applicable to corporations in respect of these offences, and that there was nothing in the nature of the appellants' offence or of the penalty imposed by the Shops Act, 1912, or otherwise, to indicate any contrary intention. He, therefore, imposed a penalty on the appellants, who now appealed.

By the Shops Act, 1912, s. 4:

(1) "Every shop shall, save as otherwise provided by this Act, be closed for the serving of customers not later than one o'clock in the afternoon on one weekday in every week. . . . (4) Where the local authority have reason to believe that a majority of the occupiers of shops of any particular class in any area are in favour of being exempted from the provisions of this section, either wholly or by fixing as the closing hour instead of one o'clock some other hour not later than two o'clock, the local authority, unless they consider that the area in question is unreasonably small, shall take steps to ascertain the wishes of such occupiers, and, if they are satisfied that a majority of the occupiers of such shops are in favour of the exemption, or, in the case of a vote being taken, that at least one-half of the votes recorded by the occupiers of shops within the area of the class in question are in favour of the exemption, the local authority shall make an order exempting the shops of that class within the area from the provisions of this section either wholly or to such extent as aforesaid. . . . (7) In the case of any contravention of or failure to comply with any of the provisions of this section, the occupier of the shop shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable to a fine not exceeding—(a) in the case of a first offence, one pound; (b) in the case of a second offence, five pounds; and (c) in the case of a third or subsequent offence, ten pounds."

R. W. Turner for the appellants.
Bodkin for the respondents.

AVORY, J.—The question whether a company incorporated under the Companies Acts is liable, or may be made liable, under the provisions of a penal statute has been naturally the subject of discussion in recent years, and the decision of such a question turns, in my opinion, on the application of s. 2 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, to the particular case in question. Section 2 of that Act says:

"In the construction of every enactment relating to an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction, whether contained in an Act passed before or after the commencement of this Act, the expression 'person' shall unless the contrary intention appears, include a body corporate"; and in every case which comes before the court the question which has to be determined is whether the contrary intention appears in the statute under which the proceedings are taken. In this case, the proceedings are taken under s. 4 (1) of the Shops Act, 1912, which provides that

Subsection (4) provides: [His Lordship read the subsection]. Subsection (7) provides that "In the case of any contravention of or failure to comply with any of the provisions of this section, the occupier of the shop shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable to a fine."

The only other section in the Act which it is material to consider is s. 14, which provides that

> "All offences against this Act shall be prosecuted, and all fines under this Act shall be recovered, in like manner as offences and fines are prosecuted and recovered under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901."

That is, in effect, saying that they shall be prosecuted and recovered under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. Subsections (2) and (3) of that section I think are also material, for a reason which I will state in a moment. By sub-s. (2):

> "Where an offence for which the occupier of a shop is liable under this Act has, in fact, been committed by some manager, agent, servant, or other person, the manager, agent, servant, or other person shall be liable to the like penalty as if he were the occupier."

By sub-s. (3):

> "Where the occupier of a shop is charged with an offence against this Act, he shall be entitled upon information duly laid by him to have any other person whom he charges as the actual offender brought before the court at the time appointed for hearing the charge; and if, after the commission of the offence has been proved, he proves to the satisfaction of the court that he has used due diligence to enforce the execution of the Act, and that the said other person has committed the offence in question without his knowledge, consent, or connivance, the said other person shall be summarily convicted of such offence, and the occupier shall be exempt from any fine."

The question in this case is whether a limited company can be lawfully convicted under s. 4 of the Shops Act, 1912. It is admitted and found in the Case that the appellants were, at the date in question, the occupiers of this shop. The appellants were on the rate book as the occupiers of the shop, and primâ facie, therefore, they come clearly within the words. Is there anything in this Act which shows that a body corporate is not intended to be included in the provisions of it? Counsel for the appellants has argued that s. 4 (4) displays a contrary intention, because it contemplates occupiers who are in certain events to exercise the right of voting on the question whether shops of that class shall be exempt from the operation of the section; and he says that a limited company cannot exercise that right of voting under that subsection. For myself, I am not by any means satisfied that a limited company cannot exercise the right of voting under that subsection. I see nothing in this Act such as there was in Wills v. Tozer (1). I see nothing which makes it impossible or which puts any difficulty in the way of a limited company exercising the right of voting under the subsection. There is nothing which says that the members shall be personally present and record their votes. There is certainly nothing which prevents a limited company from expressing its wish as an occupier. A limited company can express its wish in the ordinary way, either by a resolution of the directors or by the directors authorising the manager to express its views on its behalf. So far as I can see, there being no particular machinery for recording the votes, there is no practical difficulty in the company exercising that right of voting. Even if there were, it would not, in my opinion, justify the argument that this Act cannot be applied in the case of a limited company where a shop is admittedly open in breach of the provisions of the Act.

But counsel for the appellants argues further that, apart from the provisions of the Shops Act, the fine has to be recovered under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and he says that there are certain provisions in various sections of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, which are inapplicable to a limited company. That is quite true. There are, no doubt, certain provisions in that Act which contemplate imprisonment in certain events which are not applicable to the case of a limited company, but this court has for many years past had to consider this question under other statutes where it is provided that the fine is to be recovered or the offence is to be prosecuted under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. It has been held in cases under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts and in cases under the Merchandise Marks Act, that there is nothing in those statutes, or in the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, which prevents the application of the particular statute to a limited company. I think it is no answer to say that there are certain provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts which cannot be applied, if in fact there are other provisions which are all that are necessary for the purpose that can be applied.

For these reasons, I think that the argument that there is anything in the Shops Act, 1912, which shows any contrary intention to the provisions of the Interpretation Act, 1889, that the word "person" shall include a corporation fails.

I refer again to s. 14 (2) and (3) of the Shops Act, 1912, for this purpose as showing that they would appear to have been enacted for the purpose of meeting a case where a limited company is the occupier; but they are essentially provisions which may be most useful in a case where a limited company is the occupier of a shop, because it is just in such a case as that where, although the occupier is primâ facie liable, it may be shown that the manager or agent of the limited company is the person who really has committed the offence. No such point is raised in this case. We must assume that the appellants were the persons who in fact committed the offence, if anybody did, and we are only asked to say whether they can be made liable under this statute.

For these reasons I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

ROWLATT, J.—I agree. In this shop there was a state of facts which, under the Shops Act, 1912, subjected the occupiers to a fine. The appellants are, in the ordinary acceptation of the words, the occupiers of that shop, and they have been convicted and fined. It is objected that they are not occupiers because occupiers have votes, and they cannot exercise the vote. If it be true that they cannot exercise the vote, as to which I offer no opinion at all, that circumstance may be pathetic without being relevant, because it seems to me that the vote is a privilege conferred on the occupier if he can exercise it. If he cannot exercise it, he is none the less the occupier, and must accept the liabilities of such.

SHEARMAN, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal Law—Larceny—Fraudulent conversion—Person "entrusted" with property—"Receipt" of property for or on account of another person—Dealings through company directed and controlled by one person—Larceny Act, 1901 (1 Edw. 7, c. 10), s. 1.

A person may be "entrusted" with property or may "receive" it for or on account of another person within the meaning of s. 1 of the Larceny Act, 1901, notwithstanding that the property is not delivered to him directly by the owner, and even if the owner does not know of his existence and does not intend to entrust the property to him. If a person has obtained or assumed the control of the property of another person under circumstances by which he becomes entrusted with it, or by which his receipt becomes a receipt for or on account of another person, and he fraudulently converts the property, he has committed an offence under s. 1. For the purpose of determining whether the offence has been committed, the words "being entrusted" should not be read as being limited to the moment of the sending or delivering of the property by the owner, but may cover any subsequent period during which a person becomes entrusted with the property; equally, the words "having received" may cover the receipt at any time by a person who receives the property for or on account of another.

If a person having exclusive control over the affairs and management of a company intends to fraudulently convert property in the possession of the company, he may be guilty of an offence under s. 1 whether the property is fraudulently converted to the use or benefit of the company or to his own use and benefit. If the acts done by him are done with an intent to defraud, it will not serve as a defence to a charge under s. 1 to show that he did the acts as agent or servant of the company.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 10. LORD READING, C.J., read the following judgment of the court.— E The appellant was convicted under the Larceny Act, 1901, of having fraudulently converted to his own use or benefit property entrusted to him for certain specific purposes and property received by him for or on account of another. He appeals to this court to quash the conviction on two grounds: the first, that, as a matter of law, there was no evidence to support the verdict; the second, that the learned recorder had misdirected the jury. If there had been no company in existence, there is no doubt that, if there was evidence that the property had been entrusted to or received by the appellant, there would have been ample evidence to support the conviction. But it is strenuously contended that the property was in fact and in law entrusted to or received by the company, and not to or by the appellant. It is not in dispute that the moneys were fraudulently converted, but the appellant says they were fraudulently converted by the company and not by him. The company, it is said, was duly formed and incorporated under the Companies Act and was, therefore, a legal entity, a person: see Salomon v. Salomon (1). It is contended that the owner of the property intended in each case to entrust it to the company and not to the appellant, and that the property was in fact received by the company and not by the appellant: that, as the property came into the possession of the company and the moneys were paid into the banking account of the company and were entered in the books of the company and were applied to the use and for the benefit of the company, the appellant could not be convicted of any offence under the statute. The question raised is of general importance, for, if the appellant's contention is right, it would follow that, by the interposition of a duly formed company as the person entrusted with the property or by whom it is received, no person could be convicted of offences under the Larceny Act, 1901, nor, indeed, of any offence against the criminal law, notwithstanding the undoubted fraudulent conversion of the property, since the company cannot be indicted and sent to prison. Section 1 of the Larceny Act, 1901, was passed for the purpose of meeting technical difficulties which had arisen in proving offences under s. 75 and s. 76 of the Larceny Act, 1861, and was substituted for those sections. F G H I for or on account of any other person. This court has no doubt that, if the appellant was entrusted with the property, or if he received it, there was evidence that he fraudulently converted it to his own use or benefit. In the opinion of this court, a person may be entrusted with property or may receive it for or on account of another person within the meaning of this section, notwithstanding that the property is not delivered to him directly by the owner, and that, in fact, the owner does not know of his existence and has no intention of entrusting the property to him. If the accused has obtained or assumed the control of the property of another person in circumstances whereby he becomes entrusted or whereby his receipt becomes a receipt for or on account of another person, and fraudulently converts it or the proceeds, then he has committed an offence within the section. For the purpose of determining whether the offence has been committed, the words "being entrusted" should not be read as being limited to the moment of the sending or delivering of the property by the owner, but may cover any subsequent period during which a person becomes entrusted with the property. Equally, the words "having received" may cover the receipt at any time by a person who receives the property for or on account of another. There cannot, however, be a fraudulent conversion without an attempt to defraud. A company has no mind and cannot have an intention; if the person directing and controlling the affairs of the company, and by whose instructions the property has passed into the possession of the company and has been converted, intended to convert it fraudulently, he would be guilty of an offence whether the property was fraudulently converted to the use and benefit of the company or to his own use and benefit. If he did the acts with an intent to defraud, it would not be an answer to prove that he did them as the agent or servant of another person, whether a company or an individual. Moreover, if the company was used by his directions as the instrument, so as to enable him in the name of the company to become possessed of the property and by means of the company to convert it fraudulently to his own use and benefit, he would be guilty of an offence under this statute.

Having now stated the law applicable, we proceed to examine the evidence. Where there is a conflict of testimony it must be considered by the light of the verdict. The charges made against the appellant, and of which he was convicted, were in respect of (a) a sum of £894 2s. sent by a Miss Miller for the purchase of £1,200 Consols; (b) certain shares sent by one Ranking for sale, with instructions to invest the proceeds in other shares; (c) a sum of £311 6s. sent by Ranking to purchase shares; and (d) a sum of £91 5s. 6d. sent by one Barthrop for the purchase of £100 stock. Olivers & Partners, Ltd., was a company formed under the Companies Acts to carry on the business of stock and share brokers. In 1912, it went into liquidation and the goodwill of the business was purchased by the appellant, who formed a new company in August, 1912, with the name of H. St. John Oliver & Partners, Ltd. This company took over the assets of the old company and carried on the business of stock and share brokers, of 68 St. James Street, Pall Mall, and paid, or agreed to pay, £409 per annum for its offices. The appellant and one officer were the directors. Jones was the managing clerk, and other persons were also employed. According to the evidence of Jones and Oliver, the persons employed were engaged by the appellant. No business was conducted except under his instructions; Oliver superintended the routine of the business and sought customers, but no business of any importance was ever transacted except under the directions of the appellant. The letters were placed before him and were answered or dealt with in pursuance of orders given by him. The appellant was in daily attendance at the office of the company, and the books of the company were also kept and the entries made under his direction. The pass book of the company's banking account and the accounts of the clients with the company were placed before him. Instructions for the purchase or sale of stocks and shares, payments by the company and the dealings with moneys paid to the company took place under the sole direction and exclusive control of the appellant, who supplied money to the company and financed it. In the words of the managing clerk, "no one else had any control over the business of the firm." In November, 1912, the appellant resigned his position as director of the company because of some law suit in which he was concerned, and one Forde took his place. Forde was a friend of the appellant, and had been some little time in the office of the company to learn the business. From April 7, 1913, to May 7, 1913, there were no directors of the company. No change whatsoever was ever made in the conduct of the business—it continued as before under the exclusive control and direction of the appellant. The company was wound-up in June, 1913, and at that date it appears from the company's books that the company was indebted to the appellant in the sum of £1,245. The company never had sufficient business to make it a paying concern. The moneys paid into its banking account were derived from customers who sent either money to invest or shares to sell, or from the appellant. On Dec. 14, 1912, a Miss Miller forwarded the sum of £894 2s. addressed to Oliver & Partners, Ltd., the old company, with instructions to purchase Consols to the nominal value of £1,200. The letter was answered on Dec. 16 in the name of the new company, H. St. John Oliver & Partners, Ltd., enclosing a contract note showing the purchase by the company on her behalf of £1,200 Consols for the January Consols account. The contract note was a mere sham; no transaction had been executed in Consols. A book entry was made of a purchase of £1,200 Consols for Miss Miller from the T.G.W. Syndicate, Ltd. The T.G.W. Syndicate, Ltd., was another company whose business was conducted at the same address by the appellant. Another entry recorded that the appellant had purchased £1,200 Consols for the T.G.W. Syndicate. These entries were mere fictitious records of transactions which had never taken place. They were made by the instructions of the appellant. The sum of £894 2s. was paid into the company's banking account. At that date the account was overdrawn to the extent of some £400 against securities which had been deposited. The effect of the payment of Miss Miller's money was to put the company's account in credit and to release the securities held by the bank. Subsequently, Miss Miller having complained of the non-receipt of the Consols or interest on the same, a dividend of £7 1s. 3d., purporting to be the amount received on the Consols, was sent to Miss Miller. No such sum had been received; it was debited to the account of the appellant with the company. It was not in dispute that no Consols had ever been purchased for Miss Miller and that the money sent by her had been fraudulently converted. There is abundant evidence that the material acts relative to Miss Miller's money were done by the directions of the appellant. The letters and documents were placed before him, and on various occasions both Oliver and Jones respectively mentioned to the appellant the omission to purchase the Consols on Miss Miller's account. The appellant denied all knowledge of the facts relating to Miss Miller until March, 1913, but it is evident from the verdict of the jury that they preferred the evidence of Oliver and Jones and rejected the evidence of the appellant. In December, 1912, one Ranking forwarded the certificate and transfer of certain shares to the company with instructions to sell them and purchase other shares. Subsequently Ranking forwarded £311 6s. to the company with instructions to purchase shares for the amount. The appellant was aware of all the material facts and gave the directions relating to the dealing with the shares and the money. Fictitious records of transactions which had never taken place were made in the books of the company and sham contract notes were sent in the name of the company, and, according to the evidence of Jones, by the directions of the appellant. Ranking never in fact received either shares or money, and both the shares and the money sent by him were fraudulently converted. Similar transactions and with similar results took place with one Barthrop, who forwarded money to the company with instructions to purchase £100 Japanese stock.

The court is of opinion that there was ample evidence to support the conviction of the appellant in respect of all these charges. Whether the transactions are regarded as those of the company directed and controlled by the appellant as the agent of the company, or whether they are regarded as the transactions of the appellant using the company as the instrument to carry them out, there is abundant evidence that, although the property was sent to the company, the appellant obtained or assumed exclusive control over the property in question and that it was fraudulently converted by his directions. There was, therefore, evidence to support the conviction, and the appellant's first point fails.

On the argument as to misdirection of the jury by the learned recorder, it is true that there are passages in the summing-up which apparently fail to recognise the existence of the legal entity of the company as a separate person, and which, taken alone, might convey the idea that a one-man company was necessarily a sham or bogus company; but, viewed as a whole and without too minute an examination of the language of the recorder, we are of opinion that it sufficiently directs the attention of the jury to the material question of fact—namely, whether the appellant was the person who, having complete control of the affairs of the company, had become entrusted with or had received the property, although nominally it was delivered to the company or paid into the banking account of the company, and whether the appellant had fraudulently converted the property either to the company's or to his own use and benefit. In our opinion, the passages in the summing-up of which complaint is made have not caused any substantial miscarriage of justice. If these observations had not been made by the recorder, and if the direction had been quite accurate in law, the result on the facts of this case would have been the same, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Libel—Justification—Evidence—Character and reputation—Events happening after date of publication of libel.

In an action for libel where justification of the words complained of as relating to the general character and reputation of the plaintiff is pleaded, evidence of events which have happened within a reasonable time after the date of the publication of the libel and go to show the likelihood of an alleged tendency is admissible.

Appeal from a decision of RIDLEY, J.

On Mar. 1, 1912, an action in the King's Bench Division was commenced by the plaintiff, who was the managing director of the Oil Trust of Galicia, Ltd., against the defendants, who were the printers and publishers of the "Financial Times," to recover damages for an alleged libel published by them in the issue of their newspaper dated Jan. 17, 1912. The words complained of and the meanings alleged were stated by the plaintiff in para. 3 of his statement of claim to be as follows: B

> "'Arrest of Mr. B. P. Maisel.—Warrant executed in Berlin.—Charge of fraud in connection with patents. It is announced that Mr. B. P. Maisel, who is well known in London, has been arrested in Berlin on a warrant issued by the authorities of Hanover, charging him with fraud in connection with a number of transactions relating to patents. Mr. Maisel was identified by means of a drawing which the police had made from descriptions given by a person who claims to have been victimised by the prisoner, among whose luggage were found bills and securities representing a sum of over £75,000 in addition to a considerable amount of jewellery. Mr. Maisel was a director of the Oil Trust of Galicia. . . . Inquiries at the London office [meaning thereby the office of the Oil Trust of Galicia] elicited a statement to the effect that, so far as was known, none of the property found on Mr. Maisel related to the Oil Trust of Galicia, and, on this becoming known, the shares, which had previously been selling at a little over 11s., advanced sharply, and at the close were bid for at 12s. 3d. It is, of course, very difficult to say at present precisely how Mr. Maisel's affairs stand, but it would appear that there was practically no opportunity for him to gain possession of any cash or securities belonging to the company. A board meeting was held yesterday, but no information, beyond what we have already set forth, was forthcoming. It is probable that the directors will issue a statement at an early date.' C D E F
> Meaning thereby that the plaintiff had absconded from this country and had taken with him £75,000 in securities and a large quantity of jewellery, of which he was unlawfully in possession, and which were the property of the Oil Trust of Galicia, Ltd., or of some other person or company, and that his affairs were in an involved condition and that he was of doubtful solvency, and that his character and reputation were such that he was likely to have misappropriated funds of companies with which he was connected, and that he would have misappropriated the funds of the Oil Trust of Galicia, Ltd., if he had had the opportunity, and that inquiries had been made at the offices of the said company and that the officials thereof had refused to state whether the said property was or was not the property of the said company, but that the board of the said company were investigating its affairs with a view to ascertaining whether the plaintiff had misappropriated its funds." G H

By para. 3 (a) of their defence, the defendants denied the meaning attributed to the words set out in para. 3 of the statement of claim or that they so meant them, and by para. 3 (b) of their defence as finally amended by the Court of Appeal they stated as follows: I

> "In the alternative to what is in this paragraph hereinbefore stated the defendants say that if the said words mean that the plaintiff was of a character and reputation such that he was likely to have misappropriated funds of companies with which he was connected and that he would have misappropriated the funds of the Oil Trust of Galicia, Ltd., if he had had the opportunity and that he was an unfit person to be a director of the said or any company, the said words are, in the meaning that the plaintiff was of a character and reputation such that he was likely to have misappropriated funds of companies with which he was connected and that he would have misappropriated the funds of the Oil Trust of Galicia, Ltd., if he had had the opportunity and that he was an unfit person to be a director of the said or any company, true in substance and in fact."

In support of this plea of justification the defendants delivered on Dec. 16, 1913 (inter alia), particulars stating as facts certain events which had taken place after the date of the publication of the libel. By an order of the Court of Appeal dated Jan. 13, 1914, the above particulars were ordered (inter alia) to stand as particulars of the amended defence, and the defendants were given leave to deliver to the plaintiff certain interrogatories based on them. On Feb. 1, 1915, the House of Lords (84 L.J.K.B. at p. 2145) affirmed the order of the Court of Appeal. The defendants applied in chambers that the plaintiff should be ordered to answer certain of the interrogatories which related to events which took place after the publication of the libel. The master directed that so much of the particulars as related to events subsequent to the alleged libel should be struck out, and refused to order the plaintiff to answer the interrogatories. RIDLEY, J., reversed the order of the master and ordered the plaintiff to answer the interrogatories.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is an appeal which raises a point that has been very fully and very ably argued by counsel for the plaintiff, and which is, whether, having regard to the terms of the innuendo in an action for libel, and having regard to the amendment made by the Court of Appeal, which I assume was made by the consent of both parties, it is open to the defendants in the particulars of justification to refer to matters which took place after the publication of the alleged libel. Speaking generally, in an ordinary case of libel, as was put by PHILLIMORE, L.J., in this very case, if you say of a man, "He stole a hatchet on such and such a day," you must justify that particular allegation, and that is all. It is not relevant to say that he stole a hatchet the day before, or stole a hatchet the day after. But when you get an allegation such as I find here, it seems to me that different considerations apply.

How does the plaintiff put it in his statement of claim? In para. 3, after setting out the libel itself—a libel which, no doubt, made serious charges against the plaintiff—it goes on to say: [HIS LORDSHIP read the innuendo, and continued:] When this matter came before the Court of Appeal, the court allowed or, I think I may go further and say, the court settled, this amendment in para. 3 (b): [HIS LORDSHIP read para. 3 (b), as re-amended, and continued:] In a general allegation by way of justification of general character and general tendency, which are the only words I can think of at the moment as the meaning of the word "likely," I do not see how you can exclude events which happen, I will not say years after, but within a reasonable time from the date of the publication. I instance a case which seems to me to be rather analogous: an allegation that the plaintiff was addicted to drink and would get drunk if he could. Could you exclude evidence that, the day after publication of that libel, he had been found suffering from delirium tremens? It seems to me you could not in answer to a general allegation of what the man was likely to have done if he could. Of course, the acts in question raised by the amendment may be altogether too distant in point of time from the publication of the alleged libel. I do not in the least suggest that they are or are not, but the allegations in the particulars relate to allegations of a similar kind within some two or three months from the publication of the alleged libel. Having regard to the financial nature of these transactions, I do not think it possible to say that they were too remote to be allowed to be evidence of what a man was likely to have done at the date of the publication.

That being so, I think that the view taken by RIDLEY, J., in this case was right. This was not merely a justification of the particular acts he had done at the time, but was an allegation of his being likely to have done these acts if he had the opportunity. In my opinion, the view taken by the learned judge was right, and I think this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is nominally whether answers should be given to interrogatories. But in substance it is whether it is admissible in an action of libel, where there is a plea of justification, to give, in support of that plea, particulars alleging acts which occurred after the libel. It seems to me that, to that proposition, there can be given no direct answer, Yes or No; I think it must depend on the nature of the libel and it must also depend on the nature of the acts.

The nature of the libel here has been defined by the innuendo. When I say "the nature of the libel," I do not say that a jury would necessarily say that it means that; but that is what the plaintiff alleges that it means according to the final amendment of the defence. The defendants say that, if the said words mean that the plaintiff was of a character and reputation such that he was likely to have misappropriated the funds of the company with which he was connected and that he would have misappropriated the funds of the Oil Trust of Galicia, Ltd., if he had had the opportunity,

> "the said words are in the meaning that the plaintiff was of a character and reputation such that he was likely to have misappropriated funds of companies with which he was connected and that he would have misappropriated the funds of the Oil Trust of Galicia, Ltd., if he had the opportunity and that he was an unfit person to be a director of the said or any company true in substance and in fact."

Those are the particulars as finally settled, and those particulars are taken from the plaintiff's own innuendo.

The innuendo was that it meant that his character and reputation were such that he was likely to have misappropriated the funds of the company with which he was connected, and that he would have misappropriated the funds of the Oil Trust of Galicia, Ltd., if he had had the opportunity. Therefore, the particulars of the defence as finally settled follow exactly the innuendo of the plaintiff. That alleges that this libel has three meanings, as I read it: that he was of a character and reputation such that he was likely to have misappropriated; that he would have misappropriated if he had the opportunity, and that he was an unfit person to be a director—the third one I have left out. That being the meaning as alleged and the defence of justification which is set up, it seems to me that it is impossible to exclude, by one general proposition, particulars of any acts that took place after the libel. The allegation is that he was of a character to misappropriate funds, and that he would misappropriate funds if he got the chance. It seems to me that it cannot be irrelevant to show that, very shortly after the libel, as soon as he did get the chance, he did misappropriate.

I wish to adopt entirely what was said by LORD READING, C.J., in his judgment so as to guard myself against being supposed to say that, wherever an allegation is made against a man of having done something, you may give evidence of what has happened during all his life as being evidence to show it was likely to happen. It is expressed perfectly clearly by the Lord Chief Justice thus:

> "Suppose, for example, to use PHILLIMORE, L.J.'s illustration, if you say A.B. stole a hatchet, and then you give particulars, justifying that by a series of acts extending over his life, showing either that he had stolen other articles, or that he was the kind of dishonest person who would steal articles if he had the chance, nothing in our judgment is intended to give effect to any such contention as that. We understood that was the contention put forward by A Mr. Shearman. It is quite clear that could not be; it has been decided many times, and it is unnecessary to deal further with that."

I wish to guard myself against being supposed to say that, if you want to prove a libel on a man alleging something at a particular date, you may always go and prove anything that happened afterwards in order to show that he was likely to B have done it. I do not think such a proposition can be maintained for a moment. But where, as here, the allegation is that he is a person of a character likely to do a certain act and that he would do the certain act if he got the opportunity, then it seems to me that it cannot be said to be irrelevant to prove that, as soon as ever he got the opportunity, a short time after the libel, he did it. It may be that the act which he did was so long after the libel that it would have no relevance at all C having regard to the time of the libel. If that were so, it would not be admissible.

The only doubt I have had in this case is whether some, at any rate, of these acts are not too remote and, therefore, ought not to be given in evidence in that way. But I think, considering that the libel was published somewhere about the middle of January, 1912, and that these transactions alleged in the particulars began somewhere about the middle of February and continued systematically, D according to the allegation (I do not say whether it is true or not), from that time up to May, 1912, there is not really any reason for excluding them on the ground that they are too remote. Therefore, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I agree. The plaintiff complains, among other things, that the defendants had said that he would have misappropriated the funds of the E particular company if he had had the opportunity. The defendants have justified that statement. The libel having been in January, they propose to allege that, on several occasions, commencing early in February, and extending to some day in May, of 1912, he had the opportunity and availed himself of it. It seems to me that the series of acts which they propose to allege come so near to the date of the libel that evidence of it would be admissible in support of justification of F the statement that he would have done the acts if he had the chance.

In the Court of Appeal on the previous occasion and in the House of Lords (84 L.J.K.B. at p. 2145), the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords were not dealing with the particular complaint we are dealing with now. They were dealing then with another complaint—namely, that the defendants had said of the plaintiff that he was a man of a certain character and reputation. I read the plaintiff's G complaint contained in the innuendo and, therefore, the plea of justification, as leading to three separate things: the character, the reputation, and the fact that the plaintiff would have done a certain thing if he had the chance, and that, therefore, he was not a fit person to be a director.

I agree that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

The effect of s. 209 (1), (2) (b), and (3), of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [now s. 319 (1) (a) (i), (5) (b), and (6) of the Companies Act, 1948] read together is that the costs and expenses of the winding-up of a company are payable out of the assets of the company not comprised in a debenture security before any payment is made by the liquidator in respect of preferential debts, but that, if the general assets after discharge of the costs and expenses of the winding-up are insufficient for the payment of the preferential debts, then to the extent to which they are insufficient the amount must be made up by a debenture-holder whose security creates a floating charge on the property of the company to the amount necessary out of the property comprised in or subject to that charge. In other words, whether a creditor be an unsecured creditor or a debenture-holder whose only security is that of a floating charge, he is equally to be postponed in respect of any claim against the assets of the company until the preferential debts have been paid, but the free general assets must be exhausted before recourse is had to the secured assets.

In an action by a rating authority and a company being wound-up as joint plaintiffs against a debenture-holder for an amount due for rates, the defendant objected that the trustees of the deed ought to have been made defendants, and also that neither of the plaintiffs was entitled to sue, there being no privity between the defendant and the plaintiff corporation, and no debt due from the defendant for rates to the plaintiff company.

F

Held: although in an ordinary case the trustees should be defendants, yet that was not necessary in this case; while in the ordinary case of a claim in respect of a preferential debt the company would be the proper plaintiffs in the present case either the company or the authority could sue.

Action by a local authority and the company to recover from a debenture-holder a sum of £127 4s. 5d. due for rates.

The United Travellers' Club Co., Ltd., was formed in September, 1911, as a company limited by guarantee without any share capital to establish, maintain, and conduct a club to be called the United Travellers' Club and to provide a club-house. By cl. 6 of the memorandum of association every member of the company undertook to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of the same being wound-up during the time he was a member, or within one year afterwards, for payment of the debts and liabilities of the company contracted before the time at which he ceased to be a member, and of the costs, charges, and expenses of winding-up the same, such amount as might be required not exceeding £1, the sum to be set aside out of his first club subscription or entrance fee. On Jan. 16, 1912, the company issued a debenture, promising on Jan. 1, 1915, or such earlier day as the moneys secured became payable, to pay to F. Sammarcelli and G. Leclair, or other the registered holder, £8,000, and the company charged the whole of its property and assets with the payment of the moneys secured. By condition (1) the debenture was the only first debenture issued or to be issued by the company, and was a first charge upon the property of the company, and such charge was to be a floating security. By condition (8) the principal became payable if an order was made or an effective resolution was passed for winding-up of the company. By a deed of the same date, after reciting that a club had been established at No. 134, Piccadilly, aforesaid, called the United Travellers' Club, and that the expenses of and incidental to the formation, establishment, and conduct of the club had been defrayed by F. Sammarcelli and G. Leclair, and that repayment of such advances, amounting to £8,000, was secured by a debenture bond bearing even date therewith, the company assigned the whole of the property and assets in and upon the premises of the club, No. 134, Piccadilly, London, together with all the interest of the company in the same, to certain trustees. It was provided that the trustees should not interfere with the management of the club until default in observance by the company of the covenants and conditions of the debenture bond, but upon such default they might enforce the debenture and take possession of and realise the said property and assets for the benefit of the debenture-holders. By various transfers the debenture bond became vested in July, 1912, in the defendant C. F. Chapman, who was and remained the sole debenture-holder of the company. On May, 1913, an order was made on the petition of a creditor for winding-up the company. The official receiver as liquidator proceeded to wind-up the company, but the only moneys he received were certain sums paid by members of the company as guarantors under the memorandum of association to the amount of £88 7s. 2d., and, after paying thereout the costs, charges, and expenses of the liquidation, the liquidator had in hand only the sum of £1 8s. In his statement of affairs the liquidator stated that the number of members of the company had been 1,683. On July 23 and 24, 1913, the trustees of the debenture trust deed sold the company's interest in their lease of the club premises and the contents of the club premises, and realised, after payment of the expenses of the sale, sums amounting to £1,473 10s. 3d. This amount was received by the defendant or on his behalf, but was much less than the sum still owing to him upon the security of the debenture. The plaintiff corporation, to whom rates to the amount of £127 4s. 5d. were due in respect of the occupation by the plaintiff company of the club premises up to July 23, 1913, claimed this sum from the defendant Chapman, and ultimately they, together with the company as joint plaintiffs, brought this action, claiming a declaration that the amount of the rate had priority over the claims of the defendant as debenture-holder, and was payable out of the property comprised in such debenture, and payment by the defendant to the plaintiff corporation or, alternatively, to the plaintiff company of the amount in question.

By s. 209 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [s. 319 (1) (a) (i), (5) (b), (6), of Companies Act, 1948] :

> "(1) In a winding-up there shall be paid in priority to all other debts (a) all parochial and other rates due from the company at the date hereinafter mentioned [i.e., the date of the winding-up order] and having become due and payable within twelve months before that date.... (2) The foregoing debts shall (a) rank equally among themselves and be paid in full, unless the assets are insufficient to meet them, in which case they shall abate in equal proportions; and (b) in the case of a company registered in England or Ireland, so far as the assets of a company available for payment of general creditors are insufficient to meet them, have priority over the claims of holders of debentures under a floating charge created by the company, and be paid accordingly, and of any property comprised in or subject to that charge. (3) Subject to the retention of such sums as may be necessary for the costs and expenses of the winding-up, the foregoing debts shall be discharged forthwith so far as the assets are insufficient to meet them."

E. W. Hansell for the plaintiffs.
Harold S. Simmons for the defendant.

YOUNGER, J. (after stating the facts).—It is not disputed that the rate is due by the company; that it was properly made; that it is properly apportioned; and that the sum of £127 4s. 5d. is the sum which is due from the company. It is also not in substance disputed, and it has been proved in evidence, that the liquidator has in fact received a sum of £88 17s. 2d., and has applied it in payment of the costs and expenses of the winding-up, leaving in his hands a balance of £1 8s. and no more. The sum which he has so applied was not covered by the security, but was paid by the guarantors to the liquidator in respect of their liability under the memorandum of association. The result, therefore, is that, with the exception of £1 8s., the liquidator has no moneys now in hand. He accordingly in the name of the plaintiff company, the corporation being joined as co-plaintiffs, sues the defendant for that sum of £127 4s. 5d., which he says remains payable by him.

Whether it is so payable depends upon s. 209 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, which provides in sub-s. (1):

"In a winding-up there shall be paid in priority to all other debts (a) all parochial or other local rates due from the company at the date hereinafter mentioned."

It is, as I have said, conceded that the amount due under that description by this company to the plaintiff corporation was £127 4s. 5d. The section goes on to provide in sub-s. (2):

"The foregoing debts [of which the debt in the present case is one] shall. . . . (b) in the case of a company registered in England or Ireland, so far as the assets of a company available for payment of general creditors are insufficient to meet them, have priority over the claims of holders of debentures under a floating charge created by the company, and be paid accordingly out of any property comprised in or subject to that charge."

Subsection (3) is:

"Subject to the retention of such sums as may be necessary for the costs and expenses of the winding-up, the foregoing debts shall be discharged forthwith so far as the assets are sufficient to meet them."

The effect of these subsections read together appears to me to be that the costs and expenses of the winding-up of a company are payable out of the assets of the company not comprised in a debenture security before any payment is made by the liquidator in respect of what are called "preferential debts." But that if the general assets after discharge of the costs and expenses of the winding-up are insufficient for the payment of these preferential debts, then to the extent to which they are insufficient the amount must be made up by a debenture-holder whose security creates a floating charge upon the property of the company to the amount necessary out of the property comprised in or subject to that charge. In other words, the effect of the statute appears to me to be, and to be intended to be, that whether a creditor be an unsecured creditor or a debenture-holder whose only security is that of a floating charge, he is equally to be postponed in respect of any claim against the assets of the company until those preferential debts have

A been paid, but that the free general assets must be exhausted before recourse is had to the secured assets.

The defendant in this case is the only debenture-holder. He has, as he admits, received as the result of a sale of which he approved this sum of £1,473 10s. 3d., which is more than sufficient to meet the plaintiffs' claim in this action. The liquidator has only the sum of £1 8s. of general assets in his hands to meet this B claim, and accordingly it appears to me that, subject to a technical question to which I will refer in a moment, he is liable to make good, as being moneys in his hands realised from property comprised in or subject to his floating charge, the amount which is claimed in this action, less the sum of £1 8s.

It is, however, suggested by counsel for the defendant, that the action is improperly constituted. First, as regards the defendant, he said that the only C person who would be a proper defendant to the action, assuming it to be otherwise maintainable, would be the trustees who had in fact received the moneys and had parted with them, and that in an ordinary case it would be extremely inconvenient, if not impossible, after the money had been distributed among debenture-holders, to make all of them defendants in an action like the present—which goes to show that this defendant is not the proper defendant. I quite agree that in an ordinary D action it would be desirable that the receiver for the debenture-holders, or the trustees, or whoever were the persons who actually conducted the sale, should before distribution of the money among the debenture-holders be required to make good a prior claim, such as this, and in nine cases out of ten they would do so; in fact, they would dispose of the money to others at their own risk in view of a claim which they must be taken to have notice of merely from the E existence of the liquidation. But in the present case it seems to me that it would have been the merest formality to have made the trustees defendants to this action because they were bound to, and I have no doubt did, act in all respects under the direction of the defendant who was the sole debenture-holder, and because the defendant as the sole debenture-holder admits that he has in point of fact received from the trustees more than enough to meet this claim out of the property F comprised in the security. Accordingly, it appears to me that in this case the defendant is the proper defendant, and the only reasonably proper defendant to the action.

It is also said that there is a difficulty as to who the plaintiff ought to be. It is said that the plaintiff company is not the proper plaintiff because the money is not due to it, and also that the plaintiff corporation is not a proper plaintiff G because there is no obligation on the part of the defendant to make payment of the money to them. That point is taken quite frankly with a view to leading to the conclusion that in a case like the present there can be no proper plaintiff, and, therefore, there can be no proper claim. I do not think that the Act has reduced the court to such a position. It appears to me that in the present case either the plaintiff company or the plaintiff corporation is the proper H plaintiff. Perhaps they are not both necessary plaintiffs, but one or other of them is the proper plaintiff to make the claim in this action. My own view would be that in an ordinary case the company is the proper plaintiff, because where there are more claimants than one in respect of preferential payments, the Act provides that these payments are to be made and distributed rateably among the claimants. I think it would be extremely inconvenient in I nearly every case for anybody other than the company, suing, of course, at the instance of the liquidator, to be plaintiff, because when money is received it then becomes the duty of the liquidator in the liquidation to make the rateable division which is prescribed by sub-s. (2) (a) of s. 209. The other alternative would be that each of the preferential claimants would be entitled to maintain a separate action against persons in the position of the defendant here, and, if that were done, it would be burdensome on the claimants and equally burdensome on the defendant, especially in cases where the plaintiffs would be working men or persons of that class who would be making claims in respect of wages or payments of that nature. Therefore, in my view, the proper plaintiff is the plaintiff company; and the company have come here to make the demand. But if it were not, the only other possible person to come is the plaintiff corporation, and it is here also. Under these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief which they seek. I think the proper form of order will be that, the plaintiff company not objecting, the £127 4s. 5d., less the £1 8s., be paid by the defendant direct to the plaintiff corporation. The defendant must pay the costs of the action.

The plaintiff obtained a decree absolute for the dissolution of her marriage and presented a petition for permanent maintenance. The court ordered the late husband, the defendant, to pay "permanent maintenance at and after the rate of £62 10s. per quarter (free of income tax)." The parties then voluntarily entered into a deed whereby the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff "to pay to her during her life the quarterly sum of £62 10s. (free of income tax)." The defendant deducted income tax from a quarterly payment. The plaintiff sought to recover the amount deducted. The defendant claimed that the deduction was valid inasmuch as the covenant to pay in full was void by s. 103 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, and he was empowered to make the deduction by virtue of s. 102 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, and s. 40 of the Income Tax Act, 1853.

A. M. Latter for the plaintiff.

du Parcq for the defendant.

SCRUTTON, J.—The plaintiff brings this action to recover from the defendant £62 10s. due under an indenture dated Dec. 22, 1910, less £41 13s. 4d. already paid. The defendant denies that he is liable to pay the difference, and, alternatively, brings into court three-quarters of it and says that that is enough to satisfy any sum for which he is liable.

It appears that the parties had matrimonial differences, and that on Dec. 22, 1910, the president of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division made an order, by consent, that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff "permanent maintenance at and after the rate of £62 10s. per quarter (free of income tax)," and the sum referred to in the writ in this action is one of these quarterly payments. Counsel are agreed that no action could be brought in the King's Bench Division on an order in these terms. The King's Bench Division does not enforce by action orders for maintenance made in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division. Possibly that was the reason why the parties voluntarily entered into the deed of Dec. 22, 1910, by which the defendant, in pursuance of the agreement and in consideration of the premises, one of which was the order, covenanted with the plaintiff "to pay her during her life the quarterly sum of £62 10s. (free of income tax)." The existence of that covenant enables the plaintiff to sue in the King's Bench Division, and to get the benefit of the summary procedure under R.S.C., Ord. 14 if the £62 10s. were not duly paid, and this action is brought on that covenant.

The answer made to the action is that the court cannot enforce the covenant because it is null and void. There are two sections of the Income Tax Act, 1842, which bear on the matter. By s. 102 it is provided that on all annual payments whatever arising out of, inter alia, "a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract" a certain sum, which in 1842 was sevenpence, and has since become much larger, "shall be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount thereof," and the person "so liable to make such payment" is authorised to deduct the tax out of the annual payment when the sum is payable out of profits or gains brought into charge by virtue of the Act of 1842, and in case the sum is payable out of profits and gains not brought into charge under the Act of 1842 the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, s. 24 (3) provides that the person paying is not merely authorised to but "shall" deduct the tax out of the annual payment. It is not suggested that the payment in this case is a payment out of profits not brought into charge, and, therefore, the person paying has a right to deduct the tax but need not do so; and it is quite clear that s. 102 of the Act of 1842 does not in any way interfere with the operation of the covenant in this indenture, because there is nothing in the section to prevent a person who is authorised to deduct the tax from binding himself by contract not to deduct it. As an illustration of that one may refer to the case, not of a contract, but of a will, by which an annuity may be left free of income tax so that the annuity is paid in full and the income tax is paid by the person liable to pay the annuity.

The defendant in this case relied on s. 103, the material part of which is in the last sentence:

> "All contracts, covenants, and agreements made or entered into, or to be made or entered into, for payment of any interest, rent, or other annual payment aforesaid, in full, without allowing such deduction as aforesaid, shall be utterly void."

The words "such deduction as aforesaid" refer to the words at the beginning of the section, "any deduction authorised to be made by this Act," and refer, among other things, to the deduction authorised to be made by s. 102. The words "or other annual payment aforesaid" refer to the earlier part of s. 103, in which one finds the words "any annuity or annual payment mentioned . . . in the next preceding clause," which again take one back to s. 102. The contention of the defendant is that this covenant to pay £62 10s. free of income tax is a covenant for the payment of an annual payment arising out of a contract without allowing the deduction of income tax within the meaning of s. 103, and the covenant is, therefore, "utterly void." It is said for the plaintiff that this is not really a covenant to pay £62 10s. free of income tax; it is really a covenant to pay £62 10s., plus such sum, representing the income tax, as, when deducted from the principal sum, would leave a clear £62 10s. for the particular quarter, and it is said that I ought to try to construe the covenant so as to make it legally possible. I am disposed, particularly in view of what I am going to say at a later stage, to give to the covenant, if possible, such a meaning as would give effect to the intention of the parties, but I find very great difficulty in saying that a contract to pay £62 10s. free of income tax means a contract to pay an entirely different sum which, after deducting the income tax, will leave £62 10s. I am inclined to agree with counsel for the plaintiff, that if the covenant had expressed the latter view, it would have been a valid covenant, but it is, in my opinion, impossible to extract that meaning from the language which the parties have used, and, therefore, unless the other point urged on behalf of the plaintiff is good, it appears to me that this contract comes within the exact words of s. 103, and that the covenant in the deed is void.

The other point is this: it is said that for the purpose of construing the covenant one must have regard to the order for permanent maintenance made by the Divorce Court and to the practice of that court in accordance with which the order was made, and that by so doing one arrives at the conclusion that a deduction of income tax has in fact been made, not from the sum of £62 10s., but from some other sum, and that in these circumstances the covenant does not come within the protection in s. 103. In order to decide this point, it becomes necessary to consider the authorities to which I have been referred. The question of the right to deduct income tax from permanent alimony was very carefully considered by Sir Herbert Jenner Fust in 1845 in Viscount Frankfort de Montmorency v. Viscountess Frankfort de Montmorency (2). In that case there had been a divorce and an order for the payment of £800 a year as permanent alimony. The question then arose whether the sum was to be paid free of income tax. The court laid down that, according to the then practice of the court in fixing the amount of permanent alimony, the gross income of the husband was taken and the income tax which he would have to pay was deducted, and the net income then arrived at was then divided between the husband and the wife in varying proportions according to the case, with the result that from each pound which was to go to the wife or was left to the husband there had been in fact a deduction for income tax, and Sir Herbert Jenner Fust pointed out that the effect of the procedure of the court at that time was that as income tax had already been deducted from the husband's income,

> "it would be the height of injustice to call upon the wife to pay the tax on the sums she receives, for that would be making her pay it twice over."

In 1895 Warren v. Warren (3) came before KEKEWICH, J. In that case an order had been made by the Divorce Court that the husband should pay to the wife an annuity of £700, and a deed was entered into whereby the payment of the £700 was secured. There were no words either in the order or the deed saying that the annuity was to be paid free of income tax. KEKEWICH, J., took the view that the annuity, being payable under a deed, was governed by the law relating to deeds, and that from the payments made under the deed income tax could be deducted. Viscount Frankfort de Montmorency v. Viscountess Frankfort de Montmorency (2) does not appear to have been brought to the attention of the learned judge; but in Re Barry's Trusts (1), the same question came again before him, and his attention was then called to Frankfort's Case (2). In Re Barry's Trusts (1) there was no order of the Divorce Court. There was a voluntary deed of separation with a reference to a very distinguished leading counsel to determine the amount of the wifes' alimony, and he named a figure. Nothing was said in the deed as to the alimony being "free of income tax," and the question came before the Chancery Division whether the deduction of income tax was or was not justified. KEKEWICH, J., said that the point was directly covered by his previous decision in Warren v. Warren (3). He referred to the facts in Frankfort's Case (2) and said ([1906] 1 Ch. at p. 772):

> "If I had a case of that kind before me, I should certainly follow it without hesitation."

I do not follow how he could have had a case like that before him unless there was a deed, in which case the point which I am now considering would not arise. Then he says (ibid.):

> "It may be that the rule is not applicable to a covenant—to an obligation by contract. It may be that an entirely different rule is applicable to a case where there is an order of the court, which is made in invitum, and to a case where the obligation is contractual."

He also said—which, of course, was of great importance in that case—that there was no evidence as to how the arbitrator had arrived at the figure, and it appears that the Registrar of the Probate Division had told the learned judge that there was no settled practice on this point, so that he was not able, from the materials before him, to know whether or not income tax had or had not been taken into account. He, therefore, dealt with the matter, as he had done in Warren v. Warren (3), as being a question of debt which was governed by the provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1842, relating to covenants in deeds. The case went to the Court of Appeal, and the court treated the matter as too clear for argument. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said that the practice of the court as to alimony did not touch the case in the slightest degree; but, as KEKEWICH, J., in the court below had said there was no practice, I do not quite understand what that means. The Court of Appeal seemed to have thought that KEKEWICH, J., was right in dealing with the matter on the basis that a deed, although it arose out of matters in the Divorce Court, was governed by the ordinary law as to deeds by the provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1842, as to deeds.

Lastly, I was referred to Countess of Shrewsbury v. Earl of Shrewsbury (4), which was not a case arising out of proceedings in the Divorce Court, but a case where a voluntary deed of separation had been entered into, by which the husband undertook to pay to the wife an annual allowance "clear of all deductions." KENNEDY, J., having read the judgments in Re Barry's Trusts (1), Frankfort's Case (2), and Warren v. Warren (3), felt himself bound by those decisions and concurred with them, and treated them as making it clear that there was an obligation to deduct the tax in such a case as that. He said the contract

> "fell within ss. 102 and 103. He was not satisfied that the contract would have been void under s. 103 if in some way the plaintiff had come into possession of £4,000 a year after complying with s. 102."

I think that the result of these decisions is that when there is a covenant in a deed for payment of maintenance it must be construed as a deed which is subject to the provisions of the Income Tax Acts as to deeds, without regard to the practice of the Divorce Court, and the authorities appear to justify me in holding—and I think I am bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Barry's Trusts (1) to hold—that if this deed is one which provides for the payment of the instalments in full without allowing the deduction of income tax—and, in my opinion, it is such a deed—it comes within the prohibition of s. 103 of the Income Tax Act, 1842.

An order of the Divorce Court does not seem to me, as at present advised, to come within the section, and I think it is quite possible, if proceedings are taken for the enforcement of the order before the learned President of the Divorce Division, that the defendant, who is able to rely in this action on the provisions of s. 103 as justifying the deduction of income tax in spite of the language of the covenant, may not be able to rely on that section as an answer to an application for the enforcement of the order. It is, I think, to be regretted that one may have an action in one division of this court and a proceeding in another division on substantially the same question which may have a different result; but I think the fault does not lie with the courts, but with the advisers of the parties who were not satisfied with the remedies they might have for the enforcement of the order of the Divorce Court.

The result is that I hold that in this action, based on the covenant, the plaintiff is not entitled to rely on the provision in the deed, and the defendant is entitled to deduct the quarter's income tax which he has deducted. The defendant in fact had deducted a year's income tax, but he does not now contend that he is entitled to deduct more than a year's income tax for one quarter, and he has paid into court three-quarters of the amount claimed with a denial of liability; strictly speaking, the plaintiff would be entitled to be paid the costs up to the time of payment in, and the defendant would have the costs subsequently incurred; but I do not like these complicated taxations, and particularly in view of the prospect, which I think very likely, that these proceedings may turn out to be quite futile. In giving judgment for the defendant, as he has paid enough into court, and the plaintiff fails as to the remaining £4 5s. 2d., I do so without costs.

Judgment for defendant.

Where a mortgagee has a mortgage upon certain lands with a power of sale and the lands are compulsorily taken under statutory powers the mortgagee is entitled under the general provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to compensation both for the value of the lands taken and also for the injurious affection of his adjoining lands not taken. In such case the mortgagee is an "owner" within the meaning of the Act, and there is no provision in ss. 108 to 114, which relate to lands subject to mortgage, that deprives him of his right to claim in respect of injurious affection of his lands not taken.

Rule Nisi for a certiorari to quash an inquisition.

The rule called upon the Temperance Permanent Building Society to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue directed to the clerk of the peace for the county of Middlesex to remove into the King's Bench Division an inquisition, verdict and judgment had and taken before the sheriff of the county on Feb. 13, 1914, touching the claim to the amount of purchase money and compensation made by the Temperance Permanent Building Society against the London Electric Railway Co. for the purchase of the society's estate and interest in certain lands and hereditaments described in the schedule to the notice to treat of Feb. 14, 1913, given by the company to the society, and for the injurious affection of other lands described in the schedule. The rule was obtained at the instance of the London Electric Railway Co. The facts as appearing on affidavit were as follows: Pursuant to their statutory powers contained in the London Electric Railway Act, 1912, with which were incorporated the Lands Clauses Acts, the London Electric Railway Co. (herein called "the company") served upon the claimants on Feb. 15, 1913, a notice to treat dated Feb. 14, 1913, stating that the company required to purchase and take under the Act the lands and hereditaments described in the schedule thereto and delineated on the plan thereto annexed, and that the company were willing to treat with the claimants for the purchase of the same, and as to the compensation to be made to them for the damage that might be sustained by them by reason of the execution of the works authorised by the Act. The notice had reference to twenty houses known as Nos. 109 to 147 (inclusive—odd numbers only) Brondesbury Villas, in the parish of Willesden. The company were empowered by their Act to require the houses and thereon to construct a railway to be worked by electrical power. The houses were situate upon a strip of land abutting on the north side of the London and North Western Railway Co.'s main line. The claimants claimed to be entitled as mortgagees in possession with a power of sale to these houses, Nos. 109 to 147 (odd numbers) for various terms of years under four mortgages executed in their favour by one Davis. The first of these mortgages comprised the houses Nos. 109 to 119; the second, the houses Nos. 121 to 127; the third, the houses Nos. 129 to 135, and the fourth, the houses Nos. 137 to 147. These mortgages comprised no other houses. The claimants were also mortgagees in possession with power of sale of certain other lands and hereditaments known as Nos. 114 to 144 (even numbers), Brondesbury Villas, under mortgages executed in their favour by Davis, and these mortgages comprised the last-mentioned houses only (namely, the even numbers). These houses were held by Davis under separate and distinct leases from the houses Nos. 109 to 147 (odd numbers). The claimants claimed £13,411 in respect of the value of their leasehold interest in the houses Nos. 109 to 147 (odd numbers); and they also claimed £2,953 as damage by reason of the severing of the houses Nos. 109 to 147 (odd numbers) from the even number houses or otherwise injuriously affecting such houses. The houses Nos. 109 to 147 (odd numbers) were situate on the south side of the road: and the houses Nos. 114 to 144 (even numbers) were situate on the north side and were opposite to and faced the houses taken by the working of the railway authorised by the Act.

The inquiry was held before the under-sheriff of the county and a special jury. Counsel for the claimants stated that there was due to them upon the mortgages on Nos. 109 to 147 (odd numbers) over £11,000, and they claimed in respect of their interest in such houses a sum in excess of £11,000; and the claimants also claimed a sum in excess of £2,600 for damage done to the houses Nos. 114 to 144 by the execution of the works and the working of the railway authorised by the Act. The company's counsel contended that the claimants could only claim as mortgagees under ss. 108 to 114 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845; that the case did not come within s. 112 of that Act and that the claimants could not claim compensation for injurious affection to the houses Nos. 114 to 144 owing to the working of the railway, but were only entitled to claim the value of their interest in Nos. 109 to 147 (the odd numbers). It was agreed that the jury should make separate assessments in respect of the two sets of houses. Evidence was called at the inquiry not only as to the value of the claimants' interest in the houses Nos. 109 to 147, but also as to the damage to the houses Nos. 114 to 144, which were situate on the north side of the road and faced the houses taken by the working of the railway authorised by the Act and the removal by the company of the houses Nos. 109 to 147 and the consequent increase of noise to the houses Nos. 114 to 144 from the existing London and North-Western Railway Co. There was no evidence of any damage or injurious affection to the Nos. 114 to 144 by the construction of the works authorised by the Act. The jury returned a verdict of £8,258 as the value of the claimants' interest in the houses Nos. 109 to 147, and £1,680 as the compensation to be paid in respect of the damage to the houses Nos. 114 to 144. No objection was taken as to £8,258 awarded by the jury in respect of the claimants' interest in the houses taken which were the odd numbers; but objection was taken to that part of the verdict which awarded as compensation the sum of £1,680 for injurious affection of the houses which were the even numbers and which were not taken, and it was submitted that the claimants were not entitled to the £1,680 awarded in respect of the even numbers, and the application was for a writ of certiorari to set aside that portion of the verdict of the jury which awarded the sum of £1,680 in respect of the even numbers.

The rule was granted on the following grounds: (i) That the claimants being mortgagees of Nos. 109 to 147 (odd numbers) could only claim compensation under ss. 108 to 114 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and under those sections they could only claim for the value of their interest in the houses taken, and could not claim compensation in respect of damage to houses Nos. 114 to 144 (even numbers) of which they are mortgagees under different and distinct mortgages. (ii) That there was no evidence of any damage or injurious affection to Nos. 114 to 144 (even numbers) by the construction of the works. (iii) That there was no evidence of any damage or injurious affection to Nos. 114 to 144 (even numbers) by the construction of the works for which apart from the company's statutory powers, an action could have been maintained against the company by the claimants; and (iv) that the verdict for the sum of £1,680, as it awarded and included compensation for damages to the Nos. 114 to 144 for which, apart from the company's statutory powers, no action could have been maintained against the company by the claimants and also damage by reason of the working of the railway, was wrong as a matter of law and was in excess of jurisdiction.

AVORY, J.—In my opinion this rule must be discharged. The ground upon which it was granted, and the ground on which it has been argued before us, was that a series of sections of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, beginning with s. 108, and, for the present purpose, ending with s. 112, forms a complete code dealing with the rights of mortgagees in a case where land, the subject of the mortgage, is being taken compulsorily by a public authority like a railway company. I believe I am stating quite fairly the point, when I say that that is the whole point—that these sections form a complete code exhausting all the rights of mortgagees in such circumstances. On the other hand, it is said that these sections are only supplemental to the ordinary rights of owners as defined by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act in s. 3, namely, that "owner" shall be understood to mean > "any person . . . who, under the provisions of this or the special Act, would be enabled to sell and convey lands to the promoters of the undertaking."

It is said in answer to this rule that these mortgagees are "owners" within the meaning of this Act; that they have the rights conferred upon owners by s. 19 supplemented by s. 49. That is the real point which we have to determine here. In my opinion, apart from any question which affects this particular case, these particular mortgages of the land on both sides of the road having been consolidated, apart from that question altogether I prefer to rest my judgment upon the footing that there has been no consolidation, that there have been merely mortgages of the land on both sides of the road, and that there has been a finding that the land has in fact been injuriously affected, and on that footing I come to the conclusion that the provisions in s. 108 and s. 110 do not exclude the right of these mortgagees as owners to claim and recover compensation for the injurious affecting of the lands which have not been taken. It appears to me that ss. 108 to 112 are mere provisions enabling the promoters, the undertakers, to deal in a convenient way with mortgagees if they choose to avail themselves of those provisions; and I cannot believe that the effect, as suggested, of s. 108 is that in such a case as the present if the railway company chose to pay off the mortgage upon the land upon one side of the road, the land which they proposed to take, they could by taking that step thereby deprive the mortgagee of the rights which he has already acquired as soon as the notice to treat is given, the right to compensation as an owner under ss. 18 and 49 of the Act. Upon that short ground I think that the contention which has been put forward in support of the rule fails.

ROWLATT, J.—I agree. The point taken in support of the rule is one which would certainly have very extraordinary results if the claimants were to fail merely because we have here mortgagees who have a number of mortgages. I do not think it matters for this purpose for the application of the Cowper Essex Case (1) whether the claimants have come under one title or under several titles, or whether the mortgages are consolidated or not. The claimants have mortgages on all these houses. Some are taken, and the others are injuriously affected. In those circumstances if the houses were unmortgaged there could be no question, and it is not questioned, that the undertakers would have to pay for the value of the houses taken and also pay for the injurious affection of the houses which are not taken. The owner would receive all that compensation in respect of the property all of which is, as a security, in the hands of the mortgagees. It certainly startles one very much to find it suggested that in some way or other the mortgagees are to fail to collect all that compensation which their mortgagor could have collected in respect of the mortgaged property, and one looks with distrust upon any argument which leads to that result. It seems to me that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act has not interfered in the least with the rights of a mortgagee in this respect. It ought to be remembered that the cases have long ago shown that if the undertakers deal with a mortgagor and pay him compensation and incur the expense of a compensation inquiry as between themselves and the mortgagor, they are still subject to its being said at the last moment by the mortgagee that that does not affect him in the least, that his rights are not touched and that he would get an injunction against them and stop them from carrying out their undertaking unless they paid the value of the land to him in the first instance. If there were any surplus over, the mortgagee would, of course, have to account to the mortgagor. It seems to me that if and so far as recourse is to be had in any case to those sections of the Act which specially deal with mortgages, the language of those sections themselves is wide enough to enable the mortgagee to do what the mortgagees in this case are doing. Taking s. 110 and the group of sections which begin with these words: "And with respect to lands subject to mortgage, be it enacted as follows"—s. 110 says: "If any such mortgaged lands shall be of less value than the principal," and so on, then they are to be valued or compensation is to be assessed in the usual way. I see no reason at all why the words "any such mortgaged lands" in that section should not include mortgaged lands which have been injuriously affected, just as much as mortgaged lands which have been taken. If that is so, then there is no difficulty at all in the case. If that section is the appropriate section to apply in any case, then it seems to me that the mortgagee can get the value of the injurious affection of the lands as well as the value of the lands taken; and the same result would follow under s. 112. It has been suggested that a difficulty arises under s. 108, because it is said that under s. 108 the undertakers can pay off the mortgage on a piece of land taken, and that that undermines the whole position of the mortgagee within the Cowper Essex doctrine; and because he has been paid off he ceases—it is said—to be in the position of having lands taken and other lands held therewith which have been injuriously affected. I think the answer given by counsel for the claimants is quite obvious. The lands still are taken and the mortgagee's interest has been expropriated under the Act, and his lands held with the lands injuriously affected have been taken within the Cowper Essex Case (1), although they have been taken under s. 108, just as much as if it had not been a case between mortgagee and mortgagor. For these reasons I agree that the rule should be discharged.

SHEARMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think this application was launched by the promoters with the laudable object of protecting themselves if they could by getting a valid receipt once and for all in respect of this particular claim. As I understand it both the mortgagees in possession and the mortgagor sent in claims for the injurious affection of part of this land, and the railway company are naturally desirous of not being harassed by a second claim, but of getting a perfectly good receipt as regards the first claim, and in order to enable them to get a good receipt they say that they are willing to pay the mortgagor but they say that they are not bound to pay the mortgagee. In support of that contention they raise the argument that ss. 108 to 113 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, are compulsory upon the promoters with regard to any claims to mortgaged land. In my opinion, that contention is wrong. First of all, I think we can infer that from the language of those sections themselves. They are a group of sections, and are headed "Lands subject to mortgage." Section 108 begins with the words "It shall be lawful for the promoters of the undertaking to purchase or redeem the interest of the mortgagee." That seems to me to point to a power given to the promoters at their option, and not to be a section which deprives a mortgagee, who is in equity an owner of the property, of any rights he might have in equity. Section 109 is tacked on to s. 108 by the words: "If in either of the cases aforesaid." Section 110 does not allude to mortgaged lands generally, but to "such mortgaged lands," which I understand are the mortgaged lands referred to in s. 108. Section 111, again, says, "Upon such payment or tender as aforesaid," and s. 112 says, "If a part only of any such mortgaged lands be required." Section 113 begins with the words, "If upon payment or tender to any such mortgagee," and then, in s. 114, which is the last of the group, there is a proviso, "Provided always, that in any of the cases hereinbefore provided with respect to lands subject to mortgage." The whole of the language there used seems to me to provide a group of sections which gives a certain optional power to the promoters, of which they are at liberty to avail themselves, if they think fit, and I think that the general scheme of the Act also points in the same direction. I agree that one of the difficulties of promoters under this Act is that there are no provisions in the Act when the entire interest in the property is grouped in a number of different people for the promoters to call for one assessment of value once and for all, leaving the different people who share the different interests to divide the total sums between themselves. It would, no doubt, be more advantageous for the promoters if such a power existed, but I do not think it is to be found within the sections of this Act.

The result is that the promoters are put under an onerous obligation, but people who compulsorily acquire property must not complain at being put under onerous obligations, one of which is that they may be called upon to assess the value of different interests at different times. That may be found in various sections of the Act. Section 18, with regard to serving notices to treat, says that a notice shall be sent to all the parties interested in such lands. When we turn to s. 38, with regard to claims, it says that the promoters are to state in the notices what sum they are willing to give for the interests in such lands, and when we come to s. 49, which is another section to which we have been referred, with regard to the inquiry before a jury, it says that the jury are to deliver their verdict separately for the sums of money to be paid for the purchase of the lands, or of any interest therein belonging to the party with whom the question of disputed compensation shall have arisen. I think it is quite clear that parties who have different interests are entitled to come up at different times and have those interests assessed; but I think in a case where a mortgagee whose mortgage is larger than the value of the property is likely to prove, the difficulty of the promoters is rather an illusory one. Once the mortgagee, who can give a perfectly good title, has come up and has had the entire interest both for compensation for the lands taken and for injurious affection to his rights under the earlier sections of the Act, I do not think in practice that the promoters are likely to be harassed by the mortgagor, because it is quite clear that the interest which is left in him is illusory and they are not likely to be troubled again with a second claim, although it is impossible under the section of the Act, as I read the Act, that they can prevent it from being made. I think this application was launched with a laudable desire to get a protection for the promoters which the Act does not afford them. In my judgment, those sections of the Act, which are in question, are not compulsory sections; they are merely optional sections, and therefore this application fails.

Rule discharged.

Fishing—Offence—Taking fish in private waters—"Fish"—Winkles—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 96), s. 24.

By s. 24 of the Larceny Act, 1861, it is provided "Whosoever shall unlawfully and wilfully take or destroy any fish in any water which shall run through or be in any land adjoining or belonging to the dwelling-house of any person being the owner of such water, or having the right of fishing therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour; and whosoever shall unlawfully and wilfully take or destroy, or attempt to take or destroy, any fish in any water not being such as hereinbefore mentioned, but which shall be private property, or in which there shall be any private right of fishery, shall, on conviction thereof before a justice of the peace, forfeit and pay, over and above the value of the fish taken or destroyed (if any), such sum of money, not exceeding five pounds, as to the justices shall seem meet: provided that nothing hereinbefore contained shall extend to any person angling between the beginning of the last hour before sunrise and the expiration of the first hour after sunset; but whosoever shall by angling between the beginning of the last hour before sunrise and the first hour after sunset unlawfully and wilfully take or destroy, or attempt to take or destroy, any fish in any such water as first mentioned shall, on conviction before a justice of the peace, forfeit and pay" a penalty.

The appellant was picking up winkles on mud flats at a place in a tidal river within the limits of an exclusive fishery enjoyed by the Maldon Corporation by virtue of a grant before Magna Charta. Some of the winkles were picked up on land after the tide had receded, and some were taken from the water. Upon an information being laid against the appellant under the above-named section, the justices were of opinion that a winkle was a fish within the meaning of the section and convicted the appellant. On appeal it was contended that the term "fish" should be confined to vertebrates, and that in any case the section only applied to fish taken by angling.

Held: dismissing the appeal, that the court were bound by the decision in Caygill v. Thwaite (1) (49 J.P. 614), and must hold that a winkle was a fish, and that the section was not confined to the case of fish caught by angling.

Case Stated by the justices of Maldon. The appellant, Harry Levitt, was summoned under s. 24 of the Larceny Act, 1861, upon an information charging him that he did on a certain date—namely, Dec. 2, 1913, unlawfully take otherwise than by angling certain fish, to wit, winkles, then being in a certain water, to wit, the river Blackwater, in which the corporation of Maldon had a private right of fishery. The following facts were admitted or proved on the hearing of the information: (i) The respondent, Clark, was the fishery bailiff of the Maldon Corporation. (ii) On Dec. 2, 1913, the appellant Leavett together with four other men were found picking up winkles. (ii) The place where the winkles were being picked up was known as Goldhanger Spit, which is situate in a creek of the tidal river Blackwater. (iv) Goldhanger Spit is within the limits of an exclusive fishery enjoyed by the corporation of Maldon. (v) The exclusive fishery is enjoyed by the Maldon Corporation by virtue of certain Royal Charters, the first of which dates from 1155. (vi) The place in question where the winkles were picked up is a mud flat in the bed of the river about halfway between high and low water marks, and it was practically low water at the time when the appellant and his companions were found there. (vii) The mud flat gradually slopes towards the channel of the river, and the receding tide leaves rills or small creeks by means of which the water left by the tide drains into the river. (viii) The receding tide also leaves pools of water, or "panholes" as they are called locally. Winkles are found in the rills or panholes and also in and under the weeds and on the mud. On behalf of the appellant it was contended that a winkle, especially in view of the fact that it cannot be taken by angling, was not a fish within the meaning of s. 24 of the Larceny Act, 1861, and also that the rills and panholes from which the winkles were taken were not water to which the Maldon Corporation had a private right of fishery. The justices, however, held that a winkle was a fish, and that the rills and panholes were water in which the corporation had a private right of fishery. They therefore convicted the appellant and fined him 2s. 6d., together with 2s. 6d. costs, but stated a case in the point of law. The Case Stated first came before the Divisional Court on July 17, 1914, but it was sent back to the justices in order to obtain a finding on their part whether the winkles were picked up on land after the tide had receded or whether they had been taken in the water. The justices found that at the time and place charged the appellant took winkles from the water in the rills and panholes as well as from under the weeds and from the mud.

A. W. Ganz (E. H. Tindal Atkinson with him) for the appellant. The proviso contained in s. 24 of the Larceny Act, 1861, that the enacting part of the section was not to apply to persons angling at certain named times, made it clear that the fishing was restricted to those fish which could be taken by angling. Winkles were certainly not such fish. They were not fish within the meaning of the section at all. Molluscs were not included in the section, and this was shown by the reference made to oysters in s. 26 of the Act. When it was intended to include molluscs and crustaceans under the heading of fish in any statute, the statute clearly stated so. Thus in s. 3 of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894, it was provided: "The word 'fish' includes oysters and shellfish, and also the spawn, brood, and fry of fish, oyster and shellfish." Again, by s. 14 of the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act, 1888, the definition section:

"The expression 'sea fish' shall not include salmon as defined by any Act relating to salmon, but, save as aforesaid, shall mean fish of all kinds found in the sea, and shall also include lobsters, crabs, shrimps, prawns, oysters, mussels, cockles, and other kinds of crustaceans and shellfish."

These statutes demonstrated that molluscs and crustaceans were not to be included as fish unless the Act in question defined them as such, and this the Larceny Act, 1861, most certainly did not. The meaning, therefore, which was to be applied to the word "fish" was that which would be applied by educated persons. In scientific language the term "fish" was limited to vertebrate animals having gills throughout the whole of their life, and did not include molluscs and crustaceans: (see OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY). It was in this sense that the legislature must be presumed to have used the word, as speaking in the language of educated people. It was not for the court to extend the meaning. The Larceny Act, 1861, was a penal statute and must be strictly construed. If winkles were included in the term "fish," then the statute might be made to apply to other things which were never contemplated at all. Caygill v. Thwaite (1), in which crayfish were held to be fish within the section, was wrongly decided. That was a case of trespass, and the arguments were unconvincing. In that case MATHEW, J., said (49 J.P. at p. 614): "It is, perhaps, difficult to give any definite reason except that crayfish are fish." This expression of the learned judge seemed to imply that he had taken a wrong view as to the etymology of the word. It was generally admitted that the word crayfish was derived from or was a corruption of the French écrevisse, and the introduction of the word "fish" into the latter part of the word had nothing to do with fish at all. Under the circumstances the court ought not to hold itself bound by that decision. But even if the court held that winkles were included in the term fish, these particular winkles were not taken in any "water" within the meaning of the language of s. 24. The rights of the Maldon Corporation were confined to the flowing water of the river. The justices had found where the winkles were picked up, and the rills or panholes which were left when the tide went out were not the water in which the corporation had a private right of fishery.

C. E. Jones for the respondent. The case was important to the Maldon Corporation, as they cultivated the winkles in the place where they were taken. The word "fish" as used in s. 24 was not to be restricted to its scientific meaning, but was to be applied in its popular sense, that is, as meaning all animals living in water. The proviso to the section did not restrict its general application. There was no ground for suggesting that because an extended definition was given in the Acts of 1888 and 1894, which had been referred to on behalf of the appellant, the term was to be restricted in the construction of the Act of 1861. This case was covered by the decision in Caygill v. Thwaite (1), and the decision of the justices on that point was correct. As to the second point, the rills were none the less water over which the private rights of fishery extended because they existed in small detached parts when the tide had receded. They were still portions of the tidal river Blackwater over which the corporation enjoyed their private rights of fishery.

LORD READING, C.J.—When this came before the court as originally stated by the justices there was no finding as to whether the winkles which were found in the possession of the appellant had been taken by him from any water in which the Maldon Corporation had a private right of fishery. The case was, therefore, remitted to the justices in order to ascertain the facts upon this particular point. It is now stated, and the justices have found, that some of the winkles were picked up on land after the tide had receded, and some were taken from water in which the corporation had a private right of fishery, the evidence being that they were taken out of the rills or panholes left by the receding tide. The question which now remains for our decision is whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the conviction can stand.

The first point is whether winkles are fish within the meaning of s. 24. Speaking for myself, I must confess that I am still just as much puzzled to-day as I was on the former occasion. In the absence of any authority upon the subject, I should be inclined to hold that winkles are not fish. But the matter is not open for us. We are bound, I think, by the decision of the court in Caygill v. Thwaite (1), where it was held that a crayfish was a fish within the meaning of the section which is now under consideration. With the greatest respect for the learned judges who decided that case, I must say that I do not find that the reasoning is very convincing, and even MATHEW, J., stated that he found it difficult to give any reason for his conclusion, "except that crayfish are fish." It is not open to us, however, to question the decision in that case, as it is binding upon us; and if crayfish are fish, then winkles are also fish. We have been invited to read the general words in the section as being limited by the reference to angling which is contained in the proviso. I do not think that we are entitled to do so. The consequence is that I am of opinion that we cannot say that the word "fish" is limited to fish taken by angling, and this appears to be the true view on referring to other sections of the Act which give the owners of a private right of fishery special rights in the case of anglers.

The remaining question to be decided is whether the rills or panholes are "water" within the meaning of the section. That is a question of fact for the justices, and in view of their finding it is not for us to say that the winkles were not taken from water. For the reasons which I have given I am of opinion that the conviction must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

AVORY, J.—I agree, but I do so with great reluctance, and solely upon the ground that for the last thirty years the law has been assumed to be that which was laid down in Caygill v. Thwaite (1). That decision is binding upon us. But for that case I should most certainly have held that winkles picked up from a mud flat were not fish taken from water within the meaning of s. 24 of the Larceny Act, 1861.

LOW, J.—I also agree. The justices have found that winkles are fish. We are asked to reverse their finding, and to say that shellfish are not included in the word "fish" as used in s. 24 of the Act of 1861. Personally I cannot see why shellfish should not be regarded as fish. I am of the same opinion as my Lord that there is no limitation in the meaning of the general words in the enacting part of the section by the reference to angling which is made in the proviso. The question as to whether the winkles were taken in "water"—"in any water" to quote the exact words of the section—is one entirely for the justices. There is a finding of fact by them upon this point, and we cannot interfere with it.

Appeal dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Kennedy and Swinfen Eady, L.JJ.), October 23, 26, November 6, December 10, 1914]

[Reported [1915] 1 K.B. 439; 84 L.J.K.B. 589; 112 L.T. 562; 59 Sol. Jo. 250; [1915] H.B.R. 44]

Bankruptcy—Costs—Taxation—Right of bankrupt to appear and take part—All creditors paid—Trustee—Employment of solicitor—No committee of inspection—Need to obtain authority of Board of Trade—Unauthorised appointment of solicitor—Effect on subsequent proceedings.

Where all creditors have been paid and the only person really interested in the taxation of costs is the bankrupt an order should be made permitting him to appear and take part in the taxation.

By s. 22 (9) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now s. 20 (10) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914]: "If there be no committee of inspection, any act or thing or any direction or permission by this Act authorised or required to be done or given by the committee may be done or given by the Board of Trade." Although the word "may" is used in this subsection, if there is no committee, the trustee must obtain the authority of the Board to do those things which a committee could direct or permit, e.g., the employment of a solicitor. The fact that there is no committee does not give the trustee an unlimited discretion in such a matter, nor can a sole creditor sanction any matter which would require the sanction of the committee if there were one.

The unauthorised appointment of a solicitor to act for the trustee is not a "formal defect" or an "irregularity" within s. 143 of the Act of 1883 [s. 147 of the Act of 1914] so as not to invalidate consequent proceedings. Costs incurred by solicitors so appointed held not to be payable out of the bankrupt's estate.

Appeal from an order made by the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy (HORRIDGE and LUSH, JJ.).

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, L.J.: Frank Geiger was adjudicated bankrupt on April 3, 1914, on the petition of Partridge, a creditor for £941 7s. 7d. Partridge was the bankrupt's only creditor. The bankrupt's wife, Mrs. Caroline Geiger, died on Dec. 7, 1913, and under her will the bankrupt became entitled to property worth nearly £20,000. In any case it was much more than sufficient to enable him to pay his debt and all costs and obtain an annulment of the bankruptcy. After some correspondence, on Jan. 21, 1914, £941 7s. 7d. was paid out of the wife's estate to the trustee as the amount of the petitioning creditor's debt, and on Jan. 30, 1914, the further sum of £558 12s. 5d. (making together £1,500) as a deposit in respect of costs, and on Feb. 3, 1914, the executors of Mrs. Caroline Geiger gave to the trustee an undertaking in writing to pay out of her assets any further sum which might be necessary to provide for payment in full of any debts, interest (if any), and costs of the bankruptcy. On April 7, 1914, an order was duly made annulling the bankruptcy.

The question arising on this appeal has reference to the costs incurred in the bankruptcy. When the bankrupt had come into property sufficient to secure the annulment of the bankruptcy, his solicitors evinced an anxiety to keep down costs as much as possible. On Feb. 28 they wrote objecting to the trustee appearing by counsel on the application to annul, and stating that their client would object to bearing the expense of it. On April 24, 1914, his solicitors wrote to the trustee's solicitors asking when they expected to carry in their costs for taxation, saying that they should require a copy of them on the usual terms. They also asked when the trustee intended applying for his remuneration to be fixed, saying they would require to be present on the application, and meantime asking what he claimed. Not receiving any answer to that letter, they wrote again on April 29, asking for a reply. They were then informed that the costs had been carried in some time ago and had been taxed by the registrar, and that the trustee's remuneration had been fixed some months ago, and that no further application to the court would be necessary. There are two allocaturs for costs of the trustee: one dated Mar. 12, 1914, for £218 10s. 5d, and the other dated April 29, 1914, for £27 1s. 10d. On May 7 the amount of the taxed costs was paid by the Board of Trade. On May 11 the bankrupt's solicitors wrote to the trustee's solicitors that they were instructed to take proceedings to re-open the matter. They added:

> "Knowing, as of course you did, that our client had all along claimed the right to tax your costs, and to a voice in the settlement of the amount of the trustee's remuneration and his expenses, and that you never gave us a hint that such right was questioned, we are surprised that you and the trustee should have thought fit to proceed as you did, without any notice to Mr. Geiger or ourselves. The suggestion that the person or persons who have to pay the trustee's remuneration and costs are not to have a voice in the amounts proper to be allowed, appears to us to be most unreasonable, and is one that cannot possibly be maintained."

On May 18 the applicant gave notice of an application in the county court to re-open the matter, but the registrar refused the application. On appeal, the Divisional Court took a different view and said that the matter must go back to the registrar to be fully inquired into and dealt with. Various questions which arise were referred to. HORRIDGE, J., drew attention to the fact that the creditor consisted of one gentleman who appointed himself to the committee of inspection, and then purported to fix the remuneration of the trustee and to give authority to the trustee to employ solicitors, and that when the question of taxing the solicitor's costs came before the registrar in the first instance, a letter from the Board of Trade (dated June 25, 1908) was produced saying that where there was one creditor only, he could exercise the functions of the committee of inspection. LUSH, J., said that, having regard to the authorities, it was clear that a bankrupt was a person who under some circumstances ought to have leave to attend the taxation of costs, and if there could be a case in which the bankrupt ought to have leave this certainly was one, as the bankrupt was the only person concerned in the question, first of all, whether any costs were payable—which involves the question whether the solicitors were properly employed—and, secondly, in the question of the amount of costs. The trustee now appeals from the decision of the Divisional Court, referring the matter back to the registrar that the whole question may be re-considered by him.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 10, 1914. The following judgments were read.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—The facts in this case are stated so fully and accurately by SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in his judgment that I propose to confine myself to the questions of law which arise for our determination.

It is the settled practice not to allow a bankrupt to intervene in or take part in the bankruptcy proceedings, unless there are circumstances which justify a special order in his favour. That there is jurisdiction to make such an order is settled: Re Nash & Sons, Ex parte Crofton, Craven and Worthington (1) and Re Marsh, Ex parte Marsh (2). Where, as in the present case, all creditors have been paid and the only person really interested in taxing the costs is the bankrupt, it seems to me obviously just that such an order should be made in his favour. This was the view of the Divisional Court, and I think their decision was right.

There is, however, a further and important question which was not decided in the Divisional Court, although it was referred to. There was only one creditor who proved in the bankruptcy. On April 23, 1913, at a general meeting of creditors a resolution was passed purporting to appoint Mr. F. C. Lewis general proxy for the sole creditor, the committee of inspection, with power to fix the trustee's remuneration. This was plainly invalid, as was pointed out by the Board of Trade in their letter of May 6, which is as follows:

> "Sir,—Re Geiger.—With reference to your letter of the 25th ult. with inclosure, I am directed by the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy to inform you that, having regard to s. 22 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 20 (2)], a committee of inspection cannot consist of less than three members. I am to add that the creditor can, of course, give sanction to any matter requiring the sanction of the committee of inspection."

Meetings of "Mr. F. C. Lewis, 'Committee of Inspection,'" were from time to time held. On April 23 it was resolved that the trustee

> "be and he is hereby sanctioned to employ Messrs. Munns and Longden as his solicitors in terms of specific resolutions to be passed by the committee of inspection from time to time, with authority to employ counsel as and when instructed by the trustee, the trustee not to be personally liable for costs in any way."

On Jan. 9, 1914, a meeting of the committee of inspection was held, and it was resolved as follows:

> "That on the amount of all assets realised by the trustee a commission of 10 per cent. be and is hereby voted to the trustee as a remuneration, with a further remuneration of £2 10s. per cent. to be paid upon the amounts to be distributed in dividends."

All these proceedings were in direct conflict with the provisions of s. 22 (9) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now s. 20 (10) of Act of 1914], which enacts that where there is no committee of inspection the Board of Trade are to do any act or give any direction which might be done or given by the committee if there had been one. By s. 57 (3) [s. 56 (3) of Act of 1914] the permission of the committee of inspection is required to the employment of a solicitor; and by s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1890 [s. 83 (3) of the Act of 1914], such sanction must be obtained before

A the employment. And similar observations apply to the remuneration of the trustee under s. 72 (1) [s. 82 of Act of 1914], although the remuneration need not be fixed before appointment.

In my opinion, there was no retainer of Messrs. Munns and Longden, and their bill of costs cannot be taxed as against, or paid out of, the bankrupt's estate. They may or may not have a claim against the trustee personally. The view expressed B by the Board of Trade in their letter of May 6 that the sole creditor can, of course, give sanction to any matter requiring the sanction of the committee of inspection is, in my opinion, wrong. It is contrary to the express language of s. 22 (9) [see note supra]. Moreover, in principle it is impossible to maintain the proposition. The statute is full of provisions recognising the fiduciary position of members of a committee of inspection and imposing restrictions upon their powers, none of C which would apply to a sole creditor.

Then it is contended that this is a "formal defect" or "irregularity" within s. 143 [s. 147 of the Act of 1914], and that the retainer ought not to be invalidated. In my opinion, this is by no means a formal matter. Parliament has enacted that a solicitor shall not be entitled to be paid unless the sanction required is given before the employment, and that a subsequent sanction will avail nothing. The D prior sanction is substance and not form. In my opinion, it is not necessary to go through the form of allowing the bankrupt to attend the taxation. He would at once raise the point of no retainer, and that point would be fatal. The proper order will be to declare that the necessary permission to employ solicitors was not obtained, and that the two sums of £218 0s. 5d. and £27 1s. 10d. already paid out of the estate to the solicitors must be disallowed to the trustee and the allocaturs E may be rescinded. The trustee must pay the costs of the appeal and also the costs in the county court and in the Divisional Court.

KENNEDY, L.J.—There are two questions to be dealt with in this case.

The Divisional Court, upon the application of the bankrupt, has decided in substance that it was right that the matter of the taxation of the costs of the trustee F in bankruptcy should go back to the registrar of the county court of Surrey, holden at Kingston, in order that the taxation should be re-opened, and that leave ought to be given to the bankrupt to attend the taxation. The first question which this court has had to consider is the propriety of that decision. I agree entirely with the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and Swinfen Eady, L.J., that that decision ought to be upheld for the reasons which they give. The bankrupt had G no statutory right to be present at the taxation of the costs of the trustee, but the registrar, or, on appeal, the court, may in a proper case and in special circumstances give him leave to attend, and the special circumstances do exist in the present case.

The second question raised before us is, in my judgment, a more difficult one. By s. 22 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [s. 20 (1) of Act of 1914], the creditors H "may" (not "must") appoint a committee of inspection. If they do appoint a committee of inspection it must consist of not less than three members. Under s. 57 [s. 56 (3) of Act of 1914] it is for the committee of inspection, if appointed, to authorise the trustee, if they think proper, to employ a solicitor and generally to take such steps as they may approve in the administration of the bankrupt's estate in reference to the matters specified in that section. If there is no com- I mittee of inspection, s. 22 (9) [s. 20 (10) of Act of 1914] applies. That section is worth referring to, to make the judgment clear. It is as follows:

> "If there be no committee of inspection, any act or thing or any direction or permission by this Act authorised or required to be done or given by the committee may be done or given by the Board of Trade on the application of the trustee."

In the present case there was only one creditor, a Mr. Partridge, who had been the petitioning creditor, and at what is called a "general meeting of creditors" held on April 23, 1913, a Mr. Frank Crossly Lewis, special proxy for Mr. Partridge, the creditor, who, with the exception of Mr. Bowles, who represented the trustee, constituted the meeting, is recorded as having carried a unanimous resolution that Mr. Frank Crossly Lewis, general proxy for Mr. Partridge, be appointed the committee of inspection with power to fix the trustee's remuneration. This appears to me to have been a plainly improper proceeding. A quarter of an hour later a meeting of the committee of inspection is recorded. Again only Mr. Frank Crossly Lewis and Mr. Bowles, representing the trustee, were present, and resolutions (which I need not quote at length) were passed by Mr. Lewis empowering the trustee to employ Messrs. Munns and Longden as his solicitors, authorising the employment of counsel, and sanctioning certain other legal proceedings. All this appears to me to have been done in contravention of the statute, because there was no valid committee of inspection. The retainer of the solicitors was, in point of law, not a legal retainer. The trustee never had the authority to give it, which the Bankruptcy Act requires.

The hesitation which I have felt in agreeing with the other members of this court as to the consequent disallowance of the trustee's costs, although (as it is only fair to say) the Board of Trade, in answer to an inquiry suggested by this court, saw no ground for thinking them improper or excessive, has been due to the fact that the trustee in this case appears to have received from the Board of Trade a communication, dated May 6, 1913, which, though, of course, it did not influence the earlier proceedings of April 23, which I have stated, may, from and after its receipt, not unreasonably be supposed to have operated upon the mind of the trustee so as to lull any doubt in his mind as to the validity of the authority under which he was acting in incurring costs. The communication sent by the Board of Trade on May 6 in reply to his letter ran thus:

> "Sir,—Re Geiger.—With reference to your letter of the 25th ult., with inclosure, I am directed by the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy to inform you that, having regard to s. 22 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [s. 20 (2) of Act of 1914], a committee of inspection cannot consist of less than three members. I am to add that the creditor can, of course, give sanction to any matter requiring the sanction of the committee of inspection."

I do not know how much of the costs were incurred after May 7, when, presumably, he received the letter from the Board of Trade, but very probably the greater part was incurred after that date. The trustee had written on April 25 to the Board of Trade in the following terms:

> "I send you herewith certified copy of the minutes of a general meeting of the creditors, held herein on the 23rd day of April, 1913, a certified copy of which has been duly placed on the file at Kingston Court.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, T. H. W. Biddle, Trustee. P.S.—Upon the bankrupt's statements and the information before me there appears to be only one creditor."

With all respect to the official who wrote that letter, which I have read, of May 6, the advice contained in the last sentence was somewhat misleading advice. The intention of the legislature according to the language of the Bankruptcy Act appears to me to be that if there is no committee of inspection, the authority for certain acts (of which the employment of legal assistance is one) which the committee of inspection, if the creditors have appointed such a committee, may give, should be obtained by the trustee from the Board of Trade: s. 22 (9) of Act of 1883 [s. 20 (10) of Act of 1914]. It is true that the word used in the subsection is "may," but it is clear that it cannot be intended that the trustee, because there is no committee of inspection, should have an unlimited discretion, and I see no other method of his obtaining authority elsewhere in the Act of Parliament. The view of the Board of Trade, apparently, is that if there is a creditor—be it only one or more—he can give sanction to every matter which, under s. 57 [s. 56 of Act of 1914], requires the sanction of the committee of inspection. The only provision which might lend colour to this view appears to me to be s. 89 [s. 79 (1) of Act of 1914], giving power to creditors by a resolution to override the directions given by a committee of inspection. But this is limited to the administration of the property of the bankrupt and the distribution thereof among his creditors, and no inference drawn from this can, as it appears to me, be preferred to that which arises from s. 57 read with s. 22 (9) and the absence of any provision in terms authorising a creditor or creditors to sanction the action of the trustee in respect of the matters mentioned in s. 57. If this be so, the advice of the Board of Trade in the letter of May 6, 1913, was incorrect, and the trustee had no authority under the statute for retaining a solicitor as he did. It is a minor point, but I will add that, even if as representing in his single person a "general meeting" of creditors, the one creditor could have given the requisite sanction to the trustee, he did not in fact so act, but purported by his general proxy to give the authority as a committee of inspection at a meeting of the committee of inspection.

Having regard to the fact that the Board of Trade have signified through their counsel that they find no fault with the items in the bill of costs, and to the Board of Trade's letter of May 6, 1913, I should myself have been glad if I had felt justified in applying in favour of the trustee the provisions of s. 143 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [s. 147 of Act of 1914]. But the employment of a solicitor and the consequent expenditure in legal proceedings must be regarded as a serious matter, and the employment of the solicitor by the trustee being in this case, in my view, not merely irregular but ultra vires, as there was no sanction given either by a committee of inspection or by the Board of Trade, I do not think that the court would be justified in treating it as merely a "formal defect or irregularity" which can be cured under this section. I concur, therefore, in the judgment pronounced by the Master of the Rolls and in the order which he has stated.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J., stated the facts, and continued: Upon the question whether the registrar had jurisdiction to give the bankrupt leave to attend the taxation, I am of opinion that he had jurisdiction, and that it was a proper case in which to exercise the jurisdiction, and give leave. The bankrupt having received ample means to pay all his liabilities in full, he is interested in keeping the costs as low as possible. He is the person really paying the costs, and should certainly be allowed to have a voice in considering the amount proper to be allowed. He is not entitled as of right to attend; he cannot do so without special leave. But it is well settled that the court can under special circumstances give leave to a person to attend who would have no right otherwise to do so. Thus, in Re Marsh, Ex parte Marsh (2) the wife of the bankrupt, who had been admitted as a creditor upon his estate, obtained an order giving her leave to attend the taxation of costs, and she was heard on appeal. In Re Duncan, Ex parte Duncan (3) a bankrupt whose debts had been paid in full applied to the court to review the taxation, and succeeded. On appeal by the official receiver the court heard counsel for the bankrupt and dismissed the appeal. It appears from the report of the case in 8 MORRELL, 297, that leave to attend the taxation of the costs was given to the bankrupt by Mr. Registrar GIFFARD. Again, where an official receiver had no right to attend a taxation, it was held that the court could give him leave to do so. In Re Nash & Sons, Ex parte Crofton, Craven and Worthington (1), VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., said ([1896] 1 Q.B. at p. 17):

> "I have no doubt that it is within the inherent power of the court to order that he shall attend at a taxation if the court thinks it right."

I agree with the view expressed by LUSH, J., that if there could be a case in which the bankrupt ought to have leave, this was such a case.

But the further question raised in the Divisional Court has been fully argued before us—namely, whether the solicitor was properly employed. This in turn depends on the question whether one creditor can appoint himself to be the committee of inspection; or whether where there is only one creditor, he can exercise the functions of a committee of inspection. By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 57 (3) [s. 56 (3) of Act of 1914], the trustee may, with the permission of the committee of inspection, employ a solicitor to take any proceedings or do any business which may be sanctioned by the committee of inspection. By the provision at the end of this section the permission shall not be a general permission to do all or any of the things mentioned in the section, but shall only be a permission to do the particular things or things for which permission is sought in the specified case or cases. By s. 73 (3) [s. 83 of Act of 1914] the taxing master is to satisfy himself before passing a solicitor's bill that the employment of such solicitor in respect of the particular matters out of which the charges arise, has been duly sanctioned. And by r. 117, before taxing the bill of any solicitor, the taxing officer shall require a copy of the resolution or other authority sanctioning the employment. Great care was thus taken by the legislature that bankrupts' estates should not be wasted by any unauthorised costs being allowed out of them. But the practice was made still more stringent in 1890. Section 15 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, enacts that the sanction required under s. 73 of the principal Act, for the employment of solicitors, must be a sanction obtained before the employment, except in cases of urgency, and in such cases it must be shown that no undue delay took place in obtaining the sanction [s. 83 (3) of Act of 1914].

The question then arises: Did the trustee in the present case obtain the sanction of any committee of inspection before employing a solicitor? By s. 22 (1) of the Act of 1883 [s. 20 (2) of Act of 1914] the committee of inspection shall consist of not less than three persons. Here, what happened was that on April 23, 1913, at a general meeting convened of the bankrupt's creditors, Mr. F. C. Lewis, who was special proxy for Mr. Leonard Partridge, the sole creditor, purported to appoint Mr. Leonard Partridge the committee of inspection. He had no power to do this; nor could Mr. Partridge alone become or constitute a committee of inspection. The authority purporting to be given by Mr. Partridge as committee of inspection was of no value. There was in fact no committee of inspection. The Act then provides by s. 22 (9) [s. 20 (10) of Act of 1914]:

> "If there be no committee of inspection, any act or thing or any direction or permission by this Act authorised or required to be done or given by the committee may be done or given by the Board of Trade on the application of the trustee."

But in this case there was no permission of the Board of Trade to the employment of a solicitor. Reliance was then placed by the trustee on s. 89 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [s. 79 (1) of Act of 1914], which enables the creditors to override any directions of the committee of inspection, and it was urged that, even if there had been a committee of inspection, the direction of Mr. Partridge as sole creditor would in case of conflict prevail, and he sanctioned the employment of a solicitor. The answer to this argument is that there is not any case of conflict. There was no committee of inspection, and moreover the subsection begins: "Subject to the provisions of the Act," and one of these provisions is that where there is not any committee of inspection the permission of the Board of Trade is necessary to the employment of a solicitor.

It was then urged that the absence of the necessary permission was merely a formal defect, and was covered by s. 143 of the Act [s. 147 (1) of Act of 1914]. In my opinion, the absence of the necessary permission to employ a solicitor is not a mere formal defect or irregularity, but a matter of substance and of great importance. It is a material check and safeguard against costs being necessarily or improperly incurred. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Duncan, Ex parte Official Receiver (4) shows with what strictness the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts and rules will be enforced. Permission has been given there to incur costs not exceeding £250, and a bill of costs amounting to upwards of £500 had been incurred. It was held that as against the bankrupt's estate not more than £250 could be allowed, although all creditors had been paid in full and the bankruptcy annulled. FRY, L.J., said ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 889):

> "If anything can show the importance of keeping a strict hand upon this kind of employment, this case is a proof of it."

In my opinion, it would be most inexpedient to introduce or sanction any laxity of practice in bankruptcy, or gloss over irregularities and condone them as merely "formal defects." This would be to abolish these safeguards which the Acts and Rules founded on long bankruptcy experience have set up to promote speedy and economical administration in bankruptcy. In my opinion, the proper order to make in this appeal is to say that permission has not been duly given to the trustee to employ a solicitor, and that the payment already made out of the estate must be disallowed to the trustee. It is clear that neither the payment to the solicitors of the amount of the allocaturs, nor the audit of the trustee's accounts, nor the annulment of the bankruptcy, prevents this court from having full jurisdiction to deal with the matter on the present application.

Order varied.

Coal Mine—Coal dust prevention—Systematic clearing to prevent accumulation—Clearing done so far as was reasonably practicable—Exemption from penalty—Coal Mines Act, 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 50), s. 62 (3), s. 102 (3).

An information was preferred against the manager of a colliery for an offence under s. 62 (3) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, for not causing the floor, roof and sides of the roads in the mine, they not being naturally wet throughout, to be systematically cleared so as to prevent, as far as practicable, coal dust accumulating. The justices found that the roof and the sides of the roads in the colliery had not been systematically cleared for some months past, but that it was not practicable to carry out the provision of s. 62 (3) of the Act of 1911 in this particular mine, and that the manager had done all that was reasonably practicable to prevent coal dust accumulating.

Held: the manager came within the protection given by s. 102 (3) of the Act of 1911, and he was exempt from any penalty in respect of non-compliance with s. 62 (3) of that Act.

Notes. Section 62 and s. 102 of the repealed Coal Mines Act, 1911 (16 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 139, 161), have been replaced with amendments by s. 74 and s. 157, respectively, of the Mines and Quarries Act, 1954: 34 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 573, 627.

Case Stated by justices for the county of Glamorgan.

An information was preferred by the appellant, William Nicholas Atkinson, one of His Majesty's inspectors of mines, against the respondent, Edward Shaw, for that the respondent on or about Oct. 14, 1913, being the manager of the Universal Colliery, this not being a mine the floor, roof and sides of the roads whereof are naturally wet throughout, did not cause to be systematically cleared such floor, roof and sides of the roads of the mine so as to prevent as far as practicable coal dust accumulating, conformably with the provisions of s. 62 (3) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. At the hearing of the information it was proved or admitted in evidence before the justices: (i) That the respondent had been duly appointed pursuant to s. 2 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, and was at all material times the manager of the Universal Colliery. (ii) That the floor, roof and sides of the roads of the Universal Colliery were not naturally wet throughout, but were of a dry and dusty nature. (iii) That danger attached to the presence of coal dust in the roads of the mine, and particularly to that which attached to the sides and roof. (iv) That the respondent had caused the floor of the roads to be systematically cleared and to be well watered. (v) That the respondent had endeavoured by means of brushing, by compressed air blowing, and by watering to clear the roof and sides of the roads from coal dust; that the brushing and compressed air blowing were abandoned by the respondent for some four or six months prior to Oct. 14, 1913, because these methods were not found to be satisfactory. (vi) That the respondent had from time to time arched considerable lengths of roadway with stone arching, but that the arching had got crushed by the natural squeeze of the ground. (vii) That watering the roof and sides in the Universal Colliery would have been dangerous and was impracticable owing to the nature of the strata, which would have been pulverised by the action of the water, and was consequently abandoned. (viii) It was admitted by the appellant as a practical man and apart from the Act of Parliament, that the adoption in the colliery of the methods of brushing or compressed air blowing, though effective in carrying out what he understood to be the meaning of the Act, would not have been effective in preventing the accumulation of coal dust, and might conceivably under certain circumstances have been dangerous.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that sub-s. (3) of s. 62 only required him to cause the floor, roof and sides of the roads to be cleared as far as practicable, and pursuant to this contention he called evidence to show that it was not practicable to systematically clear the sides and the roof of the roads. On the other hand, it was contended by the appellant that sub-s. (3) required the respondent to cause the roof and sides, as well as the floor of the roads, to be systematically cleared, and that the words "as far as practicable" did not govern "systematically cleared," but did govern the words "so as to prevent coal dust accumulating," and that the duty imposed upon the respondent was a direct obligation and an absolute duty to systematically clear the roofs and sides of the roads in the colliery. The appellant called evidence to show that it was practicable to cause the roofs and sides to be "systematically cleared." The justices were satisfied (i) that the roof and sides of the roads in the Universal Colliery had not been systematically cleared for some months prior to Oct. 14, 1913; (ii) that it was not practicable to carry out this provision of s. 62 (3) of the Act in this particular mine. They were of opinion that the respondent had done all that was reasonably practicable under the circumstances to prevent coal dust accumulating, and they therefore dismissed the information.

The Coal Mines Act, 1911, provides, by s. 62:

"In every mine, unless the floor, roof, and sides of the roads are naturally wet throughout . . . (3) the floor, roof, and sides of the roads shall be

A systematically cleared so as to prevent, as far as practicable, coal dust accumulating; (4) such systematic steps, either by way of watering or otherwise, as may be laid down by the regulations of the mine shall be taken to prevent explosions of coal dust occurring or being carried along the roads. . . ."

Section 102 (3) provided:

B "Nothing in this Act shall render the owner, agent, or manager of a mine liable to a penalty in respect of any contravention of or non-compliance with the provisions of this Act, if he proves that the contravention or non-compliance was due to causes over which he had no control, and against the happening of which it was impracticable for him to make provision."

C Ivor Bowen, K.C., and Clement Edwards for the appellant.
Disturnal, K.C. (Lincoln Reed with him), for the respondent.

LORD READING, C.J.—The appellant, one of His Majesty's inspectors of mines, laid an information against the respondent for that the respondent, being the manager of the Universal Colliery at Senghenydd, Glamorganshire, and that D mine, the Universal Colliery, not being a mine the floor, roof and sides of the roads whereof were naturally wet throughout, did not cause the floor, roof and sides of the roads to be systematically cleared so as to prevent, as far as practicable, coal dust accumulating, in accordance with the provisions of s. 62 (3) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. By that Act of Parliament, which was an Act passed to consolidate and amend the law relating to coal mines, it was provided that in E every mine, unless the floor, roof and sides of the roads are naturally wet throughout, the floor, roof and sides of the roads should be systematically cleared so as to prevent, as far as practicable, coal dust accumulating.

In this case it was proved that the respondent had caused the floor of the roads to be systematically cleared and well watered, but although he had endeavoured by means of brushing, by compressed air blowing, and by watering, to clear the F sides and roof of the roads of coal dust, the brushing and compressed air blowing were abandoned by him for some four or six months prior to October, 1913, because it was found that these methods were not satisfactory. It is found as a fact in this case that watering the roof and sides of the colliery would have been dangerous, and that that course would have been impracticable owing to the nature of the strata, which would have been pulverised by the action of the water, and conse- G quently that course, which had been adopted for some time, was abandoned. The appellant, one of the inspectors of mines, admitted that, viewing the matter as a practical man and with knowledge and experience of mines, and of the difficulties of dealing with the accumulation of coal dust in mines, he was of opinion that the adoption in the colliery of these methods of brushing or of compressed air blowing would not be effective in preventing the accumulation of coal dust; and H he was further of opinion that they might conceivably under certain circumstances have been dangerous. I understand that to mean that if this course were pursued the result would be that the coal dust would not be prevented from being accumulated without being damped so as not to be blown about and have its particles disseminated throughout the atmosphere in the coal mine, but that it would have the contrary effect, and therefore that in his opinion it would indeed be dangerous.

I It is said, however, on behalf of the inspector that there is an obligation imposed by the Act of Parliament under sub-s. (3) of s. 62 which makes it necessary that steps should be taken however impracticable they may be or may appear to be, and, indeed, however dangerous they may be. And it is said that when once Parliament has imposed the obligation there is a duty on every person to carry it out, and that if he fails to do so a breach of the statute has been committed; that it may be that the breach is only a technical one for which a nominal fine would be imposed, but still there has been a breach of the Act of Parliament. Assuming for the moment that to carry out this obligation with reference to the roof and sides of the mine would be more dangerous than to neglect the duty, if that were true that it would be more dangerous it would lead to a curious state of things if provisions which were imposed for the protection of the men who were working in the coal mine and for guarding as far as possible against explosions should be used to enforce the doing of acts which would increase the dangers of the mine. But on examining the Act we find in s. 102 (3) the provision that,

> "Nothing in this Act shall render the owner, agent, or manager of a mine liable to a penalty in respect of any contravention of or non-compliance with the provisions of this Act, if he proves that the contravention or non-compliance was due to causes over which he had no control and against the happening of which it was impracticable for him to make provision."

That subsection applies to s. 62, and equally to sub-s. (3) of s. 62, and I take that to mean that the legislature was passing an Act of Parliament which was to apply to all coal mines throughout the kingdom. Coal mines vary, of course, in character, and precautions which may be quite salutary in one colliery may be highly dangerous in another. There are possibilities of such a state of things happening, as is shown apparently by the evidence in this case, and Parliament, therefore, though it imposed this obligation generally on all coal mines, said that it quite recognised that there might be cases in which it would not be possible to carry out the provisions it imposed, and therefore it has said that if the owner, agent, or manager can satisfy the justices that the contravention has happened through circumstances over which he had no control, or that it was impracticable for him to make the provisions required by the Act of Parliament, then he has not committed the offence.

On the facts of this case as found by the justices, it seems to me quite plain that they meant to find, and did find, that in this case they were of opinion that the respondent had done all that was reasonably practicable under the circumstances to prevent the accumulation of coal dust; and they thought and they found as a fact in these words that it was not practicable to carry out this provision of s. 62 (3) in this particular mine. That brings us therefore to a case provided for under sub-s. (3) of s. 102, and the justices, having come to the conclusion that it had been proved to their satisfaction that it was not practicable to carry out the provisions of the Act in this respect, were perfectly right in coming to the conclusion that the information should be dismissed. It may be under the circumstances that this is a casus omissus, and that some provision ought to have been made, upon which I express no opinion, because the facts stated in the case are not sufficiently stated to enable me to come to any conclusion with regard to it. I do not know whether in point of fact there were any means that could in any possible way be devised, and which it would be practicable to devise, to prevent the accumulation of coal dust in a colliery such as the Universal Colliery. If there are provisions to be made not to be found in this Act, they are for the legislature to make, and not for us. It is sufficient for this case to say, though I am of opinion that the inspector very properly brought this case before the justices, that on the facts as found by the justices they came to a right conclusion, and therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

AVORY, J.—I agree that this appeal must be dismissed. At first I was considerably impressed by the argument of counsel for the appellant, which appears to be the same as that presented to the justices, that the duty imposed upon the respondent was a direct obligation and an absolute duty to systematically clear the roofs and sides of the roads in the colliery. It was suggested, and at first it appeared with some force, that the words "as far as practicable" in sub-s. (3) of s. 62 do not govern the duty to systematically clear the roof and sides of the roads, but that they only govern the words so as to prevent coal dust accumulating. On further consideration I have come to the conclusion that this is a fallacious argument, and that this subsection ought really to be read as if it were in these words: As far as practicable the floor, roof and sides of the roads shall be systematically cleared of coal dust so as to prevent such coal dust accumulating. If it is read in that way, as I think it ought to be, then the findings of the justices in this case are conclusive—namely, the findings that it was not practicable to carry out these provisions of s. 62 in this particular mine, and that the respondent had done all that was reasonably practicable under the circumstances to prevent coal dust accumulating. Those findings clearly bring the respondent within sub-s. (3) of s. 102, as my Lord has pointed out. It is immaterial whether that subsection was in fact presented to the eye or to the mind of the justices at the time when they gave this decision. It seems unlikely that by accident they should have hit upon a finding which exactly brings the respondent within that subsection; but, if it is true that they hit upon that finding by accident, we are bound by it nevertheless if we come to the conclusion that that finding has brought the respondent within the protection of that subsection.

There is only one thing further I wish to add. Subsection (4) of s. 62 may possibly have an application to this particular case, and it will, of course, be for the inspector and the authorities to consider whether it has. Subsection (4) provides that such systematic steps, either by way of watering or otherwise, as may be laid down by the regulations of the mine shall be taken to prevent explosions of coal dust occurring or being carried along the roads; and I find, by turning to s. 87, which deals with the application of the general regulations, that there is power to make special regulations in the case of any particular mine, and it may be, therefore, that this is a case where special regulations may be required and may be made to prevent the danger which is aimed at by sub-s. (3) of s. 62.

LOW, J.—I agree with both the judgments which have been delivered. It especially appears to me that this is a case in which the last observations made by AVORY, J., should be very carefully considered by the authorities with the view to making special regulations if they should be of opinion that occasion has arisen for making special regulations with regard to this mine. As far as the case before us at present is concerned, it is enough to say that we are bound by the findings of the justices, which appear to have been based upon evidence, and that we have no power to review those findings.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor—Retainer—Retainer to conduct action—Authority to compromise action after judgment—Assent to execution by defendant of deed of assignment for benefit of creditors.

A retainer to a solicitor to conduct an action does not include an authority to compromise the action after judgment by assenting to the execution by the defendant of a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors.

Appeal from the county court of Oldham.

In July, 1913, the husband of the respondent, Mrs. Sharples, was knocked down and killed by a taxicab belonging to the debtor. On Aug. 7, 1913, Mrs. Sharples retained a solicitor named Challinor to take proceedings against the debtor, and the retainer was in the following form:

> "Please take the necessary proceedings on my children's and my own behalf to recover compensation for the loss of my husband through the negligence of Mr. S. through one of his employees.—Mabel Sharples.

Challinor brought the action on Mrs. Sharples' behalf and succeeded in recovering judgment for £850. Execution was then issued, but the sheriff's officer was met by a deed of assignment to a trustee for the benefit of the debtor's creditors. Mrs. Sharples had no knowledge of such a deed having been executed, but a clerk in Challinor's employment named Christian attended the meeting of creditors as representing Mrs. Sharples, but without instructions from her to do so. At the meeting Christian voted against the appointment of the trustee put forward by the debtor, and procured the appointment of his own nominee. A form of assent to the deed was subsequently sent to Mrs. Sharples, who refused to sign it and repudiated Challinor's authority to assent to it on her behalf. Mrs. Sharples thereupon instructed other solicitors, Messrs. Sharratt & Saxon to present a bankruptcy petition against the debtor, alleging, as the act of bankruptcy relied on, the execution of the deed of assignment. The petition came on for hearing in the Oldham county court, and the registrar held that the retainer to Challinor was a retainer to act for Mrs. Sharples in the course of the action, and that it did not entitle him to represent her at the meeting of the creditors, nor to acquiesce on her behalf in the execution of the deed; and he therefore made the receiving order asked for. From this decision the debtor appealed.

Dehn for the appellant, the debtor.
Ridgway Bennett for the respondent.

HORRIDGE, J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the registrar of the county court at Oldham, granting a receiving order against the debtor.

The act of bankruptcy relied upon was, that on Dec. 18, 1913, the debtor had executed a deed of assignment of his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors. The act of bankruptcy as such was not denied, but it was said before the registrar that the petitioning creditor had, through her solicitor, so acted as to preclude her from taking advantage of that deed as an act of bankruptcy. The registrar believed the evidence of Mrs. Sharples, and found as a fact that she never assented to the deed of assignment, either before or after its execution. That means that her solicitor never had authority to act in the way suggested, and thus deprive her of the right to rely upon the deed. I think we are prepared to hold that if the solicitor had authority, what he did would have precluded his client from relying on the deed as an act of bankruptcy, and the only question is whether or not he had authority. The registrar believed the evidence of Mrs. Sharples. Now, the evidence of Mrs. Sharples, apart from one passage which I will refer to later, certainly negatives the contention that the solicitor had authority to act in such a way as to preclude her from taking bankruptcy proceedings. Now, does this passage, "I told him to do everything necessary to get the money," necessarily mean that she gave him authority to attend at the meeting and assent to the deed of assignment? Because I think it is necessary to clothe the solicitor with that authority, in order to clothe him with sufficient authority to act in such a way as to preclude her from relying on the deed as an act of bankruptcy. I do not think that she clothed him with that authority. I think that she merely authorised him to take the ordinary proceedings by way of execution to get the money in respect of which she had recovered judgment. Then, again, did the original retainer, dated Aug. 7, 1913, extend to authorising such conduct as was relied upon in answer to the petition in this case? [HIS LORDSHIP then read the letter of that date.] Now that retainer, to my mind, is clearly drawn with a view to Lord Campbell's Act (The Fatal Accidents Act, 1846), which gives the wife and the children a remedy against the person whose negligence caused the death of the husband. It might be that those proceedings might be taken in the county court or the High Court, but when once the proceedings were taken in the High Court in respect of the rights of the mother and children, that retainer, except for the purposes of being worked out in that action, was exhausted.

Hitherto I have been speaking entirely of questions of fact and not of law, but it has been contended before us by counsel for the debtor that the mere retainer of a solicitor in an action entitles him, after judgment, to compromise that action, and therefore entitles him to enter into an agreement with creditors in the nature of a compromise and to affect his client's position by substituting rights under a deed for her rights under the judgment. I do not think it is necessary in this case to decide whether or not a solicitor has, by virtue of his retainer, authority to compromise an action after judgment as between the parties to it. In my view, such authority would not extend even during the action to an agreement with the defendant's other creditors. The authority, I think, must be an authority to compromise as between the plaintiff and the defendant. What was done in this case was to enter into an agreement not merely between the plaintiff and the defendant, but with the other creditors also. The effect of a creditor's assent to such a deed would be to make its execution operate as an act of bankruptcy and to put other creditors who had not assented to it in the position of being able to take bankruptcy proceedings against the estate, and it would further operate to prevent the assenting creditor from taking bankruptcy proceedings. It was not disputed by counsel for the debtor that the original retainer would not authorise the solicitor to institute bankruptcy proceedings against the defendant, and equally I do not think it could authorise him to enter into an agreement which would prevent his client from taking bankruptcy proceedings in respect of this act of bankruptcy. I cannot regard such an arrangement as a compromise of a claim in the action as between the parties, but I think that it is entering into an independent arrangement quite apart from the action and extending beyond the rights of compromise in respect of the claim between the parties, and whatever the authority might be to compromise in the action after judgment—as to which I say nothing—I do not think such authority could, in any case, extend to entering into a deed of assignment on behalf of the client, or to acting in such a way as to preclude the client from relying upon the deed entered into—to which she would not otherwise assent—as an act of bankruptcy against the defendant.

For these reasons I think the registrar's finding is one we cannot interfere with, and there is no rule of law which compels us to hold that the solicitor had any implied authority after judgment so to act as to preclude the client from presenting this bankruptcy petition. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

ATKIN, J.—I agree. I think to succeed here the debtor would have to show that the petitioning creditor had so acted as to preclude herself from relying upon the execution of this deed as an act of bankruptcy, and in order to establish that I think that the debtor would have to show that the petitioning creditor's agent had authority in fact to do the acts which are said to estop the petitioning creditor from relying upon the act of bankruptcy. I cannot conceive that there could be ostensible authority to do such acts unless there were authority in fact to assent to them, and I think, therefore, it would have to be shown that the solicitor of the petitioning creditor had authority in fact to consent to the deed of assignment.

On the question as to whether or not there was a particular authority given to do these particular acts, I think that question is determined by the finding of fact by the registrar. I think there was evidence on which he could find there was no particular authority given, and that finding we cannot interfere with; and therefore the question remains whether or not the solicitor had general authority to enter into a compromise which involved execution of the deed of assignment. It does not seem to me to be necessary to determine whether, after judgment, a solicitor has power to compromise the judgment he has obtained for his client. I think, if he has such authority, it would not extend to such a compromise as entering into a deed of arrangment which involves entering into relations, not merely with the debtor but with the trustee and with the other creditors of the debtor, involving a mutual relation between the plaintiff, the petitioning creditor, and with persons who are strangers to the action in which the judgment was obtained. Such a contention would further involve—and this is a matter of some consequence—that the solicitor would be deemed to have authority to assent to the debtor committing an act of bankruptcy, which might alter his whole status if some other creditor chose to treat it as an act of bankruptcy. I do not think the power to compromise involves a right to assent to contracts which involve consequences such as these. I think there was no authority on the part of the solicitor to assent to the deed of assignment, and therefore I think that his client was not bound by his act, and that the registrar was right in making the receiving order.

Appeal from the decision of the county court judge sitting at Birkenhead on an interpleader issue.

The plaintiffs obtained judgment in the High Court against the defendants Charles John Lane and his wife, Lily Alice Lane, and execution was levied upon certain furniture and effects belonging to the male defendant in which the female defendant had no interest. The claimants, G. H. Jones and Fred Harling, who were the grantees of a bill of sale of certain of the goods in question, took out an interpleader summons claiming the goods. The bill of sale was in the following form:

"This indenture made Dec. 23, 1913, between Charles John Lane, of . . . fruit merchant, of the first part, Lily Alice Lane, his wife, of the second part, and George Henry Jones, of . . . glover and general outfitter, and Fred Harling . . . solicitor, of the third part. Whereas by an indenture of mortgage made Jan. 10, 1913, between the said Lily Alice Lane of the first part, the said Charles John Lane of the second part, and George Henry Jones and Fred Harling of the third part the said Lily Alice Lane and Charles John Lane for the consideration therein mentioned did, amongst other things, jointly and severally covenant with the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling to pay to the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling immediately and forthwith upon notice in writing so to do all moneys which during the continuance of that security the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling shall be called upon to pay and should pay to Edward Whitley, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and also all moneys which might be paid to or advanced for or on account of the said Lily Alice Lane and the said Charles John Lane or either of them by the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling or become owing by the said Lily Alice Lane and the said Charles John Lane or either of them to the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling in respect or on account of or in connection with (inter alia) a policy of assurance in the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States numbered 1,799,135 comprising or forming the security or any part thereof intended to be affected by the now recited presents. And whereas default having been made in payment of a premium due under the said policy of assurance notice in writing was given to the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling by or on behalf of the said Edward Whitley to pay the said premium. And whereas the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling upon receiving the notice calling upon them to pay the said premium requested the said Lily Alice Lane and Charles John Lane to pay the same but they were unable so to do and the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling threatened that if and when they should pay the said premium they would institute legal proceedings against the said Lily Alice Lane and Charles John Lane to enforce and compel payment thereof by the said Lily Alice Lane and Charles John Lane in pursuance of their liability to do so under the hereinbefore recited indenture. And whereas to avoid such legal proceedings the said Charles John Lane agreed at the request of the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling that if they should pay the said premium the said Charles John Lane would give to the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling the security hereinafter contained. And whereas in pursuance of the premises the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling on Dec. 11 instant paid to the said Equitable Life Assurance Society the sum of £90 15s. 11d., being the amount of the said premium after deducting a dividend then due in respect of the said premium. Now this indenture witnesseth that in pursuance and consideration of the premises he the said Charles John Lane hereby assigns unto the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling, their executors, administrators, and assigns, all and singular the several chattels and things specifically described in the schedule hereto annexed by way of security for the payment of the sum of £90 15s. 11d. and interest thereon at the rate of £10 per cent. per annum, and the said Charles John Lane doth further agree and declare that he will duly pay to the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling on June 23 next the principal sum of £90 15s. 11d. aforesaid with interest thereon in the meantime at the rate of £10 per cent. per annum from the date of these presents, and further if the said moneys shall not be so paid will pay to the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling interest at the rate aforesaid by equal half-yearly payments on Dec. 23 and June 23 in every year on the principal moneys for the time being remaining due on this security, provided always that the chattels hereby assigned shall not be liable to seizure or to be taken possession of by the said George Henry Jones and Fred Harling for any cause other than those specified in s. 7 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882. In witness whereof the said parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first before written.—Signed, sealed, and delivered by the said Charles John Lane and Lily Alice Lane in the presence of me, W. H. Hill, clerk to Messrs. Harling, Fisher, and Houghton, solicitors."

It was contended on behalf of the judgment creditors that the bill of sale was void under s. 9 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, as not being in accordance with the form annexed to the schedule of the Act, by reason of the fact that Mrs. Lane, who had no interest in the goods, was made a party to the bill of sale and executed it. A further point was taken that the affidavit accompanying the bill of sale did not specify the residence and occupation of the wife. The county court judge held that the bill of sale was valid, and gave judgment for the claimants. The judgment creditors appealed.

Nov. 3, 1914. HORRIDGE, J., read the following judgment: This was an appeal from the judge of the county court of Cheshire holden at Birkenhead whereby he decided in favour of the claim of G. H. Jones and Fred Harling, who were grantees under a bill of sale of goods seized by the bailiff of the Birkenhead County Court. In order to ascertain whether the decision was correct or not, we have to determine what is the true construction to be placed upon s. 9 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, which enacts that a bill of sale made by way of security for the payment of money is to be void unless made in accordance with the form in the schedule. The appellants alleged the bill of sale in question was not in accordance with the form for the following reason. The wife of Charles John Lane, the person actually assigning the chattels, was made a party and executed it, and the deed contained recitals stating how the liability in respect of which the security was given arises.

In my view the test of whether or not the bill of sale was in accordance with the form may be extracted from the decisions of Melville v. Stringer (1), Ex parte Stanford (2), and Thomas v. Kelly (3). In Melville v. Stringer (1) BRETT, M.R., says (13 Q.B.D. at p. 397):

> "Whatever may be thought of the wisdom of this legislation, I feel myself bound to come to the conclusion that the object of the statute was twofold; first, that the borrower should understand the nature of the security which he was about to give for the debt due from him; and, secondly, that a creditor upon merely searching the register should be able to understand the position of the borrower, and should not be compelled to go to a solicitor in order to get counsel's opinion as to the meaning of a security already created by the borrower."

In Ex parte Stanford (2) BOWEN, L.J., says (17 Q.B.D. at p. 270):

> "But a divergence only becomes substantial or material when it is calculated to give the bill of sale a legal consequence or effect, either greater or smaller, than that which would attach to it if drawn in the form which has been sanctioned, or if it departs from the form in a manner calculated to mislead those whom it is the object of the statute to protect"

In Thomas v. Kelly (3) LORD HALSBURY, L.C., says (13 App. Cas. at p. 54):

> "Further, I think that s. 9 must be construed to enact not only what a bill of sale must contain, but also what it must not contain, so that the statute must be understood to have prohibited bills of sale of personal chattels as security for money to which the form given by the statute is not appropriate."

To deal with the form of the bill of sale in this case, the wife, Lily Alice Lane, does not in any way purport to grant the chattels in question. It was said that the deed being under seal, the recitals contained in it would operate by way of estoppel against her.

In Ex parte Morgan (4) and Fraser v. Pendlebury (5) it seems clear such recitals would only operate by way of estoppel when relied upon for the purpose of enforcing any right created by the bill of sale, but in this case she entered into no contract, and I cannot see why such recitals can be used by way of estoppel against her. The true view of her being joined in the deed seems to me to be the view expressed by JESSEL, M.R., in Ex parte Popplewell (6), where, dealing with the son James Storey, who in no way was a grantor, he says (21 Ch.D. at p. 82): "The joinder in it of a person who had no interest is mere surplusage." I am therefore of opinion that the joining of the wife was mere surplusage in this case, and did not, within the words of BOWEN, J., in Ex parte Stanford (2), give the bill of sale a legal consequence or effect, either greater or smaller than would attach to it if drawn in the form which has been sanctioned, nor do I think the joining of the wife in this case would prevent the borrower understanding the nature of the security, nor a creditor who searched the register from understanding the position of the borrower. I think, within the words of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., the transaction is one in respect of which the form in the schedule is appropriate, and the addition of the wife does not in any way prevent the document being substantially in the form required by the statute. It may be truly said the recitals and the fact of the wife joining might be used as evidence of aquiescence so as to prevent her at any future time disputing the validity of the document, but I do not think that this affects the operation of the document in any way as a bill of sale so as to render it different from what it would be if it was in the exact form required by statute.

A further objection was taken that the affidavit did not set out the residence and occupation of the wife, but she was not a person making or giving the same within s. 10 (2) of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, nor was she a grantor within s. 10 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882. I do not think there was any occasion to put her residence or occupation in the affidavit. The decision of the county court judge was in my view correct and ought to be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

ROWLATT, J.—I have read the judgment of HORRIDGE, J., and agree with it.

Appeal dismissed.

Carriage of Goods—Common carrier—Furniture remover—Special contract—Previous inspection of goods—No special stipulations as to carriage—Goods destroyed by accidental fire.

The defendant, a furniture remover, undertook to remove the plaintiff's furniture for an agreed price, having previously inspected the goods. Apart from the stipulation as to price there were no other terms regarding the removal. On the journey the furniture was destroyed by an accidental fire. In an action by the plaintiff for the loss, it was admitted that the defendant was not a common carrier, but it was contended that he was exercising a public employment of carrying goods for hire, and thereby impliedly undertook the same liability as a common carrier.

Held: (i) in the absence of any express term in the contract rendering the defendant liable as a common carrier, the admission that he was not a common carrier was sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's claim; (ii) Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson (1) ((1874) L.R. 9 Exch. 338) was no authority for the contention that a furniture remover who makes a special contract on each occasion after inspecting the goods impliedly undertakes the liability of a common carrier.

Appeal from the Bath County Court.

The defendant, a furniture remover, undertook to remove the plaintiff's furniture from Bath to Melksham for the sum of £2 10s. Before agreeing to remove the furniture, the defendant, in accordance with his practice, first inspected the furniture and then submitted his estimate of the cost. On the journey a fire broke out in one of the vans and destroyed some of the furniture. The plaintiff thereupon sued the defendant for the loss. It was admitted that the defendant was not a common carrier, but it was contended that as he was prepared to carry anyone's goods subject to a special price being arranged in each case according to the nature of the furniture and the distance it was to be taken, he was carrying on the public employment of a carrier, and was consequently under the same liability as a common carrier. Apart from the fixing of the price, no other special term was entered into. It was found as a fact at the trial that the fire was not caused by any negligence on the part of the defendant, nor was it caused by the plaintiff improperly putting any inflammable articles in the van. The learned county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the case was governed by Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson (1), and that the defendant was liable on the ground that he was carrying on the public employment of a carrier, and was, therefore, under the same liability as a common carrier. The defendant appealed.

Bromley Eames for the defendant.
Croom-Johnson for the plaintiff.

AVORY, J.—The plaintiff in this case employed the defendant to remove some furniture from Bath to Melksham. Before undertaking the work the defendant inspected the furniture, and, having done so, agreed to remove it for £2 10s. There was no other express term of the contract. The defendant proceeded to remove the furniture, and in the course of removal, while the van was upon the road, fire from some unexplained cause broke out among the goods, causing damage to them. Thereupon the plaintiff brings this action for the loss of or injury to the goods.

It was found as a fact by the county court judge that the fire did not originate through any negligence of the defendant; but it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that he was entitled to recover, not upon the ground that the defendant was a common carrier—that is to say, an insurer of the safety of the goods—but upon the ground that he had, in performance of this contract, incurred or undertaken the liability of a common carrier. At the trial in the county court and in the argument before us it was admitted on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant was not carrying on the business of a common carrier. It is not suggested that there was in this case any express contract that the defendant should be liable as a common carrier, and I was disposed to think that the admission that he was not a common carrier put the plaintiff out of court. But it was contended that this defendant, although not a common carrier, had under the circumstances of this case undertaken the liability of a common carrier. In giving judgment for the plaintiff, the county court judge relied mainly on Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson (1) as an authority which governed the matter in favour of the plaintiff.

Before turning to the judgment, I think it is necessary that one should have a clear idea of what constitutes a common carrier. The following definition in MACNAMARA ON CARRIERS BY LAND (2nd Edn.), p. 11 [see now (3rd Edn.), p. 11], is, I think, an accurate one:

> "A common carrier is a person who undertakes for hire to transport from a place within the realm to a place within or without the realm the goods or money of all such persons as think fit to employ him. To render a person liable as a common carrier he must exercise the business of carrying as a public employment, and must undertake to carry goods for all persons indiscriminately, and hold himself out, either expressly or by course of conduct, as ready to engage in the transportation of goods for hire as a business, not merely as a casual occupation pro hac vice."

That being the definition of a common carrier, a "private carrier" (i.e., everyone who carries for hire who is not a common carrier) is defined in the same textbook (ibid. at p. 6) as > "a person whose trade is not that of conveying goods from one person or place to another, but who undertakes upon occasion to carry the goods of another and receives a reward for so doing."

As I have said, I doubt whether the plaintiff in this case can succeed when once he has admitted that the defendant was not a common carrier, unless he could prove that there were express terms in this contract rendering the defendant liable as a common carrier; and it is not suggested that there were any such express terms in this agreement.

But it is suggested that there is a third class of persons who are under the liability of a common carrier, and as far as I am able to understand the suggested definition of this third class it is this—namely, persons exercising a public employment of carrying goods for hire. Counsel for the plaintiff says that although they are not common carriers, they are persons who, when they do carry goods, fall under the same liability. I doubt very much whether there is any such class as distinguished from common carriers. I will now proceed to examine the judgment of the county court judge before I deal with the authorities. Having found that the defendant is a furniture remover, he proceeds:

> "It is admitted that the defendant is not a common carrier, but it is submitted on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant has so exercised his employment as to incur the liabilities of a common carrier, and therefore is liable, although the goods have been lost without negligence on his part."

Unless this means that he has entered into a special contract under and by virtue of which he incurs the liability of a common carrier, I doubt, as I have already said, whether there is any distinction between a man who so exercises his employment as to incur the liability of a common carrier and a common carrier. In other words, if he exercises his employment so as to incur the liability of a common carrier, in my opinion he is a common carrier. The county court judge says he relies mainly for his decision in favour of the plaintiff upon the judgment of BLACKBURN, J., in Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson (1). BLACKBURN, J. said (L.R. 9 Exch. at pp. 340, 341):

> "the defendant . . . carried for anyone who chose to employ him, but that an express agreement was always made as to each voyage or employment of the defendant's flats, which means, as we understand the evidence, that the flats did not go about plying for hire, but were waiting for hire by anyone. We think that this describes the ordinary employment of a lighterman, and that, both on authority and principle, a person who exercises this business and employment does, in the absence of something to limit his liability, incur the liability of a common carrier in respect of the goods he carries."

The county court judge then says that he adopted that principle in the present case, but, with all respect, I do not think that the decision in Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson (1) was really based on that ground. He then proceeds to quote the passage on which the defendant relied from the judgment of KELLY, C.B., in the Court of Exchequer, where he said (L.R. 7 Exch. at p. 269):

> "If each particular voyage had been made under a special contract containing stipulations applicable to that voyage only the case would have been different."

The county court judge says that this dictum does not support counsel for the defendant, as there is a distinction between an express agreement, which there must be in every contract and one containing stipulations applicable to the particular voyage only, and there were, in the present contract, no stipulations applicable to the particular voyage only. The stipulations were the ordinary stipulations of carriage. There was an express stipulation as regards price and therefore the present case is not brought within the dictum of KELLY, C.B., because there were no stipulations applicable to that voyage only.

I differ from the county court judge. I think there was something more important in this case than a mere stipulation as to price. There was a preliminary agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant that before agreeing to carry the goods the defendant should, in this case, as apparently in all others in the course of his business, first of all inspect the goods to see if he would undertake the work of carrying. That is, he was not a person ready to carry anybody's goods to anywhere from any place at a fixed rate, but a man who first inspected before he undertook to carry any goods at all. The county court judge says that the defendant's course of business was to accept a contract from anyone who applied for removal of furniture, subject to the estimate as to price being accepted.

In this court we have power to draw inferences such as might be drawn in the court below. I think the county court judge was drawing wrong inferences from the facts. He says the terms of business were to accept anyone's goods. There is not a particle of evidence of this. The evidence showed that the defendant himself first of all inspected the goods and exercised his discretion whether he should agree to take them or not.

The judgment is obviously based upon the Liver Alkali Case (1), and it is necessary, therefore, to examine that case to see whether it supports the proposition put forward on behalf of the plaintiff. I think that the view put before the court has been rather misleading owing to want of attention to the original judgment in the Court of Exchequer. It is quite clear to my mind that in the original judgment the whole court, consisting of KELLY, C.B., MARTIN, BRAMWELL, and CLEASBY, B.B., decided the case upon the ground that the defendant was a common carrier; and it is important to see what the facts were on which it was so decided. There the defendant was a flat or lighter owner, and let out his vessels for the conveyance of goods to any person who applied to him. The vessels did not ply between fixed points, but a separate bargain was made on each occasion, the customer paying a specified rate per ton—not a contract price. It is significant to note that any person could hire a vessel for the purpose of carrying goods on paying a specified rate per ton. KELLY, C.B., said (L.R. 7 Exch. at p. 269):

> "Different persons did hire them at different times, and no evidence was given of any refusal on the part of the defendant to allow any applicant to hire."

The evidence also showed that there was no contract in writing between the parties. In other words, there was no special contract applicable to the particular voyage. The arguments in the case turned entirely on the question whether the defendant was a common carrier. KELLY, C.B., in giving the judgment of the court said (ibid.):

> "I feel constrained to assent to the neat and precise argument of counsel and to hold that there was evidence that the defendant was a common carrier. Without going through all the authorities which have been referred to, it is enough to say that we have the clearest authority that 'hoymen, ferrymen, and masters of ships who carry goods for hire' are common carriers."

He then proceeds to discuss the question whether the fact that the defendant only carried for one person at a time deprived the defendant of the character of a common carrier, and he decided that it did not.

This being the decision of the Court of Exchequer, the case went to the Exchequer Chamber, and there BLACKBURN, J., gave judgment, with which the majority of the other judges concurred; and I think that the true reading of that judgment is a concurrence with the court below that the defendant was a common carrier. It is true that in the course of his judgment BLACKBURN, J., said (L.R. 9 Exch. at p. 340):

> "We have purposely confined our expressions to the question 'whether the defendant has the liability of a common carrier,' for we do not think it necessary to inquire whether the defendant is a carrier so as to be liable to an action for not taking goods tendered to him."

That passage might appear to support the plaintiff's contention in this case, but he proceeds, after stating the facts of the case (ibid. at pp. 340, 341, 343),

> "We think that this describes the ordinary employment of a lighterman, and that, both on authority and principle, a person who exercises this business and employment does, in the absence of something to limit his liability, incur the liability of a common carrier in respect of the goods he carries. . . . We think, therefore, that the judgment below was right, and should be affirmed."

BRETT, J., who concurred in the result, put his judgment on another ground. He thought the defendant was not a common carrier, but that he was liable by reason of a custom which, he said (ibid. at p. 344), was

> "a recognised custom of England . . . every shipowner who carries goods for hire in his ship . . . undertakes to carry them at his own absolute risk, the act of God or of the Queen's enemies alone excepted, unless by agreement between himself and a particular freighter, on a particular voyage, or on particular voyages, he limits his liability by further exceptions."

In my view, the true meaning of the judgment of BLACKBURN, J., is that the defendant was a common carrier, and it does not appear to be any ground for holding that a furniture remover, who makes a special contract on each occasion for the removal of furniture, is a common carrier. It is to be noted that the view I have expressed about the true effect of that judgment has been already taken by COCKBURN, C.J., in the later case of Nugent v. Smith (2), where he said (1 C.P.D. at p. 433):

> ". . . it is obvious that as the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber proceeded on the ground that the defendant in that case was a common carrier, the decision is no authority for the position taken in the court below, that all shipowners are equally liable for loss by inevitable accident."

However that may be, it is sufficient to say that the Liver Alkali Co. Case (1) is no authority for holding that a furniture remover who does not carry for all indifferently, but who makes a special contract after inspecting the goods, is a common carrier. In these circumstances, I have come to the conclusion, first, that there was no evidence that the defendant undertook or incurred the liability of a common carrier; and, secondly, that the county court judge misdirected himself in holding that he was bound by the Liver Alkali Co. Case (1) to decide in the way he did. The judgment must, therefore, be set aside.

ROWLATT, J.—I agree. It is admitted that the defendant was not a common carrier, but it is said that he is responsible because he had contracted on the footing of assuming the liability of a common carrier. That doctrine is traceable to Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson (1). Now that was a case, as I understand the facts, in which the defendant was ready to carry anyone's goods at a specified rate per ton. He only carried one person's goods at a time, but no special contract was made as to the terms and conditions of carriage apart from the separate bargain as to the price. This is what KELLY, C.B., lays stress on in the Court of Exchequer in deciding that the defendant was a common carrier. He said (L.R. 7 Exch. at p. 269):

> "No doubt, if each particular voyage had been made under a special contract containing stipulations applicable to that voyage only, the case would have been different."

He means, as I understand him, that as the terms, apart from the bargain as to the price, on which the goods were to be carried were left unexpressed, the ordinary conditions which govern a contract of carriage applied.

When the case came before the Exchequer Chamber there was some difference of opinion as to the grounds on which the case should be decided. BRETT, J., took one view and BLACKBURN, J., and the majority of the court another. BLACKBURN, J., after referring to the facts, said (L.R. 9 Exch. at p. 340):

> "We think that this describes the ordinary employment of a lighterman, and that, both on authority and principle, a person who exercises this business and employment does, in the absence of something to limit his liability, incur the liability of a common carrier in respect of the goods he carries."

As I understand him, he means that a man who lets the whole of a ship at a price for a voyage to carry the goods of a particular person is not in the position of a common carrier; but that once he has made a bargain as to the price, if he says nothing as to the other terms of carriage, he is merely fulfilling the functions and so assuming the role of a common carrier. Therefore you may say that by contracting on the footing of a common carrier he incurs the liability of a common carrier, if that is a more accurate way of putting it than saying that he is a common carrier; to my mind, it is merely a matter of words. It is to be observed that when that case was considered in the Court of Appeal in Nugent v. Smith (2) COCKBURN, C.J., who presided, took the view that the Liver Alkali Co. Case (1) really proceeded on the footing that "the defendant was a common carrier and liable as such." But he added (1 C.P.D. at p. 433):

> "I cannot help seeing the difficulty which stands in the way of the ruling in that case, namely, that it is essential to the character of a common carrier that he is bound to carry the goods of all persons applying to him, while it never has been held, and, as it seems to me, could not be held, that a person who lets out vessels or vehicles to individual customers on their application was liable to an action for refusing the use of such a vessel or vehicle if required to furnish it."

He points out that that would be calling someone a common carrier who is not a common carrier, because he is not obliged to carry for everyone; and he goes on to say (ibid. at p. 434):

> "At all events, it is obvious that as the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber proceeded on the ground that the defendant in that case was a common carrier, the decision is no authority for the position taken in the court below, that all shipowners are equally liable for loss by inevitable accident."

It is said by counsel for the defendant that, even if the Liver Alkali Co. Case (1) was not decided on the ground that the defendant was a common carrier, the doctrine that all carriers by sea are subject to the liability of a common carrier has never been applied to carriers by land—that is to say, it has never been held that a carrier by land is liable as a common carrier if he is not, in fact, a common carrier. Some cases might arise in the future in which this doctrine might be applied to a carrier by land, and I express no opinion as to whether it is restricted to carriage by sea. But we must look at this case and see whether there is any pretence for saying that this man took upon himself the role of a common carrier. It seems to me that that is a question of law. What are the words of a contract is in every case a question of fact; the construction and legal effect of those words is a question of law. In this case there is no dispute about the words or terms of the contract; the facts are quite clear from the evidence. This was an ordinary case of a small household removal into the country. The defendant, before agreeing to undertake the removal, first inspected the goods and then fixed the price at which he was willing to undertake the removal. That being the character of the contract, one sees at once how entirely artificial the argument is that suggests that he was acting as a common carrier. The defendant did more than simply agree to carry the goods. The contract included the removal of the furniture from one house and the placing of it in another; the transit over the road was a mere incident of the contract. I think that a great deal of light is thrown on the question by Scaife v. Farrant (3), which was decided in the interval between Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson (1) and Nugent v. Smith (2). That was a case of removal of furniture, and the defendant, who held himself out as a furniture remover, accepted the plaintiff's goods for removal on the terms that he would undertake "risk of breakages (if any) not exceeding £5 on any one article." The furniture in the present case was destroyed by fire without any negligence on the defendant's part. The argument for the plaintiff was that the defendant was a common carrier, that his liability was limited in amount only

A in the event of breakage, and that he was still liable as a common carrier. It was held that in case of fire he was not liable, on the ground that the special contract was intended to limit the defendant's liability to loss by breakage or by the defendant's negligence, and excluded any question of liability as a common carrier. LUSH, J., held (L.R. 10 Exch. at p. 362) that it was impossible to construe the contract

> "as merely limiting the amount which should be payable by the defendant in the event of damage by breakage, leaving him by implication liable to the full extent for all other casualties."

DENMAN, J., referring to Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson said (ibid. at p. 363):

> "If that case were identical in its material facts with the present, I should hold myself bound by it so far as to say that, whether a common carrier or not, to all intents and purposes the defendant must be held liable, as having undertaken a business imposing upon him the same liabilities as those of a common carrier. But I am of opinion that the mode of dealing adopted by the defendant in this case differs in many most important particulars from that of the defendant in Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson (1)."

He then reviewed the facts of the case and continued (ibid. at p. 364):

> "I come to the conclusion that the defendant did not so deal with the public as to undertake to carry goods in the absence of an agreement as to terms of carriage."

E

COCKBURN, C.J., said (ibid. at p. 366) that he entirely agreed that this was a special contract, and that the question of the liability of the defendant as a common carrier could not arise; had it not been for this he would have felt himself "bound to enter into the question whether the defendant was a common carrier at all." I think, therefore, that this case shows that the judges there considered that a contract of furniture removal was not simply a contract of carriage open as to its terms save as to price, but a different kind of contract altogether, and that such a contract was not one which put the remover in the position of a common carrier. For these reasons it seems to me that this action entirely fails and the appeal must succeed.

FOLKESTONE CORPORATION v. BROCKMAN AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Earl Loreburn, Lord Kinnear, Lord Dunedin and Lord Atkinson), October 28, 30, 1913, February 6, 1914]

Highway—Dedication—Common law—Intention to dedicate—Question of fact—Evidence of user—Presumption of intention.

Whether or not land has been dedicated to the public as a highway is a question of fact for the jury or other tribunal of fact and not one of law for the court, and the decision of the tribunal of fact cannot be set aside by the court unless there is no evidence to support it. To constitute a valid dedication an intention to dedicate by the owner of the soil must be proved. While user of the way by the public may be evidence tending to show dedication it will have that effect only when it is exercised under such conditions as to imply the assertion of a right with the acquiescence of the owner of the fee. Evidence of user, however long and uninterrupted, does not at common law raise a presumption of intention to dedicate which, in the absence of rebutting evidence, must necessarily entitle the litigant alleging dedication to succeed. No matter how strong the evidence of user, all the evidence should be left to the jury, who should be asked to consider it as a whole and to determine whether the owner of the soil intended to dedicate to the public a way over it.

Where the owner of waste land over which the public were in the habit of wandering in all directions made an unfenced road across it leading from one public highway to another, and by erecting gates or barriers on the road prevented the passage of unauthorised horses and carriages over it, but took no measures to prevent the public from wandering over it or walking along it as they had theretofore done over the land on which it had been made,

Held: there was evidence on which justices, dealing with an objection to an apportionment under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, could find that the owner of the land had no intention to dedicate the land as a public way.

Appeal by Folkestone Corporation from an order of the Court of Appeal reversing an order of the Divisional Court upon a Case Stated by justices of the borough of Folkestone.

The appellants, pursuant to the Private Street Works Act, 1892 [repealed by Highways Act, 1959, of which see s. 174 et seq.], made a provisional apportionment of expenses to be incurred in executing works in a portion of the Lower Sandgate Road lying between the eastern boundary fence of Cliff House and a point 170 yards east of St. Paul's Church Schools, Sandgate. The respondents, who were owners and occupiers of premises situate there, objected to the apportionment on the ground (inter alia) that this portion of the street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. The justices disallowed the objections, but, at the request of the respondents, stated a Case for the opinion of the King's Bench Division. The Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division (LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., and HAMILTON and BANKES, JJ.) ordered that the matter should be remitted to the justices to say whether they found that there was no dedication of the road in question as a highway for foot passengers before the year 1836, or whether they had only negatived dedication of a highway for horses and carriages, and that, if they found no dedication of a highway for foot passengers, their decision should be affirmed, but that if they had found that there was such a dedication their decision should be reversed. The justices stated that they had found that there was no dedication of the road in question as a highway for foot passengers before the year 1836, and their decision accordingly was affirmed. The Court of Appeal (VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and BUCKLEY, L.JJ., FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., dissenting) reversed the decision of the Divisional Court and of the justices, and the corporation appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., Ryde, K.C., and R. W. Turner for the appellants.
Cave, K.C., and R. A. Glen for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Feb. 6, 1914. The following opinions were read.

EARL LOREBURN.—In this appeal the question of substance is whether upon the facts found by the justices they were justified in coming to the conclusion that there was no dedication of a certain road near Folkestone before 1836. Treating these findings in the Special Case as the evidence upon which the conclusion of the justices was based, is there any evidence to support that conclusion? If I relied upon my own unaided judgment I should assent to the order of the Court of Appeal, because I have not myself been able to see any such evidence. But I know that FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., and your Lordships think otherwise, and in those circumstances I feel that I cannot insist upon a view which would import that there was no evidence upon which a reasonable man could act. I take it, therefore, that there is such evidence, and if so, then the conclusion of the justices cannot be lawfully disturbed. I desire to say only a few words upon the law of the case, which was discussed at the Bar. I believe that the doctrine enunciated in the Privy Council in Turner v. Walsh (1) has been uniformly accepted—that dedication may be and, indeed, ought to be presumed in the absence of anything to rebut the presumption from long continued user of a way by the public. Two things have to be made good—that the user has been sufficient in its duration and character, and that the presumption then arising has not been rebutted. The two questions are usually, or at all events often, put to the jury in a composite form. For example, they are told that if they think the user is sufficient, dedication ought to be presumed, unless they think it is rebutted by the evidence. In that or in any other case where there is not any evidence to support a verdict, it may be set aside, and the proper judgment may be entered against the party whose case has nothing to support it. As for the presumption, I do not think it makes much difference whether it be called a presumption of law or fact, though I think it is the former.

LORD KINNEAR.—The question to be considered in this case is whether a certain road had, before Mar. 20, 1836, been effectually dedicated to the public as a highway for foot passengers. The importance of the date is owing to the Highways Act, 1835, because after that Act came into force roads could not be lawfully dedicated so as to be deemed public highways repairable by the inhabitants at large except in accordance with statutory requirements which have not been complied with in this case. It does not follow that use by the public since 1836 may not be so connected with prior user as to be treated as evidence, so far as it goes, to prove an earlier dedication. But the fact to be proved is that the road was dedicated before the Act, at a time when such dedication, if accepted by the public, would have been lawful. The question arises on a Special Case stated by the justices of the borough of Folkestone for the opinion of the King's Bench Division. The justices have decided that there has been no dedication in fact; and on matter of fact it is not disputed that their decision is final, the jurisdiction of the court, and, therefore, of this House on appeal, being confined to the determination of questions of law. The particular question of law which the justices propose for consideration of the court is not formulated with precision. But in the Special Case they state distinctly certain specific facts relating to the history and use of the road, and the question seems to be whether, when the facts so specified had been proved, it was still open to the tribunal to draw a further inference of fact one way or the other, or whether the necessary conclusion was already fixed by a rule of law.

I do not think it necessary to recapitulate the facts in detail. But the main points may be briefly stated in order to see how the question of law arises. The road was made in 1827 by Jacob, Earl of Radnor, over lands of which he was a life tenant. The ground over which it was constructed lies between the base of the cliff and the beach, at some little distance from the highway between Sandgate and Folkestone. Before the road was made it was open and waste, and people were allowed to wander over it at pleasure. Immediately upon completion of the road in 1827, houses of a residential character were erected along its course on building plots leased by Lord Radnor; and the road in question was constructed, and was necessary for the use of the occupiers, their servants, and tradespeople. There was no evidence that it was required for any other purpose, although it was in fact used, as the justices say, "to some extent" by the inhabitants of Folkestone and Sandgate other than Lord Radnor's lessees. It was constructed as a horse and carriageway, and was never open to the public in that character. But while the passage of horses and carriages was regulated by the erection of barriers and toll bars, no barrier of any kind was erected to exclude foot passengers. There was no defined footpath, and people who traversed it on foot used the whole width of the road and the adjacent banks at pleasure. The result was that the public, who had been accustomed to stray over the waste ground before the road was made, were allowed to do so after its completion, and nothing was done to prevent their entering upon it at any point in its course, or to prevent their using it as a means of passage between two points on the highway from Sandgate to Folkestone. This public enjoyment of the road had continued, when the present question arose, for more than eighty years. In the meantime, the road was repaired, when necessary, by the owner of the soil, and never by a public authority. Along with these facts there must be taken into account another of a different description, as throwing light on the probable intention of the landowner. The lands were held by Earl Jacob in strict settlement, and as tenant for life he had no power to dedicate a right of way to the public. His disability was so far removed by a private Act of Parliament in 1825 as to enable him to "allot and set out a competent part of the ground for public squares, roads, streets, ways, avenues, or otherwise for the use and convenience of" such houses as might be built on part of the estate over which he was authorised to grant building leases. But during the short period between 1827 and 1835 he made no actual allotment, and did nothing to set out a competent part of the ground for a footpath unless his submission to the public user is enough to satisfy these conditions, and after 1835 the Highways Act made dedication impossible.

On consideration of these facts the justices say that they came to the conclusion that it was not the intention of Jacob, Earl of Radnor, in 1827, or later, to make and dedicate the road in question as a public highway; that there was in fact no dedication of such road as a highway prior to Mar. 20, 1836; and that since that date there has been no dedication as prescribed by s. 23 of the Highways Act, 1835 [see now s. 39 of Highways Act, 1959]. They "therefore decided that the road in question is not, nor is any part thereof, a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and that it is a street within the meaning of the Act," Private Street Works Act, 1892 [repealed by Act of 1892], and the question they propose for the opinion of the court is whether, upon the above statement of facts, they had come to a correct determination in point of law. It is unnecessary to consider the final decision which is deduced from the findings I have quoted, that the road is a street within the Private Streets Act, 1892, because that point is not now in controversy; and it is common ground that the Special Case is so framed as to raise the question really in dispute—namely, whether the conclusion that there has been no dedication can be set aside as erroneous in law. On this question it appears to me, in the first place, that the three propositions embraced in this conclusion are, all of them, affirmations of fact within the exclusive jurisdiction of the justices. This was evidently the view of the King's Bench Division, because after certain procedure the judgment of the justices was affirmed, although in the course of the procedure it is indicated clearly enough that the learned judges would probably have come to a different conclusion if it had been open to them to determine the question of fact for themselves. They thought it doubtful whether the justices had not meant to decide, only that there was no public carriageway, without having addressed their minds to the question of the existence of a public footway, and accordingly they remitted the matter to the justices who had stated the Case in order that they might say whether they had found that there was no dedication of the road in question as a highway for foot passengers before the year 1836; if they had so found, it was ordered that their judgment should be affirmed, and if they had not come to any decision on the said question, it was ordered that they were to determine whether the road was dedicated as a highway for foot passengers before 1836 or not. It is evident that no such remit could have been made if the learned judges had not been satisfied that dedication or no dedication was a question of fact for the justices, and not one of law for the court, and, accordingly, when the justices reported that they had found that there was no dedication of the road as a highway for foot passengers before 1836, their judgment stood affirmed. I think this was perfectly right. Dedication, in my opinion, is matter of fact, and whatever their view of the evidence might have been, the learned judges, as they properly held, had no power to overrule the decision of the justices.

It is said that they should have come to a contrary conclusion in law, because user creates a presumptio juris in favour of dedication. This proposition is too vague to be helpful in argument, since each of its terms is ambiguous. The nature of user, and consequently the weight to be given to it, varies indefinitely in different cases, and whether it will import a presumption of grant or dedication must depend upon the circumstances of the particular case. The law is stated more exactly by LORD BLACKBURN in Mann v. Brodie (2) (10 App. Cas. at p. 386). He begins by citing the doctrine laid down by PARKE, B., in Poole v. Huskinson (3) (11 M. & W. at p. 830):

> "In order to constitute a valid dedication to the public of a highway by the owner of the soil, it is clearly settled that there must be an intention to dedicate, there must be an animus dedicandi, of which the user by the public is evidence and no more."

Then he adds more particularly with reference to the effect of user, that

> "where there has been evidence of a user by the public so long, and in such a manner that the owner of the fee, whoever he was, must have been aware that the public were acting under the belief that the way had been dedicated, and has taken no steps to disabuse them of that belief, it is not conclusive evidence, but evidence on which those who have to find that fact may find that there was a dedication by the owner, whoever he was."

The points to be noted are, first, that the thing to be proved is intention to dedicate, and, secondly, that while public user may be evidence tending to instruct dedication, it will be good for that purpose only when it is exercised under such conditions as to imply the assertion of a right, within the knowledge and with the acquiescence of the owner of the fee. The cases in which the law is stated in the same way are numerous, but I refer to one in particular in which it was so laid down by LORD HALSBURY, L.C.: Macpherson v. Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society (4), because I think his Lordship's observations bring out very sharply the determining fact of which in a case like the present the judges of fact must be satisfied, before they can find room for the application of any presumption of law. The law of Scotland as to rights of way differs from that of England in this respect, that the public right, as LORD WATSON more fully explains in Mann v. Brodie (2), is not rested upon any theory of dedication, but upon acquisitive prescription; but the two laws agree in this, that the public use from which a right of way is to be inferred must be had as of right. With reference to this difference, the Lord Chancellor says (13 App. Cas. at p. 746):

> "The question in the mind of an English lawyer is not only whether he can, on proper judicial evidence, determine that there has been an exercise of such a right of way as is here in question, but whether he can reasonably infer that the owner has a real intention of dedicating that way to the use of the public. That, however, is not the law of Scotland, and if it can be established that for the necessary period there has in fact been such a use of the way as negatives a mere licence or permission, then, as I understand the law of Scotland, that establishes the right of way in question."

He goes on to point out (ibid. at p. 747) that a question had been asked by a dissentient judge in the court below, which required an answer if the judgment was to be supported.

> "A question is put by LORD YOUNG to which, if I were not able to give an answer, I should feel that the respondents ought to be able to furnish it to me. LORD YOUNG, quoting the Lord Ordinary, says, 'The question is whether such use as has been proved is to be ascribed to tolerance or right. Why, I venture to ask,' says LORD YOUNG, 'is it not to be ascribed to tolerance? Does anybody think that an ordinary proprietor would have objected to it or interfered with it by appealing to a court of law to prevent such use of it upon any of the occasions which have been referred to? Why, he would have been thought very ill of by his neighbours, and I think deservedly.' Now I say [continued the Lord Chancellor] that if no answer could be given to that question, I should take a different view from that which I have been at last compelled to take."

I think LORD YOUNG's question is exactly that which would have required an answer in the present case, if we had been concerned with matter of fact. But it was for the justices to answer it; and their answer is final. It appears from the Special Case that the law laid down by PARKE, B., had been cited to them, and they followed it correctly, when they put to themselves, as the first question to be decided, whether the facts proved before them justified the inference that Lord Radnor intended to dedicate a highway. They answer that question of fact in the negative, and I see no ground in law upon which it can be held that a court, which is forbidden to interfere with their decisions of fact, is nevertheless entitled to declare that that conclusion is wrong. No power to disturb it can be drawn from the doctrine that from sufficient user dedication is to be presumed, because the question is whether the facts are sufficient to raise the presumption.

It is admittedly presumptio juris and not juris et de jure, or in other words, it is not an absolute and inflexible rule of law which imposes a pre-ordained conclusion upon the judges of fact, but an inference of fact which is allowed by law if, upon clear evidence or a balance of conflicting evidence, it is reasonable that it should be drawn. It is conceded by the learned lords justices in the majority that the presumption may be disproved; but, with great respect, it seems to me to be so treated in the argument as to give it all the effect of an absolute rule. I think it fallacious to assume dedication on a partial view of the evidence, and only after that has been done to inquire whether conflicting facts are strong enough to dislodge a conclusion already reached. I concede that a presumption of law, once it has been established, throws the onus of proof upon the party who disputes it; and when it rests upon a definite fact which may be proved with certainty or may be admitted, it may be easy to determine at what stage the onus has been shifted. But in the simplest case rules for fixing the onus of proof do not determine the value of conflicting evidence when the proof has been completed; and in the present case no presumption of law can arise until the basis of fact upon which it rests has been established, and that cannot be done until the whole body of evidence has been considered. It is manifest that the facts tending to prove dedication cannot be weighed until they are brought into connection with and checked by the facts tending in the opposite direction. It is, however, not only by the balance of conflicting facts, but by the interpretation of ambiguous facts that the true conclusion is to be reached. This must be the office of the judges of fact, and it seems to me impossible that the presumption should be held to be established in law at any particular stage of the proof, until the fact upon which it rests has been definitely fixed with due reference to all the circumstances, by the proper tribunal. I admit that if it is given without evidence, or against evidence, the decision of the justices, like the verdict of a jury, may be set aside, not because it is erroneous, but because it is arbitrary. That is a rule of law which is well settled. But it has no application to the present case. The burden of proof lies in the first place on the respondents, who allege dedication, because he who affirms must prove. They adduce a body of evidence which makes it highly probable that the owner of the fee should have intended to dedicate. But ex hypothesi it is not conclusive evidence, for if it were, there would be no room for presumption, and presumption which the law allows may be stronger or weaker; and if the tribunal which has to judge of the fact think that in all the circumstances of the particular case it is not strong enough, they may be right or wrong, but they are not chargeable with arbitrary excess of jurisdiction if they decline to draw the inference.

The result is that the respondents have failed to prove their case. But the appellants do not by any means rest their own case upon this negative conclusion. They say, and I think with great force, that all the facts connected with the origin and history of the road are in favour of a presumption of tolerance, and against a presumption of dedication. The public, or such of them as chose to go there, were already in enjoyment of the locus over which the road was made; it was constructed and maintained as a private road for horses and carriages, and it never was dedicated as a public highway for these purposes; it made no special provision for the use of foot passengers, and nothing was done by Lord Radnor to suggest that he intended to dedicate it in the only way in which, as a limited owner, he could properly create such a burden upon an estate held in strict settlement. It is true that he did not interfere to obstruct the way for foot passengers, but to do so would have been churlish in the highest degree; and it may well be supposed that he did not believe he had any interest to do so, since during the short time when dedication was lawful his estate was sufficiently protected by a private Act, and thereafter by the Highway Act, 1835. They argued that, on the one hand, no reasonable proprietor would have interfered with foot passengers in these circumstances, and that, on the other hand, no one would have dreamed of creating, without necessity, so anomalous a right as a public footway repairable by the inhabitants at large superimposed without delimitation, upon a private carriage-way repairable by the proprietor. Why, then, to apply LORD BLACKBURN'S test, must it be held that he knew that the foot passengers who came upon his road were

A acting in the belief that a way had been dedicated, or why should the public have believed anything so improbable?

I express no opinion as to the weight which should be given to these considerations, because I am not deciding the question of fact. But I do not understand how they can be supposed to be irrelevant to the question whether the public user is to be ascribed to the permission or licence allowed by successive proprietors or B to the deliberate intention of Lord Radnor formed and carried into effect before 1836 to dedicate a highway to the public. The question is one of fact, turning upon probabilities of conduct, which cannot be estimated by antecedent rules of law. I think it a very fair test of the argument to inquire how the question would have been treated if it had been tried by a jury. I was impressed by the observation of my noble and learned friend LORD ATKINSON during the argument, when C he asked whether there was any case in which a jury had been directed that they were bound in law to presume dedication. No such case was cited, and I think that Turner v. Walsh (1) in the Privy Council, on which the respondents' counsel relied, is a high authority to the contrary. It was held to be a right direction to a jury that user might be relied on in New South Wales in the same way as in England for the purpose of raising the presumption of a dedication of a road over D Crown lands, and that the evidence was sufficient to entitle them to presume dedication by the Crown. This left it for the jury to determine whether the facts raised the presumption. The plain meaning of the words is not that they were bound by law to presume, but that it was within their competence to do so, and that implies that they must judge for themselves whether to make the presumption or not. This is even more clearly brought out by the observation of SIR MONTAGUE E SMITH on the main point on which the appeal appears to have been taken. After a user of twenty-one years, an Act had been passed in 1861 which was said to exclude dedication by the Crown, except by a certain prescribed method. Assuming this to be the effect of the Act, SIR MONTAGUE SMITH says it is proper to look at the whole evidence together to see whether there had been such a continuous and connected user as was sufficient to raise the presumption of dedication prior F to the statute at a time when the Crown had power to dedicate, and he adds (6 App. Cas. at p. 642):

> "It may be that in this case the evidence of user prior to 1861 was alone sufficient to establish the presumption of dedication; but the strength of that presumption is increased by the subsequent user, and would certainly have G been much diminished if the user had been discontinued after 1861."

But then if the strength of the presumption may be increased or diminished according to circumstances, it is for the jury to determine the weight which should be given to it in the particular case. This is entirely in accordance with the general rule laid down by SIR MONTAGUE SMITH when he says (ibid. at pp. 639, 640):

> "From long continued user of a way by the public, whether the land belongs to the Crown or a private owner, dedication from the Crown or the private owner, as the case may be, in the absence of anything to rebut the presumption, may, and indeed ought, to be presumed."

I This does not mean that it must be presumed even in the absence of rebutting evidence, but that the sound inference in the case supposed would be in favour of the presumption. It still remains a question of fact whether the presumption has been established. The phrase "ought to be presumed" has been construed by CRANWORTH, L.C., in Young v. Cuthbertson (5), where it had been used by LORD JUSTICE-CLERK HOPE in charging a jury; and LORD CRANWORTH, criticising what he describes as "looseness" in the mode of directing juries, says (1 Macq. at p. 460):

> "I should add, however, that I understand the learned judge when he used the expression 'the jury ought to presume,' not to be stating a proposition in law on which the jury were bound to act, but merely to be pointing out what was almost an irresistible inference in point of fact."

I take it, therefore, that the application of the presumption in a particular case is a question of fact for the jury and not a question of law for the court.

BUCKLEY, L.J., says that the justices have decided a question of mixed fact and law. If so, it was within their competence so to decide. But the case cannot be treated in the same way by a court of law, which has no jurisdiction to decide questions of fact. It became necessary, therefore, for the King's Bench Division to disentangle the law from the fact so far as necessary to explicate their own limited jurisdiction. I think they did so successfully when they decided, as HAMILTON, J., puts it, that, as the matter was one of fact and there was some evidence in it, it must go back to the justices for their determination. It does not appear to me, with great respect, that the issues of fact and law are so clearly distinguished when the learned lord justice says that the justices have found facts which amount in law to dedication. He fails to advert to the critical fact with which they introduce their conclusions—namely, that it was not the intention of Lord Radnor to dedicate the road as a public highway, and I assume that, in speaking of the facts they have found, he refers to the detailed facts which are really no more than evidence from which the fact in issue—to wit, dedication—may or may not be inferred. On the question so raised, as I have already said, I am of opinion that the decision of the justices is final and conclusive as a decision of fact, that the court below had no authority to inquire whether in fact it was right or wrong, and that no ground has been brought forward for setting it aside as contrary to law. I think, therefore, that the order of the Court of Appeal must be reversed, and that of the King's Bench Division restored.

LORD DUNEDIN.—In this case the only question before us is whether there was evidence before the justices which reasonably entitled them to come to the conclusion which they embodied in their finding—"that there was, in fact, no dedication of the road in question as a highway prior to Mar. 10, 1836," as amplified by the further finding "that there was no dedication of the road in question as a highway for foot passengers before the year 1836." The reason of the findings being in two branches is to be found in this. Upon the first finding coming before the Divisional Court, and on consideration of the Case as stated, that court held that it was not certain whether the justices had considered the whole possibilities of the circumstances, or, in other words, that the first finding as it stood might mean that the road had not been dedicated as a carriage road, leaving undetermined the fact whether it had or had not been dedicated as a foot road. So they sent it back to the justices to state precisely whether they had found the latter matter, and, if they had found as regards the foot road also against the dedication, their judgment was to stand. Accordingly, the justices, on remit, added the finding second quoted, and their judgment stood.

It is true that the actual judgment which was allowed to stand was expressed thus (after making the finding first quoted, and adding "that since 1836 there has been no dedication as prescribed by s. 23 of the Highway Act, 1835"): "We, therefore, decided that the road in question is not, nor is any part thereof, a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large." The question was put: "whether upon the above statement of facts we came to a correct determination in point of law." Nevertheless, however the question is framed, the Divisional Court—and necessarily the Court of Appeal in their turn reviewing the judgment of the Divisional Court—has only a right to review law, and so far as a judgment depends on facts the only question of law arising thereon is: Was the evidence reasonably sufficient to justify the finding? I find this very clearly expressed by CHANNELL, J., in Rishton v. Haslingden Corpn. (6), where he says ([1898] 1 Q.B. at p. 301):

"The magistrates ask, 'Were we justified in finding?' It is contended that as the magistrates can only state a Case upon a point of law, and must them-

A selves decide a question of fact, this question means, 'Was there any evidence upon which we could find as we did?' and this we think is so."

Such was also clearly the view of the Divisional Court in this case, for they allowed the decision to stand. That necessarily meant that they considered the question one for the justices to determine, and that whichever way they determined it there B was some evidence on which that judgment could be supported. As Hamilton, J., puts it at the close of his judgment:

> "As the matter is one of fact, and there is some evidence for the justices on it, it must go back for their determination."

When the case came before the Court of Appeal, two of the learned judges took C the view that there was no evidence upon which the finding of the justices could be supported; Fletcher Moulton, L.J., dissented. I am not going to recite the judgments of the majority, but I hope I do them no injustice when I say that they seem to me to be rested on this view. They fasten upon certain of the series of separate conclusions in fact which the justices set out in the Case, and which run:

> D "(h) . . . But there was evidence before us, and we found that from the year 1831 the road was to some extent used by inhabitants of Folkestone and Sandgate other than the said lessees, &c., for business and other purposes." "(j) That spaces are, and have been, since a period antecedent to 1836, left on either side of the toll gate for foot passengers." "(p) That prior to 1836 the road in question was never kept in proper repair, but was open for foot passengers without interruption, and has so continued to the present time." E "(q) That there was no evidence before us of any made footpath on the road before 1836, but we found that foot passengers used the whole width of the road, and the banks by the sides of the road (when practicable) without let or hindrance."

These findings, say they, amount to a finding of user by the public. User by F the public raises a presumption of dedication, and in the other facts found by the justices (which exhaust the letters of the alphabet from a to t, exclusive of the letters above quoted), there is nothing sufficient to rebut the presumption. With deference to the learned judges, I do not think that is the proper way to approach the question, and its defect, to my mind, consists in regarding "user" as an inflexible term, which, if found to apply, can lead to only one legal result. User G is evidence, and can be no more, of dedication. The expression that user raises a presumption of dedication has its origin in this, that in cases where express dedication is out of the question, no one can see into a man's mind, and, therefore, dedication, which can never come into being without intention, can, if it is to be proved at all, only be inferred or presumed from extraneous facts. But that still leaves as matter of inquiry what was the user, and to what did it point. And H this must be considered, not after the method of the Horatii and Curiatii, by taking a set of isolated findings, saying that they presumably lead to a certain result, and then proceeding to see if that presumption can be rebutted, but by considering the whole facts, the surroundings which lead to the user, and from all those facts, including the user, coming to the conclusion whether or not the user did infer dedication.

I I can make my meaning clear by illustration. If you know nothing about a road except that you find it is used, then the origin of the road is, so to speak, to be found in the user, and in such cases it is safe to say, whether strictly accurate or not, that the user raises a legal presumption of dedication. That really means no more than that the evidence points all one way. Hundreds of highways are in this position. But suppose, on the other hand, you do know the origin of a road. Suppose it is the avenue to a private house, say, from the south. But from that house there leads another avenue to the north which connects with a public road different from that from which the south avenue started. This is not a fancy case.

The situation is a common one in many parts of the country. Would the mere fact that people could be found who had gone up the one avenue and down the other—perhaps without actually calling at the house—raise a presumption that the landholder had dedicated his private avenues as highways? The user would be naturally ascribed to good nature and toleration.

Now, what were the surrounding circumstances in this case? The origin of the road was known. It was not a case where the mere user discovered the existence of the road. It was made as an estate work, and it was in its origin and up to the critical date indubitably not only labelled private, but kept private, for the greater uses for which its construction was designed—viz., horse and carriage traffic. It was only repaired by the proprietor, never by the parish, and a transaction was entered into at a later date (1852) which showed on the face of it that in the view of the proprietor and of the commissioners of Folkstone at that time the road was a private road. Further than that, there was the light to be got from the legal position of the proprietor. He was admittedly a limited owner, and it is conceded that a limited owner cannot dedicate. But before the road was made his disability was removed by an Act of Parliament—provided always that he acted in the way that the Act of Parliament directed. In other words, looking at the terms of s. 5 of the private Act, the Earl of Radnor could only dedicate if he "set out ground for public squares, roads, ways, or otherwise." He admittedly did not set out this as a public carriageway. Did he set it out as a public way for foot passengers?

I must here pause to say that the strenuous criticism which was directed in the argument against the judgment of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in the Court of Appeal to my mind missed its mark. It was argued that that learned judge insisted that unless it could be shown that the Earl of Radnor formally "set out" this particular highway as for passengers, the case for dedication must fail, and it was added that upon the view of omnia præsumuntur rite sollemniter acta, the direct evidence of such formal dedication after such a lapse of time could not be insisted on. I do not think that is at all a fair view of the learned judge's opinion. All I think he meant and said was that, inasmuch as to be valid at all the dedication must have had its origin in a setting out under s. 5, you were bound to consider, under the whole circumstances of the case, whether such a dedication as is here sought to be shown was a thing to be inferred as a likely thing for the estate owner to do. In the long run it all comes to this: Which is the more probable alternative? Did the Earl of Radnor lay out this road as private and mean to keep it private as of right, although he did not take any active steps to prevent foot passengers going over it any more than he took active steps to prevent them straying over the waste surrounding ground, or did he, when laying out a private carriage road, which he meant to and did keep private, at the same time dedicate to the public a footway on the top of the said private carriageway? The circumstances which I have detailed may be said to point to the former, those included in the lettered findings above quoted may be said to point to the latter. If I had been one of the justices I say frankly I should have come to the same conclusion as they did. In that I may be wrong. I cannot be sure I am right, for I see that several learned judges, who are just as competent to weigh evidence as I am, if they had been in that position, would have come to a different conclusion. But the question is not whether I am wrong or right, the question is whether there is any evidence to support such a conclusion. I am willing not to be dogmatic in saying that my conclusion is the right one, but I am not equal to such a height of modesty and altruism as to say that the conclusion which I have reached in common with the justices and FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., is a conclusion to which, on the evidence, no reasonable man ought to have come. It follows that, in my opinion, this appeal must prevail.

LORD ATKINSON.—The question for decision in this case is raised by the justices of the peace of the borough of Folkestone, on a Case stated by them under

A the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1857 and 1879, for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice. It is admitted that under these statutes such a Case can only be stated in reference to their determination on a point of law, and that the court whose opinion is asked for can only determine the question or questions of law arising on the Case. The proceedings in which the determination of the justices took place were brought under B the Private Street Works Act, 1892 [repealed by Highways Act, 1959, of which see s. 174 et seq.], which the appellants, the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the borough of Folkestone, had adopted. This body, asserting that about 7,000 ft. in length of a certain road within their borough, called the Lower Sandgate Road, from a point immediately east of St. Paul's School, Sandgate, where it joins the main highway, to a point to the westward of the Folkestone bathing establishment, C was a street, or if not, that the portion of it between two points lettered B and D on the Ordnance sheet given in evidence in the case, was a street, within the meaning of this statute, proposed, in exercise of the powers conferred upon them by s. 6 of the Act [see s. 174 of the Act of 1959], to execute certain works upon it and to charge the cost thereof upon the premises fronting or abutting upon it. The expression "street" is defined in s. 5 of the Act [see s. 213 (1) of Act of 1959] D to mean (unless the context otherwise requires)

> "a street as defined by the Public Health Acts and not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large."

The respondents, who are frontagers, in exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the statute, served upon the appellants notices setting forth their objec- E tions to the proposal of the latter on the following grounds, among others, (i) that the portion of the street upon which the works were proposed to be executed did not form part of a street within the meaning of the Act of 1892, and (ii) that the said part of the same is a "highway repairable by the inhabitants at large." During the hearing before the justices a question was evolved upon which the case turned—namely, whether the lord of the soil, Jacob, Earl of Radnor, the F owner of the land upon which this street was made, had before the year 1836 effectually dedicated to the public a right of way over it for passengers on foot. It was conceded on both sides that if he was found to have done so, and the dedication had, by user, been accepted by the public, then the street would have been repairable by the inhabitants at large, at least to the extent necessary for the exercise by the public of their limited right of way, and would by the definition G clause have been excluded from the operation of s. 6 of the Act. The justices found that there was no dedication by the said earl of the said road, or the portion of it already mentioned, to the public as a highway for foot passengers before the year 1836, and in the Case stated by them they set forth that the question they referred to the Divisional Court for its opinion was whether their finding on this point was correct in point of law. This was the question of law, and the only H question of law, which the Divisional Court had to determine.

After certain proceedings, immaterial for the purposes of this appeal, had been taken, that court ultimately answered the question put to them in the affirmative. The Court of Appeal by the order now appealed from, reversed this decision on the ground, as stated by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., that there was nothing in the findings of fact appearing in the Special Case justifying the conclusion of the justices I that it was not the intention of Jacob, Earl of Radnor, in 1827 or later, to make and dedicate the road in question as a public highway, or that there was, in fact, no dedication of such road as a highway prior to March, 1836, and he, therefore, answered the question put by the justices in the negative. He further stated that, in his opinion,

> "there was sufficient evidence that this road was so used as a highway or footway prior to 1836 to justify the conclusion that there was a dedication by Lord Radnor, who acquiesced in such user."

The grounds of his decision were stated by BUCKLEY, L.J., thus: A

"I cannot find that in finding these facts the justices have found any relevant facts to negative the dedication, which in my judgment is evidenced by the facts to which I have first referred."

That appears to be the user. FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., dissented. It would appear, I think, from the double negative form in which the alleged error of the B justices is thus stated, that the line of reasoning adopted by counsel for the respondents in the argument before your Lordships was in the Court of Appeal only too successful. It was, as I understood it, to this effect: "Proof of open, uninterrupted, and continuous user raises a presumptio juris in favour of dedication. If evidence be not produced to rebut this presumption, it must prevail. C Tribunals which are exclusive judges of fact, whether juries or justices, are bound in law to act upon it, and their finding against it is an error in law. In the present case there was such evidence of user, no rebutting evidence was produced, the justices were, therefore, bound in law to find that this way was dedicated to the public, and their decision to the contrary was a decision made without any evidence to support it, and consequently invalid in point of law." What the justices have really and in fact done is not to find a negative without any evidence D to support it, but have refused, on the evidence laid before them, to find the affirmative proposition contended for by the respondents that the owner, the Earl of Radnor, had intended to dedicate, and had dedicated, this footway to the public. The existence of this intention, which is crucial in such matters, being an inference of fact, the justices were clearly within their right in so refusing, unless it be the law that in such cases where open, long continued and uninterrupted evidence of E user is clear, unrebutted and unexplained, the tribunal whose members are the exclusive judges of issues of fact are bound in law to draw this affirmative inference, and consequently that in every case where the question of the dedication to the public of a highway is tried before a judge and jury, and strong evidence is given of user by the public, while no evidence rebutting the so-called presumptio juris thereupon arising is produced, the litigant relying upon dedication must F necessarily be entitled to have a verdict directed for him. During the argument, in order to test the soundness of this line of reasoning, I asked to be referred to any case where in a trial before a judge and jury a verdict was directed under such circumstances. No such authority was produced. I believe it would have been produced had it existed. I think it does not exist. On the contrary, the invariable well-established practice, followed by many of the most able and distinguished G judges for many, many years, has, I think, been, no matter how strong the evidence of user, to leave all the evidence to the jury, ask them to consider it as a whole and determine whether the owner of the soil intended to dedicate to the public a highway over it. The justices in cases such as the present are, if anything, more absolute and exclusive judges of fact than is the jury in a trial before them. Their finding cannot, like the finding of a jury, be set aside as against H the weight of evidence. Order 40 and such like orders of the Supreme Court Rules do not apply to their findings as they do to the verdict of a jury. I am unable, therefore, to discover on what principle their decision can be set aside as contrary to law because they have refused to find in a way in which a jury in a similar case would not be directed to find or be bound to find.

I propose, therefore, to test the soundness of the reasoning upon which the I Court of Appeal have apparently acted by reference to the procedure followed on the trial of questions such as this before a judge and jury, and as the point is of general importance one may be excused for dealing at some length with a few of the best-known authorities. In Poole v. Huskinson (3), PARKE, B., thus states the principle of the law (11 M. & W. at p. 830):

"In order to constitute a valid dedication to the public of a highway by the owner of the soil, it is clearly settled that there must be an intention to dedicate, there must be an animus dedicandi of which the user by the public is evidence and no more; and a single act of interruption by the owner is of much more weight upon a question of intention that many acts of enjoyment."

In Mann v. Brodie (2), LORD BLACKBURN, after quoting this passage, said (10 App. Cas. at p. 386):

> "But it has also been held that where there has been evidence of a user by the public so long and in such a manner that the owner of the fee whoever he was, must have been aware that the public were acting under the belief that the way had been dedicated, and has taken no step to disabuse them of that belief, it is not conclusive evidence, but evidence upon which those who have to find the fact may find that there was a dedication by the owner whoever he was."

The remarks of LORD WATSON show that under Scottish law the inference which a jury may draw from evidence of user, is an inference not of law but of fact. In Barraclough v. Johnson (7) it was proved that in the year 1814 the representative of the owner of the soil of a laneway entered into an agreement with a certain company, together with a surveyor of highways acting on behalf of the inhabitants of a hamlet, that this laneway should be open to carriages, that the company should pay an acknowledgment of £5 per annum and supply cinders for the repair of the road, which the people of the hamlet should spread. Up to this time there had been a gate across the laneway which was kept locked and carriages stopped, but apparently passengers and horses were allowed to pass. In 1832 disputes arose between the parties when the passage of carriages was prevented by the proprietor, but from the date of the agreement up to this time the lane was open, and carriages, horses and pedestrians allowed to use it. An action was then brought; the judge, PATTESON, J., left all the evidence to the jury, and instructed them > "that though user was evidence of a dedication to the public, yet the question always was what the landowner intended, and if it appeared that he had not intended absolutely to dedicate, the inference from user failed, and that in the present case, unless the jury thought that the proprietor in 1814 intended absolutely to dedicate the carriage road to the public, he might resume it if the bargain was broken by the other parties."

The jury found that there was no good dedication of the carriageway, but that there was a dedication of the way for foot passengers and horses. No direction was given to the jury that they were bound to find as to the footway where the user had been continuous, or any intimation given that there was a presumption in favour of dedication of either right of way, which, unless rebutted, should prevail. A court, consisting of LORD DENMAN, C.J., and LITTLEDALE, PATTESON and COLERIDGE, JJ., upheld the verdict, PATTESON, J., using these words (8 Ad. & El. at p. 105):

> "I think that the intention to dedicate or not must be left to the jury. The very term dedication shows that intent is material. There cannot be such a thing as turning land into a road without intention on the owner's part."

This case was cited with approval by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Simpson v. A.-G. (8). He said ([1904] A.C. at p. 493):

> "As regards the second, it is, I think, enough for me to say that it is clear law that a dedication must be made with an intention to dedicate, and that the mere acting so as to lead persons into the supposition that a way is dedicated to the public does not itself amount to dedication: Barraclough v. Johnson (7)."

R. v. Inhabitants of the Tithing of East Mark (9) was the case of an indictment for non-repair of a road which had been formed over part of the waste land of a manor, and had been set out as a private road by an award, dated in January, 1797, of commissioners acting under a Private Enclosure Act. By this award a certain portion of this waste had, as directed by the Act, been allotted to the lord of the manor in respect of his interest in the soil. Evidence had been given, which was apparently not contradicted, that the road had been used by the public generally ever since it was set out up to the time of the trial in the year 1848, a period of over fifty years. It was contended for the defendants that there could be no dedication to the public of this right of way, as there was no one capable of dedicating it, inasmuch as the interest in the soil over which the road had been made had been taken out of the lord of the manor by the award. WILLIAMS, J., who presided at the trial, instructed the jury in the language of PARKE, B., in Poole v. Huskinson (3) already quoted, and proceeded to add that there could not be land without an owner, that the ownership of it must be in somebody, and that it was for the jury to consider whether the owner, whoever he might be, had consented to the public user in such a manner as to satisfy the jury that he intended to dedicate a highway to the public. This instruction was held to be right by a court composed of LORD DENMAN, C.J., and PATTESON, WIGHTMAN and ERLE, JJ. The last-named learned judge expressed himself more strongly as to the effect which the jury should give to the evidence of user than I have been able to find was done by any other learned judge in any of the older authorities. He said (11 Q.B. at p. 884):

> "In this case there was uninterrupted user of the road by the public for about fifty years. I think the learned judge would have been quite justified in telling the jury, that although there must be an intention on the part of the owner to dedicate, such use was so strong an evidence of his intention that the jury ought to find in favour of the dedication unless there was some evidence that he did not consent. The direction was much more favourable to the defendant than that would have been."

It will be observed that the words are "ought to find," not "must find."

R. v. Petrie (10) was similar to the last case in this, that there was clear and strong evidence of a continuous and open user by the public of the street called Rope Street, the street in question in the case, from the year 1827, when it was laid out, until the year 1836, when the defendants obstructed it. It was objected, however, that the estate upon which the street was situate was in strict settlement, that the tenant for life was in possession till 1829, when the estate was under a power contained in the settlement sold by his trustees. The first tenant in tail was still a minor. CROWDER, J., the presiding judge at the trial, told the jury that there was evidence that the east end of Rope Street had been for several years actually used by the public, from which a dedication might be inferred. "And he asked the jury whether they inferred that there was a dedication, and at what time and by whom." The jury answered that there was a dedication in 1829 by whosoever was then owner in fee. On that finding a verdict was entered for the Crown. On a motion for a new trial it was held by COLERIDGE, WIGHTMAN, ERLE and COMPTON, JJ., that the question put to the jury was the proper question. And this same learned judge, ERLE, J., expressed himself thus (4 E. & B. at p. 748):

> "I think the judge was bound to put the question he did. The counsel for the prosecution claimed to rest their case on a certain inference from the facts; if there was good evidence from which the inference might be drawn the judge was bound to ask the jury whether they would draw it."

These last are precisely the two authorities relied on by SIR MONTAGUE SMITH in Turner v. Walsh (1). But the judgment of that very learned judge in that case is no authority whatever for the proposition that if the user by the public be proved

A to be ever so open, lengthy and continuous, and the presumption of dedication arising therefrom be not rebutted, the jury is at law bound to infer a dedication, or that the judge presiding at the trial is entitled to direct them so to do. In that case strong and clear evidence of user was given. It was not rebutted. The presiding judge ruled that user in the colony (New South Wales) might be relied upon in like manner as it might be in England for the purpose of establishing B dedication of a road over Crown lands, as against the Crown, and that the user proved was sufficient to entitle the jury to presume dedication by the Crown of the road in question. This was the instruction to the jury of which SIR MONTAGUE SMITH expressly approved. He says (6 App. Cas. at p. 641):

> "Their Lordships have no difficulty in saying that the judge was right in C directing the jury that from the user of twenty-one years before the statute, continued since 1861 down to the time of action without any interruption or interference on the part of the Crown, they might presume a dedication prior to the statute, and at a time when the Crown had power to dedicate."

Again the words are "might presume," not "must presume." The portion of his judgment in which it is contended he laid down that the presumption of dedication D from continuous user was a præsumptio juris, which if not rebutted juries were bound at law to act upon, had reference to a passage in the judgment of MANNING, J., in which that learned judge apparently suggested that the user previous to the Crown Lands Act, 1861, was only inchoate and that its effect was defeated by that statute. The case is, in my view, no authority whatever for the proposition in support of which it was cited.

E In Winterbottom v. Lord Derby (11), user of the way in dispute by the public for a period of seventy years before action was proved. The defence was that during the entire of that period the land the way crossed was under lease, and that the defendant as reversioner was not bound by the action of the lessee. The presiding judge told the jury that from long user, going back indeed as far as living memory could go, they were at liberty, if they pleased, to infer a dedication.

F Cases of this kind might be multiplied. Your Lordships have not been referred to any case, and I, though I have searched somewhat diligently, have not been able to find any case in which there was even a suggestion that when the evidence of user is of the strongest kind and is unrebutted, the judge is entitled to direct the jury to find a verdict in favour of dedication. The crucial matter being the existence in the mind of the owner of an intention to dedicate, the inference of G that fact, if drawn at all, must be drawn by the judges of fact. The respective functions of the judge and jury in such cases are, in my view, this. It is for the judge in each case to determine, as a matter of law, whether there is any evidence from which the inference of an intention to dedicate can reasonably be drawn; it is for the jury to determine whether it shall be drawn. And if, by adopting such a rule or formula as that contended for, a judge takes upon himself H to decide upon the question whether the alleged presumption is rebutted or no, and forces this conclusion of his own upon the tribunal which is to determine issues of fact, either by directing them to find in a certain way, or by setting aside their decision if they find in the contrary way, he usurps an authority which in no way belongs to him. The rule of law as to the action of justices in such cases as this is, I think, that, if it does not appear on the face of their proceedings that I they have, as it is said, misdirected themselves, or there was evidence before them upon which reasonable men might act to sustain their findings of fact, their decisions cannot be disturbed. An order made without any evidence to support it is in truth, in my view, an order made without jurisdiction, and is, therefore, invalid at law, but a refusal to find an affirmative in favour of the person on whom the burden of proof lies cannot be so treated. It does not come within either the letter or spirit of the above-mentioned rule. If in the present case the justices were not satisfied that the earl intended to dedicate, they were bound to find against dedication. No middle course was open to them.

Counsel for the respondents referred to para. 131 of TAYLOR ON EVIDENCE (9th Edn.). The statement of the law contained in that paragraph is perfectly accurate, and is supported by the six authorities mentioned in the notes. It is to this effect, that the uninterrupted user of a road justifies a presumption in favour of the original animus dedicandi, even against the Crown. That is a wholly different thing from saying that this presumption is a præsumptio juris, which, if unrebutted, must be acted upon by exclusive judges of fact. This rule, relied upon by the respondents as to the unrebutted presumption of dedication, is a good working rule for all judges of fact to act upon. It is a rule which juries should be instructed to act upon, and which they ought to act upon, but it is, in my opinion, nothing more than that. An order made by such judges, in effect refusing to act upon it in favour of the person on whom the burden of proving dedication lies, cannot therefore, I think, be treated as a nullity, void at law, and made without jurisdiction. The practice of over a century in trials of such questions before juries establishes this. I am far from saying that if the present case had been tried before a jury they would not have been justified in finding in favour of dedication on the evidence on which the findings of the justices are presumably based. I think they would have been fully justified in so doing, but I am quite unable to come to the conclusion that a finding against the dedication is a conclusion at which no reasonable men could arrive. I go further. I do not think a finding to this latter effect could properly be set aside on the ground that it was against the weight of evidence.

The intention with which Jacob, Earl of Radnor, and his successors permitted the user relied upon being the crucial matter, it is essential to consider the time at which and the circumstances under which the user commenced and subsequently continued. If an owner of enclosed land permits the public for years to traverse on foot a well-marked footway across it, leading from one public thoroughfare to another, without making any effort to prevent them, or indicating in any way that he objects to the practice, the user would be very strong evidence indeed of his intention to confer on the public the right to use that footway; but if the owner of a moor or of some waste land over which the public were in the habit of wandering in all directions, were to make an unfenced road across it with similar termini, and by erecting gates or barriers upon the road prevent the passage of horses or carriages over it, but took no measures to prevent the public from wandering over it, or walking along it as they had theretofore done over the land upon which it has been made, it would appear to me to be pushing a principle to extremes to hold that this omission was not perfectly consistent with the absence of any intention on the owner's part to do anything more than allow the old practice to continue, so far as the changed nature of the surface would permit, without conferring upon the public any new right whatever. HEATH, J., said in Steele v. Houghton (12) in reference to a claim by the poor of the right to glean in cornfields (1 Hy. Bl. at p. 60):

> "It is the wise policy of the law not to construe acts of charity though continued and repeated for never so many years in such manner as to make them the foundation of legal obligation."

The same thought, substituting the word "kindliness" or "good nature" for the word "charity," is expressed by BOWEN, L.J., in Blount v. Layard (13) (a case about fishery) in the well-known passage of his judgment quoted with approval by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Simpson v. A.-G. (8). It ran thus ([1891] 2 Ch. at p. 690):

> "If the case is re-tried, the jury ought to be most carefully warned (as they were) not to do injustice under the idea that they are vindicating a public right. I think they ought to be solemnly told (as they no doubt will be) that nothing worse can happen in a free country than to force people to be churlish about their rights for fear that their indulgence may be abused, and to drive them to prevent the enjoyment of things which, though they are matters of

A private property, naturally give pleasure to many others besides the owners, under the fear that their good nature may be misunderstood."

This passage applies forcibly, I think, to the present case. One has only to look at the map after reading the findings in para. 5 of the Special Case to realise how great the inconvenience, if not annoyance, would have been, caused by the fencing B of this road in such a way as to prevent anyone rambling on the waste land beside it or from crossing over it to the beach, or gaining access to it, and how difficult, if not impossible, it would have been, while the road remained unfenced, to have prevented those wanderers from walking along it from end to end. Much reliance was placed upon the fact that while a toll-gate and barriers were erected upon this road to prevent the passages of wheeled traffic along it, no barriers were C erected to prevent the passage along it of passengers on foot; that, on the contrary, room was left at each side of these obstructions for foot passengers to pass. But no barrier—while the public were permitted to wander over the waste land and the road remained unfenced—could have been effective for that purpose; because anyone could by deviating on to the waste land at either side of the road have outflanked the barrier. Exclusion from the waste land would possibly have been D an effective protection to the owner's rights, but it would have been a churlish and unkindly act, hurtful, probably moreover, to the development of Folkestone as a seaside resort.

It has been found that there was no evidence of any road or defined footway having been made upon this land before the year 1836, and there is no finding that such a footway existed over it leading from one public thoroughfare to another E before that date, or that any precaution was taken to prevent people from wandering where they would over the surface of the waste land. It was, however, found that since 1836 foot passengers used the whole width of the road as a passage, and had traversed the banks at its sides where practicable; that the road was not absolutely necessary for the accommodation of any persons other than those who occupied the houses since erected abutting upon it, their servants, tradespeople, F and visitors; that such repairs as were effected upon it down to 1851 were executed at the expense of Lord Radnor and his successors, but that it was never properly repaired till the year 1836; and never formally dedicated as a public highway according to the provisions of the Highways Act, 1835, s. 23. The correctness of this last finding is admitted.

It was not disputed in argument that for all purposes other than that of the G passage of persons on foot this road was a private road; nor was it disputed that Jacob, Earl of Radnor, was in the year 1827 only tenant for life of his estate, and as such could not at common law have dedicated to the public any right of way over it. Neither was it disputed that for many years from and after that date, 1827, the estate was settled in strict settlement, but the appellants put in evidence before the justices a private Act of Parliament of June, 1825, passed to enable H building leases to be granted of part of the settled estates of the earl. The first section empowers him to grant building leases with power to the lessees to appropriate any portion of the demised premises as and for streets, passages, or ways for the more convenient enjoyment of such houses as might be built, and the fifth section, which is the important section, empowers the earl to "allot and set out" a component part of the pieces or plots of ground described in the schedule annexed I to the Act for "public squares, roads, streets, ways, avenues, or otherwise for the use and convenience of the houses and other public buildings to be erected upon the said pieces or plots of ground or any part or parcel thereof as aforesaid." The waste land below the cliff was included in this schedule. If the earl dedicated this road as a footway to the public he could only do so under the provisions of this section. A lengthened argument was addressed to your Lordships' House on the construction of the section. It is obvious that its framers considered that a street, road, or way, though public, might yet be for the convenience of the occupiers of the houses to be built, but it was contended that this particular Sandgate road was "not allotted or set out" for the purpose of a public footpath, but merely as and for a private roadway for horses and carriages to traverse. I think it would, on the authorities I have cited, have been competent for the earl to have "allotted and set out," under the provisions of this section, a road to serve the double purpose of a public footpath and a private road for the passage of horses and carriages, and that it would have been competent for any jury who might have tried the case, and for the justices who actually tried it, to have presumed from long continued user that he intended to do this, but I think it would have been equally competent for such a jury, and was competent for the justices, having regard to all the facts, notwithstanding the evidence of user, to have found that the earl never intended to do anything so improbable. One could, I think, understand his making, for the development of his estates, a road public for all purposes leading from one public thoroughfare to another, or making a private road (for which he did not require statutory powers), leaving the public to wander over it as they had formerly wandered on the ground it covered, and not churlishly depriving them of that enjoyment, without intending to confer any new public right. Both of these courses would have been reasonable enough. I fail to see on what ground it could be held that no reasonable men could find he adopted the latter. Counsel for the appellants urged that if either the then earl of the corporation believed that any public footway then existed over this road, it would necessarily have been mentioned in this negotiation. No allusion appears to have been made to its existence. I concur with him in thinking that the conduct of the parties in this respect is very significant. On the whole, I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the King's Bench Division restored, on the ground, in addition to that already mentioned, that it would have been competent for a jury, had the case been tried by a jury, to have, on proof of the facts found, returned a verdict either in favour of dedication or against it, and that neither verdict could have been disturbed. I further think that if the findings in the Case Stated were treated as a special verdict found by a jury, the respondents would not have been entitled to have a judgment entered for them, and I am, therefore, unable to discover any ground on which the conclusion of this bench of justices should be disturbed where a jury's determination would not have been disturbed. It is hardly necessary to point out that in Greenwich Board of Works v. Maudsley (14) the court had power to draw inferences of fact.

DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO., LTD. v. NEW GARAGE AND MOTOR CO., LTD.

Contract—Damages—Liquidated damages or penalty—Question for court—Characteristics of liquidated damages and penalty—Presumption of penalty where sum payable on occurrence of events of varying importance—Rebuttal where pre-estimate of damage impossible.

Where the parties to a contract agree that on breach of the contract one party will pay to the other a specified sum "by way of damages and not as a penalty" they may prima facie be supposed to have meant what they say, but the expression is not conclusive, and the court must determine whether the payment stipulated is in truth a penalty or liquidated damages. The essence of a penalty is a payment of money stipulated in terrorem of the offending party: the essence of liquidated damages is a genuine pre-estimate of damage. The question whether a sum stipulated is a penalty or liquidated damages is one of construction to be decided on the terms and inherent circumstances of each particular contract, judged of as at the time of the making of the contract, not as at the time of the breach. A sum will be held to be a penalty if it is extravagant and unconscionable in amount in comparison with the greatest loss which could conceivably be proved to have followed from a breach of the contract or if the breach consists only in not paying a sum of money and the sum stipulated is greater than the sum which ought to have been paid, and there is a presumption (but no more) that there is a penalty when a single sum is made payable on the occurrence of one or more of all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others trifling damage. But that presumption may be rebutted if the damage caused by each and every one of those events, however varying in importance, may be of such an uncertain nature that it cannot previously be accurately ascertained.

Retail dealers agreed to sell the goods of a wholesale manufacturer only on conditions which were designed to insure maintenance of the prices fixed by the manufacturer and to pay £5 for every article sold in breach of the agreement "as and by way of liquidated damages, and not as a penalty":

Held: although the sale of an article of one type in breach of the contract must result in more damage to the manufacturer than the sale of another, the provision in the contract must be taken to refer to a single obligation to maintain prices generally and not to the payment of a sum on the non-performance of any one of many obligations differing in importance; in the circumstances of the case and on construction of the contract the provision relating to damages contained nothing unreasonable, unconscionable, or extravagant; and, therefore, the stipulation was to be taken as one for liquidated damages and the retailers were liable to pay the sum specified in respect of each breach of the contract of which they had been guilty.

Appeal by the plaintiffs in the action from an order of the Court of Appeal (VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and SWINFEN EADY, L.JJ., KENNEDY, L.J., dissenting).

The appellants were wholesale manufacturers of motor tyres, covers, and tubes, and in April, 1911, they entered into an agreement with the respondents, who sold similar goods by retail, which provided that the respondents would not sell or offer any Dunlop motor tyres, covers, or tubes to any private customers or to any co-operative society at prices below those mentioned in the appellants' price list current at the time of sale, nor give to any such customer or society any cash or other discounts or advantages reducing the said prices, and, further, that the respondents would not sell or offer any Dunlop motor tyres, covers, or tubes to any other person, firm, or company at prices less than those mentioned in the price list aforesaid. It was further provided that the respondents would pay to the appellants the sum of £5 for each and every tyre, cover, or tube sold or offered in breach of the agreement as and by way of liquidated damages and not as a penalty, but without prejudice to any other rights or remedies which the appellants might have under such agreement. They also agreed not to sell to "persons whose supplies" the appellants "may decide to suspend." The appellants brought this action against the respondents for an injunction and damages for alleged breaches of the agreement. The action was tried before PHILLIMORE, J., without a jury. He ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs for an injunction, and directed an inquiry to be held before a master as to the damages sustained by them and for an account of the goods sold by the defendants since the date of the agreement, and of the prices at which they were sold. The master held that the sum mentioned in the agreement was liquidated damages, and not a penalty, and assessed the damages at £250. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal, who held that the sum of £5 mentioned in the agreement was a penalty, and, as

A there was no other evidence of damage, the plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages only. The plaintiffs appealed.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

B July 1, 1914.—The following opinions were read.

LORD DUNEDIN.—The appellants, through an agent, entered into a contract with the respondents under which they supplied them with their goods, which consisted mainly of motor tyres, covers, and tubes. By this contract, in respect of certain concessions as to discounts, the respondents bound themselves not to do C several things, which may be shortly set forth as follows: Not to tamper with the manufacturers' marks; not to sell to any private customer or co-operative society at prices less than the current price list issued by the Dunlop company; not to supply to persons whose supplies the Dunlop company had decided to suspend; not to exhibit or to export without the Dunlop company's assent. Finally, the agreement concluded (cl. 5):

> "We agree to pay to the Dunlop company the sum of £5 for each and every tyre, cover, or tube sold or offered in breach of this agreement, as and by way of liquidated damages and not as a penalty."

The appellants, having discovered that the respondents had sold covers and tubes at prices under the current list price, raised action and demanded damages. The E case was tried and the breach in fact held proved. An inquiry was directed before the master as to damages. The master inquired, and assessed the damages at £250, adding this explanation:

> "I find that it was left open to me to decide whether the £5 fixed in the agreement was penalty or liquidated damages. I find that it was liquidated damages."

F

The respondents appealed to the Court of Appeal, when the majority of that Court, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and SWINFEN EADY, L.JJ., held (KENNEDY, L.J., dissenting) that the said sum of £5 was a penalty, and entered judgment for the plaintiffs for the sum of £2 as nominal damages. Appeal from that decision is now before your Lordships' House.

G We had the benefit of a full and satisfactory argument, and a citation of the very numerous cases which have been decided on this branch of the law. The matter has been handled, and at a recent date, in the courts of highest resort. I particularly refer to Clydebank Engineering Co. v. Yzquierdo y Castaneda (1), in your Lordships' House, and Public Works Comr. v. Hills (2) and Webster v. Bosanquet (3), in the Privy Council. In all these cases many of the previous H authorities were considered. In view of that fact, and of the number of the authorities available, I do not think it advisable to attempt any detailed review of the various cases, but I shall content myself with stating succinctly the various propositions which I think are deducible from the decisions which rank as authoritative:

(i) Though the parties to a contract who use the words penalty or liquidated I damages may primâ facie be supposed to mean what they say, yet the expression used is not conclusive. The court must find out whether the payment stipulated is in truth a penalty or liquidated damages. This doctrine may be said to be found passim in nearly every case. (ii) The essence of a penalty is a payment of money stipulated as in terrorem of the offending party; the essence of liquidated damages is a genuine covenanted pre-estimate of damage: Clydebank Engineering Company v. Yzquierdo y Castaneda (1). (iii) The question whether a sum stipulated is penalty or liquidated damages is a question of construction to be decided upon the terms and inherent circumstances of each particular contract, judged of as at the time of the making of the contract, not as at the time of the breach: Public Works Comr. v. Hills (2) and Webster v. Bosanquet (3). (iv) To assist this task of construction various tests have been suggested, which, if applicable to the case under consideration, may prove helpful or even conclusive. Such are: (a) It will be held to be a penalty if the sum stipulated for is extravagant and unconscionable in amount in comparison with the greatest loss which could conceivably be proved to have followed from the breach—illustration given by LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in the Clydebank Case (1). (b) It will be held to be a penalty if the breach consists only in not paying a sum of money, and the sum stipulated is a sum greater than the sum which ought to have been paid: Kemble v. Farren (4). This, though one of the most ancient instances, is truly a corollary to the last test. Whether it had its historical origin in the doctrine of the common law that, when A. promised to pay B. a sum of money on a certain day and did not do so, B. could only recover the sum with, in certain cases, interest, but could never recover further damages for non-timeous payment, or whether it was a survival of the time when equity reformed unconscionable bargains merely because they were unconscionable—a subject which much exercised JESSEL, M.R., in Wallis v. Smith (5)—is probably more interesting than material. (c) There is a presumption (but no more) that it is a penalty when

> "a single lump sum is made payable by way of compensation, on the occurrence of one or more or all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others but trifling damages":

per LORD WATSON in Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co. (6) (11 App. Cas. at p. 342). On the other hand: (d) It is no obstacle to the sum stipulated being a genuine pre-estimate of damage that the consequences of the breach are such as to make precise pre-estimation almost an impossibility. On the contrary, that is just the situation when it is probable that pre-estimated damage was the true bargain between the parties: Clydebank Case (1) per LORD HALSBURY; Webster v. Bosanquet (3) per LORD MERSEY.

Turning now to the facts of the case, it is evident that the damage apprehended by the appellants owing to the breaking of the agreement was an indirect and not a direct damage. So long as they got their price from the respondents for each article sold, it could not matter to them directly what the respondents did with it. Indirectly it did. Accordingly, the agreement is headed "Price Maintenance Agreement," and the way in which the appellants would be damaged if prices were cut was clearly explained in evidence, and no successful attempt was made to controvert that evidence. But though damages as a whole from such a practice would be certain, yet damages from any one sale would be impossible to forecast. It is just, therefore, one of those cases where it seems quite reasonable for parties to contract that they should estimate the damage at a certain figure, and provided that the figure is not extravagant there would seem no reason to suspect that it is not truly a bargain to assess damages, but rather a penalty to be held in terrorem.

The argument of the respondents was really based on two heads. They overpressed, in my judgment, the dictum of LORD WATSON in Lord Elphinstone's Case (6), reading it as if he said that the matter was conclusive, instead of saying, as he did, that it raised a presumption, and they relied strongly on Willson v. Love (7). Now, in the first place, I have considerable doubt whether the stipulated payment here can fairly be said to deal with the breaches, "some of which"—I am quoting LORD WATSON's words—"may occasion serious and others but trifling damage." As a mere matter of construction, I doubt whether cl. 5 applies to anything but sales below price. But I will assume that it does. None the less the mischief, as I have already pointed out, is an indirect mischief, and I see no data on which, as a matter of construction, I could settle in my own mind that the indirect damage from selling a cover would differ in magnitude from the indirect damage from selling a tube, or that the indirect damage from a cutting price sale would differ from the indirect damage from supply at full price to a hostile

A because prohibited, agent. You cannot weigh such things in a chemical balance. The character of the agricultural land which was ruined by slag heaps in Elphinstone's Case (6) was not all the same, but no objection was raised by LORD WATSON to applying an overhead rate per acre, the sum not being in itself unconscionable. I think that Elphinstone's Case (6), or rather the dicta in it, do go this length—that if there are various breaches to which one indiscriminate sum to be paid in B breach is applied, then the strength of the claim must be taken at its weakest link. If you can see clearly that the loss on one particular breach could never amount to the stipulated sum, then you may come to the conclusion that the sum is a penalty, but further than this it does not go. So, for the reasons already stated, I do not think that the present case forms an instance of what I have just expressed.

C As regards Willson's Case (7), I do not think it material to consider whether it was well decided on the facts, for it was decided on the view of the facts that the manurial value of straw and of hay were known ascertainable quantities as at the time of the bargain, and radically different, so that the damage resulting from the want of one could never be the same as the damage resulting from the want of the other. Added to that, the parties there had said penalty, and the effort D was to make out that they really meant liquidated damages; and lastly, if my view of the facts in the present case is correct, then RIGBY, L.J., would have agreed with me, for the last words of his judgment are as follows ([1896] 1 Q.B. at pp. 633, 634):

> "On the other hand, it is stated that, when the damages caused by a breach of E contract are incapable of being ascertained, the sum made by the contract payable on such a breach is to be regarded as liquidated damages. The question arises, what is meant in this statement by the expression 'incapable of being ascertained'? In their proper sense the words appear to refer to a case where no rule or measure of damages is available for the guidance of a jury as to the amount of the damages, and a judge would have to tell them they must fix F the amount as best they can."

To arrive at the indirect damage in this case, supposing no sum had been stipulated, that is just what a judge would, in my opinion, have had to do. On the whole matter, therefore, I go with the opinion of KENNEDY, L.J., and I move your Lordships that the appeal be allowed, and judgment given for the sum as brought out by the master, the appellants to have their costs in this House and in the G courts below.

LORD ATKINSON.—The action out of which this appeal arises was brought upon a contract entered into between the appellants, through the agency of Messrs. Pellant, Ltd., and the respondents, claiming, among other things, to recover a sum of £5 in respect of each of the breaches of this contract complained of. The H sole question for decision on this appeal is whether the sum of £5 is a penalty or liquidated damages.

The appellants are extensive and well-known manufacturers of motor tyres, covers, and tubes—a trade in which there is keen competition. They have no patents protecting their manufacture. Success over their competitors depends on the reputation acquired for their products, and largely upon the efficiency of the I organisation of their business. Ninety-nine per cent. of their output in this class of goods is sold through what one of their managers, who was examined as a witness, described as their distributing organisation. It consists in this, that they sell to motor-car manufacturers, persons called factors who resell to retail agents, and retail agents themselves, and that all these latter sell to the public, the users of the goods. The appellants produce price lists of these goods of theirs varying from time to time. They invariably sell at these prices to the members of their distributing organisation under agreements similar to that sued upon, giving, however, discount and rebates at varying rates. These agreements are styled price-maintenance agreements, and their main purpose, obviously, is to prevent the sale to the public, the users, either directly or indirectly, of the goods which the appellants manufacture at prices less than those named in their price lists. The result of this is that, competition having reduced these prices to the lowest remunerative scale, the agent secures his remuneration by selling at the prices at which he buys. If he sells at lower prices than these the loss comes out of his discount and rebates, his own profits. The manager in his evidence explains elaborately the dislocation of the distributing organisation of the appellants and the injury to their trade which would ensue from the sale by one or more of their agents or factors of their goods at prices less than those named in these lists. He pointed out that if the business of one of their agents in any particular place was undercut by such sales, the agent would, owing to the diminution of his remuneration, most probably throw up his agency and become the agent of a competitor, thus leaving the field open to the rivals of the appellants; that it was essential for their trade that their wares should be obtainable all over the country at as many places as possible; that though the consequential injury to their trade by this undercutting would, or might, be very serious, it would be very difficult to prove in evidence the precise amount of their loss in money; that considering all these things, the appellant company fixed £5, the sum mentioned in the agreement, as a fair and reasonable sum for liquidated damage in respect of the breaches specified. This evidence was uncontradicted.

In a good deal of the argument which has been addressed to your Lordships on behalf of the respondents, the true object of this price-maintenance agreement and the nature of the consequential injury to the plaintiffs' trade flowing from the breaches of it have been somewhat lost sight of. It has been urged that as the sum of £5 becomes payable on the sale of even one tube at a shilling less than the listed price, and as it was impossible that the appellant company should lose that sum on such a transaction, the sum fixed must be a penalty. In the sense of direct and immediate loss the appellants lose nothing by such a sale. It is the agent or dealer who loses by selling at a price less than that at which he buys, but the appellants have to look at their trade in globo, and to prevent the setting up, in reference to all their goods anywhere and everywhere, a system of injurious undercutting. The object of the appellants in making this agreement, if the substance and reality of the thing and the real nature of the transaction be looked at, would appear to be a single one—namely, to prevent the disorganisation of their trading system and the consequent injury to their trade in many directions. The means of effecting this is by keeping up their price to the public to the level of their price list, this last being secured by contracting that a sum of £5 shall be paid for every one of the three classes of articles named sold or offered for sale at prices below those named on the list. The very fact that this sum is to be paid if a tyre cover or tube be merely offered for sale, though not sold, shows that it was the consequential injury to their trade due to undercutting which they had in view. They had an obvious interest in preventing this undercutting, and on the evidence it would appear to me impossible to say that their interest was incommensurate with the sum which it was agreed to pay.

Their object is akin in some respects to that which a trader has in binding a former employee not to set up, or carry on, a rival business within a certain area. The trader's object is to prevent competition, and especially to prevent his old customers whom the employee knows from being enticed away from him. If one takes, for example, the case of a plumber; the carrying on of the trade of a plumber may mean anything from mending gas-pipes for a few pence apiece up to doing all the plumbing work of a big hotel. If the employee should mend a hundred of such pipes for twenty old customers at 6d. apiece, for which the employer would charge 1s. apiece, could it possibly be contended that the trader's loss was only a hundred sixpences at £2 10s.? It is, I think, quite misleading to concentrate one's attention upon the particular act or acts by which, in such cases as this, the rivalry in trade is set up, and the repute acquired by the former employee that he works cheaper and charges less than his old master, and to lose sight of the risk to the latter that old customers, once tempted to leave him, may never return to deal with him, or that business which might otherwise have come to him may be captured by his rival. The consequential injuries to the trader's business arising from each breach by the employee of his covenant cannot be measured by the direct loss in a monetary point of view on the particular transaction involved in the breach. An old customer may be as effectively enticed away from him through the medium of a 10s. job done at a cheap rate as by a £50 job done at a cheap rate, or a reputation for cheap workmanship may be acquired as effectively in one case as in the other. In many cases a person may contract to do or abstain from doing an act which is a composite act, the product or result of almost numberless other acts. For instance, if one should contract with a builder to build a house of the best materials and with the most skilled workmanship, and to hand over possession of the same completed on a certain day for £1,000, £500 to be paid if the agreement was not performed, every fire grate set which on completion would be found to be of bad material, every door which would be then found to have been defectively hung, every cubic foot of masonry which would be found to have been badly and improperly built, would involve a breach of the agreement, but it would be quite illegitimate thus to disintegrate the obligation to do what the parties regarded as a single whole, into a number of obligations to do a number of things of varying importance, and treat the £500 as primâ facie a penalty, because these individual breaches of the agreement did not cause, in many instances, any injury commensurate with that sum. This is the very ground, or one of the grounds, upon which LORD HERSCHELL rests his judgment in Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co. (6). He said (11 App. Cas. at p. 345):

> "The agreement does not provide for the payment of a lump sum upon the non-performance of any one of many obligations differing in importance. It has reference to a single obligation, and the sum to be paid bears a strict proportion to the extent to which that obligation is left unfulfilled."

In the present case the agreement of the parties, in effect, though possibly not in form, did little, if anything, more than impose a single obligation—namely, to sell or endeavour to sell the goods of the appellants at the prices named in their lists, though, of course, as they sold different kinds of goods, this single obligation might be violated in many ways. Much reliance was placed by the respondents on the well-known passage in the judgment of LORD WATSON in the last-mentioned case (11 App. Cas. at p. 342), to the effect that > "when a single lump sum is made payable by way of compensation, on the occurrence of one or more of several events, some of which may occasion serious, and others but trifling damage, the presumption is that the parties intended the sum to be penal and subject to modification."

It is quite true that, as mentioned by SWINFEN EADY, L.J., LORD ESHER, in Willson v. Love (7), said ([1896] 1 Q.B. at p. 630) that he thought that this passage meant the same thing as if it ran "some of which occasion serious and other less serious damage." With all respect, this alteration would mean that the damage resulting from each event should be uniform in amount, a construction which would mean that the stipulated compensation must presumably be a penalty in almost every conceivable case. Moreover, LORD WATSON's statement of the law as it stands was approved by LORD DAVEY in Clydebank Engineering and Shipbuilding Co. v. Yzquierdo y Castaneda (1) and in Webster v. Bosanquet (3) without any qualification of that kind. In this last-mentioned case, as in the present, the contract provided that the amount specified should be paid as "liquidated damages, and not as a penalty." The covenant upon which the matter in controversy turned was contained in a deed made on the dissolution of a partnership between two partners, the plaintiff and defendant, and it provided that the defendant should not, during a certain period, be at liberty to sell the whole or part of the tea crops of two estates named to any person other than the plaintiff without first offering to him the option of buying the same, and further provided that on breach of this covenant by the defendant he should pay to the petitioner the sum of £500 as "liquidated damages and not as a penalty." Now, it will be observed that this covenant would be violated by the sale of any appreciable part, in a business point of view, of the crops of either of these estates, no matter how relatively small that part might be compared with the entire crop of either. It is also clear that the object of the parties when they executed the deed was to secure to the plaintiff the option of buying the entire crops of both estates, and that when they fixed this sum of £500 they were thinking of the loss which the plaintiff might sustain by the loss of that option. The amount of tea sold by the defendant in breach of the covenant was considerable—nearly 54,000 lb. It was laid down that in determining whether a sum contracted to be paid is liquidated damages or a penalty, one is to consider whether the contract, whatever its language, would, at the time it was entered into, have been unconscionable and extravagant, and one which no court ought to allow to be enforced if this sum were to be treated as liquidated damages, having regard to any possible amount of damages conceived to have been in the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract. LORD MERSEY, in delivering the judgment of the Board, said ([1912] A.C. at p. 398):

> "When making the contract it was impossible to foresee the extent of the injury which might be sustained by the plaintiff if sales of tea were made to third parties without his consent. That such sales might seriously affect his business was obvious, and the very uncertainty of the loss to arise made it most reasonable for the parties to agree beforehand as to what the damages should be. And, furthermore, it is well known that damages of this kind, though very real, may be difficult of proof, and that the proof may entail considerable expense."

Those remarks are, having regard to the evidence in the present case, particularly applicable to it.

In Kemble v. Farren (4), TINDAL, C.J., said (6 Bing. at p. 148):

> "We see nothing illegal or unreasonable in the parties, by their mutual agreement, settling the amount of damages, uncertain in their nature, at any sum upon which they may agree. In many cases, such an agreement fixes that which is almost impossible to be accurately ascertained; and in all cases, it saves the expense and difficulty of bringing witnesses to that point."

Therefore, although it may be true, as laid down by LORD WATSON, that a presumption is raised in favour of a penalty where a single lump sum is to be paid by way of compensation in respect of many different events some occasioning serious and some trifling damage, it seems to me that this presumption is rebutted by the very fact that the damage caused by each and every one of those events, however varying in importance, may be of such an uncertain nature that it cannot be accurately ascertained. The damages have been proved to be of that nature in the present case, and the very fact that they are so renders it all the more probable that the sum of £5 was not stipulated for merely in terrorem, but was really and genuinely "a pre-estimate of the appellants' probable or possible interest in the due performance of this contract."

SWINFEN EADY, L.J., holds that cl. 5 of the agreement in the present case applies to the first part of cl. 3, the supplying of these goods to persons on the appellants' black list, as it was styled. I confess that this seems to me a very, very doubtful construction. What is prohibited by the second clause is "the sale or offering for sale of motor tyres, cases, or tubes at prices less than those in the price list." What is dealt with in cl. 5 is a sale or offering for sale of these particular kinds of goods in breach of the agreement. What is dealt with in the first part of cl. 3 is the supplying without consent of any such goods to these black-listed agents at any price whatever. But even if SWINFEN EADY, L.J., should be right in this it would not lead me to a conclusion different from that to which I have come. The appellants, like the respondents, are most probably good business men. Neither of them contemplated, presumably, the black-listing of these agents without adequate trade reasons. Nothing was more natural than that the appellants should seek to prevent the supply of their goods indirectly to persons to whom they would not supply them directly. Considerable injury to the appellants' trade interests might obviously be done by putting such persons in a position to undercut their prices, and derange their supply organisation, and nothing conceivable could be more difficult than to prove by evidence, or to estimate precisely in money the exact amount of damages which might be caused by such an injury. The passage in the judgment of TINDAL, C.J., above quoted applies directly to such state of things. I entirely concur with KENNEDY, L.J., in his criticism of the agreement. I agree with him that on the face of it, on this point of liquidated damages, it contains nothing unreasonable, unconscionable, or extravagant; and I further think that the same may be said of the real transaction between the parties if its substance be regarded reasonably. For these reasons I think that the judgment of KENNEDY, L.J., was right, that the judgment appealed from was wrong and should be reversed, and the judgment of PHILLIMORE, J., be restored, and the appeal allowed with costs.

LORD PARKER.—Where the damage which may arise out of a breach of contract is in its nature uncertain, the law permits the parties to agree beforehand the amount to be paid on such breach. Whether the parties have so agreed or whether the sum agreed to be paid on the breach is really a penalty must depend on the circumstances of each particular case. There are, however, certain general considerations which have to be borne in mind in determining the question. If, for example, the sum agreed to be paid is in excess of any actual damage which can possibly, or even probably, arise from the breach, the possibility of the parties having made a bona fide pre-estimate of damage has always been held to be excluded, and it is the same if they have stipulated for the payment of a larger sum in the event of breach of an agreement for the payment of a smaller sum.

The really difficult cases are those in which the court has to consider what presumptions or inferences arise from the number or nature of the stipulations on breach of which it is agreed that the sum in question should be paid. In the case of a single stipulation, which, if broken at all, can be broken once only, and in one way only, such as a covenant not to reveal a trade secret to a rival trader, there can be no inference or presumption that the sum payable on breach is not in the nature of agreed damages, and if the parties have referred to it as agreed or liquidated damages, no reason why the court should not treat it as such. The question is more complicated when the stipulation, though still a single stipulation, is capable of being broken more than once, and more ways than one, such as a stipulation not to solicit the customers of a firm. A solicitation which is unsuccessful can give rise to only nominal damages, and even if it be successful, the actual damage may vary greatly according to the value of the custom which is thereby directly or indirectly lost to the firm. Still, whatever damage there is must be the same in kind for every possible breach, and the fact that it may vary in amount for each particular breach has never been held to raise any presumption or inference that the sum agreed to be paid is a penalty, at any rate in cases where the parties have referred to it as agreed or liquidated damages. The question becomes still more complicated where it is agreed to pay a single sum on the breach of a number of stipulations of varying importance. It is said that in such a case an inference or presumption is raised against the sum in question being in the nature of agreed damages, even though the parties have referred to it as such. In this respect I think that a distinction should be drawn between cases in which the damage likely to accrue from each stipulation is the same in kind, and cases in which the damage likely to accrue varies in kind with each stipulation. Cases of the former class seem to me to be completely analogous to those of a single stipulation, which can be broken in various ways and with varying damages; but probably it would be difficult for the court to hold that the parties had pre-estimated the damage if they have referred to the sum payable as a penalty. A

In cases, however, of the latter class, I am inclined to think that the primâ facie presumption on inference is against the parties having pre-estimated the damage, even though the sum payable is referred to as agreed or liquidated damages. The damage likely to accrue from breaches of the various stipulations being in kind different, a separate pre-estimate in the case of each stipulation would be necessary, and it would not be very likely that the same result would be arrived at in respect of each kind of damage. In my opinion, however, any such presumption or inference would be primâ facie only and capable of being displaced by other considerations. Supposing it were recited in the agreement that the parties had estimated the probable damage from a breach of one stipulation at from £5 to £15, and the probable damage from a breach of another stipulation at from £2 to £12, and had agreed on a sum of £8 as a reasonable sum to be paid on the breach of either stipulation, I cannot think that the court would refuse to give effect to the bargain between the parties. In the present case, even accepting the construction of the contract which makes cl. 5 apply not only to a sale or offer contrary to the provisions of cl. 2, but also to one contrary to the provisions of cl. 3, I think it reasonably clear that the damage likely to accrue from the breach of every stipulation to which cl. 5 applies is the same in kind. Such damage will in every case consist in the disturbance or derangement of the system of distribution by means of which the appellants' goods reach the ultimate consumer. The parties by their contract agree that the sum payable on breach of any such stipulation is to be paid by way of damages and not by way of penalty, and I can see nothing to justify the court in refusing to give effect to this bargain. B C D E

LORD PARMOOR.—On April 7, 1911, Messrs. A. Pellant, Ltd. (acting as agents for the appellants), entered into a price-maintenance agreement with the respondents. The question to be determined is the construction of this agreement. In cl. 5 the respondents agreed to pay to the appellants F

> "the sum of £5 for each and every tyre, cover, or tube sold or offered in breach of this agreement, as and by way of liquidated damages and not as a penalty."

There has been difference of opinion whether the sum of £5 is inapplicable only to a breach of the conditions contained in cl. 2 of the agreement or extends to a breach of the conditions contained in this paragraph. Clause 2 contains an undertaking by the respondents that they G

> "will not sell or offer any Dunlop motor tyres, covers, or tubes to any private customers or to any co-operative society at prices below those mentioned in the price list current at the time of sale, nor give to any such customer or society any cash or other discounts or advantages reducing the same, and will not sell or offer any Dunlop motor tyres, covers, or tubes to any other person, firm, or company at prices less than those mentioned in the said price list." H

I agree with the opinion of KENNEDY, L.J., that under the terms of the contract the sum of £5 is only payable in respect of a breach of the undertaking in cl. 2 of the contract and does not extend to other breaches. I further agree with the opinion expressed by the lord justice that, within this limitation, cl. 5 of the contract does not apply to more than one contingency and that the case must be considered on this basis. It was held by the Court of Appeal that although the sum of £5 was agreed between the parties to be by way of liquidated damages and not as a penalty, yet it must be regarded as a penalty; that the appellants could not recover any greater damages for breach of the agreement in the sale or offering of any tyre, cover, or tube than such damage as they could prove that they had sustained; since they could not prove that they had sustained actual damage. I

A they were not entitled to more than nominal damages. It is against this decision that the appeal is brought to your Lordships' House.

There is no question as to the competency of parties to agree beforehand the amount of damages, uncertain in their nature, payable on the breach of a contract. There are cases, however, in which the courts have interfered with the free right of contract, although the parties have specified the definite sum agreed on by B them to be in the nature of liquidated damages, and not of a penalty. If the court, after looking at the language of the contract, the character of the transaction, and the circumstances under which it was entered into, comes to the conclusion that the parties have made a mistake in calling the agreed sum liquidated damages, and that such sum is not really a pactional pre-estimate of loss within the contemplation of the parties at the time when the arrangement was made, but a penal sum C inserted as a punishment on the defaulter irrespective of the amount of any loss which could at the time have been in contemplation of the parties, then such sum is a penalty, and the defaulter is only liable in respect of damages which can be proved against him. It is too late to say whether such interference with the language of a contract can be justified on any rational principle.

There are two instances in which the court has interfered when the agreed sum D is referable to the breach of a single stipulation. It is important that the principle of interference should not be extended. The agreed sum, though described in the contract as liquidated damages, is held to be a penalty if it is extravagant or unconscionable in relation to any possible amount of damage which could have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time when the contract was made. No abstract rule can be laid down without reference to the special facts of the E particular case, but when competent parties by free contract are purporting to agree a sum as liquidated damages there is no reason for refusing a wide limit of discretion. To justify interference there must be an extravagant disproportion between the agreed sum and the amount of any damage capable of pre-estimate. In Clydebank Engineering and Shipbuilding Co. v. Yzquierdo y Castaneda (1), LORD HALSBURY, L.C., gives an apt illustration of what would probably render a F sum agreed by the parties unconscionable, and, therefore, a penalty ([1905] A.C. at p. 10):

> "For instance, if you agreed to build a house in a year, and agreed that if you did not build the house for £50 you were to pay a million of money as a penalty, the extravagance of that would be at once apparent."

G In the present case the definite sum agreed by the parties is £5, and this cannot be said to be extravagant or extortionate, having regard to the nature of the contract. The second instance in which the courts have sanctioned interference is in the case of a covenant for a fixed sum, or for a sum definitely ascertainable, and a larger sum is inserted by arrangement between the parties, payable as liquidated damages in default of payment. Since the damage for the breach of covenant is H in such cases by English law capable of exact definition, the substitution of a larger sum as liquidated damages is regarded, not as a pre-estimate of damage, but as a penalty in the nature of a penal sum. In the present case this limitation has no application. It cannot be said that the sum of £5 is being substituted for the payment of a smaller fixed or ascertainable sum, since from the nature of this contract any accurate pre-estimate of damage would be practically impossible. The words of TINDAL, C.J., in Kemble v. Farren (4) are directly applicable (6 Bing. I at p. 148):

> "We see nothing illegal or unreasonable in the parties, by their mutual agreement, settling the amount of damages, uncertain in their nature, at any sum upon which they may agree. In many cases, such an agreement fixes that which is almost impossible to be accurately ascertained, and in all cases, it saves the expense and difficulty of bringing witnesses to that point."

The point on which the majority of the Court of Appeal decided this case against the appellants is that, where a contract contains varying stipulations, and the evidence shows that these stipulations are of varying degrees of importance, the court exercises a wider power of interference, and a single sum made payable by the occurrence of the breach of one or more, or all of such stipulations, is primâ facie a penalty and not liquidated damages. If this statement of the law is accurate without limitation, the agreed sum of £5 in the present case would be primâ facie in the nature of a penalty, since that sum is fixed irrespective of the varying degrees of importance of the stipulations. I agree with KENNEDY, L.J., that, though the fact that the agreed sum covers more than one event is an element in the case, or may constitute a presumption that it is a penalty, it is in no sense conclusive against such sum being treated as liquidated damages. There may be a greater risk of infringing the principle against extortion, or against the substitution of a larger for a smaller payment, in applying the same figure to a number of different breaches of varying importance, more especially if some occasion serious and others but trifling damage, than when it is applied to one breach; but if these tests are complied with the parties may reasonably be allowed to make their own agreement. No doubt, if the agreed sum is not applied distributively, but equally to stipulations of varying importance, and in reference to any of the stipulations it is a penalty, it is a penalty for the purpose of the whole contract, since it could not in the same contract be construed both as a penalty and as liquidated damages. If the same agreed sum, separately allocated in different agreements to breaches of varying importance, could be properly construed as a pre-estimate of damage, it seems illogical to regard such sum as a penal payment because for convenience or economy the whole transaction is included in one agreement. The present case is an illustration in point. Having regard to the character of the contract, it would have been possible to have a series of contracts applicable to the various stipulations, and to have inserted in each of them a sum of £5 as liquidated damages to compensate a loss difficult, if not incapable of ascertainment, at the time when the contract was made. I can see no reason why the parties should not be allowed to contract in one document instead of several, or that in such a case the law should interfere with freedom of contract.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in the Court of Appeal, largely bases his judgment on Willson v. Love (7). In that case there was a covenant by the lessees of a farm not to sell hay or straw off the premises during the last twelve months of a term, and provision that an additional rent of £3 per ton should be payable by way of penalty for every ton of hay or straw so sold. There was a substantial difference between the manurial value of hay and that of straw, and it was held that the sum so made payable was a penalty and not liquidated damages. It is noticeable in that case that the parties expressed the sum to be a penalty, and not liquidated damages, but in giving judgment A. L. SMITH, L.J., says ([1896] 1 Q.B. at p. 631):

> "Where a sum is made payable by a contract to secure performance of several stipulations, the damages for the breach of which respectively must be substantially different, or, in other words, the performance of stipulations of varying degrees of importance, that sum is primâ facie to be regarded as a penalty and not as liquidated damages."

If the words primâ facie only apply to a presumption which can be displaced, then I agree with KENNEDY, L.J., that the presumption is displaced in the present case, which belongs to a class in which it is practically impossible to make an accurate assessment of damage, and there is no question of extortion or of substituting a larger for a smaller sum. If the words primâ facie imply that the sum will be regarded as a penalty unless there are some special circumstances which could justify an opposite conclusion, the statement appears to be expressed in too general terms. In Wallis v. Smith (5), tried before FRY, J., and taken to the Court of Appeal, it was necessary to decide whether when a contract contained a condition for payment of a sum of money or liquidated damages for the breach of stipulations of varied importance, none of which is for payment of an ascertained sum of money, the sum named should be treated as liquidated damages or as a penalty. All the previous cases were examined in the Court of Appeal, and the court unanimously affirmed the judgment of FRY, J., that the agreed sum was not a penalty but liquidated damages. LINDLEY, L.J., says (21 Ch.D. at p. 275):

> "When I come to look at the cases I cannot find a single case in which the larger sum has been treated as penalty where there has been no smaller sum ascertainable as the amount of damages."

COTTON, L.J., says (21 Ch.D. at p. 268):

> "There are a number of covenants to which cl. 25 applies, and in respect of the breach of which it is said that £5,000 shall be liquidated damages. Now, in what cases have the courts said that in those circumstances you shall construe the words 'liquidated damages,' not what they mean—as a sum assessed between the parties—but only as a penal sum, leaving the real damages to be ascertained. Undoubtedly the authorities do say this, that when a stipulation applies to a breach of a number of covenants, and one of those is a covenant for payment of a sum of money, where the damage for the breach of it is, according to English law, capable of being actually defined, then where a sum is said to be liquidated damages the stipulation applies not distributively to the different covenants but equally to all, and you must hold that the sum cannot be damages assessed by parties as in the case of a particular covenant with respect to which the damages are incapable of being ascertained and are by law fixed in a different way; but you must look upon it as a mere penalty, and ascertain when the breach occurs what is the damage sustained in respect of the particular breach."

In the present case there is no question of giving a larger sum as liquidated damages for a fixed or ascertainable sum, in reference to any of the stipulations to which the agreed figure is applicable, and no adequate reason for altering the terms of the contract as arranged by the parties. The parties adopted a wise and prudent course, having regard to the nature of the contract and the practical impossibility of an accurate ascertainment of damages. In my opinion, this appeal should be allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

NORTH-WESTERN SALT CO., LTD. v. ELECTROLYTIC ALKALI CO., LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Haldane, L.C., Lord Moulton, Lord Parker of Waddington and Lord Sumner), December 16, 17, 18, 1913, February 12, 1914]

Contract—Illegality—Public policy—Restraint of trade—Dismissal of action on contract—Illegality not raised in defence—Contract ex facie illegal—Contract illegal when read in connection with surrounding circumstances—All circumstances not before court.

Where an action rests on a contract which on the face of it, or when read in connection with all the surrounding circumstances, is shown to be so unreasonable as between the parties or so detrimental to the public as to be illegal as being in restraint of trade the court should dismiss the claim although the defendant has not raised the question of illegality on his pleadings. The matter is one of law for the judge. But if the contract is not ex facie illegal and there is not sufficient evidence to enable the court to review the case in its entirety the court is not entitled to consider the question and decide against the plaintiff.

Contract—Illegality—Public policy—Restraint of trade—Agreement between business concerns regulating trade relations—Consideration of interests of public—Parties best judges of reasonableness between themselves.

Per VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C.: When the question is one of the validity of a commercial agreement for regulating their trade relations entered into between two firms or companies, the law adopts a different attitude from that which it takes in the case of, e.g., an agreement for service by which someone who has little opportunity of choice has precluded himself from earning his living by the exercise of his calling after the period of service is over, when the law looks jealously at the bargain. In the former case the law still looks carefully to the interests of the public, but it regards the parties as the best judges of what is reasonable as between themselves.

Appeal by the plaintiffs in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal reversing a decision of SCRUTTON, J.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of the LORD CHANCELLOR: The appellant company are a combination of salt manufacturers, and they are alleged to include substantially the whole of the salt manufacturers in the north-west of England, and to have obtained the practical control of the inland market in England for the sale of vacuum salt, stoved and unstoved. Stoved salt is salt which is used for household purposes and has been subjected to special drying processes to fit it for such purposes. Vacuum salt is salt, whether afterwards stoved or not, which has been prepared by a process in which the waste steam from the works is carried under the salt pans, instead of fires being put under these salt pans. The contract between the appellants and the respondents, who were salt manufacturers, was made on Nov. 9, 1907. By its terms the respondents agreed to sell to the appellants 72,000 tons of vacuum salt, of which 12,000 were to be stoved salt. Delivery was to be spread over the four years between Jan. 1, 1908, and Dec. 31, 1911, in about equal monthly quantities. These quantities represented 18,000 tons a year, of which 3,000 were to be of stoved salt, unless the respondents in November in any year exercised an option to deliver unstoved salt only in the following year. The price was to be 8s. a ton for both kinds of salt, delivered into trucks at the sellers' works or into craft at their canal wharf. Stoved salt was to be loaded in bags, to be provided by the buyers, but to be filled and stitched at the expense of the sellers. The sellers were to be free to manufacture other salt for their own use, but not for sale, excepting so much as was required to satisfy a certain current contract. The sellers were to have the option of re-purchasing from the buyers the stoved vacuum salt manufactured by themselves to the extent of 3,000 tons annually at the buyers' current prices. If the sellers made stoved vacuum salt they were to be elected distributors in respect of 3,000 tons annually, on the same terms and conditions as the buyers' other distributors. The sellers agreed not to lease or sell any of their land during the contract for salt making or boring for brine for salt making, but they might sell brine for other purposes than salt making. They were to be free to reduce or cease their making of salt. The agreement was to be taken as in settlement of all questions arising out of a previous agreement of Aug. 25, 1906. There were, of course, other salt manufacturers, and these were also under contract to sell salt to the appellants, and they acted as distributors of salt for the appellants under an agreement for distribution, the terms of which did not substantially vary during the period covered by the contract sued on. The effect of these terms was that if the salt manufacturers exercised their option to re-purchase the stoved salt, and then re-sold it, they would have to pay out of the price they received not only the current selling prices, but certain amounts which they might receive for putting the salt into bags and stitching them, and the amount of these charges could be claimed by the appellants as additions to their current selling price. There were also loading and other charges, the amounts of which might be similarly claimed. The appellants' current price for table salt, apart from all additions—the naked price, as it was called—was fixed on Mar. 30, 1908, at 18s., and the respondents intimated their exercise of the option to re-purchase. Controversy arose as to the terms and effect of the option when exercised, and as to whether the respondents were bound to sign a distributor's agreement, and in what terms. Meantime the respondents began, in breach of their contract, to sell stoved salt to customers. They appear to have concealed these sales from the appellants. The latter, however, discovered what had been done, and claimed damages.

In the event the present action was brought. In their points of claim the appellants simply stated the contract of Nov. 9, 1907, alleged breaches, and claimed damages. They set out particulars of the sales alleged to have been made in breach by the respondents, and stated the character of the dispute which had arisen as to the measure of damages. The respondents' points of defence were confined to a denial of the alleged breaches as regards the bulk of the stoved salt in question. The case made was that they had in substance re-purchased and properly sold the stoved salt in question, and that they had duly paid or brought into court all the money the appellants were entitled to. As to another and smaller quantity of the salt in controversy, they admitted sales in breach of contract, but disputed the measure and amount of the damages claimed, and they brought into court sums which they alleged were sufficient to satisfy all proper claims. In their reply the appellants joined issue generally, and alleged that the respondents were only entitled to sell salt re-purchased on the terms contained in the distributor's agreement, under which they ought, as a preliminary to such re-sale, to have lodged with the appellants the contracts for sale. This it was alleged that the respondents had not done, and the appellants further relied on certain inland conditions which were issued in accordance with the distributor's agreement, and with which it was said that the respondents had not complied. The respondents did not in their points of defence set up the invalidity or non-enforceability of the contract of Nov. 9, 1907, and it was admitted at the Bar that it was through no slip, but after consideration, that this was not done. The only questions raised by the pleadings were, first, whether the respondents had not in substance re-purchased under the option in the contract and then properly re-sold; and, secondly, as to the measure of damages. The action was tried in the Commercial Court, before SCRUTTON, J. The learned counsel for the respondents, in the course of cross-examining one of the appellants' witnesses, raised the point as to the legality of the agreement. Counsel for the appellants objected that no such point had been pleaded. SCRUTTON, J., sustained the objection. He held that unless illegality appeared on the face of the plaintiffs' case the point could not be put in cross-examination, having regard to the fact that no such point was raised by the pleadings, pursuant to what was required by the Rules of the Supreme Court. He refused leave to amend, but he said that if, after hearing the plaintiffs' case, he was satisfied that the claim was as matter of law illegal or unenforceable, he would be bound to take judicial notice of this and to disallow the claim. He finally gave a judgment for the plaintiffs on the question of validity, and for the rest, confined it to the other questions which I have indicated. It dealt mainly with the measure of damages. The case went to the Court of Appeal, where a majority of the court, consisting of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and FARWELL, L.JJ., held that the contract was in restraint of trade and bad, and that the action should be dismissed with costs. KENNEDY, L.J., dissented. The court was willing to grant a new trial, if both parties desired it, in which further evidence as to the circumstances could be brought forward, but the defendants elected to take a final judgment. The majority of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal held that the contract sued on must be read in connection with the distributor's agreement, and that this agreement must be read as connected with another agreement dated Sept. 11, 1906, between the plaintiffs and certain other salt manufacturers in the north-west of England. They considered that when these agreements were construed together the contract of 1907 must be held illegal as being in restraint of trade, and as forming part of a scheme for securing a monopoly by restricting output and raising prices. FARWELL, L.J., said:

> "In the present case no circumstances, in my opinion, could justify such a contract made for the mere purpose of raising prices, with the inseparable incident of depriving the members of the public of the choice of manufacturers, while hoodwinking them into the belief that such choice is open to them; in any case, the special circumstances would have to be pleaded and proved by the plaintiffs."

In his dissenting judgment, KENNEDY, L.J., held that there was no evidence on which, so far as the interests of the community were concerned, it could be held to be proved that the contract was contrary to public policy. It was, in his opinion, principally and essentially a contract for sale which was made between manufacturers and sellers of salt dealing with each other on equal terms, and regulating by partial and temporary restrictions, and for good consideration, the manufacture and sale of salt by one of them beyond a specified quantity, but only as part of a scheme for mutual profit. He found no sufficient evidence that the provisions of the contract of 1907 sued on were so injurious that it ought to be held invalid as offending against public policy. The plaintiffs appealed to the House.

Sankey, K.C., and J. D. Crawford for the appellants.
Maurice Hill, K.C., and McCardie for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Feb. 12, 1914. The following opinions were read.

VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for breach of a contract relating to the sale of salt. The question to be determined is whether the contract was enforceable. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts set out above and continued:] Some doubt has been raised whether the general agreement with the other salt manufacturers of Sept. 11, 1906, was put in evidence. But I assume, for the present, that it was in evidence, and I turn to it. It is contended that it must be looked at because of the provision in the contract sued on, which says (cl. 7) that the respondents, if they make any stoved vacuum salt, are to be elected distributors on the same terms and conditions as the appellants' present distributors. These terms and conditions are contained in a document dated Aug. 7, 1908, which was submitted to the respondents as already stated, and which they refused to sign. It is headed: "Distributors Appointment," and it purports to define the terms on which a person appointed to be one of the appellants' salt distributors may purchase salt from the appellants and sell it. It defines the quantity that may be so purchased at prices to be fixed by the appellants, and the conditions on which it may be re-sold at prices to be similarly fixed, and it contains provisions regulating the amount to be sold, the discounts, the use of craft and rolling stock, the freight and other charges, and the customers to whom sales may be made. It provides that the appellants are not to be bound to deliver salt except at the works where it is produced, and that they may, on receiving any order, decide at which of the works of any of their members it is to be delivered. The document contains a statement that similar appointments had been given to other distributors, who were named, and in some cases it was stated that the appointment contained a clause providing that it should not prejudice rights under an agreement of Sept. 11, 1906, being the general agreement already referred to between the appellants and the other salt manufacturers. This last-mentioned agreement, which purports to be made with fourteen salt manufacturers of Cheshire, Lancashire, Worcester, and Stafford, comprising both companies and firms, contains provisions largely resembling those in the contract sued on. The purpose of both contracts was to enable the appellant company to control the sales and prices of salt within its sphere of influence, and as the members of the appellant company were the salt manufacturers themselves, this was not impracticable.

It is no doubt true that where on the plaintiff's case it appears to the court that the claim is illegal, and that it would be contrary to public policy to entertain it, the court may and ought to refuse to do so. But this must only be when either the agreement sued on is on the face of it illegal, or where, if facts relating to such an agreement are relied on, the plaintiff's case has been completely presented. If the point has not been raised on the pleadings so as to warn the plaintiff to produce evidence which he may be able to bring forward rebutting any presumption of illegality which might be based on some isolated fact, then the court ought not to take a course which may easily lead to a miscarriage of justice. On the other hand, if the action really rests on a contract which on the face of it ought not to be enforced, then, as I have already said, the court ought to dismiss the claim, irrespective of whether the pleadings of the defendant raise the question of illegality. In the case before us it is to me obvious that the Court of Appeal could not be sure that it had got before it the whole of the materials which were necessary if it was to be justified in deciding on the legality of what it took to be a scheme for securing a monopoly by restricting output and raising prices, and for depriving the public of the choice of manufacturers, while hoodwinking them into the belief that such choice was open to them.

Unquestionably the combination in question was one the purpose of which was to regulate supply and keep up prices. But an ill-regulated supply and remunerative prices may, in point of fact, be disadvantageous to the public. Such a state of things may, if it is not controlled, drive manufacturers out of business, or lower wages, and so cause unemployment and labour disturbance. It must always be a question of circumstances whether a combination of manufacturers in a particular trade is an evil from a public point of view. The same thing is true of a supposed monopoly. In the present case there was no attempt to establish a real monopoly, for there might have been great competition from abroad or from other parts of these islands than the part which was the field of the agreement. On material questions of fact such as these the Court of Appeal had not the proper evidence before it, and the pleadings of the respondents had thrown on the appellants no duty to bring forward such evidence. The general agreement of 1906, which was referred to in the document relating to the appointment of distributors, was not an agreement sued on. It constituted only a surrounding circumstance in the case, and it is impossible to predict how that case might have appeared had the appellants presented full evidence of all the circumstances. The Court of Appeal ought, in my opinion, in the absence of amended pleadings and full evidence, to have refused to enter into what was a mere speculation on an intricate and wide question of fact.

If this be so, then the only question which can legitimately be considered is whether the contract sued upon is one which on the face of it ought not to be enforced. As I read the judgments of the majority of the lords justices, they seemed to have thought that the contract, although possibly valid if taken by itself, was not so in view of inferences of fact to be drawn from the character of the outside agreements to which referred. But if there is not sufficient evidence to enable a court to review the situation in its entirety, then the court is confined to what appears on the face of the contract sued upon, including any documents incorporated with it. As the outside agreements and documents to which I have referred were not so incorporated, I think that they could not be looked at in an action with the restricted issues which the pleadings before us raise.

I come back, therefore, to the contract on which the action is based. The law as to contracts in restraint of trade is not doubtful. In order to be valid, a clause imposing restraint must be reasonable, and he who says that the restraint is so must make it out. But he will discharge this burden if he can point to other parts of the contract which show the reasonableness of the restraining clause. If the contract read as a whole appears on the face of it not to be unreasonable in the interest, either of the parties or of the public, that is enough, and the question is not one of evidence. Evidence may, indeed, be given as to the character of the business and the circumstances. But it cannot be given on the question of the reasonableness of what appears on the face of the document when construed in the light of the circumstances as to which evidence is admissible. The question is one of law for the court, and is not an issue of fact. When the controversy is as to the validity of an agreement, say, for service, by which someone who has little opportunity of choice has precluded himself from earning his living by the exercise of his calling after the period of service is over, the law looks jealously at the bargain; but when the question is one of the validity of a commercial agreement for regulating their trade relations, entered into between two firms or companies, the law adopts a somewhat different attitude; it still looks carefully to the interest of the public, but it regards the parties as the best judges of what is reasonable as between themselves. In the present case I see no reason for doubting that in entering into the contract on which this action was brought the respondents were probably acting in their own best interest. It may well be that such a contract was, in view of the powerful position of the appellants, the respondents' best way of securing a market and adequate prices. And if this be once conceded, I find nothing else in the detailed provisions of the contract excepting machinery for working out the bargain. If the general object was lawful, then these provisions were, in my opinion, free from objection on the score of illegality. Nor do I find that the public interest was necessarily or even probably injured.

I have already adverted to the fact that competition from abroad and from other parts of the United Kingdom was not affected. It may be, for all that appears, that agreements of this kind were the only effective method of preventing domestic competition from being carried to a length which would ultimately prove not merely ruinous to the parties themselves, but injurious to the public, even outside that portion of it which was dependent on the prosperity of the salt manufacturing industry. No doubt if there were a monopoly attempted to be set up which was calculated to enhance prices to an unreasonable extent, that would, if it so appeared on the face of the contract, be ground for refusing to enforce it. But an effective attempt to set up such a monopoly or so to enhance prices can but rarely appear on the face of an agreement between two traders. Whether such an attempt is really being made is almost always a question of fact. It certainly does not appear as being made on the face of the agreement in question. It may well be that prices such as 18s. or 23s., which were to be charged for the appellants' salt, were fair prices. The fact that the manufacturer is only to receive 8s. cannot, standing by itself, be treated as sufficient evidence to the contrary. For it may be well worth while for a firm like the respondents, which obviously had to face much competition, to take a low price in order to secure a steady market, and the appellants' prices may have been no higher than a manufacturer might under ordinary circumstances have expected to get. Nor am I impressed by the view of FARWELL, L.J., that the arrangements stipulated for by the appellants for directing the supply of orders to be made from the factories which they thought most convenient in particular cases was detrimental to the public, who might be hoodwinked thereby. Such distribution arrangements are common in business. One of their obvious purposes is to save cost of carriage, and there is no reason to suppose that the business world is either ignorant that they may exist, and so is likely to be deceived, or is incapable of taking care of itself.

In an appeal which recently came before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (A.-G. of the Commonwealth of Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Co. (1)), my noble and learned friend, LORD PARKER, delivered on behalf of the committee a judgment in which the law on these subjects was fully reviewed. Among other statements in that judgment there is one which bears closely on the question before us. After explaining the difference between a monopoly in the strict sense of a restrictive right granted by the Crown, and a monopoly in the popular sense in which what is meant is that a particular business has been placed under the control of some individual or group, he says ([1913] A.C. at p. 796) that it is > "clear that the onus of showing that any contract is calculated to produce a monopoly or enhance prices to an unreasonable extent will lie on the party alleging it, and that if once the court is satisfied that the restraint is reasonable as between the parties, this onus will be no light one."

I desire to adopt this proposition as applicable to the question before us. For the reasons I have given, I do not think that, consistently with the principle so expressed, a court of justice is at liberty to infer from the terms of the contract in controversy that it is directed to establishing either a pernicious monopoly or a state of things injurious to the public. And I agree with what was said by LINDLEY, L.J., one of the most cautious and accurate judges of our time, in Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co. v. Nordenfelt (2) ([1893] 1 Ch. at p. 646):

> "The interest of the public is no doubt adverse to monopolies and to restrictions on trade; but then its interest is to allow its members to carry on those businesses which they themselves prefer, and to abandon and sell to the best advantage those businesses which for any reason they do not wish to continue."

The result of the consideration I have given to this appeal is that I think that this House should declare that the contract in question has not been shown to be in unreasonable restraint of trade, and that it was, therefore, enforceable by the appellants. As the Court of Appeal did not proceed to dispose of the points raised by the respondents as to the measure of damages, the case must be remitted to it for that purpose, with the declaration I have suggested. The appellants are entitled to their costs of the appeal to this house, and also to their costs of the last hearing in the Court of Appeal.

LORD MOULTON.—I agree, and, in my opinion, the sole question which your Lordships are called upon to decide is one of no difficulty if the history of this case be borne in mind. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts.] The discussion before this House has related solely to the question whether the court was justified in dismissing the action on the ground that the contract was illegal or unenforceable. The argument on behalf of the respondents is a very specious one. It is conceded that if a written contract is ex facie in restraint of trade so as to be against public policy, the judge is entitled, and, indeed, bound, to take the point, and the decision is for him and not for the jury. The same must be true when the question is whether a contract when taken in connection with the surrounding circumstances, is in like manner against public policy. This must be so because the question is one of law, and, therefore, is for the court and not for the jury; although it is needless to say that, if there be a dispute as to the facts, that dispute has to be settled by the tribunal which has the duty of deciding as to fact before the judge can exercise his function. If, therefore, say the respondents, the court, taking the contract in connection with the facts appearing in a plaintiff's case or otherwise legitimately brought before the court at the trial, comes to the conclusion that it is against public policy, it is entitled and bound to dismiss the action. This reasoning would be sound in the case of a properly constituted action, where the defence of illegality is duly raised on the pleadings. The court would then be entitled to assume that it had before it, in evidence, all the relevant surrounding circumstances. If any be missing it is the plaintiff's own fault, and he must take the consequences. In such a case the legal motto, de non apparentibus et de non existentibus eadem est ratio, is rightly applied. But it is not so where the issue is not raised on the pleadings. The plaintiffs have received no notice that the point will be raised, and are presumably not prepared with the necessary evidence. Even if they are in a position to call the evidence they are not at liberty so to do, because they are only entitled to call evidence on the issues raised by the pleadings. The facts before the court at the end of the case are, therefore, only a casual selection from the surrounding circumstances, and the court has no longer the right to treat them as properly and fully representing those surrounding circumstances so as to justify its pronouncing on their true effect upon the contract. It may be shortly put as follows. If the contract and its setting be fully before the court it must pronounce on the legality of the transaction. But it may not do so if the contract be not ex facie illegal, and it has before it only a part of the setting, which it is not entitled to take, as against the plaintiff, as fairly representing the whole setting.

Lurking beneath the argument for the respondents was the idea that the public good is a matter of such supreme importance that courts should not require proof in due form and in accordance with the recognised requirements of our legal procedure of any charge of illegality or offence against the rules of public policy. But our judicial procedure is based on the principal that in fairness a litigant should have due notice of the issues that are to be raised in order that he may prepare himself with the evidence necessary to present his case fittingly to the court, and it would indeed be strange to hold that this wholesome rule should be relaxed when he is charged with something so grave as acting against the common weal. Such a proposition partakes of the absurdity of the rule in criminal proceedings that prevailed in England centuries ago—viz., that, because felony was so very wicked, persons accused of it should not be allowed the assistance of counsel. Happily we have shaken ourselves free from all such notions, and the principle that in all cases fair notice should be given to the plaintiff of all the defences that are to be raised is now so fully recognised in our procedure that it is formulated in the rule above quoted, in language which permits no misunderstanding as to the general rule, and which, in particular, specifically includes such a case as the present.

One special case should perhaps be noticed. It is possible to conceive a case in which a fact comes to light in the course of the trial which of itself renders an agreement illegal on grounds which nothing could cure. In such a case the court would act upon it. But this is no exception to the general rule. Amendments of the pleadings and permission to the plaintiff to call evidence would ex hypothesi be useless in such case, because the fact is conclusive of the illegality. But no such case is before us here. It is evident that had the issue been raised on the pleadings, it would have entitled the plaintiffs to call further evidence of various kinds, and such evidence might have negatived any inference that the parties were concerned in creating or supporting a hurtful combination in restraint of trade.

It remains to apply these principles to the present case. The contract sued upon is not ex facie illegal. So far as is material to this question, it may be described as a contract whereby the respondents have the option to buy up to a certain amount of stoved salt at a certain price, but there is a condition attached to this option that if they exercise it they shall not re-sell the goods except at certain prices and in a certain way. It was a hopeless task to argue that such a contract is ex facie against public policy, and accordingly the argument in the Court of Appeal and in this House turned mainly on the nature and status of a separate and independent contract made by the appellants with other persons which was not incorporated in, and did not form part of, their contract with the respondents. It was contended that this latter contract was in restraint of trade and hurtful to the public, and that the contract with the respondents was in aid of this contract, and that, therefore, it was also invalid. There can be no doubt that if this issue had been raised on the pleadings the appellants might have called relevant evidence as to the circumstances under which these contracts were made and as to their object and effect. This they had no opportunity of doing by reason of the respondents' electing not to raise the issue by their pleadings, and we cannot pronounce on the question whether the surrounding circumstances were such as to render the contract with the respondents illegal because we have not the requisite material before us. The consequence is that this appeal should be allowed with costs. The case must be remitted to the Court of Appeal on the question of damages.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—I agree. A contract in restraint of trade may on the face of it be so unreasonable as between the parties, or so detrimental to the public, that the court will on its own initiative refuse to enforce it. There may, however, be contracts in restraint of trade the validity or invalidity of which cannot be gauged by the terms of the documents themselves without reference to the circumstances under which they were executed. In such cases it is more difficult for the court to act on its own initiative. Indeed, it ought not so to act unless it be quite certain that all the relevant facts are in evidence. The present action was for damages for breaches of a contract in restraint of trade. As I read the pleadings, both the breaches and liability for the breaches are admitted, the substantial matter in dispute being as to the measure of the damages. No question was raised as to the validity of the contract itself, nor can it be contended that the contract is on the face of it either unreasonable as between the parties or detrimental to the public. At the trial the defendants' counsel proposed to cross-examine one of the plaintiff's witnesses as to the circumstances under which the contract was executed, in order to show that, having regard to those circumstances, the contract was invalid. The judge refused to allow this to be done, as no question of invalidity was raised by the pleadings. He also refused to allow the pleadings to be amended so as to raise the question of invalidity. Under those circumstances neither party had any opportunity of tendering the evidence which would have been relevant on this question if raised by the pleadings. It so happened, however, that certain facts and documents which would have been relevant on this question if raised, were also relevant, and were admitted in evidence, on other issues in the action. On the strength of those facts and documents the majority of the Court of Appeal (KENNEDY, L.J., dissenting), have held the contract sued on to be invalid as part of a scheme for securing a monopoly by restricting output and by raising prices. The question your Lordships have to determine is whether this decision can stand. For my part, I entirely agree with the dissenting judgment of KENNEDY, L.J. Even assuming that the facts and documents in question, if unexplained, would establish the existence of an attempt on the part of the plaintiffs to establish such a monopoly, your Lordships cannot disregard the fact that the plaintiffs have had no opportunity of explaining them. The full facts, if known, might profoundly modify any inferences your Lordships might be induced to draw from the imperfect information now before the House. For example, the circumstances under which the plaintiffs entered into the agreement of Sept. 11, 1906, with the salt manufacturers of Cheshire, Lancashire, Worcester, and Stafford may have been analogous to those which the Privy Council recently considered in A.-G. of the Commonwealth of Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Co. (1), in order to determine whether the trade restrictions contained in the "Vend" agreement therein referred to were necessarily detrimental to public interest. The competition between salt producers within the area covered by the agreement of Sept. 11, 1906, either inter se or with salt producers outside this area may have been so drastic that some combination limiting output and regulating competition within the area so as to secure reasonable prices may have been necessary, not only in the interests of the salt producers themselves, but in the interest of the public generally, for it cannot be to the public advantage that the trade of a large area should be ruined by a cut-throat competition. Under these circumstances, though it was no doubt open to the Court of Appeal, taking the view they did of the evidence, to direct a new trial, it was not, in my opinion, open to them to hold the contract invalid on the imperfect information before them. It appears that the defendants refused to concur in asking the Court of Appeal for a new trial, nor have they asked for this on the present appeal. Under these circumstances, I think the only course is to allow the appeal, and remit the case to the Court of Appeal to be dealt with on the footing that the contract was valid.

LORD SUMNER. I agree that it is unnecessary to decide any question about the form of the pleadings, the propriety of refusing to allow the respondents to amend, or the admissibility of any part of the evidence. In a case such as this the burden is on the respondents of proving the illegality on which they rely. Since the decision of A.-G. of the Commonwealth of Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Co. (1) this must be taken as established. The whole question is whether or not, in the condition in which the materials reach your Lordships, illegality has been proved. As it appears to me, the agreement of 1906 and the evidence elicited in the cross-examination of Mr. Clarke are not materials sufficient to enable a court to act in this matter. The respondents were not parties to that agreement, and the contract between them and the appellants did not become less legal because the appellants on their side had entered into particular engagements with strangers. It is not their motive, but the contract sued on that is in question. Much of the oral evidence was strictly immaterial since, though obtained in cross-examination, it went to no issue. It may, therefore, be disregarded. Nor does the residue suffice, for this simple reason. Whatever else can be made of it, if anything, it is certain that we do not know half the facts material to the case. For myself I should require to know much more of the conditions of the trade and of the effect of such arrangements as these before I could profitably express any opinion on the practical rights and wrongs of the sale of salt. In such a matter partial information is as bad as none. By this contract A. buys all B.'s product for a given and not protracted period, and buys it to sell again. B. has the right to buy back, or virtually to keep out, a certain quantity, if he desires to make a dealer's as well as a manufacturers' profit. To prevent B. from underselling A. he is put under terms as to his sales over. In law B. is probably a buyer from A. and a seller to third parties; practically his position hardly differs from that of A.'s del credere agent. To restrict an agent's authority can hardly be illegality in the principal, and there is little more here. Further, B. is restrained from opening up any more salt-bearing ground, directly or indirectly. In the case of a mineral which is not inexhaustible and cannot be renewed, that may as well make for the public good as not. No doubt the difference between the selling price fixed for the producers, the respondents, and the buying price open to the public is extreme, but we do not know enough of the conditions of competition or of the other elements in the ultimate selling price beyond bare costs of production to act upon it. Doubtless the parties entered into the contract in order to make money out of it, probably by keeping up prices, but that is not conclusive. I dare say the appellants were not any more anxious to go into all the facts than the respondents were to plead illegality in black and white, but your Lordships have to decide this appeal as things stand here. I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be allowed with costs, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be set aside and the case be remitted to them to hear and determine the other questions arising on the defendant's notice of appeal.

Licensing—Offence—Sale of liquor without justices' licence—Liquor owned by brewers—Licence held by manager—Sale to customer by manager—Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. 7 & 1 Geo. 5, c. 24), s. 65.

By s. 65 (1) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 [see now s. 120 of the Licensing Act, 1953: 33 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 142]: "A person shall not sell or expose for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor unless he holds a justices' licence authorising him to hold an excise licence for the sale of that intoxicating liquor, nor at any place except that for which the justices' licence authorises him to hold an excise licence for the sale of that liquor." Penalties are specified in s. 65 (2) of the Act.

The appellants, brewers and wholesale wine and spirit merchants, were the owners of a public house the justices' licence in respect of which was held by S., who was the manager for the appellants under an agreement by which he undertook to manage the premises, inter alia, under such rules and in such manner as the appellants required. The liquor on the premises was the property of the appellants, who were rated as occupiers, their name appearing on various signs and signboards exhibited outside the premises. When granting the licence to S, the justices were made fully aware of the terms of the agreement under which he went into the house and they also knew the capacity in which he acted. On Feb. 14, 1914, the respondent went to the licensed premises and was served with intoxicating liquor, namely beer, by S.

Held: the sale contemplated by s. 65 was a sale by the person who actually sold the liquor; S. was the person who actually made the sale; and, therefore, the appellants were not guilty of an offence under the section.

Per DARLING, J., and AVORY, J.: Even if the sale was by the appellants, they were not liable, for it would be a sale by persons holding a licence in the name of their agent or servant with the knowledge and sanction of the justices.

Case Stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the city of Liverpool.

An information, dated Feb. 18, 1914, was preferred by Robert Lydiate (hereinafter called "the respondent") against James Mellor and others, trading as

James Mellor & Sons (hereinafter called "the appellants"), for that they in the city of Liverpool on Feb. 14, 1914, did unlawfully sell by retail certain intoxicating liquor, to wit, beer, without holding a justices' licence authorising them to hold an excise licence for the sale of such liquor, contrary to the provisions of s. 65 (1) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 [see now s. 120 (1) of the Licensing Act, 1953]. On the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted. (i) The appellants were a partnership firm carrying on the business of brewers and wholesale wine and spirit merchants in the city of Liverpool, for which purposes they held the necessary wholesale licences. (ii) The appellants were the owners of several fully licensed public-houses in Liverpool, including one known as the Central Vaults, at No. 30, Tithebarn Street (hereinafter referred to as "the licensed premises"). (iii) The appellants held no justices' licence in respect of the licensed premises. (iv) The justices' licence in respect of the licensed premises was on Feb. 14, 1914, and had for some years past, been held by Henry Smith. (v) Henry Smith was the manager of the licensed premises for the appellants under an agreement dated Mar. 18, 1907. (vi) The licensing justices when granting the licence to Henry Smith were satisfied that he was a fit and proper person to hold a licence. (vii) Henry Smith was resident on the licensed premises, which was in accordance with the agreement and with the conditions made by the justices in granting the licence to him. He personally conducted the sale of the intoxicating liquor on the licensed premises and was responsible for the management of the licensed premises. The whole of the intoxicating liquor stocked in and sold at the licensed premises was the property of the appellants, and the appellants received the whole of the moneys arising from the sale thereof less only the deductions therefrom permitted by the agreement to be made by Henry Smith. The licensed premises were rated in the rate book under the name of James Mellor & Co., and there appeared outside the licensed premises such signs as "Mellors' Old Derby Ale Stores," "Mellors' Wine and Spirit Stores," "Mellors' Luncheon Bar," etc. (viii) The appellants had been the owners of the licensed premises for many years, and before Henry Smith first obtained the licence in 1907 the agreement was produced to the licensing justices, who had full knowledge of its terms and of the capacity in which Henry Smith was to become the licensee. (ix) The respondent purchased intoxicating liquor at the licensed premises on Feb. 14, 1914, and the actual conduct of the sale was by Henry Smith. (x) The appellants always exercised a strict supervision over Henry Smith, who accounted weekly to the appellants for the takings on the licensed premises in accordance with the terms of the agreement. (xi) The business and assets (including the licensed premises) of the appellants had since Feb. 14, 1914, been transferred to a company limited by shares. (xii) There were some 1,500 persons in the said city holding justices "on" licences, and of this number there were about 1,050 who held such licences with the full knowledge and approval of the licensing justices as managers for brewing firms under agreements similar to that of Henry Smith in this case, and the system of licensing managers for brewing owners of public-houses has been in force in Liverpool for over thirty years past.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the sale on Feb. 14, 1914, was in law and in fact a sale by the appellants at the licensed premises, and that, as the appellants did not hold a justices' licence enabling them so to sell, they ought to be convicted of an offence under s. 65 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. In support of this contention Dunning v. Owen (1), Peckover v. Defries (2), and Williamson v. Norris (3) were cited. On behalf of the appellants it was contended that the fact that all the circumstances in connection with the licensing of the premises were known to the licensing justices at the time when they granted the licence to Henry Smith was a sufficient protection to the appellants against any liability under s. 65, and, further, that, although it was a fact that the licence in existence for the licensed premises was in the name of Henry Smith, yet he was, and was well known to be, only acting for and on behalf of the appellants, whose business was being carried on and whose intoxicating liquor was being sold by his hands, and that, therefore, no offence as charged had been committed by the appellants. In support of these contentions the following cases were referred to: Brooker v. Wood (4); Ritchie v. Smith (5); R. v. Jones, Ex parte Davies (6); R. v. Lyon, Ex parte Skinner (7); Saunders v. Thorney (8); Nix v. Nottingham Justices (9); Caldwell v. Bethell (10). Reference was also made to s. 20 (2) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, and the two first-mentioned cases relied upon by the respondent were sought to be distinguished on the ground that fraud was a constituent part of the facts therein.

The learned stipendiary magistrate was of opinion that on the authority of Dunning v. Owen (1) there had been a sale in law by the appellants on the licensed premises, and that, as they did not hold a justices' licence for that purpose, they ought to be convicted.

Under the agreement between the appellants and Henry Smith (which was annexed to and formed part of the Case Stated) Smith agreed that he would act as manager for the appellants of the Central Vaults; that he and the persons assisting him in the management of the business for the time being carried on in the said public-house would conduct himself and themselves in a proper and orderly and sober manner; that he and they would conduct and manage the public-house and the business carried on therein under such rules and in such manner as the appellants should require and in a quiet and orderly manner and use his best endeavours to preserve and maintain the custom and business thereto; that neither he nor his wife nor servant nor any agent assisting him in the conduct of the business should do or suffer any act or thing which might afford or be likely to afford any reasonable pretext for the refusal or suspension of the licences attached to the premises or for any information or complaint to be laid or made against him or the premises; that he would annually at the proper time so long as he should remain in the premises apply for and obtain the renewal of the licences; that he would personally attend to the business and devote his whole time and attention thereto, that he would keep proper books of account (which would be provided by and be the property of the appellants) and enter therein daily in the mode prescribed by the appellants an account of all moneys received by him on that day and of all moneys paid by him that day for sundries which he might be authorised by the appellants to provide; that he should every Monday by 10 a.m. make out an account of the previous week's takings according to the mode prescribed by the appellants, with an account of the moneys paid for sundries during such week, and should hand over the takings (less such payments for sundries) to the appellants or any person whom they might appoint to receive the same; that he would not sleep away from the premises without the assent of the appellants; that whenever he should be required by the appellants so to do he would give up vacant possession of the premises and sign the necessary notices for the transfer of the licences both by temporary authority, by indorsement at petty sessions, and by complete transfer at special sessions into the name of any person whom the appellants might appoint; and that, if he or his wife, agent, or any of his servants should act in any way or do any act in contravention of the rules for the time being or any of them for the conduct of the public-house and premises prescribed by the appellants, the agreement should (at the appellants' option) be at an end, and he might be thereupon dismissed from the premises.

July 31, 1914. The following judgments were read.

LORD READING, C.J.—The appellants were a partnership firm of brewers who were also the owners of various fully-licensed public-houses in Liverpool, including the Central Vaults. One Henry Smith had acted for them since March, 1907, as the manager of the business there conducted, and had ever since that date, and in particular on Feb. 14, 1914, held a justices' licence authorising him to sell intoxicating liquor by retail on the said premises. On this date Henry Smith sold a pint of beer to the respondent at the public-house—that is, he actually conducted the sale and received the money therefor from the respondent. The liquor stocked at the public-house and that sold to the respondent was the property of the appellants. Under the agreement in writing of March 18, 1907, between the appellants and Henry Smith, Smith undertook to manage the public-house in a proper, quiet, and orderly manner, and under such rules and in such manner as the owners should require. He further agreed not to do anything which might afford a reasonable pretext for the refusal or suspension of the licences attached to the premises, and undertook annually to apply for and to obtain the renewal of these licences. Upon these facts the respondent instituted proceedings against the appellants for having contravened the provisions of s. 65 (1) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, which, so far as material, is in the following words:

The learned magistrate convicted the appellants and inflicted a nominal fine. In giving his decision he said that, had the matter been res integra, he would have held that no offence had been committed, but that he felt bound, by reason of the judgment in Dunning v. Owen (1) to decide against the appellants. This court has now to determine whether the appellants have committed any offence under s. 65 of the statute in question.

On behalf of the respondent it is contended that as the appellants were the owners of the public-house and of the intoxicating liquor there sold, and as the business on the premises was conducted by Henry Smith their servant, who was under their control and supervision, and was acting on their behalf and for their benefit, the sale to the respondent was a sale by the appellants, and as they were not the holders of a justices' licence they had committed an offence under the section of the statute. On behalf of the appellants it was contended that there had been no sale by them within the meaning of the words in s. 65, and that, in any event, their servant, for whose act it was sought to make them responsible under the statute, was the holder of a justices' licence, and, therefore, that the requirements of the statute had been met. The matter in dispute is of considerable public importance, particularly in Liverpool, as in that city alone the licensing justices have adopted and followed for over thirty years the policy of granting justices' licences to brewers' managers under agreements similar to that forming part of this case. Of 1,500 persons holding justices' on-licences in that city, there are about 1,050 who hold such licences to the knowledge of the licensing justices and with their approval in the same way as Henry Smith, and under agreements similar to that between him and the appellants.

The question to be decided depends upon the construction of the words in the section, and particularly upon the meaning to be attributed to the words "shall not sell or expose for sale." If it were right to construe this section as if we were determining the rights and obligations of the parties to a contract of sale, it could not be doubted, as a general principle of law, that a sale by a servant authorised in that behalf is a sale by the principal, at least to the extent of imposing upon the latter the burdens and the advantages of the contract. But I cannot think that when the legislature enacted that a justices' licence should be required as a condition precedent to the right of selling intoxicating liquor by retail on the licensed premises, it intended that every person who might be made liable as a contracting party to a contract of sale must hold a justices' licence for such sale notwithstanding that he took no part in the actual conduct of the sale on the premises. The justices' licence is not required for revenue purposes. It is required for the protection and preservation of public morals, and for the prevention of offences which are subversive of good order and the public safety: Ritchie v. Smith (5). The object of the statutory requirement is to make the person who conducts and manages the business there transacted responsible to the licensing justices for its proper and orderly conduct and management in accordance with the requirements of the statute and of the licensing justices acting in pursuance thereof. It is clear that the word "sell" has different meanings in different sections of this statute. For example, it cannot be doubted that the barman or other assistant under the control or direction of the holder of the licence does not commit an offence under s. 65 when he sells a pint of beer across the counter to a customer: per LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., in Williamson v. Norris (3), [1899] 1 Q.B. at p. 13. The Lord Chief Justice in that case said that the true meaning of the section is that the sale which is prohibited must be a sale by the person who ought to be licensed. If a person is placed on the premises for the purpose of taking charge and control of the premises and the business there conducted, he is a person who, in my opinion, requires the protection of a justices' licence, and that notwithstanding that he is responsible to principals for the good conduct and management of the premises and business, and is acting for their benefit and as their servant. He remains responsible to the justices; he is a person deemed by them, in the exercise of their discretion, a fit and proper person to whom a licence should be granted under s. 9 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. On the other hand, under s. 69 of the statute, every person who sells is held to include every person who does the physical act of transferring the liquor to the purchaser, and includes the barman or other person as well as the licence-holder.

In the present case the question is whether the appellants can be said to have sold the liquor under s. 65. There has been only one sale, and that was the sale actually conducted by Henry Smith, who is the licence-holder. In my judgment, there cannot be, under this section, one sale physically made by him for which a licence is required and another arising out of his acts by the appellants as a firm and by each of the members of the firm. If the sale was not by him, but by the appellants, it would mean that the person placed by the appellants on the premises to manage and conduct the business there did not require to hold a licence. For the reasons I have already given, I think that he is the person aimed at by Parliament in this section who requires the protection of a justices' licence. As he held a licence, the appellants have not aided or abetted him in committing an offence under this section. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appellants did not sell the liquor to the respondent within the meaning of the section, and have, therefore, not committed the offence of which they have been convicted. An examination of Dunning v. Owen (1) makes it plain that nothing that I have said in this judgment is in conflict with that decision. That case applied the principle of law laid down in Peckover v. Defries (2) to the facts of the case then before the court. It did not lay down any new principle of law. I do not intend in my judgment to detract in the slightest degree from or otherwise to weaken the full effect of the judgments in Dunning v. Owen (1) and Peckover v. Defries (2) which, in my opinion, are right and salutary decisions. I am of opinion, for the reasons given, that this appeal should be allowed, and the conviction quashed.

DARLING, J.—This case raises a question under s. 65 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, which enacts that:

It seems to me that the prohibition contained in the words quoted is not absolute, and that a person not holding a justices' licence may lawfully sell by retail intoxicating liquor, provided he does so "subject to the provisions of this Act," and such, I think, was the sale by the appellants. They were the owners of the licensed house, and the liquor was there sold and dispensed by Henry Smith—he was resident on the licensed premises, and was there acting entirely as manager of the business carried on—by virtue of the agreement set out in the Special Case. The court need not be embarrassed by the judgments in Dunning v. Owen (1) and still less by Peckover v. Defries (2) for in the latter case the point here to be decided did not arise, and in the former it was expressly reserved. Smith, being the manager for the appellants of the whole business conducted on their premises, did undoubtedly sell liquor there within the meaning of the Act, and, therefore, he needed the protection of a justices' licence. Of course there was a sale by, or at least on behalf of, the appellants of whatever liquor of theirs was sold by their managing agent; but such a sale by them is not necessarily a selling of the kind for which they require a licence. The whole transaction may be regarded thus: The appellants did sell their goods on the licensed premises, but merely through and by means of Smith, their fully authorised agent or manager, knowingly licensed to act in this manner on his principal's behalf. This selling was by a licensed person of goods to which the licence properly applied, and was entirely within the contemplation of the justices who granted it. But there was no complete and perfect sale without the concurrence of the principals and agent alike, and so the person conducting the sale was the alter ego of the appellants. Perhaps it would be a refinement of language to say that, having regard to the agreement between them, the principals and agent are rightly to be considered as a dual or complex personality—one holding a licence for the benefit of both—just as joint tenants of a copyhold estate are equally possessed of the entire holding, although one of them is admitted tenant on the roll of the manor. In my opinion, the appellants did not sell liquor contrary to the provisions of the Act, and so the conviction should not stand.

BANKES, J.—This is a Special Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate of Liverpool in order to raise the question whether the appellants were rightly convicted by him of selling intoxicating liquor without being duly licensed. The material facts are that the appellants are brewers at Liverpool and the owners of licensed premises known as the Central Vaults in Tithebarn Street. The appellants appointed one Smith as their manager to conduct their business upon the said premises upon the terms that he was to have the entire management and be paid a weekly salary, accounting weekly to the appellants for all moneys received. The appellants themselves supplied the intoxicating liquors. The terms of the engagement are contained in a written agreement which forms part of the Special Case. Smith applied to the licensing justices for a licence authorising him to sell intoxicating liquor at the said premises. The agreement was produced to the justices, who, with full knowledge of all the circumstances, granted him the licence. The effect of the granting of the licence was that the premises became licensed premises within the meaning of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, and Smith became the holder of the licence and, as such, the person who, under the group of sections headed "General Regulations as to the Sale of Liquor and Conduct of Licensed Premises," is responsible for the proper conduct of the licensed premises. The premises are treated in the Act as Smith's premises. For instance, s. 75 (1) [s. 136 (1) of Licensing Act, 1953] provides that:

> "The holder of a justices' licence shall not permit drunkenness, or any violent, quarrelsome, or riotous conduct to take place on his premises, or sell any intoxicating liquor to a drunken person."

In my opinion, the holder of a licence who serves a customer, or who authorises him to be served with intoxicating liquor on the licensed premises, sells the liquor to the customer within the meaning of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. To contend that he does not do so because the liquor is not his property, but belongs to someone else, would be, in my opinion, a hopeless contention.

In the present case the respondent applied to be served upon the licensed premises, and was served with intoxicating liquor by Smith, the holder of the licence. This was, in my opinion, a sale by Smith, which his licence authorised him to make, and, consequently, it was a transaction authorised by the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. Section 65 of the Act provides that:

> "Subject to the provisions of this Act, a person shall not sell by retail any intoxicating liquor unless he holds a justices' licence authorising him to hold an excise licence for the sale of that intoxicating liquor."

The appellants themselves held no such licence as is indicated in the section. The magistrate held that he was bound by the authority of Dunning v. Owen (1) to convict the appellants, and he did so, at the same time expressing his opinion that, but for that decision, he should have held that no offence had been committed. The question for our decision is whether the conviction was right. In my opinion, it was not. It is, no doubt, true, as contended by counsel for the respondents, that Smith's act was, in the ordinary commercial sense, a sale by the appellants because it was a sale by their authorised agent of liquor which was their property. This, however, does not decide the question. I agree also with counsel's contention that we ought, in construing s. 65, not to exclude the ordinary meaning of the word "sell," unless there is something in the statute which renders it necessary to do so, or that to include the ordinary meaning would result in an absurdity. The section is governed by the opening words, "Subject to the provisions of the Act." What are the material provisions of the Act in relation to the sale by Smith which constitutes the alleged offence? They are that the act of Smith was an authorised act, a lawful sale by the holder of the licence upon the licensed premises. It is the act of Smith which is said to render the appellants liable to conviction, because the sale by Smith was a sale by their agent, and, therefore, a sale by them. In my opinion, any construction of s. 65 which results in the act of Smith in serving the respondent with intoxicating liquor being treated as between the respondent and Smith as an authorised and lawful act, and the same act as between the respondent and Smith's principals, for whom he, Smith, was acting in serving the respondent, being treated as an unauthorised and illegal act, is absurd and must be rejected. This, however, is the construction which the respondent is seeking to put upon the section.

I do not propose to attempt to put a construction upon the section which shall be applicable to every case which may arise. It is sufficient to say that, in my opinion, the opening words of s. 65 limit the operation of the section to cases other than the present case, and that no person can be convicted of selling intoxicating liquor without a licence under this section, where the act complained of is an act done by the person who is a duly appointed manager, who holds a licence authorising him to do the act.

AVORY, J.—In my opinion, the question to be decided in this case is whether intoxicating liquor has been sold without the authority of a justices' licence. The words in the Licensing Act, 1872, "without being licensed to sell the same," have, I think, been altered in the Act of 1910 in order to remove doubt whether the word "licensed" referred to the excise licence or to the justices' licence. On the facts found in this Special Case it is clear that the justices authorised and intended to authorise Smith as the agent or servant of the appellants to sell intoxicating liquor which at the time of sale was the property of Messrs. Mellor. The sale in question in the present case was, therefore, authorised by the licence, and whether the sale was by Messrs. Mellor, as I think it was within the meaning of s. 65 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, or by Smith, their agent or servant, as I also think it was, the sale was not unlawful, but was a sale by a person holding a licence in the name of his agent or servant in the one case, and by the actual holder of the licence in the other case. I think that the learned stipendiary magistrate was right in the view which he was desirous of adopting—namely, that the requirements of the law are satisfied if the owners of the intoxicating liquor hold a licence by or through their representative with the knowledge and sanction of the licensing justices—and that Dunning v. Owen (1), by which he was misled, is not, in my opinion, in conflict with this decision. That case was really decided on the same ground as Peckover v. Defries (2)—namely, that the sale was by a person who was neither the authorised agent of a licensed person, nor authorised to sell through a licensed agent. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

LUSH, J.—We have in this case to put a construction on s. 65 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. The question is whether Mr. Smith, the appellants' manager, who held a justices' licence, sold the beer on the licensed premises, or whether the appellants who supplied the beer and took the profits, and whose agent Mr. Smith was, sold it within the meaning of the section. If the former was the case, no offence was committed; if the latter, an offence was committed, as the appellants held no licence. It seems clear to me that there was only one sale. It was either a sale by Mr. Smith or a sale by the appellants. The argument for the respondent was that it was a sale by the appellants, because the appellants were the principals on the contracts made by Mr. Smith. The section, which is one of a group of sections dealing with the conduct of licensed premises, has nothing to do with defining contractual rights or contractual obligations. It was for the purpose of securing the proper management of the business of selling intoxicating liquor on licensed premises that the enactment was passed. Bearing this in mind, and construing the section in view of what its obvious purpose is, we must, in my opinion, hold that the "seller" contemplated by the section is the person who actually sells; the person who is in charge and who makes the contracts and generally conducts the business of selling. The person who does that is Mr. Smith, not the appellants, and although he sells for the appellants' benefit, it is he who sells and not the appellants themselves. The appellants, therefore, have not committed any offence, and, inasmuch as their manager was duly licensed, they have not participated in the commission of any offence by him. I think that the appeal ought to be allowed and the conviction quashed.

Appeal allowed.

B Licensing—Compensation authority—Reference by licensing justices of application for renewal of licence—Member of authority one of referring justices—Competence to sit as member of authority and also give evidence—Evidence to be given in public—Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. 7 and 1, Geo. 5, c. 24), s. 19 (2).

Where an application for the renewal of an on-licence is referred by licensing justices to the compensation authority one of the licensing justices who referred C the case and is also a member of the compensation authority is entitled under s. 19 (2) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 [now s. 15 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1953] to give evidence regarding the reasons of the licensing justices in referring the case. But if he wishes to give evidence he should not sit on the Bench as a member of the compensation authority and leave the Bench to go into the witness-box. He should elect whether to be a witness D and give evidence or to sit as a member of the authority and adjudicate on the matter. His acting in both capacities in the same case is highly undesirable as likely to result in a lack of confidence in the administration of justice.

Where licensing justices are heard under s. 19 (2) of the Act [s. 15 (2) of the Act of 1953] they should be heard in the presence of the persons whose E interests are affected, semble, in open court.

Licensing—Compensation authority—Reference by licensing justices of application for renewal of licence—Decision to be arrived at judicially—Matters to be considered.

On a reference by licensing justices to the compensation authority of an application for the renewal of an on-licence the compensation authority are F not entitled merely to look at a map showing the various licensed houses in a district and say from such inspection that certain houses shall be closed. To act in that manner would not be to exercise a judicial function. Evidence must be forthcoming on which the authority can come to a proper decision, and in arriving at their decision they must consider the conflicting claims put forward by the various individuals interested in the matter and also the interests G and convenience of the public.

High Court—Appeal from quarter sessions—Power to draw inferences of fact—Power to reverse findings of fact by quarter sessions—Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 16), s. 2 (2).

By s. 2 (2), of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1894 [now Supreme H Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 25], on the hearing of an appeal from quarter sessions the appellate court "may draw any inference of fact which might have been drawn in the court of quarter sessions, and may give any judgment or make any order which ought to have been given or made by that court. . . .

This subsection means that upon the facts proved or admitted before quarter I sessions the appellate court may draw any inference necessary to enable it to determine the question of law which arises on them, but it does not entitle the appellate court to reverse the findings of quarter sessions on questions of fact.

Case Stated by justices for the borough of Croydon, sitting as the compensation authority.

At a duly appointed principal meeting, held on July 1, 1913, at the Town Hall, Croydon, the question of the renewal of the publican's licence held by Julia Mitchell, one of the appellants, in respect of a public-house known as the Crown and Sceptre and situate in Union Road in the borough of Croydon, came up for consideration under s. 19 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 [Licensing Act, 1953, s. 15], before certain of the justices of the borough sitting as a compensation authority, in pursuance of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, and the rules made thereunder. Eight justices sat as the compensation authority, and of these eight justices five were members of the borough licensing committee which had referred the question of the renewal of the licence of the public-houses to the compensation authority. The borough licensing committee (being the renewal authority for the borough of Croydon) referred the question of the renewal of the licence of the Crown and Sceptre public-house to the compensation authority, on the ground that they considered it redundant, and that the number of licensed houses in its immediate neighbourhood was ample for the accommodation of the neighbourhood in which it was situated. After hearing the evidence, as hereinafter set out, and after hearing counsel on behalf of the appellant Julia Mitchell, the tenant and the licensee of the public-house, and on behalf of the other appellants, Young and Co.'s Brewery, Ltd., the owners of the public-house, the justices by a majority refused the renewal of the licence of the public-house subject to the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice on the present Case stated.

At the hearing before the justices a map of the locality was produced, on which the fully-licensed houses and the beerhouses within a quarter of a mile radius from the Crown and Sceptre public-houses were marked. The Crown and Sceptre public-house was a fully-licensed house occupying a corner position in Union Road just off the Whitehorse Road. The premises were assessed at £110 gross and £88 net rateable value, and were substantially built and had a commanding appearance, the whole front facing Windmill Road. The premises comprised good bedroom accommodation, three bars all with separate entrances from Union Road, namely, public and private bars and bottle and jug department, a billiard room with one full-sized table, a large saloon bar, a kitchen, a large beer cellar paved and drained, a wine-cellar, a scullery, an excellent public urinal, entered from Union Road, and there was a total frontage to Union Road of about 107 ft. 6 in. The premises were lighted with electric light throughout the ground floor and basement, and with gas on the upper floor. They were in a good state of repair generally, and were in good sanitary condition. On Feb. 20, 1912, plans were laid before the renewal authority setting out proposed alterations to the premises by throwing into the existing premises an adjoining shop. The plans were approved by the renewal authority, and the alterations were carried out in June 1912, at a cost of over £200, a further sum of £79 being spent on other structural repairs. The result of these alterations has been to provide a large and spacious saloon bar capable of seating sixty people at small tables and there is a total seating accommodation on the ground floor for eighty-eight people. The nearest licensed houses to the Crown and Sceptre public-house within walking distances there, and the assessments thereof, are as follows:

	Distant	Assessment Gross	Assessment Net Rateable
The Mail Coach ...	140 yds.	100	80
Fisherman's Arms ...	200 yds.	67	54
Gloucester Tavern ...	230 yds.	247	198
Queen's Arms	250 yds.	62	50
Golden Lion		24	19

In addition to the above there was a fully-licensed house, the Princess Arms, and two beerhouses, the Four-in-Hand and the Queen's Head, all within the quarter-mile radius. It was proved by the inspector of police of the division that it was easy to keep observation upon the Crown and Sceptre public-house, that the police periodically visited the house and found it well conducted, and that the house was used by respectable people of the working class. The appellant, Julia Mitchell, had been in occupation of the premises for over two years under a lease with fifteen years unexpired and pays an annual rent of £100. There had been fifteen transfers in twenty-seven years, and in the years 1908 and 1909 there were convictions against a former tenant for permitting the premises to be used for the purpose of betting. A large and increasing trade both in beer and spirits was done in the public-house, and the appellant, Julia Mitchell, made an excellent living in the house. No evidence was given relating to any of the other licensed houses in the district except as to their positions, their distances from the Crown and Sceptre public-house, and their assessments.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that, as all the evidence which had been given was favourable to the Crown and Sceptre public-house, and as no evidence of differentiation from the nearest licensed houses in the district had been given, the appellants were entitled to the renewal of the licence. Cases were referred to in support of this contention, two of which were Raven v. Southampton Justices (1) and Dartford Brewery Co. v. London County Quarter Sessions (2). The justices by a majority decided that there was evidence of differentiation and refused the licence, but consented to state a Case for the opinion of the High Court of Justice.

After three other cases had been heard by the justices, the clerk to the compensation authority stated in open court to counsel appearing on behalf of the appellants that one of the justices sitting on the bench, Mr. Frank Denning, who had visited the licensed houses in the district and was a member of the borough licensing committee which had referred the question of the renewal of the licence to the compensation authority, was willing and anxious to give evidence as to his reasons for so referring the licence. Counsel for the appellants replied that, if the Bench desired to re-open the Case and hear further evidence, it was not in his power to prevent it, but in any event he would still ask the justices to state a Case for the opinion of the High Court, and also submitted that if Mr. Denning, who had previously adjudicated on the matter, was called as a witness, he ought not afterwards to adjudicate on it. The justices agreed to state a Case for the opinion of the High Court in any event, and, after some discussion, ruled that Mr. Denning could not adjudicate after he had given evidence. Mr. Denning then came off the bench and gave evidence upon oath. Apart from evidence which applied equally to all the licensed public-houses in the immediate neighbourhood, he stated that the main reason which influenced him in referring the Crown and Sceptre public-house was the position which it occupied in the Union Road. He also stated that the Fisherman's Arms was in a better position for police observation, that there was more traffic passing that house, that two or three clubs used that house, that it had a bowling green, and that the Gloucester Arms was in the main road and was a larger house than the Crown and Sceptre. He further stated that the Crown and Sceptre was in the poorest part of the neighbourhood, and that an undesirable class of persons both used the house and congregated outside. In cross-examination he admitted that there was very little difference in the width of the Union Road opposite the Crown and Sceptre and the widths of Whitehorse Road and Windmill Road, that the Fisherman's Arms was a smaller and much older house than the Crown and Sceptre, that the accommodation for the public in the Crown and Sceptre was larger than that at the Fisherman's Arms or the Gloucester Arms, and that the Fisherman's Arms was doing a decreasing trade and a smaller trade than the Crown and Sceptre. Counsel for the appellants again submitted that there was no evidence of differentiation on which the justices could refuse the old licence, but the justices by a majority again refused the licence subject to the Case stated.

By s. 2 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1894 [Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 25] :

> "(1) Every Case stated by a court of quarter sessions otherwise than under the Acts eleven and twelve Victoria, chapter seventy-eight, and twelve and thirteen Victoria, chapter forty-five, for the consideration of the High Court shall be deemed to be an appeal, and shall be heard and determined accordingly. (2) On the hearing of any appeal from a court of quarter sessions the appellate court may draw any inference of fact which might have been drawn in the court of quarter sessions, and may give any judgment or make any order which ought to have been given or made by that court, or may remit the order, and in criminal matters the conviction with the order, and the Case stated on it, with the opinion or direction of the appellate court, for re-hearing and determination by the court of quarter sessions, or may remit the Case for re-statement."

Sir Frederic Low, K.C., and Whiteley for the appellants.
Colam, K.C., and Curtis Bennett for the justices.

AVORY, J.—It cannot be doubted that in the present case there are circumstances which may very easily have created the impression upon the mind of the applicant for the licence of this particular public-house when he went away from the tribunal that justice had not been done. But I am afraid that there are many cases which come before licensing justices and licensing authorities where a licence-holder who has been doing a considerable trade in the public-house goes away under the same impression when the licence which he has been holding is not renewed. In this court the duty is imposed upon us of applying the law according to the statute and in accordance with the previous decisions of the court, and, in my opinion, there is one simple question for our decision in the present case—namely, whether the compensation authority had before them legal evidence upon which they could properly arrive at a conclusion which would justify them in refusing the renewal of this licence.

In order to determine that question it is necessary for us to look at the findings of fact as contained in this Special Case. There can be no doubt that we ought to examine the findings of fact with the utmost care upon the present occasion since we have been asked in effect by counsel for the appellants to overrule the decision of the justices upon a question of fact. We have been asked to do this under the provisions of s. 2 of the Judicature Act, 1894, which gives this court power, upon the argument of a Case which comes from quarter sessions, to draw any necessary inference of fact. Now the inference which the licensing justices drew from the facts as laid before them was that the licence in the present case ought not to be renewed. The chief part of the argument which has been addressed to us on behalf of the appellants is that this court, acting in accordance with the powers given under s. 2 of the Judicature Act, 1894, ought to arrive at the conclusion that the licence ought to have been renewed. In my opinion, there is no such extensive power granted to this court under the Act of 1894. I expressed my views upon the effect of this statute in Hickton v. Hodyson (3), and I am still of the same mind—namely, that s. 2 of the Act only means that upon the facts which are either proved or admitted the court may draw any inference necessary to enable it to determine the question of law which arises upon them, but that it does not entitle this court to reverse the finding of the court of quarter sessions upon questions of fact.

That being so, the question before us resolves itself into one of extreme simplicity, and we have only to determine whether upon this Special Case there are facts which, in our view, afford legal evidence upon which the justices were entitled to refuse the renewal of this licence. It is quite true that there were many facts proved or admitted before the justices which went to show that this public-house was one which, in the ordinary course of things, should certainly have had its licence renewed. Among those facts there was one of a striking character, and one which does undoubtedly create a peculiar hardship as far as the appellants are concerned, for in 1912 the licensing justices for the borough had actually approved certain alterations, which were afterwards carried out at considerable expense, as far as this public-house was concerned—alterations which did very considerably increase the accommodation provided for the general public. I do not, of course, say that they were the same individual justices who sat in 1913 as those who had sat in 1912, and then imposed this hardship in 1913 after allowing the expenditure in 1912, but the fact remains that the same licensing authority, after acting in such a manner in one year as to allow a tenant to spend money upon improvements, actually refuses in the following year to grant a renewal of the licence, but refers it to the compensation authority for compensation instead of renewal.

When the case was before the compensation authority there were other facts of importance which were proved—namely, that the house was one which was convenient for police observation, that it was used by a respectable class of working men, that it was doing an increasing trade, and that there was ample accommodation for the public. Up to this point, therefore, as I have pointed out, the whole of the evidence was one way, and went to show good grounds for the renewal of the licence, even though there was opposition to it. The argument put forward, based upon these grounds, is that there was no justification for the licensing justices to refuse the renewal of the licence because there was no evidence of what has been called differentiation—that is to say, no evidence which serves to distinguish this house from the other licensed houses in the neighbourhood. A map has been produced which shows the distribution of public-houses in the locality in which the Crown and Sceptre is situated. The mere production of such a map, however, is not evidence upon which this court can act when there has been other evidence adduced before the justices.

As to this other evidence it is necessary to consider the case from two points of view. The first point is this: Was there any evidence at all of differentiation before one of the licensing justices, Mr. Denning, left the bench and went into the witness-box? And then the second point is, if there was no such evidence before he went into the witness-box, was there any such evidence after he had been called and examined? I have arrived at the conclusion, acting upon the principle which I have already mentioned—namely, that it is not the function of this court to express a different view of the facts from that which the justices have taken on a question which is peculiarly within their discretion—that even though I might personally have thought, that the evidence given was of such a nature as to have afforded good grounds for renewing this licence, there was, even before Mr. Denning went into the witness-box, evidence which would legally justify the licensing justices in arriving at the conclusion that the renewal of the licence should be refused. I need not go into details as to the kind of evidence which was given, as the facts are sufficiently referred to in the Case, but when one considers simply the number of transfers that had taken place and the number of convictions recorded against the public-house at different times, no matter how much we may differ from the decision of the justices, they were fully entitled to form their own judgment and to act upon it. There was, indeed, evidence upon which they could lawfully come to the conclusion that the licence ought not to be renewed even before they had heard Mr. Denning, and therefore the decision of the justices ought not to be interfered with by us.

If the view that I have expressed is the correct one, there is no need to go into the question of evidence being given by gentlemen in the position occupied by Mr. Denning. I am sorry that we are not compelled to consider the effect of evidence given in the manner and under the circumstances it was given, because I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the course adopted by him is one which ought on no account to be accepted as a precedent for future action. No man ought to allow his judicial character to conflict with his character as a witness; and if a member of an administrative body which has to exercise judicial functions wishes to give evidence in a case, he ought to decide upon the position which he intends to occupy before the proceedings commence. In this case Mr. Denning sat as a member of the licensing committee of the borough; he was one of those who referred the public-house for compensation; he sat and adjudicated when the compensation authority inquired into the matter; and I think I am right in assuming that he was one of the majority when the renewal of the licence was refused. After having acted in the manner which I have described, the point was taken that there was no evidence of differentiation, and after some time had elapsed, three other cases having been heard in the meantime, it was stated that one of the justices, who was sitting on the Bench and who had adjudicated on the case, wished to state the reasons why he had himself come to the conclusion that the question of the licence should be referred to the compensation authority. This justice was Mr. Denning. He left the Bench, went into the witness-box, gave evidence, the case was further heard, and, although the justices decided that Mr. Denning could not now adjudicate upon the matter, the majority of those who were sitting on the Bench again refused the renewal of the licence. I regret to say that I do not know of any authority which would justify the court in saying that the evidence given in this manner was not admissible in law. As his testimony was admissible, reluctantly as it is that I have come to this conclusion, and as he did give evidence satisfying the rule as to differentiation between the public-house in question and others in the neighbourhood, even if I am wrong in holding that the justices were justified in their finding on the evidence before them prior to the time when Mr. Denning went into the witness-box, the facts he deposed to were such that we are not entitled in any way to say that the justices were wrong in their application of the law. Consequently, as I am of opinion that the justices had evidence before them upon which they could legally act, there is no ground upon which we can interfere with their decision, and the present appeal must be dismissed.

ROWLATT, J.—I agree. There can be no doubt whatever that there are matters connected with these proceedings which are exceedingly regrettable. I think that the course pursued by Mr. Denning and acquiesced in, apparently, by his colleagues is one that can only be described, using the mildest terms, as most unfortunate. There was no difficulty in the way of Mr. Denning appearing in court either as a justice or as a witness. He was entitled to adopt either position, but he ought to have made up his mind beforehand as to which of the two positions he would accept. It is, to my mind, unthinkable that a man can combine the function of sitting in a judicial capacity, when impartiality is demanded, with the function of a party or witness, which involves looking at the matter in question from one side only. That is the reason why it is so essential that a decision should be arrived at before the proceedings commence. If it was possible for a person to occupy the two positions when the same question was in dispute, I cannot see how any confidence could ever be felt in the administration of justice. What can a litigant think if, when he appears before a judicial tribunal of any kind, the person who is sitting in judgment can at any moment descend from the Bench and give evidence against him? It is essential that the litigant shall know that those who are sitting in judgment upon him are sitting judicially, and the thought ought never to cross his mind that he can attribute to any of his judges the possibility of a change in his functions. That is why I say that the particular proceedings in this case are of a most unfortunate character.

Still, I think that it cannot be asserted that the evidence was legally inadmissible, regrettable as were the circumstances under which it was given, although at the same time I am most anxious to say, and this is due to the justices, that everything that was done was done in the frankest manner, and that there was no concealment of any kind on their part. The only question that remains, therefore, is whether there was any evidence upon which the decision of the justices to refuse the renewal of the licence can be supported. I will look at it as though the evidence of Mr. Denning was not there at all, because from the narrowest point of view I do not think that the decision of the justices can be disturbed. It has been urged before us that there is no evidence of differentiation. I cannot help thinking that it is somewhat unfortunate that as soon as a new Act of Parliament is passed which introduces what may be termed a new branch of jurisprudence, some word or phrase is immediately coined which sets up a new system of confusion and misunderstandings, and the law gets enthralled by what is after all something not much better than a piece of slang. This is pretty much what has happened in the case of this word "differentiation," and here we have it put before us that there is no evidence of differentiation against the public-house, just as we might have it put before us in another kind of case that there was no evidence of negligence. I do not think that that is the case. The Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, was passed for the purpose of enabling steps to be taken, whenever there were too many public-houses in a district, to reduce the number of the same, and very naturally the question which immediately arises is this: On what materials are the authorities to act in coming to a decision as to which houses are to go and which are to remain? I think that the decisions which have been given upon this point do not proceed further than this, that the justices are not entitled merely to look at a map, from which alone no facts can be elicited on either side, and merely say that certain houses shall be suppressed from such inspection. To act in this manner would not be to exercise a judicial function at all. Evidence must be forthcoming upon which the authority can come to a proper decision, and in arriving at their decision they must consider the conflicting claims that are put forward by the various individuals interested in the matter, and they must also consider the interests and the convenience of the public. It is not a question of finding something prejudicial to the public-house necessarily, although there is no doubt that this is the form which an objection generally takes. But in this case the justices had not simply the map of the district before them; they had the map and they had evidence upon which any question as to locality could be elucidated by the surveyor and the police. There was evidence that the house was one of excellent character. It is quite true that they had also the fact before them that the public-house had changed its tenants with considerable frequency, and they had, moreover, the whole evidence as to the locality. With all these facts before them, no matter what conclusion any other body of persons might have arrived at, I think that the justices were quite entitled to say that this particular public-house must be closed, that the licence would not be renewed, and that it must be referred to the compensation authority.

As to the other point, the one which was put before us first of all, apparently to prepare our minds for what was really, if I may so call it, the pinch of the case, it has been suggested that we are entitled, under s. 2 of the Judicature Act, 1894, to draw an inference from the facts of the case contrary to that which was drawn by the justices. In my opinion, the section does not apply to this kind of case at all. It only means that where certain facts are found, the effect of those facts, which, perhaps, cannot exactly be said to be a question of law, can be dealt with by this court. I do not know whether this is too narrow a rule to be laid down, but at any rate I am perfectly convinced that the effect of the section under consideration leaves this case well outside it, because here it is not really an inference of fact, the justices have come to a conclusion really of opinion, their opinion and their view as to which of the houses must go is, after all, to be considered, it must be arrived at fairly upon evidence and judicially, but, after all, somebody has to decide it. It is they who have to decide it; we have not to decide it, and I do not think that the section come anywhere near enabling us to decide it. For these reasons I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

SHEARMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion, though I must confess that I have had great difficulty in arriving at my decision. The first of my difficulties has been the form in which the Case has been stated. I have always understood that a Case of this kind should be so stated as to give the greatest possible assistance to the court which has to decide the question; and that the question which is submitted to the court for decision should be stated in the clearest possible language. I think it ought to be understood that in cases of this description the court should not merely have all the evidence given, but should have the conclusions of fact at which the justices have arrived, and, when it is the decision of a majority of the justices, I think that the court should be supplied with a statement as to the conclusions at which the majority have arrived. When I turn to this Case, I think it creates a difficulty from the outset. It is well-settled law that the magistrates cannot decide a case of this kind on the map alone. But when I look at the Case I see, "The following facts were proved or admitted"; and immediately afterwards comes the statement, "A map of the locality was produced." The map is annexed to and forms a part of the Case. Is the meaning of this first paragraph relating to facts proved or admitted that the map was admitted as a part of the evidence? On the whole, I come to the conclusion that it was not, and that that statement was merely put in as showing that the magistrates had had a map; and, although the sentence before says this was one of the facts proved or admitted, I have come to the conclusion that that merely means that it was a document before the justices, though it is one which, on the decisions, the court cannot treat as evidence. Then, further, there is a statement of the matters which were proved by the inspector of police. I cannot help thinking that those who stated this Case did not mean that those matters were proved—that is to say, that they were conclusions arrived at by the court; but that by proof they meant that evidence was given which the magistrates were at liberty to accept or to reject. But when one comes to the end of the Case to seek what is the question submitted to us, I find that counsel for the appellants submitted that there was no evidence of differentiation. Then the Case goes on to say that the question for the opinion of the court is whether the justices were legally entitled, in the circumstances, to refuse the renewal of the licence. I read that as meaning that the appellants submitted that there was no evidence of differentiation, and really that is the question which is being submitted to us, and the expression "legally entitled," which is a wide and vague expression, does not mean to raise any question other than the question whether there was evidence before the justices of differentiation. That is to say: Was there evidence before the justices on which they could take away the licence of one house rather than the licence of another house because there were differences between the different houses which were under consideration? I have come to the conclusion that there was evidence before Mr. Denning went into the witness-box and gave evidence. There was, in my opinion, some evidence on which the majority of the justices could have acted. I have also come

A to the same conclusion as my brethren, that there was no legal obstacle to Mr. Denning's evidence being admissible as evidence, and that, therefore, a fortiori after he had given evidence there was evidence of differentiation. I may add that another difficulty of the Case was this. Mr. Denning was a party who was entitled to be heard, not to give evidence, but was entitled, under s. 19 (2) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 [Licensing Act, 1953, s. 15 (2)], to put forward his B views on behalf of the licensing justices, and I presume from his conduct that he was one of the majority of them. He was entitled to be heard, but I hope that that means "entitled to be heard in the presence of the persons whose interests are affected." I feel certain that it must mean that. I have felt in the course of the case great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion whether Mr. Denning merely expressed his views or reasons or gave evidence. Looking at the form in which the C Case is stated, I think that it must mean that he gave evidence. In my opinion, therefore, there was evidence upon which the justices could find as they did, and it follows that this court has no power to interfere with their findings of fact. For the reasons that I have stated I think that the decision of the justices must be supported and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Privy Council (Judicial Committee)—Practice—Appeal—Criminal appeal—Principles on which Judicial Committee will act.

The Judicial Committee on an appeal will not interfere with the course of criminal law unless there has been such an interference with the elementary H rights of an accused as has placed him outside the pale of regular law, or unless, within that pale, there has been a violation of the natural principles of justice so demonstratively manifest as to convince the committee, first, that the result arrived at was opposite to the result which the committee would themselves have reached, and, secondly, that the same opposite result would have been reached by the local tribunal also if the alleged defect or I misdirection had been avoided.

The practice laid down in R. v. Joykissen Mookerjee (1) (1862), 1 Moo. P.C.C.N.S. 272, and Falkland Islands Co. v. R. (2) (1863), 1 Moo.P.C.C.N.S. 299, has not been altered by Re Dillet (3) (1887), 12 App. Cas. 459, and later cases.

Appeal by special leave from a conviction and sentence by the Chief Court of Lower Burma (Sir Charles Fox, sitting with a jury).

The appellant, who was the editor and one of the proprietors of a newspaper called "The Burma Critic," published at Rangoon, was charged under s. 499 of the Indian Penal Code with having defamed Mr. G. P. Andrew, a deputy commissioner and district magistrate, by the publication of two articles entitled "A Mockery of British Justice." The jury found the appellant guilty, and he was sentenced to one year's simple imprisonment.

This report deals only with that part of the judgment of the Board dealing with the practice of the Board in criminal appeals.

Sir R. Finlay, K.C., D. A. Wilson, and Arthur Pope for the appellant.
Sir Erle Richards, K.C., and A. M. Dunne for the respondent.

April 7. LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—From what has been said it will, their Lordships think, clearly appear that there was material before the jury on both sides of this case, and that the determination was on a subject peculiarly within the jury's province. In their Lordships' opinion, the case was not improperly withdrawn from the jury's domain on fact, and they were not misdirected in law. But even if it were conceded that, on a meticulous examination of the judge's charge or conduct of the case, certain flaws could be discovered, it is the duty of their Lordships to consider the special position and function of the Board in criminal cases as the advisers of the King. The frequency of applications made to the Board for leave to appeal against the judgments of criminal tribunals in various parts of the empire, as well as the thoroughness with which the powers and practice of the Judicial Committee were discussed in this case, incline their Lordships to make a deliberate survey of this important topic.

The question is not truly one of jurisdiction. The power of His Majesty under his royal authority to review proceedings of a criminal nature, unless where such power and authority have been parted with by statute, is undoubted. On the other hand, there are reasons, both constitutional and administrative, which make it manifest that this power should be lightly exercised. The overruling consideration on the topic has reference to justice itself. If throughout the Empire it were supposed that the course and execution of justice could suffer serious impediment, which in many cases might amount to practical obstruction, by an appeal to the royal prerogative of review on judicial grounds, then it becomes plain that a severe blow would have been dealt to the ordered administration of law within the King's dominions. These views are not new. They were expressed more than fifty years ago by Dr. Lushington in his judgment in R. v. Joykissen Mookerjee (1), and

LORD KINGSDOWN, in Falkland Islands Co. v. R. (2), stated the matter compendiously in these words (1 Moo.P.C.C.N.S. at p. 312):

> "It may be assumed that the Queen has authority by virtue of her prerogative to review the decisions of all colonial courts, whether the proceedings be of a civil or criminal character, unless Her Majesty has parted with such authority. But the inconvenience of entertaining such appeals in cases of a strictly criminal nature is so great, the obstruction which it would offer to the administration of justice in the colonies is so obvious, that it is very rarely that applications to this Board similar to the present have been attended with success."

Their Lordships desire to state that, in their opinion, the principle and practice thus laid down by LORD KINGSDOWN still remain those which are followed by the Judicial Committee.

There have been various important cases in recent times to which, naturally, reference has been made. The first is Re Dillet (3). It should be observed that, while that case was in form an application within the ambit of criminal law, the matter of substance which was truly brought before the Judicial Committee was a civil matter. The appeal was by a barrister and solicitor against a verdict convicting him of perjury, but there had been a consequential order of the court directing him to be struck off the roll of practitioners, and special leave was granted to appeal in reference to the consequential order. LORD BLACKBURN referred to LORD KINGSDOWN's judgment in Falkland Islands Co. v. R. (2) as authoritative and binding. After citing that learned judge, LORD BLACKBURN added (12 App. Cas. at p. 446):

> "In this statement of the general practice their Lordships agree. They are not prepared to advise Her Majesty to make this conviction for perjury an exception if it were not made the sole foundation for the subsequent order of Mar. 27, 1885," and liberty accordingly was granted (ibid.)

> "to appeal against the order of Mar. 27, 1885, striking him off the roll, and also to the extent above stated, and no further, against the conviction for perjury."

While, accordingly, the familiar sentences again about to be quoted from LORD WATSON are frequently cited with reference to criminal review in general by this Board, this outstanding circumstance just referred to ought not to be forgotten. It appears to dispose of the argument that the practice of the Board was in purely criminal matters in any respect either advanced or distorted from the position which it occupied under the judgments of DR. LUSHINGTON and LORD KINGSDOWN pronounced about a quarter of a century before. LORD WATSON in Re Dillet (3) observed (12 App. Cas. at p. 467) that

> "the rule has been repeatedly laid down, and has been invariably followed, that Her Majesty will not review or interfere with the course of criminal proceedings, unless it is shown that, by a disregard of the forms of legal process, or by some violation of the principles of natural justice, or otherwise, substantial and grave injustice has been done."

The present case brings prominently before the Board the question of what is the sense in which those words are to be interpreted. If they are to be interpreted in the sense that, wherever there has been a misdirection in any criminal case, leaving it uncertain whether that misdirection did or did not affect the jury's mind, then in such cases a miscarriage of justice could be affirmed or assumed, then the result would be to convert the Judicial Committee into a Court of Criminal Review for the Indian and Colonial Empire. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that no such proposition is sound. This committee is not a Court of Criminal Appeal. It may in general be stated that its practice is to the following effect:

It is not guided by its own doubts of the appellant's innocence or suspicion of his guilt. It will not interfere with the course of criminal law unless there has been such an interference with the elementary rights of an accused as has placed him outside of the pale of regular law, or unless, within that pale, there has been a violation of the natural principles of justice so demonstratively manifest as to convince their Lordships, first, that the result arrived at was opposite to the result which their Lordships would themselves have reached, and, secondly, that the same opposite result would have been reached by the local tribunal also if the alleged defect or misdirection had been avoided. The limited nature of the appeal in Re Dillet (3) has been referred to, and their Lordships do not think that its authority goes beyond those propositions which have now been enunciated.

The argument for the appellant was to an entirely contrary effect. In the forefront of it Makin v. A.-G. for New South Wales (4) was cited. That case in truth did not raise the question at issue in the present case. It depended on the construction of s. 423 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1883 (a New South Wales statute). That section set up the judges of the Supreme Court as a tribunal to determine questions submitted to them in a Case Stated by the judge at the trial, and there was a proviso that there should be no quashing "unless for some substantial wrong or other miscarriage of justice." It was stated by this Board that, under that section, the judges have not been substituted for the jury. As they said ([1894] A.C. at p. 70),

> "In their Lordships' opinion substantial wrong would be done to the accused if he were deprived of the verdict of a jury on the facts proved by legal evidence, and there were substituted for it the verdict of the court founded merely upon a perusal of the evidence."

The second case founded on is that of Vaithinatha Pillai v. King-Emperor (5) in which this Board sustained an appeal. The circumstances of the case, however, were of the most extraordinary character, and were such as appeared to the Board to demand imperatively that it should interpose, because the very foundations of justice seemed to have been attacked in the proceedings. A whole body of inadmissible evidence had been received in the case. The one witness who remained in the case whose evidence was relevant was supporting another witness who was a confessed perjurer. The remaining witness himself had given under oath conflicting and contradictory accounts in previous judicial proceedings before the magistrate and certain officials. Lord Atkinson observed:

> "If true they show that these officials, or at least the sub-inspector, induced the witness to forswear himself, and found in him a pliant instrument ready to give false evidence upon oath to secure the conviction of his own father; and if false they show that the witness was ready to commit deliberate perjury whenever he was confronted with the inconsistencies in his former statements. There is no alternative."

The simple case accordingly confronting the Board was a case of a subject sentenced to death on no evidence at all. In these circumstances, although the principle of Re Dillet (3) was again re-affirmed, their Lordships did not see their way to refrain from interfering. The third case referred to is that of Lanier v. R. (6) and, fortunately, it is seldom that such a travesty of justice can be witnessed. One of the notable features of the case had reference to the judge himself. He, as narrated in the report, was a member of the family council which instigated the proceedings, and himself was a party to appointing two barristers to conduct the prosecution and arrange about their fee. The facts need not be referred to. The indictment was altered by drastic amendments; the trial was hurried on; but the narrative need go no further, for, as the report states ([1914] A.C. at p. 226),

> "In short, counsel for the Crown at the Bar of this Board very properly admitted that he could not contend that any jury upon the evidence submitted would have convicted the appellant of crime."

The Board were of opinion that the sentence pronounced against the appellant (ibid. at p. 230)

> "formed such an invasion of liberty and such a denial of his just rights as a citizen that their Lordships feel called upon to interfere."

But the Board took care to repeat that it did not lightly interfere, and the language of LORD WATSON in Dillet's Case (3) was again cited. It was pointed out that the interference was not on any matter of form, but because of matters lying at the very foundation of justice (the judge had been a judge in his own cause); justice had "gravely and injuriously miscarried." That case stands as a fair type of almost the only case in which this Board would advise the interposition of His Majesty the King with the course of criminal justice in the colonies or dependencies. That extreme case is this—that it must be established demonstrably that justice itself in its very foundations has been subverted, and that it is, therefore, a matter of general Imperial concern that, by way of an appeal to the King, it be then restored to its rightful position in that part of the Empire.

Their Lordships were referred to the dicta of judges and the rules set up with regard to the procedure of the Court of Criminal Appeal in England; but they are not the rules adopted by this Board, which, as already stated, is not a Court of Criminal Appeal, and the authority of these decisions, which apply to a different system, a different procedure, and a different structure of principle, must stand out of the reckoning of any body of authority on the matter of the procedure of this Board in advising His Majesty. This view is in entire accord with the recent proceedings of this Board on applications for leave to appeal. One instance of this is that of Clifford v. King-Emperor (7), on Nov. 17 last, and their Lordships refer to the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in this and the other refusals referred to.

The application to the present case is simple. Even had this committee been a Court of Criminal Appeal, it is hardly doubtful that the appeal would fail. A fortiori their Lordships are left in no doubt as to their own duty in conformity with the practice of the Board. They will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. There will be no order as to costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Re WEBB. Ex Parte BOARD OF TRADE

[Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Swinfen Eady and Pickford, L.JJ.). April 24, 1914]

Bankruptcy—Scheme of arrangement—Approval by court—"Reasonable security" for payment of statutory composition—Probability of recovery within reasonable time—Refusal to approve scheme even though sanctioned by creditors—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict., c. 71), s. 3 (9).

By s. 3 (9) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 [see now s. 16 (10) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914], where a scheme of arrangement with creditors proposed by a debtor is submitted for the approval of the court, the court shall, on proof of certain facts, refuse to approve the scheme unless it provides "reasonable security" for payment of not less than 7s. 6d. in the pound [5s. under Act of 1914] on all the unsecured debts provable against the debtor's estate.

D

The words "reasonable security" in this subsection are not used as meaning the security afforded by trustee investments or even the security required by a man who is very strict in his business affairs. The court must be satisfied that the security proposed is such that under it the statutory composition can probably be recovered within a reasonable time. Unless that condition precedent is complied with the court must refuse to sanction the scheme, even though the creditors have approved it.

Appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Hood.

A receiving order, dated May 8, 1913, was made against the debtor, Webb, who was a solicitor and registrar of the Whitechapel County Court. The debtor was sixty-four years of age, and in receipt of a salary and emoluments amounting to £1,100 per annum. His liabilities amounted to upwards of £28,000. A proposal for a composition was put forward in June, 1913, but, that falling through, a further proposal was put forward on Aug. 27, which was accepted and approved by a majority of three-fourths of the creditors in September. The scheme proposed was that the debtor should set aside £600 per annum out of his salary, of which there was to be no protection by life policies or otherwise, and that the debtor's brother, Charles W. Webb, should assign to trustees for the benefit of the creditors one-half of one-tenth share in the proceeds of sale arising from certain interests in oil properties in Wyoming, U.S.A. It having been found by the registrar that circumstances had occurred which would render it impossible for the debtor to

A obtain his discharge without suspension or conditions in the case of adjudication, the proposed scheme had to be approved by the registrar before it could be accepted. The registrar being of opinion that the proposed scheme provided reasonable security for the payment of 7s. 6d. in the pound on all unsecured debts provable against the debtor's estate, sanctioned the scheme and discharged the receiving order on Feb. 1, 1914. The interest, one-half of which was to be assigned B by the debtor's brother, was a tenth share in the net proceeds of sale of certain oil-bearing properties in Wyoming, which share had been assigned to the debtor by one Walter in 1907. In 1908 the debtor assigned his interest to his brother for £2,000. The evidence of the original assignment by Walter was contained in a letter dated June 9, 1913, signed by Walter. It was admitted that the interest so assigned did not amount to a charge on the properties in question, but was limited C to a personal claim against Walter. It was admitted that the properties had not so far produced anything. The Board of Trade and the official receiver appealed against the decision of the registrar sanctioning the scheme.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Stanley Buckmaster, K.C.) and E. W. Hansell for the appellants.

Hollis Walker, K.C., and Woodgate for the debtor.

COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is an appeal by the Board of Trade and the official receiver, raising what is undoubtedly a point of general interest and importance in the administration of the bankruptcy law. A receiving order was made against the debtor, Mr. Webb, who is a solicitor, in May, 1913. In June there E was a proposal for a scheme of composition. That scheme fell through because part of the security which was offered failed, and a second proposal was started in August, 1913. The creditors held a meeting, and in September by the requisite majority they approved it. It came before the registrar, who also approved of the scheme and discharged the receiving order.

The question turns upon s. 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 [see now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 16], and in particular upon sub-s. 9 of that section. In certain F events, which I need not particularise, the court is bound, if the debtor is adjudicated a bankrupt, to refuse, suspend, or attach conditions to the debtor's discharge, and this, which is called the composition section, says:

> "If any facts are proved on proof of which the court would be required either to refuse, suspend, or attach conditions to the debtor's discharge, were he G adjudged bankrupt, the court 'shall refuse to approve the proposal unless it provides reasonable security for payment of not less than 7s. 6d. in the pound on all the unsecured debts provable against the debtor's estate'" [see now s. 16 (10) of Act of 1914 wherein the figure of 5s. is substituted for that of 7s. 6d].

Upon whom is the duty imposed of considering and deciding the question whether H the proposed scheme provides a reasonable security for the payment of 7s. 6d. in the pound? Quite clearly, upon the court; quite clearly the court cannot sanction the composition arrangement and annul the bankruptcy proceedings if it is satisfied that the scheme does not provide reasonable security, and it does not matter in the least, in those circumstances, what are the views of the creditors in the matter. It may be, and this is the other alternative—I dare say it is one which I may occur not infrequently—that the court may be satisfied that the scheme does provide reasonable security for payment of 7s. 6d. in the pound. I do not mean "reasonable security" in the sense in which it might be applied to trustee investments, or even those of a man who is very strict in his business arrangements, but if the court is satisfied that this proposal is security for 7s. 6d. in the pound it may then say "notwithstanding that, I am not bound to follow the wishes of the creditors or the majority of them, although I may be satisfied that the creditors have been actuated by other motives, or, it may be, satisfied that if the bankruptcy works out they will get more than 7s. 6d. in the pound." I do not doubt if the condition about the scheme providing reasonable security for the payment of 7s. 6d. in the pound is satisfied that the court would in most cases listen favourably to the wishes of the creditors and in most cases would give effect to the resolution of the creditors in favour of accepting the composition.

What is the proposal here? The debts, so far as known, amount to a very considerable sum, and a composition of 7s. 6d. in the pound means in fact about £11,000, dealing only in very round figures. The proposal that is offered is, in the first place, a few hundreds a year from his salary as registrar of a county court. That, of course, is a matter which is quite inadequate to produce the £11,000. There is no covering of it by policies of assurance, and there is no other tangible security given by the debtor, but it is said that there are interests in oil properties in Wyoming, properties upon which large sums of money have been laid out, and which are of almost untold value. I think in some of the questions put to the experts it was stated that they were worth hundreds of thousands of pounds. But what is the title shown? It is said that there is a letter produced of June 9, 1913, signed by a Mr. Henry Walter, addressed, not to the bankrupt, but to his brother, Charles Webb, in these terms:

> "I hereby declare that it was agreed between Mr. H. R. Webb [i.e., the bankrupt] and myself in 1907 that in consideration of his services in recovering and protecting the properties as mentioned in para. 10 of the agreement of May 12, 1908, he was to have a clear 10 per cent. (10%) of the net proceeds of all dealings therewith accruing to Henry Walter or his assignee or nominee, such properties including the whole of the lands forming 'The Henderson Purchase'—viz.: (i) The 560 freehold acres at Lander; (ii) the 1,500 acres surrounding these freeholds; (iii) the freehold square mile at Conan Creek, being the lands referred to in schedules 1, 2, and 3 in Mr. H. R. Webb's proposed scheme of arrangement with his creditors."

That is the most extraordinary document I ever saw, if it is to be regarded as a root of title, to use for a moment a conveyancing term. It refers to a certain agreement of 1908, subsequent, be it observed, to the arrangement said to have been made with the bankrupt in 1907. I have read and carefully considered this agreement of May 12, 1908, and I say frankly without hesitation that I do not understand it. I doubt whether anybody does understand it. I doubt whether it is capable of being understood; certainly I am absolutely unable to say what is the effect of this agreement itself except this, that it does appear that the properties, or some of the properties in question, were subject to charges, the number of which I have not ventured to calculate, certainly some score or two of charges; and, further, it appears that as to the properties referred to in the schedules 1, 2, and 3 in the proposal, the position of things is this. As to the first schedule, which is said to be the most valuable one, foreclosure proceedings have been instituted in Wyoming, and a foreclosure decree has been made; but it is said, and I assume, of course, in favour of the debtor, that there have been proceedings that have resulted in the foreclosure proceedings being re-opened—re-opened, no doubt, upon terms—and it must, therefore, not be taken that all the mortgages are impeached or questioned; but as to some of them it has not been definitely established that they are charges on this property. The position remains, however, thus: Foreclosure proceedings as to the whole of the property in the first schedule, the existence of mortgages as to a large amount on that property not in dispute; a receiver appointed by the court in possession; and, so far as appears, not one penny has been received either by Mr. Walter or by anyone of the other parties to the transaction for many years. The next schedule is the property containing 1,500 acres, a little more or less. What is the position of that? That is not in Mr. Walter's possession; it is now in that of the Fremont Syndicate. What is the Fremont Syndicate? The Fremont Syndicate is a company which was in possession at the time, and I suppose is still in possession of these 1,500 acres, but it has made nothing out of them; the property has not been worked, nothing is being derived from it, and all we know is that as late as last December there was an issue of debentures for the small amount of £1,800 at a discount of 30 per cent. The interest of Mr. Walter in the second schedule is not in the land itself but in certain shares or interests in this company, which is an English limited company. The property in the third schedule, again, is no longer in Mr. Walter's possession. That is now in the possession of the New Canadian Oil Co. As long ago as April 25, 1910, it was transferred to that, which is an American company, and there again not a penny has been produced in respect of this. Counsel for the debtor has argued the case very frankly. He admits that this letter, which is really the root of the title, does not create any charge upon this property at all, but merely gives personal rights against Mr. Walter. Is it possible for anybody to say that a security consisting of a personal right against Mr. Walter, who evidently has been a financial speculator to a large extent—and I am afraid not always to a very successful extent—that a personal security of this nature given by Mr. Walter, as to whose financial means and capacity no evidence is forthcoming, can be regarded, in the language of the section of the Act which I have read, as satisfying the court that this provides reasonable security for the payment of not less than 7s. 6d. in the pound? In my opinion, it is almost ludicrous to treat this matter seriously, or to say that this is in any way from any point of view a reasonable security for the payment of 7s. 6d. in the pound.

There are two authorities to which I think I ought to refer. LORD ESHER, M.R., in the first case which came after the Act of 1890, Re Paine, Ex parte Paine (1) says this ([1891] W.N. at p. 208):

> "The appellants were bound to show that the proposed scheme did provide 'reasonable security for the payment of not less than 7s. 6d. in the pound.' This did not mean payment at a distant time, such as a year hence. It meant reasonable security for the payment now or within a short time."

If that is the law, speaking for myself with great respect to the learned registrar, it is impossible to say that a security on an undivided interest in property like this, which has yielded nothing for years, and which exists in the State of Wyoming in America, can be a reasonable security within the meaning of the Act. I think that the subsequent case, and the next in point of time of Re Burr, Ex parte Board of Trade (2) is an extremely important case, because it seems to me to lay down the principles which ought to be followed. FRY, L.J., said ([1892] 2 Q.B. at pp. 476, 477):

> "There are two questions to be considered in the present case. First, is the court bound to refuse to approve the scheme? In my opinion, it is bound to refuse, because the condition which sub-s. 9 imposes has not been satisfied. It has not, in my opinion, been proved that this scheme provides reasonable security for the payment of 7s. 6d. in the pound. . . . I am of opinion that it is not proved that the scheme will provide reasonable security for the payment of 7s. 6d. in the pound, and that, consequently, it is being admitted that some of the facts exist which are mentioned in s. 8, and which would require the court, if the debtor were adjudged bankrupt, to refuse, suspend, or attach conditions to his discharge, the court is bound to refuse to approve the scheme."

In my opinion, upon that ground, not one depending upon time but upon the substance of the scheme, I think that this court is bound to refuse to sanction the scheme.

It is said that in Re Bottomley, Ex parte Bottomley (3), VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., made some observations, the tendency of which was to say that the question was very much one for the creditors to determine, that they understand the position better, and that the court ought to be slow to interfere with their view, and further with the latter part I entirely agree—it does not mean an absolutely good security, but it must be a reasonable security under which money could probably be recovered. I am sure I am never likely, particularly in bankruptcy matters, to speak otherwise than with the greatest possible respect of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., but I do not think that it is fair to take the language which he uses as in any way intending to depart from what FRY, L.J., said in the prior case, which was not cited to him in that case, or to treat that decision as in any way qualifying that which seems to me to be the necessary consequence of the language. For these reasons I think that the court is bound, notwithstanding that the creditors have approved, to refuse to sanction this scheme of composition, and that this appeal must be allowed.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It not being disputed that facts have been proved within the meaning of sub-s. 9 of s. 3 of the Act of 1890, that not being a matter in dispute, the subsection provides that the court shall refuse to approve the proposal—that is, a proposed scheme—unless it provides reasonable security for the payment of not less than 7s. 6d. in the pound on all the unsecured debts provable against the debtor's estate. Unless that condition precedent is complied with, the court is bound to refuse its approval of the proposal. It must be remembered that when a debtor intends to make a proposal, he arranges his scheme, a meeting of creditors is first held, and it is after the scheme has been before the creditors, and after the proposal has been accepted by the statutory majority of creditors, that is to say, a majority of three-fourths in number, and it is only after that step has been taken that the scheme comes before the court. Then, if the court is satisfied that the scheme does not provide reasonable security for the payment, it is bound to refuse its sanction. It seems to me that it cannot be contended that it is sufficient to say that the creditors have approved the scheme. That is so in every case where the scheme comes before the court. It is after the approval of the creditors that the court has to decide whether it will or will not approve the scheme.

In the present case is there reasonable security for the payment of 7s. 6d. in the pound? The debtor, we are told, is some sixty-four years of age, and holds an official position. The sum that is required to be provided for the composition is between £10,000 and £11,000. Of his own resources he is only able to offer to set aside £600 a year. That, of course, would go no way at all, having regard to his age and the time that would be required for the payment of the sum of about £10,500; that will go no way at all to provide this composition. Then all else that is offered is that his brother has received from the debtor for value, which it is said comes to about £2,000, an assignment of an interest which the debtor has. The debtor's interest is not the subject of any contract in writing, so far as appears before us, but it is manifested by a letter written by Henry Walter, the assignor, to the debtor's brother so recently as June 9, 1913. Until then it does not appear that there was any contract in writing, setting out what the interest was but under that letter dated June 9, 1913, Henry Walter, being interested in certain oil property, declares that so long ago as 1907 it was agreed that the debtor was to have a clear 10 per cent. of the net proceeds of all dealings with certain oil property, 10 per cent. of the net proceeds of all dealings therewith accruing to Henry Walter, his assignees or nominees, such properties including three specified properties, No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3. Although that letter is dated in 1913, the interest is stated to have been made over or promised—perhaps that is the more accurate word—to the debtor in 1907. On Jan. 6, 1908, the debtor agreed to assign, or did assign, whatever interest he had to his brother, and it does not appear that since Jan. 6, 1908, or at any time the brother or the debtor himself has ever received any cash whatever in respect of these interests, so that upwards of six years have gone by and no cash whatever has been received. So far as I gather, nothing whatever has been received by the brother except £1,500 debentures of a company called Fremont, Ltd. As I gather, the company was originally intended to acquire the properties mentioned, numbers 1 and 2, in the letter of June 9, 1913. Property No. 1 is freehold of 560 acres. I gather that property

No. 2 is leasehold. The interest of Walter in the property No. 1 has been the subject of extensive foreclosure proceedings, and apparently it now stands in this way, that there is a sum of £118,000 claimed to be due to mortgagees; there has been a foreclosure; the foreclosure has been re-opened; and now there are further proceedings pending in America with regard to that. I gather further that it was intended that this Fremont, Ltd., was to acquire the property, but under a note placed upon each of the three balance-sheets that appear on the file of the proceedings in that company, it is stated that the option over the freehold property has expired, and therefore it is only the leasehold interest that remains in Fremont, Ltd. With regard, therefore, to the property No. 1 in the schedule it would appear that it is an interest which is the subject of protracted litigation, which is heavily mortgaged, and in respect of which nothing has yet been received, and there is no definite evidence of anything being likely to be received either by the debtor's brother or anyone claiming through him.

With regard to the second property, the 1,500 acres surrounding the freeholds, that interest, whatever it is, appears to be vested in the company called Fremont, Ltd. That company's file has been produced. There are three balance-sheets, or rather there is upon the file a statement in the form of a balance-sheet as of June 30, 1911, filed with the summary of share capital made up to Nov. 13, 1911. When the next summary of share capital comes to be made up in 1912 there is no further summary in the form of a balance-sheet, but the form is filled up by the old summary being copied again, as if it was applicable at that date. When the next year comes to be dealt with there is a summary of the share capital and shares of Oct. 27, 1913, and there is exactly the same state of things. There is no statement, there is no balance-sheet of what the financial position of the company is, but only the old document made up to June 13, 1911, copied again. It does not appear that any interest has been paid on the debentures; we are left in the dark as to that, but we do know that there was a recent issue in December, 1913, of 1,800 debentures which could only be placed, or, in any case, were placed, at 20 per cent. discount. With regard to the third interest, the freehold square mile at Conan Creek, this property is made over to a company called the New Canadian Co., and we have no further details with regard to it, and nothing to show that a penny is ever likely to result from it.

I cannot, in the face of these facts, regard but as wild and extravagant the affidavit of Charles Walter which was relied upon in part by the debtor. Mr. Charles Walter says that he possesses large interests in the oil property and knows these properties. In para. 3 he says:

> "From my intimate knowledge of the oil properties referred to in the said scheme, and my expert knowledge extending over upwards of twelve years of oil lands in general in the State of Wyoming, U.S.A., I am satisfied that the value of the total interest of Charles W. Webb will exceed £100,000."

The interest of Charles W. Webb is this one-tenth, which will exceed £100,000. It will be observed he does not state what the interest is or give any particulars of it, and he does not state what are the charges upon the interest. Assuming it were worth £100,000, if it were mortgaged to the extent of £118,000, the equity of redemption would be worthless. Such an affidavit as that is of no value whatever in arriving at what the interest is. Having followed as well as one is able to follow this agreement which is most difficult to understand—perhaps as the Master of the Rolls has said, impossible to be understood—of May 12, 1908, and the other documents relating to the case, I am not satisfied that there is any reasonable prospect of anything coming from any of these oil-bearing properties within a reasonable time, whatever extended view may be taken of what is a reasonable time. Having regard to the fact that during the last six years no cash has been received from them, I am not satisfied that these properties or the interest of the debtor in them, or the interest which the debtor's brother is prepared to make over, afford any reasonable prospect whatever of anything coming, and I am quite satisfied in the words of the statute that the interests do not provide any reasonable security for the payment of 7s. 6d. in the pound in the debts provable. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the order sanctioning the scheme is erroneous and should be discharged.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Rowlatt, J.), March 25, 30, 1915]

[Reported 85 L.J.K.B. 32; 113 L.T. 96]

Company—Debenture—Bearer debenture bonds—Claim by holder for unpaid interest—Failure to observe conditions precedent in trust deed—Previous action by debenture holder in Chancery Division—Right to recover payment.

The plaintiff was the holder of bearer debenture bonds issued by the defendant company in which it was provided that interest would be paid to the holder. The bonds were secured by and issued subject to the provisions contained in a trust deed. By cl. 28 of the trust deed the defendant company covenanted with the trustees to pay the interest, and cl. 36 provided that no holder of a bond could institute any suit or proceeding for the execution of the trusts without having first performed certain conditions. The plaintiff brought this action claiming payment of interest which had not been paid, but before he did so a debenture-holder's action had been successfully brought in the Chancery Division for the appointment of a receiver and consequential relief. The defendant company contended that the plaintiff's action should not succeed because he had not performed the conditions set out in cl. 36, and that the debenture-holder's action was a bar to these proceedings as the same relief which the plaintiff was claiming could have been given by the Chancery court.

Held: clause 36 did not apply as the plaintiff's action was not an action for the execution of the trust, but a claim for the payment of a debt; the debenture-holder's action was not a ground for staying the proceedings as that action had not been a claim for payments as in this case; and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed.

Action brought by the plaintiff on a covenant contained in bearer debenture bonds and attached coupons issued by the defendant company, for half a year's interest due on Jan. 1, 1915, the coupons having been presented for payment and the defendant company having refused to pay.

The defendant company was incorporated under the laws of the State of Maine, in the United States of America, and in the year 1909 they created, in accordance with the laws in force in that State, a series of first mortgage sixty-year gold bonds for £100 each payable to bearer, and carrying interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum. The bonds were secured by, and issued subject to the provisions contained in a trust deed, dated June 1, 1909, and made between the company of the first part, and the Empire Trust Co., a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, of the other part. The trust deed was duly executed in accordance with the laws in force in the State of Maine. By cl. 28 of the trust deed it was provided that:

> "The company will pay the principal moneys and interest secured by the bonds in accordance with the tenor thereof respectively, and shall observe and perform all the covenants and conditions contained therein or indorsed thereon respectively, which shall be binding upon the company and the holders of the bonds respectively, and by all persons claiming through or under them respectively."

By cl. 36 it was provided that:

> "The trustee shall not be bound to take any step to enforce the perfomance of any of the covenants on the part of the company in these presents contained . . . unless when required to do so in writing by the holder or holders of one-fifth part in value of the bonds for the time being outstanding or by an extraordinary resolution of the bondholders . . . and then only after it shall have been indemnified to its satisfaction against all actions, proceedings, claims, and demands, to which it may render itself liable, and all costs, charges, damages, and expenses, which it may incur by so doing, and it is hereby declared and agreed that no holder of bonds shall have the right to institute any suit or proceeding for foreclosure or sale under this mortgage, or for the execution of the trusts thereof, except upon and after the refusal or neglect of the trustees to proceed to act in the premises upon requisition and indemnification for the satisfaction of the trustees as aforesaid."

No requisition had been made to the trustee to proceed to act in accordance with the provisions of cl. 36. The defendant company was unable to pay its debts, and previously to the plaintiff bringing his action a debenture-holder's action was commenced in the Chancery Division of the High Court, of which the short title was Re Brazil Rail. Co., Smith v. The Co., and by an order of the court dated Jan. 13, 1915, William Cameron Forbes, who had been appointed receiver by the United States District Court at Portland, Maine, on Oct. 13, 1914, was appointed receiver of all the assets in England comprised in the trust deed. This action in the Chancery Division was still proceeding for the execution of the trusts of the trust deed, and for the enforcement of the mortgage thereby effected.

Mar. 30, 1915. ROWLATT, J., read the following judgment. This is an action brought upon a covenant contained in a debenture payable to bearer issued by the defendant company, which is incorporated in the State of Maine, and also upon a covenant contained in a coupon for interest attached to the debenture, the tenor of the covenant in each case being that the interest would be paid to the holder, and the statement of claim, therefore, claims the interest. What use the judgment will be to the plaintiff I do not know. All the assets, at any rate in this country and possibly everywhere, are included in the security of the debenture trust deed and are now under the protection of a receiver, who has been appointed in an action commenced by one of the debenture-holders. There is, however, some land somewhere expressed to be excepted from the security, and it is possible that a judgment may be of some use to the plaintiff in this country or in the country where the company is incorporated, or possibly in another country where it has property or where it desires to carry on business. But however that may be, it is not for me to consider whether the judgment will be of any use to the plaintiff. That is for him to consider.

A judgment upon a covenant which has been broken is not a discretionary remedy, it is a remedy to which the plaintiff is entitled if the covenant has been broken. Now, therefore, is there any legal or equitable defence to this action? In the first place, it is said that there is a defence owing to a provision of the trust deed, the terms and conditions of which were incorporated with the debenture. That provision, which is contained in cl. 36, is to the effect that no holder of a bond shall have the right to institute any suit or proceeding for the execution of the trusts of the trust deed without the performance of certain conditions precedent which in this case have not been performed. It was said that this action was a suit or proceeding for the execution of the trusts of the trust deed. All I can say to that is that it is not. An action against a covenantee for money which he covenants to pay is not an action for the execution of any trust at all. When the covenantee pays he is not performing a trust, he is simply paying a debt, and this action would have been just as competent if there never had been a trust deed, or if the trust deed had been released, which is legally, though not perhaps commercially, conceivable. But it is said with regard to this particular deed that an action of this kind is an action for the execution of the trusts within the meaning of the clause, where that phrase occurs, because by one of the clauses of the trust deed—namely, cl. 28—the company covenants with the trustees of the trust deed to pay this interest, and that therefore the bondholders are entitled under the trust deed to the benefit of an action of covenant. So they may be. They are entitled to the benefit of the covenant with the trustees, and that covenant might have been enforced in an action which might perhaps have been called an action for the execution of the trusts of the trust deed. It might have been possibly so called. But that would have been an action to which it would have been necessary for the trustees and for all the beneficiaries, actually or by representation, to be parties, and the demand in that action would have been that the trustees be compelled by the equitable powers of the court to put in suit their covenant against the company for the benefit of all their beneficiaries, and, of course, the covenant would have been enforced in that very action, but the plaintiffs would have been the trustees. That is a wholly different action from the present one. Besides the covenant with the trustees in the trust deed, there is the covenant, now sued on personally, with each holder of the debentures. This action is an action entirely different from the action which I have mentioned, and I find no ground whatever for saying that this can be possibly regarded in any sense as an action for the execution of the trusts of the deed.

There was another objection made to this action which was that another debenture holder had commenced an action in the Chancery Division and had obtained an order for the appointment of a receiver. There is nothing in that analogous to the liquidation of the company. There is no question of winding-up, of course, but there is nothing in the procedure which I have mentioned analogous to an order for the administration of the assets of a debtor, such as the decree which is made in a creditor's action for the administration of the estate of a deceased person, whereby the court takes into its own possession and control all the assets of the debtor and necessarily restrains any individual action at common law. There is nothing of that kind in the debenture-holder's action, which is merely an action to have a receiver, and in which a receiver has been appointed. But it was further said that that action was an action including a claim for the same relief as is now claimed in this action; in other words, that it was an action leading to a personal judgment on behalf of the bond-holders against this company, and if that was so, though possibly it would not be a defence to the action—judgment not having been recovered—it would be a ground for staying it. It was also contended that a debenture-holder's action is just the same as a mortgagee's action for foreclosure, which includes, as has been well settled by several decisions which I need not refer to, a claim for a personal judgment for the interest right up to the date of the foreclosure, and that this action therefore includes such a claim. I have looked at the writ, which was put in, in the debenture-holder's action, and it is only a claim for the appointment of a receiver and consequential relief. It does not purport to be a claim for payment. But it was urged that I ought so to regard it and reference was made to Hope v. Croydon and Norwood Tramways Co. (1), where, in an action in which the plaintiff was a debenture-holder, NORTH, J., made a declaration that the debenture-holders, as a whole, were entitled to stand in the position of judgment creditors for the total amount of the debentures issued, and it is said that that showed that this debenture-holder's action was an action really including a claim for the same relief as is sought in this action. The reason why I did not give judgment when the case was heard was not because I had any doubt as to what my decision ought to be, but because I wanted just to look and see what that action before NORTH, J., really claimed, and I sent for the writ, and I found that it was not an action for a receiver. I do not know that a receiver was even claimed, but at any rate it was an action in which the first claim on the writ was for payment, and, therefore, an action on the covenant. The debenture-holder's action now pending in the Chancery Division is nothing of the kind; there is no claim for payment, and, therefore, that is a sufficient answer to the defendant's contention. There may be other answers, but I need not refer to them. It is sufficient to say that the pending debenture-holder's action is not an action which covers the same ground as, and therefore is no impediment whatever to the prosecution of, this action in which I now give judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed with costs.

Re MARIETTE. MARIETTE v. ALDENHAM SCHOOL GOVERNING BODY

Charity—Education—Games—Bequest to governors of school for building fives courts—Gift to headmaster to provide prizes in school athletics—Development of body by organised games part of education.

By his will a testator bequeathed £1,000 to the governing body of Aldenham School "for the purpose of building Eton fives courts or squash racket courts or for some similar purpose." The testator also bequeathed £100 to the headmaster for the time being of the school on trust to use the interest "to provide a prize for some event in the school athletic sports every year." Aldenham School was originally founded as a free grammar school. It was conceded that it was a charity within the statute of Elizabeth. There were 208 boys at the school all of whom except four were boarders. On an originating summons to determine if the gifts were valid charitable legacies,

Held: in considering whether or not a gift was charitable regard must be paid to the character and objects of the charity intended to benefit as well as to the character of the gift itself; in the present case the object of the charity was education in its widest sense which included development of the body, by organised games, as well as development of the mind: accordingly, both gifts were to a charity for purposes included in the objects of that charity, and were, therefore, valid charitable legacies.

Adjourned Summons by executors to determine whether legacies were valid.

By his will, dated Dec. 2, 1908, Edgar Henry Mariette, of Aldenham School, Elstree, in the county of Hertford, after appointing his two brothers executors and trustees, bequeathed the several pecuniary and specific legacies set out in the

A schedule to the will and then devised and bequeathed all his real estate and the residue of his personal estate not otherwise disposed of to his trustees on the trusts declared in the will. By the schedule, which was duly signed and witnessed, the testator bequeathed the following three legacies:

"£1,000 to the governing body of Aldenham School for the purpose of building Eton fives courts or squash racket courts or for some similar purpose B that shall be decided upon by a majority of the house masters at the time of my death.

"£100 to the head master for the time being of Aldenham School upon trust to use the interest for a prize in books to be given every year for classics in the sixth form.

"£100 to the head master for the time being of Aldenham School upon C trust to use the interest to provide a prize for some event in the school athletic sports every year, to be agreed upon by the Committee of the athletic sports."

The testator died on June 14, 1914, and his will was duly proved on Aug. 1, 1914.

The testator had been a master at Aldenham School for more than twenty-four D years. Aldenham School formed part of a charity founded by Richard Platt, a brewer of London, under letters patent granted by Queen Elizabeth I on Feb. 18, 1596. The charity was for the foundation of a school and almshouses on land in the parish of Aldenham belonging to Richard Platt, and Aldenham School was founded as a free grammar school in 1597. Under a scheme dated May 13, 1875, made by the Charity Commissioners, Aldenham School was established as E a grammar school for home boarders and school boarders and opened to all boys of good character and bodily health between the ages of ten and eighteen. The scheme provided that management of the income of the charitable trust should be vested in the Brewers' Company but that the management of Aldenham School should be vested in a governing body of fifteen persons. By the first clause of the scheme the object of the charity was to supply sound practical and liberal F education in accordance with the doctrines of the Church of England for boys and girls by means of schools in the parish of Aldenham, and to provide for the relief of poor people. By cl. 51 of the scheme the governors had power to assign out of the income of the trust a sum for proper plant or apparatus for carrying on the instruction given in Aldenham School, for giving prizes or rewards for meritorious scholars, for aiding the games of scholars, and generally for pro- G moting the spirit and the efficiency of the school. The governors were also empowered to enlarge and improve the school buildings and playgrounds. By cl. 97 the governors might receive additional donations or endowments for the general purposes of the trusts and might receive donations or endowments for any special objects directed by the donors provided that the objects were certified by the Charity Commissioners to be for the general benefit of the trust, and in the case H of donations for educational purposes, were not calculated to give privileges to any scholar without regard to merit or otherwise inconsistent with or calculated to impede the working of the scheme. There were 208 boys at the school, all but four being boarders. The Brewers' Company contributed £2,500 each year for carrying on the school out of the general funds at their disposal.

During recent years considerable sums had been given to the school to improve I its general efficiency by providing extra facilities for outdoor games and different kinds of prizes. In particular large sums had been given for the erection of a swimming-bath and fives courts. The governors had from time to time expended considerable sums upon playgrounds and buildings for athletic purposes, and had for some time past given prizes for classics and athletic sports out of their income as part of the general purposes of the school.

The head master stated in an affidavit that it had always been the practice of the school to encourage the usual games, among which fives had proved very popular; that it had been found that this course promoted the general efficiency of the school, and that the present number of fives courts was insufficient for the number of boys who wished to play the game, which could be played at a time of year when there were no other suitable games; and that, in his opinion, to provide extra fives courts was calculated to maintain the utility of the school and to promote its general educational efficiency. It was proposed to expend the legacy of £1,000 in the erection of four additional covered Eton fives courts, or at least six open courts on a site adjacent to the existing fives courts, and on land forming part of the property of the trust. The head master was of opinion that the existence of prizes for classics and for events in the school athletic sports was desirable, as they were calculated to encourage a healthy spirit of rivalry among the boys, and thereby to promote the general well-being of the school.

By orders in council, made pursuant to the Board of Education Act, 1899, the powers of the Charity Commissioners in respect of endowed schools were transferred to the Board of Education. By a certificate dated June 14, 1915, the Board of Education certified that the special object directed by the testator in his bequest of the £1,000 was for the general benefit of the school, and not calculated to give privileges to any scholar without regard to merit, and was not otherwise inconsistent with or calculated to impede the due working of the provisions of the scheme regulating the foundation. By a letter to the governors, dated May 17, 1915, the Board of Education stated that they did not consider that the two legacies of £100 each for prizes came within the provisions of the scheme.

The residuary legatees other than Frank Auguste Mariette, one of the executors and trustees of the will, objected to the payment of the three legacies on the ground that they constituted a perpetuity and were not valid charitable legacies.

The executors issued an originating summons, to which the governing body of Aldenham School, the chairman of the governing body, the head master, and Richard Lionel Mariette, one of the residuary legatees, were defendants, asking whether the three legacies were respectively valid, and, if so, to whom payment thereof respectively should be made, and that Richard Lionel Mariette should be appointed to represent the residuary legatees, all of whom, except Frank Auguste Mariette, were resident abroad.

F. E. Farrer for T. Pakenham Law, serving with His Majesty's forces, for the executors.

Maugham, K.C., and J. F. W. Galbraith for the governing body of the school, their chairman, and the head master. It makes no difference that a school is endowed. All schools fall within the statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz. 1, c. 4) and are charities. Any gift to a school for its educational purposes is a charitable gift. There is no question that the legacy for prizes for classics is valid. Classics are obviously learning and fall within the statute of Elizabeth. As regards the other legacies, it is a fallacy to suggest that schools exist only to teach Latin and Greek. They exist for education in its widest sense, and every school must provide for recreation and games. The provision of fives courts must benefit a school. If the bequest aids in a particular way the carrying out of the objects of the charity it is a valid bequest. Re Nottage, Jones v. Palmer will no doubt be cited against us, but there were none of the elements of a charitable bequest. If the cup in that case had been given for competition among the seamen of the Royal Navy no doubt the decision would have been different. We submit that the legacy of £1,000 is a good charitable legacy as given for one of the proper objects of the school, and that the legacy of £100 for prizes for athletic sports stands on the same footing, though the hand to distribute is that of the head master and not of the governing body.

Clayton, K.C., and W. A. Peck for the residuary legatees other than the executor. We have no doubt an invidious task in disputing bequests for purposes with which everyone will sympathise, but we submit that the legacies of £1,000 and £100 for athletic prizes tend to a perpetuity and are not for charitable purposes.

A and therefore fail. We cannot dispute that the £100 legacy for prizes for classics is valid. We concede that the school is a charity and if the legacies were for the general purposes of the school they would be good charitable legacies. If you give to an institution for the blind the gift is obviously for the benefit of the blind and so a general gift to a school would be for the purposes of learning. But the gift to a charitable institution may be for purposes not essential to the purposes
B of the institution and then it ceases to be charitable. You must not look at the medium but at the destination of the gift. The word charity does not include purposes of philanthropy. It applies to a school by analogy from the words used in the statute of Elizabeth. Whether a gift is a good charitable gift or not depends upon whether its object is per se charitable. Here the testator has picked out a particular element which is not charitable. If he had given the
C legacy of £1,000 to the general purposes of the school the governing body could have applied it as they thought fit, and even to the object he has named, but still it would have been charitable. Re Nottage, Jones v. Palmer clearly shows that such a bequest is void, and that sport though of great utility is not charitable. So exercise though desirable is not charitable. Re Good, Harington v. Watts and Re Donald, Moore v. Somerset are, we submit, decided as falling within the D words in the statute of Elizabeth "setting up of soldiers." Schools are not for the setting up of boys, but for instruction in learning, and except for that purpose do not fall within the statute. If the bequest did not tend to perpetuity there would be no question, but here if it is not charitable it is void for perpetuity. The legacy of £100 for athletic prizes is void on the same principle.

E EVE, J.—The admonition with which counsel for the residuary legatees commenced his argument is by no means to be disregarded. One must be careful not to allow one's natural inclination to give effect to a gift of this sort to lead one to disregard well-established principles. The gift in question is a gift by a gentleman who had served the school for twenty-four years as an assistant master and who had obviously come to entertain for it in a marked degree that affection
F which most men feel for the old school, and which would certainly tend to increase in the case of a man who had given the best part of his life to its services. The amount is to be laid out in the erection of additional fives courts at the school, and the question is whether it is a gift which in law can be supported or whether it is void as not being charitable and tending to a perpetuity.

It is a gift to an institution which is admittedly a charity within the statute
G of Elizabeth, but I accede to the argument of the residuary legatees that it is quite possible that a gift to a charity may be of such a character as not to be in itself a charitable gift. On the other hand, I think in considering whether a gift is charitable or not one must not confine oneself to the character of the gift itself, but must pay regard also to the character and objects of the charity, who are the intended recipients of the gift.

H The object of this charity is the education, in the widest sense, of boys and young men between the ages of ten and nineteen years. No one of sense could be found to suggest that between these ages any boy can be properly educated unless at least as much attention is given to the development of his body as is given to the development of his mind. This involves periods of relaxation and leisure, and no one with experience of youth will deny that, unless these periods are
I usefully occupied, the truth of the old saying that there is a certain individual always ready to find mischief for idle hands will soon be demonstrated. It is necessary, therefore, in any satisfactory system of education to provide for both mental and bodily occupation; mental occupation by means of the classics and those other less inviting studies to which a portion of the day is devoted, and bodily occupation by means of regular and organised games. To leave 200 boys at large and to their own devices during their leisure hours would be to court catastrophe; it would not be educating them, but would probably result in their relapsing quickly into something approaching barbarism. For these reasons I think that it is essential that in a school of learning of this description, a school receiving and retaining as boarders boys of these ages, there should be organised games as part of the daily routine, and I do not see how the other part of the education can be carried on successfully without them. It is not disputed that if this sum—I am dealing now with the £1,000 legacy—had been left to the charity for the general purposes of the charity, it might have been applied to any of the purposes to which moneys coming to the hands of the governing body are in fact applied; it might have been expended in the repair of or additions to the class rooms, laboratory, and other buildings of that sort; or it might equally, as it seems to me, have been applied to the repair or enlargement of the swimming bath, the gymnasium, the fives courts, or other buildings employed in those branches of education which have exclusively to do with the bodily welfare of the students. I cannot in these circumstances bring myself to think, because the testator has indicated his intention that in the hands of the charity the money shall be used for the particular purposes stated in his will, that the gift is thereby vitiated. On the contrary, I think that the gift is a good charitable gift. It is a gift to a charity for purposes which seem to me to be included in the objects of the charity.

The same reasoning applies to the £100 legacy. It is given not to the charity, but to the head master; but it is given for a purpose which, though not quite so specific as the purpose for which the £1,000 is given, is, in my opinion, within the objects of the charity—that is to say, the advancement of that part of the educational work of the charity which has to do with the bodily and physical development of the students. I think that both legacies are valid charitable legacies, and I so hold. I have said nothing about the £100 legacy for a classical prize; that is clearly good, and the contrary has not really been argued.

Demurrer to petition of right.

In 1899, the suppliant retired from the army with the rank of lieutenant colonel, and became entitled to military pay at the rate £450 per annum. In 1900, he was appointed Chief Inspecting Officer of Railways. Under the Superannuation Act, 1887, he received as Chief Inspector the full amount of salary attached to that post—viz., £1,400 per annum, less his non-effective pay of £450. On his retirement in 1913 the suppliant received a pension calculated on £950, being the difference between the £1,400 and the £450, and petitioned that the pension should have been calculated on his full salary of £1,400 without deduction, and that the arrears due on that basis should be paid to him.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Stanley Buckmaster, K.C.) (G. A. H. Branson with him) for the Crown.—The petition is brought by a civil servant in respect of superannuation allowance, and such a matter cannot be entertained by the courts. The matter is governed by the Superannuation Acts, 1834 and 1859. The former statute establishes the scale of allowances in regard to pensions payable to civil servants, and by s. 30 provides that nothing in that Act shall give any person an absolute right to compensation for past services or to any superannuation or retiring allowance under the Act. The Act of 1859, by s. 2, amends the provisions relating to pensions, and enacts, "provided always that if any question should arise in any department of the public service as to the claim of any person or class of persons for superannuation under this clause it shall be referred to the Commissioners of the Treasury, whose decision shall be final." The same statute provides by s. 18 that that Act is to be read with the Act of 1834. It has been clearly held that a civil servant has no right to take proceedings in respect of a superannuation allowance.

LUSH, J.—The Superannuation Acts, 1834 and 1859, must be looked at to see whether they give to a person placed in the position of the suppliant the right to come to the court in a case such as the present. It appears to me clear, on looking at s. 30 of the earlier Act, that the legislature, although apparently conferring on certain persons the right, in certain circumstances, to receive a superannuation allowance, safeguards the position by enacting that the words which might be thought to confer a legal right shall not in fact be treated as doing so. The method of calculation of pensions is altered by the Act of 1859, which, in s. 2, contains a proviso that all disputes in relation to pensions shall be referred to the Commissioners of the Treasury, whose decision is to be final. I have been asked by the suppliant to say that the proviso only means that, if the question of the right of a person or a class of persons to receive pensions should arise, that question should be referred to the Treasury and that the proviso must be limited in that way. I can see no ground for doing so. It appears to me that the proviso to s. 2 follows the same line of reasoning as s. 30 of the Act of 1834, and that it is intended by it again to make it clear to those who claim to be entitled to pensions that their right is not a legal right, and that, if any question arises, either as to their status or to the amount of their pension, or any question touching their claim, it shall be referred to the Treasury, whose decision is to be final. Almost precisely the same question has arisen in Cooper v. R. (1), in which the court had to consider these same Acts. It was there held that s. 30 did not relate only to the question whether the suppliant was entitled to compensation at all, but covered the whole question of the calculation of the amount as well. In my opinion, the suppliant is not entitled to come to the court, either in regard to his right to a pension or the method in which the amount is to be arrived at. The petition will be dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Swinfen Eady and Pickford, L.JJ.), July 22, 30, 1914]

Sale of Land—Incumbrance—Light—Agreement by vendor to enjoy light under neighbour's licence—Obligation to brick up windows on termination of licence—Misdescription—Failure to disclose windows not ancient lights.

By an agreement contained in a lease dated Nov. 21, 1900, the defendant agreed to purchase, within one year of the death of the lessor, which took place on Oct. 7, 1912, premises of which he was in occupation as a lessee. Part of the premises was a warehouse in the east and west walls of which were windows which were not ancient lights, and in 1890 the lessor had entered into agreements with his neighbours on both sides by each of which he agreed that his enjoyment of the windows referred to in the agreement should be by licence granted by the neighbour in question, that the windows should not open outwards and should be glazed with opaque glass, and that within one month after the determination of the licence he would fill up the windows. It was admitted that the light through the windows was material to the premises. No notice of these agreements was given to the defendant, and when the lessor's personal representatives, as vendors, sought to enforce the contract of sale he objected to the title. In an action by the personal representatives for specific performance, Held: the fact that none of the windows in question was an ancient light would not be an objection to title or description in the absence of an express representation or warranty on the subject, of which there was none; the agreements to enjoy the light through the windows by licence of the neighbours were not binding on a purchaser save so far as he chose to continue to enjoy light by virtue of the agreements, whereas he could denounce them at any time, and under the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay (1) (1848) 2 Ph. 774, he could not be called on to do anything involving the expenditure of money, e.g., to brick up the windows; accordingly, the existence of the agreements did not create an incumbrance, there was no need to put it on the abstract, and the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed.

Appeal by the vendor from a decision of ASTBURY, J., in an action for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land.

Upjohn, K.C., and J. G. Wood for the vendor.

Younger, K.C., and Sheldon for the purchaser.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30, 1914. The following judgments were read.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is an action for specific performance of a contract to purchase some houses at Brighton. The purchaser has objected to the title, and ASTBURY, J., has allowed the objection and dismissed the action with costs. The contract to purchase is contained in a lease dated Nov. 21, 1900, under which in an event which has happened, the defendant agreed to purchase the demised property for £16,875. The property is described as messuages, shops, warehouse, showrooms, buildings and premises delineated on a plan. There is no express mention of windows. In my opinion, there is no warranty in such a contract that the de facto windows are ancient lights. Greenhalgh v. Brindley (2) is a direct authority on this point, and I desire fully to adopt FARWELL, J.'s judgment—a judgment based upon general principles and not upon the facts of that particular case.

Does a consent in writing which prevents the statutory period of prescription from beginning to run create an encumbrance on the property? I think not. FARWELL, J.'s judgment is again a distinct authority ([1901] 2 Ch. at p. 328):

"The vendor does not fail to possess the fee simple free from encumbrances of a house because he has not got the easement of light over the adjoining property, nor because the time necessary for acquiring that easement has not commenced to run."

If the consent in writing does not create an encumbrance, there is no obligation to put it on the abstract.

The only objection taken before us is based upon an agreement dated in 1890 between adjoining owners named Crunden and Joseph Smith, a predecessor in title of the defendant. The agreement is positive in form, not negative. A purchaser from Smith would not be under any liability to perform the obligations entered into by Smith. He could not, under the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay (1) be called upon to do anything involving the expenditure of money. The agreement can be denounced at any time by Smith or persons claiming under him, and the statute which had no operation during the continuance of the agreement would immediately begin to run. But it is said that Bewley v. Atkinson (3) is inconsistent with this view. I think a careful examination of that case will show that the argument has no foundation. It was an action to restrain the owner of the servient tenement from blocking up windows which had been enjoyed since 1814. The defence was that the windows had been opened and allowed to remain open under the written licence, consent, or agreement of the defendant's predecessor in 1814. Sixpence a year was paid up to 1859, but no longer. The agreement had never been denounced. The decision was that notwithstanding the cessation of payment of 6d. a year in 1859, the agreement was, under s. 3 of the Prescription Act, 1832, sufficient to prevent the acquisition of an indefeasible title to the light. That is the only point which was decided. The case has been often cited—by FARWELL, J., among others—but never for the purpose of establishing that the agreement imposed obligations upon the purchaser. It was a weapon of defence, not of offence. Any expressions which, apart from the context, might be held to have a larger meaning, cannot properly be so regarded. It is beyond controversy that the purchaser could not be liable to pay the 6d. a year or spend money in blocking up the windows.

It was further urged that the agreement, though affirmative in form, implied a negative. This, however, is not correct, except in the sense that every agreement to do A. implies an agreement not to do B., and this court has repeatedly held that such an implied negative is not sufficient to bring a case within Tulk v. Moxhay (1). It was further urged that the words at the end of cl. 4 of the agreement gave a right of entry, and, therefore, an interest in the land. I think it is a mere licence, but if it is more, it seems to be void as a perpetuity. Lastly, it was urged that the title is too doubtful to be forced upon a purchaser. The courts have in modern times not listened with favour to such a defence. It is the duty of the court, unless in very exceptional circumstances, to decide the rights between the vendor and the purchaser even though a third person not a party to the action will not be bound by the decision. For these reasons I think the appeal must be allowed. The usual decree for specific performance must be made, and the defendant must pay the costs here and below.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—The plaintiffs claim specific performance of an agreement by the defendant to purchase certain shops, warehouses, and premises at Brighton for £16,875. The agreement is contained in a lease dated Nov. 21, 1910, under which the purchaser is in possession. He agreed to purchase within one year from the death of Joseph Smith, which happened on Oct. 7, 1912. The premises are partly freehold and partly leasehold. The defendant raises an objection to title or, as he puts it, to subject-matter.

The premises agreed to be sold include a warehouse at the rear. In the east wall of this warehouse there are three ancient windows or lights on the ground floor, and there are five windows on the first floor of which two only are ancient and the remaining three are the subject of an agreement dated Mar. 31, 1890, entered into between Joseph Smith, the plaintiffs' testator, and Henry John

A Infield, the owner of the adjoining premises. In the west wall of the warehouse there are two windows, neither of which is ancient, and they are the subject of an agreement of the same date and to the same effect as the last-mentioned agreement, but made between Joseph Smith and Mrs. Crundon and others, owners of the adjoining premises on the west side. The defendant objects to complete the purchase alleging that the rights which exist in the adjoining owners by reason B of these agreements constitute a material misdescription of the premises of such a character as to relieve the defendant from his obligations under the contract for sale.

The fact that none of the five windows in question (three in the east wall and two in the west wall) is ancient would not alone be an objection to title or description, in the absence of any express representation or warranty on the subject. In C Greenhalgh v. Brindley (2), FARWELL, J., said ([1901] 2 Ch. at p. 328):

> "But a contract for the sale of a house with windows looking over the land of a third person implies no representation or warranty that the windows are entitled to the access of light over that land."

In my opinion, this accurately states the law.

D It was then urged that the agreements would be binding upon the defendant if he were to complete his purchase as he now has notice of them, and that he would be prejudiced thereby. In my opinion, the agreements will only be binding upon the defendant in the sense and to the extent that, so long as he enjoys unobstructed the access of light through the five windows in question under and by virtue of the agreements, it will be enjoyed by consent or agreement expressly E made or given for that purpose by writing within s. 3 of the Prescription Act, 1832, and the period for acquiring a statutory right to light will not have begun to run. In no other sense will the agreements be binding upon the purchaser. The agreements contain provisions that, during the continuance thereof, the windows shall at all times be kept glazed with opaque glass; and that, after receipt of notice determining the licence, Joseph Smith, his heirs, or assigns will remove the F windows and fill up the openings with like material as the wall—that is, with brick. These agreements to do something on the land involving the expenditure of money will not be binding on the purchaser: Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society (4), Austerberry v. Oldham Corpn. (5).

It was also contended that another clause in the agreements would remain in force and bind the purchaser after conveyance, viz., the clause that the grantors of G the licence, and all persons deriving title under them, might at any time thereafter at the expense of Joseph Smith, his heirs, or assigns enter upon the premises, remove the windows, and fill up the openings, in default of Smith doing so. In my opinion, this clause is a mere licence, passing no interest and not binding upon the purchaser after conveyance: Thomas v. Sorrell (6), Wallis v. Harrison (7). If it amounted to an easement, which, in my judgment, it does not, it would be H void, under the rule against perpetuities: LEWIS ON PERPETUITIES, pp. 619, 620; London and South Western Rail. Co. v. Gomm (8).

The purchaser may, after conveyance, determine the agreement by giving notice to the adjoining owners that he will not be bound by its provisions, and after that date he may commence to enjoy the access of light as of right, and not by consent or agreement. Bewley v. Atkinson (3) is important on this point. The short facts I were that when Kirkbride, in 1814, put out four new windows he signed a document that they were put out and remained upon the leave of Spencer, his adjoining neighbour, and that he would, upon the request of Spencer at any time thereafter, block up the same, and in the meantime and until such request would pay 6*d.* a year. The rent was paid down to 1859. In 1865 the plaintiff's predecessor bought Kirkbride's house with notice of the document. In 1877 Spencer's successor required the windows to be blocked up, and in default of this being done built on his own land a wall obstructing the access of light to the windows. The plaintiff brought the action to obtain a mandatory injunction to have the wall pulled down, but the action was dismissed by HALL, V.C., and by the Court of Appeal. The Vice-Chancellor held that the document was binding upon Kirkbride's alienee, but that it might be brought to an end by a refusal to pay rent, by a refusal to perform the obligation and otherwise. I understand the Vice-Chancellor to mean that the agreement was binding on Kirkbride's alienee in the sense that, so long as he enjoyed the access of light under the agreement, there was a consent or agreement which would prevent the statutory easement from being acquired. The Vice-Chancellor did not mean that the agreement was binding on the alienee in the sense that he could have been compelled to pay the rent of 6d. or to block up his own windows. On the contrary, he treats the refusal by the alienee to pay the rent or to perform the obligation as terminating the agreement and thereby enabling the adjoining owner, if he pleased, to obstruct the light, but not as giving the adjoining owner any cause of action against the alienee for the rent or for the breach of the agreement. The same opinion is expressed by the Court of Appeal. JAMES, L.J., pointed out that a simple agreement, such as he suggested, would be binding in equity on the owner of the house with the new windows, and upon all persons who took the ownership of that estate with notice. But he then proceeds to point out the sense in which alone such an agreement would be binding on a new owner of the estate. He could not claim an indefeasible right to light, while enjoying it only under the agreement, with the equitable obligation to block up when called upon. JAMES, L.J., did not (in my opinion) mean that the equitable obligation to block up was one which a court of equity would enforce against a new owner of the estate, but only that, in such circumstances, the new owner had no cause of complaint when his neighbour obstructed the light, and this upon the ground that the new owner had not, under the circumstances, acquired any easement of light. In Greenhalgh v. Brindley (2), FARWELL, J., also points out that a purchaser may put an end to an agreement about windows by repudiating it and refusing to enjoy any light by virtue of it. Upon his so doing, the twenty years under s. 3 of the Prescription Act, 1832, will begin to run.

It was then urged by the defendant that the position of a purchaser with regard to these windows would be one of some doubt, and that the title ought not to be forced upon him. But the rule of the court is that enunciated by JAMES, L.J., when delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Alexander v. Mills (9) (6 Ch. App. at pp. 131, 132):

> "As a general and almost universal rule, the court is bound as much between vendor and purchaser as in every other case, to ascertain and determine, as it best may what the law is, and to take that to be the law which it has so ascertained and determined."

In my opinion, the position of the purchaser, after completion, with regard to these five new windows will not be one of any doubt. These are not ancient lights, and the twenty years will not begin to run so long as the purchaser enjoys the light under the agreement. But he may repudiate the agreement or his neighbour may determine it, in which case the right to obstruct light will arise. The purchaser, however, cannot be compelled to block up the windows or to glaze with opaque glass or to do any other act occasioning any expenditure of money. Nor can the purchaser be prevented from keeping open these windows or opening any new ones, subject only to the right of his neighbour to obstruct the light to any windows not ancient. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed, and judgment given for specific performance.

PICKFORD, L.J. This was an action for specific performance in which the purchaser objected to accept the vendors' title because of agreements which were made with regard to some windows in the premises agreed to be sold.

The plaintiffs' predecessor in title had entered into two agreements in identical terms with the owners of adjoining premises on the east and west by which he

A agreed that the enjoyment of the user of the windows should be by licence, that the windows should not open outwards and should be glazed with opaque glass, and that the plaintiffs' predecessor in title, his heirs or assigns would within one month after the determination of the licence remove the windows and fill up the openings with like materials as the wall in which they were, and that in default the adjoining owners and all persons deriving title under them might at their B expense enter upon the premises and remove the windows and fill up the openings. The agreement was determined by notice given by the adjoining owners. No notice of these agreements was given to the defendant who was the purchaser, and he objected to the plaintiffs' title because of them. It was admitted that the light through the windows was material to the premises.

I do not think that the defendant's objection is good. I think that the general C proposition as to the representation made by a vendor who sells a house with windows was correctly laid down by FARWELL, J., in Greenhalgh v. Brindley (2) ([1901] 2 Ch. at p. 328), and he held that an agreement by which the vendor in that case held the right of light by the licence of the corporation of Stockport, did not afford ground for a valid objection to the title. In this case the only difference is that there is in addition to the agreement for a licence an agreement by which D the vendors' predecessor in title agreed to do certain work in any case—i.e., glaze the windows and keep them glazed with opaque glass and certain other work if called upon, to remove the windows and make good the wall, and also that in default of his doing the latter work the adjoining owners might enter and do it at his expense. These are agreements which, in my opinion, would not bind the purchaser within the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay (1), as they were positive agree- E ments involving the spending of money. There was a negative agreement that the windows should not open outwards, but without any such agreement there would be no right to open windows so as to project over another person's ground. The defendant relied upon Beasley v. Atkinson (3) as supporting his contention that the purchaser would be bound by the agreement to glaze with opaque glass and to remove the windows. The decision does not establish any such proposition, but F there are expressions in the judgments which, read by themselves, seem to support it. I am not clear that the learned judges had the point present to their minds and did intend to support any such proposition. If they did, the remarks were obiter only, and we are not bound by them. I think that the appeal should be allowed and judgment given for specific performance.

Appeal allowed.

Charity—Sale of property—Mixed charity—Income derived from investments in land and voluntary contributions—Need of consent of Charity Commissioners—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict., c. 137), ss. 62, 66—Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict., c. 124), ss. 29, 48.

An educational charity, which was incorporated in 1739, with power to buy and sell land, derived its income partly from the investment in land of moneys given to the institution for the general purposes of the charity, which could have been spent as income, and partly from voluntary contributions of a small amount.

Held: at the time of the passing of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, the charity was, and it had ever since been, supported in part, although to a comparatively small extent, by voluntary subscriptions; consequently, it was a charity "maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income" within s. 62 of the Act, and under that section any donations or voluntary subscriptions which had been invested by the governing body of the charity to be held and applied for the purposes of the charity were not subject to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners [now Minister of Education] or to the provisions of the Act; therefore, by s. 48 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, the charity was exempt from the provisions of s. 29 of the Act of 1855 prohibiting the sale of charity estates except with the permission of the Charity Commissioners, and the governors of the charity were free to sell the whole or any part of the land held by them.

C The Foundling Hospital was constituted a corporate body by Royal Charter in 1739 under the name of "The Governors and Guardians of the Hospital for the Maintenance and Education of Exposed and Deserted Young Children." By the charter power was given to the hospital to purchase manors, messuages, lands, rents, tenements, annuities and hereditaments, and to sell, grant, demise, exchange and dispose of such lands. In 1739 an Act was passed confirming the charter and
D empowering the charity to purchase lands for the purpose of erecting the hospital. In or about 1741 the Foundling Hospital purchased for the sum of £6,500 certain lands containing fifty-six acres or thereabouts in Bloomsbury. The hospital was erected on part of these lands, and a large portion of the lands was granted or demised on building leases. Subsequently other lands were purchased by the hospital, and certain parts of these other lands were sold. In 1855 the Foundling
E Hospital Act (48 & 49 Vict., c. vi) was passed. This was a private Act passed for the purpose of regulating the dealings of the hospital in respect of land in accordance with the provisions of the charter, and excepting the hospital from the operation of certain statutes passed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. In the Act it was recited that there were, at the time of the passing of the Act, vested in the hospital certain lands in the city of London, and also the property in BloomsF bury, and that the purchase money of the Bloomsbury property represented moneys received by the hospital in donations and subscriptions. At the date of the commencement of this action the income of the hospital was upwards of £27,000, of which £26,000 or thereabouts was derived from the lands and investments, a small sum from donations, legacies and other benefactions, and £11 or thereabouts from annual subscriptions. This action was commenced against the hospital for
G a declaration that the lands vested in the hospital for the purposes of their charity, and particularly the property in Bloomsbury and in the city of London, could not be sold, granted, demised, exchanged or disposed of under the charter or under the Acts of 1739 and 1885, except in accordance with the provisions of s. 29 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, which were as follows:

H "It shall not be lawful for the trustees or persons acting in the administration of any charity to make or grant, otherwise than with the express authority of Parliament, under any Act already passed, or which may hereafter be passed, or of a court or judge of competent jurisdiction, or according to a scheme legally established, or with the approval of the Board, any sale, mortgage, or charge of the charity estate, or any lease thereof in reversion after more than three years of any existing term, or for any term of life, or in consideration
I wholly or in part of any fine, or for any term of years exceeding twenty-one years."

The hospital being an educational charity, the "Board" referred to in the above section to which an application by the charity for consent would, if necessary, be made, was the Board of Education [now Minister of Education].

Cur. adv. vult. A

Mar. 5, 1914. JOYCE, J.—This is an action upon an information by the Attorney-General ex officio against the governors and guardians of what we know as the Foundling Hospital, asking for a declaration that the lands vested in the defendant corporation, the hospital, for the purposes of their charity, and particularly what I may call the Bloomsbury estate and the city property, cannot be sold, granted, demised, exchanged or disposed of under the charter of 1739, or under the Act of 1739 which confirmed the charter, or under the Foundling Hospital Act, 1885, except in accordance with the provisions of s. 29 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855. B

This charity was constituted by Royal Charter in the year 1739, which charter gave various powers (I need not go through them in detail) as to the purchasing and holding of lands and so on, and power C

> "to sell, grant, demise, exchange, and dispose of any of the same manors, messuages, lands, and tenements whereof and wherein they shall have any estate of inheritance, or for life, lives, or years as aforesaid";

the point of that being that there is a distinct power to sell in the charter constituting the charity. In the ordinary sense of the term, this is not an endowed charity. D It has, I will not say capital, that is an ambiguous term, but real estate which has now become very valuable, the whole of which, with one exception (which will be mentioned presently) was purchased out of contributions in money made to the charity—contributions which, upon the evidence, in my opinion, might have been expended as income or in whatever manner the governors pleased for the purposes of the charity, although, no doubt, and this must be admitted, in obtaining contributions generally, there was an idea that the governors (I am not sure that they were called governors then) of the charity would not immediately spend everything they got, but if possible would make investments as and when it might be found possible and expedient to do so in property producing income for the maintenance of the charity. E The principal investment made by the governors was the purchase of their Bloomsbury estate bought in some year before 1750 of the Earl of Salisbury for £6,500, and now producing a considerable net income, as well as comprising the land utilised in part as the site of the hospital buildings including the chapel. There is also some property in the city of London which I may call the city property, purchased in 1744 for between £700 and £800, and at once presented by the purchasers to the charity without special or, indeed, any express trust being imposed. F This constitutes the exception I mentioned just now. G I may observe that this gift of land to the charity is very similar to what happened in Corpn. of the Sons of the Clergy and Skinner (1), where it was held by NORTH, J., that the consent of the Charity Commissioners to a sale was not necessary in the case of some land which had in effect been presented to the charity as land. I should also mention that the governors erected a chapel many years ago at a cost of some thousands of pounds, and there is some evidence that sums of money, amounting altogether to less than £900—something like £875 or thereabouts—were contributed nominally towards the expense of the erection of this building. H Re Church Army (5), before the Court of Appeal, was referred to in the argument as furnishing, as it does, an instance of a very similar proceeding: see also Re Orphan Working School and Alexandra Orphanage's Contract (2).

In 1853 an Act called the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, was passed with the object of providing for the better administration of charitable trusts. I Section 66 of that Act, the interpretation clause, enacts, amongst other things, that > "the expression 'endowment' [of course, only for the purpose of the Act] shall mean and include all lands and real estate whatsoever, of any tenure, and any charge thereon, or interest therein, and all stocks, funds, money, securities, investments, and personal estate whatsoever, which shall for the time being belong to or be held in trust for any charity, or for all or any of the objects or purposes thereof."

In s. 62, which is rather a long section, of the same Act, we find this:

> ". . . where any charity is maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income arising from any endowment [here 'endowment' means endowment as interpreted by s. 66] the powers and provisions of the Act shall, with respect to such charity, extend and apply to the income from endowment only, to the exclusion of voluntary subscriptions and the application thereof; and no donation or bequest unto or in trust for any such charity as last aforesaid, of which no special application or appropriation shall be directed or declared by the donor or testator, and which may legally be applied by the governing or managing body of such charity as income in aid of the voluntary subscriptions, shall be subject to the jurisdiction or control of the said Board, or the powers or provisions of this Act; and no portion of any such donation or bequest as last aforesaid, or of any voluntary subscription, which is now, or shall, or may from time to time be set apart or appropriated and invested by the governing or managing body of the charity, for the purpose of being held, and applied or expended for or to some defined and specific object or purpose connected with such charity, . . . shall be subject to the jurisdiction or control of the said Board or the powers or provisions of this Act."

Giving the widest possible meaning to the term "endowment" as interpreted by s. 66, it appears to me that upon the evidence in the present case, and I found my judgment upon it, the fact is that at the time of the passing of the Act of 1853 this charity was and has ever since been supported in part (it may be to a comparatively small extent) by voluntary subscriptions. Consequently, if I am right as to this, the charity is at least one of those maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income arising from "endowment" in the sense in which that term is used in the Act, so that the last provision in s. 62 is applicable, viz., "no donation or bequest" not particularly appropriated or invested, and so on, "shall be subject to the jurisdiction or control of the Board."

In the Act of 1853 there is no prohibition or restriction upon charities selling or leasing. Soon afterwards, however, came the Act of 1855, containing s. 29. [HIS LORDSHIP read the section.] That is the section upon which this information is founded. By s. 48 of the Act, this is provided:

> "In the construction of the principal Act [i.e., the Act of 1853] and this Act, the word 'charity' shall include every institution in England or Wales endowed for charitable purposes, but shall not include any charity or institution expressly exempted from the operation of the Act of 1853."

Therefore, if this charity is exempted from the operation of the Act of 1853, it is exempted from the operation of the Act of 1855, including s. 29.

Referring to the provision or saving clause in s. 62 of the Act of 1853, it appears to me, although the governors had invested in land a considerable part of their funds derived from voluntary and unfettered contributions (and it makes not the slightest difference for this purpose whether the investment was in land or securities), that all they possessed, endowment or not, was and is exempt from the jurisdiction or control of the Board and from the provisions of the Act of 1855, as well as those of the Act of 1853, and having regard to what is said in Corpn. of the Sons of the Clergy and Skinner (1) there is no material difference, in point of law, between the position of the Bloomsbury property and the city property of the charity.

There are certain statutes of Elizabeth imposing restrictions with reference to leases, and so on, of charity lands, and among others there is a recital of the charity purposes, and in or prior to 1885 someone—presumably a very careful conveyancer—I suppose, suggested in regard to the charter, and so on, that this charity was subject to the provisions of this statute of Elizabeth. Probably it had been forgotten up to that time in connection with this charity. Thereupon the charity applied for and obtained their Act of 1885, which recites these statutes of Elizabeth and various other matters of importance, among others that the Bloomsbury estate was purchased "with moneys received by the corporation in donations and subscriptions," and so on, a statement in the recital of the private Act of Parliament which, if it were not otherwise provided, is ample evidence for all purposes, and then it recites that a portion of the said land was appropriated for gardens, and so on. Then it recites leases and sales, and that the governors, relying on the express terms of the charter, by force of those express terms were enabled to dispose of their lands in manner authorised by the charter without reference to the Acts of Elizabeth. The recital then refers to doubts having been entertained, and so on. It is further provided that

> "Notwithstanding anything contained in the three hereinbefore recited Acts [of Elizabeth] or any other law or statute to the contrary, the several conveyances and leases, the short particulars whereof are contained in the schedule [those are leases which had been made without reference to the Act of Elizabeth] shall be as valid in law and of the same force and effect in all respects as if the said three recited Acts of Elizabeth had never been passed."

The fourth clause, which it is suggested, I understand by the Crown, assists us very much, provides:

> "Provided always that this Act or anything herein contained shall not operate to make valid any sale, grant, demise, exchange, or disposition, or any other act or thing purported to be made or done by virtue of the said charter further or otherwise than the same would have been valid under the said charter in case the said three recited Acts of Queen Elizabeth had never been passed."

My opinion of that section is that it simply means or was intended to mean what is stated in the marginal note—I do not say because it is the marginal note—that this Act was not to make valid any Act not authorised by the charter. It seems to me in fact, and I have no doubt, that that Act was supposed to set everything right, and was enacted upon the basis that the charity could, under the terms of their charter and by force thereof, make the sales and grant the leases referred to.

So far as I understand, no one suggested or thought—indeed, it was not supposed until long afterwards—that s. 29 of the Act of 1855 had any operation with respect to a charity constituted by Royal Charter containing a full power of sale. In Re Mason's Orphanage v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (3), where there was a question whether a deed founding a charity was a scheme legally established within s. 29 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855—the point being whether a certain scheme gave a sufficient authority for a sale, it being held that the instrument founding the charity was not a scheme within the meaning of the terms of the section—in giving judgment, KAY, L.J., expressly excepts, in the opinion he gave, charities constituted by the Crown or by Royal Charter. I have not the slightest doubt that he thought the Act had nothing whatever to do with such charities. However, if he did think so, he turned out to be wrong, because in a later case it was ultimately held, I think in A.-G. v. National Hospital for Relief and Cure of the Paralysed and Epileptic (4), that s. 29 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, did apply to charities governed by Royal Charter, if that were all. After more than fifty years have elapsed since the Act of 1855, the Crown for the first time, as I understand, sets up the present claim, and, notwithstanding the Act of 1885, to which I have adverted, and as to the meaning and intention of which I cannot help thinking that the advisers of the Crown hold an opinion very different from that which I entertain, we have this action. But apart altogether from the Act of 1885, it appears to me that the real estate held by this charity, the Bloomsbury estate, is derived from the investment of donations of which no special application or appropriation was directed or declared by the donors, and which might legally have been applied as income. With regard to the city estate, that was presented to the charity. The case I referred to does not bring it within this section. Consequently, seeing that this charity has been and is maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions, in my opinion it is exempt from s. 29 of the Act of 1855 under the express provisions of s. 62 of the Act of 1853, coupled with s. 48 of the Act of 1855; in other words, I am of opinion that this action fails.

Hire-Purchase—Distress—Exemption—Agreement determinable on hirer failing to perform agreement—Right of owner to enter hirer's premises and re-take goods—Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 53), s. 4 (1).

The plaintiffs let certain furniture to one B. under a hire-purchase agreement by cl. 1 of which it was provided: "The hirer agrees with the owners as follows: (a) To pay punctually rent weekly . . . and all expenses incurred in the collection of any arrears thereof. . . . (f) If the hirer does not duly perform and observe this agreement, the same shall ipso facto be determined, and the hirer shall forthwith, at his own expense, return the said goods to the owners, and the owners shall be entitled to re-take possession of the same as being goods wrongfully detained by the hirer, and for that purpose to enter upon any premises where the said goods may be." B. having fallen into arrear with the payments under the agreement, the plaintiffs sent a notice to him that the hiring agreement entered into by them with him had been terminated and that they demanded the return of the goods. They sent a van for the goods, but there was no one on the premises. Subsequently B.'s landlord distrained upon the furniture for rent. The plaintiffs served upon him and his agents a notice under the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908, s. 2, declaring that B. had no beneficial interest in the goods, which were the plaintiffs'. The defendants refused to give up the goods. In an action for illegal distress brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants:

Held: by reason of the provision in the agreement conferring on the owners the right of entering and re-taking the goods, the agreement was not determined, but was determinable, by the breach of the hirer to carry out its terms: and, consequently, at the date of the distress, the goods were comprised in a hire-purchase agreement, and, by virtue of s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1908, were not within the provisions of that statute exempting from distress goods of persons other than the tenant.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Divisional Court (RIDLEY and BANKES, JJ.).

By the terms of a hire-purchase agreement dated Mar. 8, 1913, the plaintiffs, Jay's Furnishing Co., Ltd., let certain furniture to one P. D. Bray for a consideration of a weekly payment of 11s. 6d. The agreement in question provided:

"The hirer agrees with the owners as follows: (a) To pay punctually the said rent weekly . . . and all expenses incurred in the collection of any arrears thereof. . . . (f) If the hirer does not duly perform and observe this agreement the same shall ipso facto be determined and the hirer shall forthwith at his own expense return the said goods to the owners, and the owners shall be entitled to re-take possession of the same as being goods wrongfully detained by the hirer, and for that purpose to enter upon any premises where the said goods may be."

The hirer fell into arrear with the instalments due under the agreement, and on May 14, 1913, the plaintiffs wrote to him as follows:

"We beg to give you notice that the hiring agreement which we entered into with you has now been terminated, and that we demand the return of our goods. Please see same are handed over to our representative."

The plaintiffs upon two occasions sent a van to Bray's premises to re-take the furniture, but, as there was no one there, they were unable to do so. On May 5 the defendants, who were Bray's landlords, seized the furniture under a distress for rent. On the following day the plaintiffs served upon the defendants a declaration in writing under s. 1 of the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908, that Bray had no right of property or beneficial interest in the furniture distrained, and that it was the property of the plaintiffs and, therefore, exempt from seizure under the Act. It was contended on behalf of the defendants in an action brought against them by the plaintiffs in the county court for damages for illegal distress that the Act did not protect the furniture from being seized for rent, since s. 4 (1) of the Act provided that it should not apply "to goods comprised in any . . . hire-purchase agreement," and they contended that at the date of the distress the furniture was still comprised in the hire-purchase agreement of Mar. 8. They, therefore, proceeded with their distress. The Divisional Court held that by reason of the provision in the agreement conferring on the owners the right of entering and re-taking the goods, the agreement was not determined by the breach of the hirer to carry out its terms, and that consequently at the date of the distress the goods were comprised in a hire-purchase agreement, and by virtue of s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1908 were not within the provisions of that statute exempting from distress goods of persons other than the tenant. The plaintiffs appealed.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—The question in this case arises under the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908. That is an Act which, when you commence to read it, seems to apply to a case in which there is a superior landlord, a tenant of the superior landlord who becomes an intermediate landlord and is in fact the landlord of an ultimate tenant in possession. It would appear from the first section, which uses the words: "If any superior landlord shall levy," that the Act was addressed to the case where there is a superior landlord, a tenant, and an under-tenant, but it is quite plain when you read on that the Act is not confined to that; for instance, in s. 4 a provision is to be found that the Act shall not apply "to goods belonging to the husband or wife of the tenant whose rent is in arrear." The tenant whose rent is in arrear there is tenant of what is called the superior landlord in s. 1, and, therefore, the Act applies to the case in which the tenant is the husband or wife, as the case may be, and the goods in question are those of the wife or husband, as the case may be. In that case there is no under-tenant, and the matter is made more plain by s. 9, because that section goes on to define that "superior landlord shall be deemed to include a landlord in cases where the goods seized are not those of an under-tenant or lodger."

The facts here are that there was a landlord of a flat named Palliser, one of the defendants in the action, whose agents were Messrs. Brand & Co., the other defendants in the action, and he had a tenant of the flat named Bray, who hired certain furniture from the plaintiffs in the action, Jay's Furnishing Co. In that state of things the persons referred to in s. 1 of the Act mean by the words "superior landlord" Palliser, and by the words in sub-s. (c) "any other person whatsoever not being a tenant of the premises or of any part thereof, and not having any beneficial interest in any tenancy of the premises or any part thereof," the plaintiffs in the action, Jay's Furnishing Co. Under a certain hiring agreement dated Mar. 8, 1913, the plaintiffs, Jay's Furnishing Co., had let out on hire to the tenant certain furniture, and the agreement provided for payment of rent, the first payment of which was to be made on Mar. 27, 1913. He paid certain instalments, but he made default in the payment of others, and on May 14 Jay's Furnishing Co. wrote a letter addressed to him which they put through the letter-box of the flat in question, but which in fact never reached Bray's hands. In that note they gave him notice that "the hiring agreement which was entered into with you has now been terminated, and that we demand the return of our goods." On the same day, May 14, the company sent to fetch the goods, but the flat was closed so that they could not get in, and they went away, having left that letter in the box because they could do nothing more. On May 15 the landlord put in a distress, and on the same day Jay's Furnishing Co. came again and found that the landlord had done so. On May 16, they made the declaration which is referred to in s. 1 of the Act of 1908, and on May 21 paid the rent, which was a small sum of £9 or £10, to the lessor under protest. They have brought the present action to recover the money. The question is whether they are entitled to recover or not.

For that purpose the relevant provisions of the Act are these. As against the landlord, his common law right to distrain is by this Act diminished as regards certain goods having a certain character, but s. 4 provides that the Act shall not apply to goods comprised in any hire-purchase agreement. The question, therefore, is whether, in the events which I have stated, these goods, at the relevant date, were comprised in a hire-purchase agreement, and if they be, then the Act does not apply to them—that is to say, the landlord is not prevented from distraining upon the goods—the right of distress is good and the plaintiffs fail.

A point I will mention first was raised before us, upon which I will express no opinion, because it was not, I think, open to the plaintiffs. That point was that in s. 4 (1) the sequence of words is this, "nor to goods comprised in any bill of sale, hire-purchase agreement, or settlement made by such tenant." It is pointed out, and quite accurately, that as regards a bill of sale made by the tenant, that must mean that the tenant is grantor of the bill of sale and as regards a settlement made by such tenant, it must mean that the tenant is the grantor, the settlor in that case. It is said that in the third case, which is sandwiched between those two,

"hire-purchase agreement made by such tenant" must mean hire-purchase agreement in which the tenant is grantor and not grantee. That point was not taken in the county court; it was not taken in the Divisional Court. It is for the first time sought to be taken before us, and, in my opinion, it is not open because it is a point of law that was not taken in the county court. With that I dismiss it, because it is not competent for us to express any opinion upon it. I, therefore, assume, for the purposes of this judgment, that the hire-purchase agreement mentioned in the Act of Parliament may be a hire-purchase agreement under which the tenant is grantee.

That being so, I have to see what the agreement in question is. It is one under which the hirer agrees with the owners "to pay punctually the said rent weekly, commencing on 27th day of March, 1913, and all expenses incurred in the collection of any arrears there." By cl. (f):

> "If the hirer does not duly perform and observe this agreement, the same shall ipso facto be determined, and the hirer shall forthwith at his own expense return the said goods to the owners, and the owners shall be entitled to re-take possession of the same as being goods wrongfully detained by the hirer, and for that purpose to enter upon any premises where the said goods may be. Notwithstanding such return or re-taking of the said goods, the hirer shall remain liable for arrears of hire up to the date of such determination of this agreement."

As a matter of dates, these events took place. The first instalment, which was due on Mar. 27, was not paid, and, therefore, default was made on that date. The first instalment was not paid until Mar. 31; the second instalment fell due on April 3, and was not paid until the 5th; the next instalment fell due on the 10th, and was not paid until the 15th. The result of that, therefore, is that there was default to pay punctually the weekly rent on Mar. 27. It has been contended that the words of the agreement, "If the hirer does not duly perform and observe this agreement, the same shall ipso facto be determined," mean exactly what they say, neither less nor more. If that be true, this consequence results, that when on Mar. 27 the tenant failed to observe that agreement by failing to pay punctually the rent due on that date, the agreement was ipso facto determined. Was that right? In my opinion, that was not right. It seems to me that there are many grounds upon which that could be shown to be wrong. The first is that cl. (a) provides:

> "To pay punctually the said rent weekly, commencing on the 27th day of March, 1913, and all expenses incurred in the collection of any arrears thereof."

On Mar. 28, 29, and 30, therefore, the agreement was still in force, because there remained available to Jay's Furnishing Co., Ltd., on those three days a contractual obligation to pay the arrears which had fallen due on the 27th. You cannot give effect to that stipulation at all if you say that the agreement was ipso facto determined on the 27th. You could not collect arrears after that date if that was so. Further, looking at cl. (f), after the words "shall ipso facto be determined," there remains after this event has happened an obligation on the part of the hirer, arising under the agreement, to return the goods, and a right in Jay's Furnishing Co., Ltd., to re-take possession of the goods, "and for that purpose to enter upon any premises where the goods may be." Unless the last words are still operative, the entry would be a trespass, whereas the force of these words is that it would not be a trespass. That goes to show, of course, that the agreement is not determined by the mere fact that the hirer did not pay on the 27th. Clause (f) concludes with the words:

> "Notwithstanding such return or re-taking of the said goods, the hirer shall remain liable for arrears of hire up to the date of such determination of this agreement."

If the determination be not, as I have shown that it is not, an ipso facto determination on Mar. 27, it must, of course, be some other and necessarily some later date. The clause, I think, is to be read as providing that the agreement is not ipso facto determined, but is determinable at the election of Jay's Furnishing Co., Ltd. They may exercise their various powers to enter upon the premises, to retake possession of the goods, and enforce the obligation on the hirer to return the goods, and so on, under the agreement, and they can claim, I think, the arrears of hire up to the date of the determination de facto of the agreement. They have a contractual right to do that.

If that be the true construction of the agreement, the only question which remains is this. On May 15, when the landlords distrained, were those goods still comprised in a hire-purchase agreement? I apprehend that chattels remain comprised in a hire-purchase agreement when there is still subsisting some contractual obligation in the agreement dealing with those chattels. There remained under the agreement as regards those chattels, at the date that the distress was made, the right in Jay's Furnishing Co., Ltd., to enter upon the premises and retake possession of those chattels. Even if so much of the hire-purchase agreement as consisted of the demise had been brought to an end by the exercise by Jay's Furnishing Co., Ltd., of a right to determine it, the agreement was still subsisting and bound the chattels in the sense that it gave the company certain rights as against the chattels to go in and take the chattels, to deal with the chattels, and under those circumstances it seems to me that the chattels were still comprised in a hire-purchase agreement. This is what was held in the court below, and is, I think, the whole question to be determined in the case. In that state of things it seems to me that the goods in question were goods to which s. 4 of the Act applied—that is to say, that s. 4 excluded those goods from the operation of the Act, and preserved the right of the landlords to distrain upon them. On these grounds I think that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I agree that the first point raised is not open for our decision because of the reasons given by the lord justice. As to the second point, cl. (f) is in these words: "If the hirer does not duly perform and observe this agreement the same shall ipso facto be determined," and then certain consequences shall follow. It is not that the bailment shall ipso facto be determined, but the agreement shall ipso facto be determined. Does that mean "determined" or "determinable"? It would be so clearly a disadvantage to the furnishing company that it should be determined instead of determinable, and such an unbusinesslike proceeding, that I think we must construe the word as "determinable" and not "determined." That being the case, the agreement and the bailment, which is part of the agreement, becomes determinable at the option of the grantor or the devisor of this furniture, and no doubt when he has manifested his determination the bailment is determined, but it is doubtful whether he has manifested his determination if he has not actually taken physical possession, nor communicated to the hirer his intention to determine it. Be that as it may, we have still to consider whether these goods can be said to be comprised in a hire-purchase agreement so as to bring them within s. 4 of the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908. Hackney Furnishing Co., Ltd. v. Watts (1), in the Divisional Court of which I was a member, decided, no doubt upon a less advantageous form of agreement, that the goods remained comprised. That judgment is open to review by us in this court, but as counsel for the plaintiffs has truly said, it does not go to the length of deciding this case, because, although it does not happen that this present form of agreement has been prepared in order to stop up holes found by that case, still it is a different form of agreement and is more to the advantage of the furnishing company than the agreement in the Hackney Case (1). I do not say that by apt words furnishing companies might not accomplish that which they seek to do in this class of case, but I do say that in this case the furnishing company have not done it, because I think that these goods are still comprised in a hire-purchase agreement, and I rest my judgment entirely upon the licence to enter upon the premises in order to re-take these goods. For that purpose the hire-purchase agreement remains in force.

I do not say that the fact that contractual rights, as for instance, for payment or for damages for breach, may not remain and yet the goods might cease to be comprised in a hire-purchase agreement, but I do say that when any right in respect of the goods, to handle the goods, to obtain possession of the goods, remains for which you must go upon the operative agreement, so long as the goods are comprised in a hire-purchase agreement within the meaning of this statute. It seems to me that that is the sense and intention of the statute, and that here it is necessary to have recourse to the licence. It would be necessary to have recourse to the licence contained in this hire-purchase agreement for the furnishing company to obtain the benefit which they seek. For these reasons I think that the judgment of the court below was right and the appeal must be dismissed.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Re CROXON. FERRERS v. CROXTON

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Eve, J.), July 7, 1915]

[Reported [1915] 2 Ch. 290; 84 L.J.Ch. 845; 113 L.T. 1103; 59 Sol. Jo. 693]

Annuity—Insufficiency of estate—Annuities charged on income and capital—Annuities made up out of capital—No recoupment of capital out of future surplus income.

The testator bequeathed three annuities charged on the income and corpus of his estate. The income produced by the testator's estate proved insufficient to pay the annuities in full, and the trustees used capital to augment income for the purpose of paying the annuities both before and after the death of one annuitant. The trustees having asked whether, as between the tenant for life and those entitled in remainder, payments made from capital ought to be recouped out of income,

Held: the tenant for life was entitled to have the deficiency satisfied out of capital without liability to resort to future income to recoup capital.

Administration of Estates—Annuity—Payment quarterly out of capital and income—Adjustment of charge between capital and income.

Under the will the annuities were payable quarterly.

Held: for the purpose of adjusting the charge between capital and income the annuities should be treated as payable annually on the anniversary of the testator's death, and on each anniversary any deficiency in the income then available should be recouped out of capital, without any right to resort to future income for recouping capital.

Adjourned Summons.

The testator, Boydell Jones Croxon, made his will, dated June 19, 1898, whereby (vide 80 L.T.Rep. 733) he appointed his sons, the plaintiff, Herbert Ferrers Ferrers, and the defendant, Compton Herbert Croxton, executors, and, after making specific bequests and bequeathing pecuniary legacies, devised and bequeathed the residue of his estate unto and to the use of trustees on trust to raise thereon (in the event which happened) an annuity of £50 and to pay the same to the testator's daughter, Cicely Margaret Batstone, quarterly during her life, and upon trust to raise thereon a further like annuity of £50 and to pay the same quarterly to the testator's daughter, Constance Henrietta Anne Crane and upon trust to raise thereon an annuity of £50 (for which by codicil an annuity of £12 per annum was substituted), and to pay the same to Clara Price quarterly during spinsterhood, and upon trust to permit certain furniture and effects to be enjoyed as heirlooms as in the testator's will mentioned, and subject to the provisions thereinbefore contained upon trust as to the testator's real estate in his will mentioned for the defendant, Compton H. Croxton, during his life without impeachment of waste with remainder to his sons in tail male with remainder to the testator's grandson the defendant, Francis Charles Cecil Ferrers, for life with divers remainders over, and as to the residue of the testator's personal estate upon similar trusts as to the proceeds to those declared of the residue of his real estate subject to defeasance in certain events which had not happened. The testator died on Oct. 15, 1902, and his will and codicil were duly proved. By an order dated Mar. 7, 1904, it was declared that the pecuniary legacies given by the testator's will were payable out of the whole of his real and residuary personal estate including settled chattels, and that the annuities given by his will and codicil were, subject to the payment of his pecuniary legacies, payable out of the whole of the testator's real and residuary personal estate with the exception of the settled chattels, and that as between the pecuniary legatees and the annuitants the annuitants were entitled to marshal the assets. The testator's real estate consisted of a freehold house which realised £635, and another freehold house sold in 1914 for £510. His personal estate consisted of two sums of railway consols and deferred ordinary stock, settled chattels which had been sold, and furniture and cash realising £740. The testator's daughter, Cicely M. Batstone, died on July 14, 1911. The other two annuitants were living. Clara Price had never married. The defeasance clauses in the testator's will had not taken effect. The income produced by the testator's estate had never been sufficient to pay the annuities in full, and the trustees had drawn upon the capital in order to pay them in full. At the death of the testator's daughter, Cicely M. Batstone, the amount of capital which had been expended for the purpose of making up the annuities was £43 1s. 4d., of which £19 4s. 7d. represented capital expended to make up her annuity. Since Cicely M. Batstone's death further capital had been expended to make up the annuities of £50 and £12 respectively to the other annuitants, the total capital expended in making up such annuities up to Oct. 15, 1914, being £51 8s. 5d. Compton H. Croxton had no children. The trustees caused an originating summons to be issued to which the tenant for life and first remainderman under the testator's will were made defendants, asking whether the payments out of capital in respect of the annuity to the deceased annuitant, Cicely M. Batstone, ought to be recouped to capital out of income of trust estate accruing since her death, and whether payments made in the past or to be made in the future out of capital to pay in full the subsisting annuities ought to be recouped out of income before any payment should be made of income to the defendant tenant for life.

EVE, J.—The testator bequeathed three life annuities charged upon the income and corpus of his residuary estate. Unfortunately the income has throughout been insufficient to keep down the annuities, but in consequence of the death of one annuitant in 1911, and the recent sale of an unproductive asset and the investment of the proceeds, it is anticipated that there will now be forthcoming sufficient income to keep down the remaining annuities and to leave a small annual surplus. To satisfy the annuity of the annuitant, who died in 1911, the sum of £19 4s. 7d. in all was raised out of capital, and there have also been paid to the annuitants who still survive capital moneys amounting to £32 3s. 10d. The question is whether the surplus income which will, it is anticipated, be coming to the hands of the tenant for life, ought to be applied in recouping to capital the sums of £19 4s. 7d. and £32 3s. 10d., or either of them. The £19 4s. 7d. is entirely covered by the decision in Prince v. Cooper (1). If I were to direct recoupment out of future income, I should be ignoring the fact that the annuity is charged upon capital as well as income. No doubt such a charge is primarily for the benefit of the annuitant, but in adjusting the rights of tenant for life and remainderman, I do not think the court can properly disregard the fact that the annuity is so charged, and I adopt the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls in Prince v. Cooper (1), and hold that there is no right to have the £19 4s. 7d. recouped to capital out of future income. The same considerations apply to the £32 3s. 10d. raised in respect of the continuing annuities. Strictly speaking, the annuitant is entitled on the recurring days on which his annuity becomes payable to call upon the trustees to apply the income in hand in or towards satisfying the instalment of his annuity, and if the income be deficient, he may require them to make good the deficiency out of capital. If this course were strictly pursued, the life tenant could not, as it seems to me, be called upon subsequently to replace the deficiency raised and paid out of capital. The instalment of the annuity could have been properly paid out of the two sources made available by the testator for its payment, and I see no valid reason why the life tenant should be ordered to forgo future income to replace capital properly applied in the discharge of a liability imposed upon it.

In the present case the annuities are payable quarterly. It would obviously be inconvenient to adjust the charge as between capital and income four times in each year, and I think for this purpose the proper course is to treat the annuities as payable annually on the anniversary of the death of the testator, and on each anniversary to apply the income then available in keeping down the annuities, and, if there is a deficiency to make up, such deficiency out of corpus, starting de novo for the next year, and without any right to resort to future income for recouping capital. That was the effect of the decision in Re Grant, Walker v. Martineau (2), which I respectfully accept as good sense and good law.

[King's Bench Division (Lord Reading, C.J., Bray and Lush, JJ.), March 15, 26, 1915]

Licensing—New licence—Full on-licence in force—Purported grant of "new licence" with alteration of monopoly value—Validity—Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. 7 & 1 Geo. 5, c. 24), ss. 12, 14, 16.

When a full on-licence has been granted in respect of premises and is in force in respect of those premises, the licensing justices have no jurisdiction to grant, or the confirming authority to confirm, a new on-licence of a similar kind in respect of the same premises; if, on an application to grant a new on-licence of a similar kind to the one then in force, the justices grant what purports to be a new on-licence, such grant is not a "new licence" within the meaning of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, [now the Licensing Act, 1953] but, if valid, is merely a "renewal" of the existing licence.

If in such case the licensing justices, on the grant of the so-called new licence, alter the conditions attached to the existing licence as to the payment of monopoly value by reducing the amount of such payment, the grant is void as a renewal of the existing licence, as, on a renewal, the conditions attached to the existing licence as to monopoly value cannot be altered. It is also void as a new licence as the premises are then licensed with a similar licence.

Notes. The Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, has been repealed, but the definitions contained in the current Act, the Licensing Act, 1953, are so similar to those of the 1910 Act that this case remains authority for the propositions stated in the headnote. Sections 165 (1), 6 (2) and 11 (1) of the 1953 Act contain the provisions set out below formerly contained in ss. 12 (1), 14 (1), and 16 (1) respectively of the 1910 Act.

Rules Nisi for writs of certiorari calling upon the respondent licensees Taylor and Amendt to show cause why two orders made on April 16, 1913, by justices for the county of Essex, acting as the confirming authority under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, each confirming the grant of a so-called new licence, should not be quashed.

By the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910: A

"Section 12 (1) [see now Licensing Act, 1953, s. 165 (1)]. For the purposes of this Act, a new justices' licence is a justices' licence granted at a general annual licensing meeting otherwise than by way of renewal or transfer as defined by this Act. Section 14 [see now s. 6 (2) of the Act of 1953]. The licensing justices, on the grant of a new justices' on-licence, may attach to the grant of the licence such conditions, both as to the payments to be made and the tenure of the licence, and as to any other matters, as they think proper in the interests of the public; subject as follows: (a) Such conditions shall in any case be attached as . . . the justices think best adapted for securing to the public any monopoly value. Section 16 (1) [see now s. 11 (1) of 1953 Act]. For the purposes of this Act, the renewal of a justices' licence means the grant of a justices' licence at a general annual licensing meeting by way of renewal of a similar licence which is in force in respect of the premises at the date of the application. . . ." The Attorney-General (Sir John Simon, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir Stanley Buckmaster, K.C.), and Daldy in support of the rules.

Mar. 26, 1915. The following judgments were read.

LORD READING, C.J.—The respondents, Taylor and Amendt, showed cause against a rule obtained by the Attorney-General to quash two orders made by the confirming authority for the county of Essex, whereby they confirmed the grant by the licensing justices of a new licence to each of the respondents. E

The facts, so far as material, are as follows: In 1905 the respondent Taylor obtained a new licence in respect of premises occupied by him. Under s. 4 of the Licensing Act, 1904, now s. 14 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, a new licence was granted subject to conditions of payment of monopoly value of the licence. The licence was a full publican's licence, and the conditions of payment were £200 per annum for the first five years, £300 per annum for the next five years, and thereafter the sum of £400 for every year. There were restrictions and other conditions which are not material to the point now raised. The licence granted was an annual licence, and every year till 1913 application was made for the renewal of the licence, and the renewal was granted. In Feb. 1913 the application was made on behalf of Taylor for a new licence in respect of the same premises. The justices intimated that they were disposed to grant a new licence with a revision of the monopoly value. Objection was taken on behalf of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise that such a licence would, in fact, be a renewal of the old licence, and in the circumstances could not be a new licence, and could not be subject to the payment of a reduced monopoly value. The justices, however, granted a new licence subject to a reduction of monopoly value, namely, payment of £100 per annum till 1917, and thereafter of £150 per annum. The new licence was subject to the same restrictions and other conditions as the old licence, and the renewals of the same. Further, the justices provisionally renewed the existing licence on condition that the renewal should be surrendered on the confirmation of the grant of the new licence. On April 16, 1913, the confirming authority of the county confirmed the licence granted by the justices. In 1906 the respondent Amendt obtained a new licence in respect of premises occupied by him subject to the conditions of payment for monopoly value of £30 per annum for five years, and thereafter of £40 per annum. The licence was a full publican's licence, and was renewed from year to year until 1913. In February of that year application was made on behalf of this respondent for a new licence in respect of the same premises. The same objection was taken on behalf of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise on Mar. 11, 1913. F G H I

On that date the justices granted a new licence for a term of five years at the monopoly value of £15 on condition that the existing licence, which was provisionally renewed, should be surrendered immediately upon the new licence becoming effective. On April 16, 1913, the grant of this licence was confirmed by the confirming authority of the county.

In both these cases the effect of the grant of the new licence with revised conditions is to reduce the annual payments for monopoly value. It is clear law, and it is not in dispute, that when a licence has been granted with conditions attached for payment of monopoly value there is no jurisdiction in the justices to revise the conditions of payment attached to the licence or to the renewal of the licence. The objects of the respondents in applying for and obtaining a new licence instead of a renewal of the old licence was to enable the justices to impose new and reduced conditions of payment of monopoly value, and the question is whether there was jurisdiction in the licensing justices to grant these new licences, or in the confirming authority to confirm them. A new licence is a licence granted "otherwise than by way of renewal or transfer"; (s. 12 (1), of the Act of 1910). The renewal of a licence is a grant "by way of renewal of a similar licence which is in force in respect of the premises at the date of the application": (s. 16 (1)). This definition of a renewal embodied the law as it was before the passing of this consolidating statute. Under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 74, a renewal of a licence meant "a licence granted at a general annual licensing meeting by way of renewal." As was said by Cockburn, C.J. in Marwick v. Codlin (1) (L.R. 9 Q.B. at p. 514): "A renewal of a licence is a repetition of an old one." By the Licensing Act, 1874, s. 32, a new licence meant > "a licence for the sale of any intoxicating liquor granted at a general annual licensing meeting in respect of premises in respect of which a similar licence has not theretofore been granted."

The effect of these two statutory definitions is comprised in the definition in s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1910.

The applications for the new licences were made, and the licences were granted by the justices at a time when there were similar licences in existence—that is, licences of a similar class, in those cases full publican's licences in respect of the same premises. In form, the applications were not made by way of renewal, but were for new licences, which were therefore subject to confirmation by the confirming authority, but in truth they were applications for a repetition of the old licences. It appears to me that when there is at the time of the application a similar licence in force in respect of the same premises the justices cannot grant a new licence of a similar class in respect of the same premises; they can only grant a licence by way of renewal, and in that case cannot revise the conditions of payment of monopoly value. If the means adopted in these cases for the purpose of securing a reduction of the terms of payment succeeded, the result would be that applications for new licences instead of renewals would only be made when it was reasonably certain that there would be a reduction in the terms of payment for monopoly value. There are no means by which the Commissioners of Customs and Excise could approach the licensing justices for the purpose of obtaining an increase in the payments. The commissioners could not initiate proceedings for revising the conditions of payment however great the increase might be in the value of the licence, although in the public interest they are entitled to be heard on the question of the payments to be imposed for the purpose of securing monopoly value to the public: (Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, s. 87). The monopoly value must be a definite capital sum ascertained by the justices once for all, and the conditions of payment to secure it must be fixed once for all when the licence is applied for, and before it is granted, and subject only to the power of reduction given to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise under s. 47 of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910. Once that capital sum has been ascertained by the justices they cannot alter it: R. v. Customs and Excise Comrs. (2) ([1914] 2 K.B. at p. 399). On the application for a new licence the licensing justices may grant the licence for a term, in which case no renewal is necessary (s. 14 (2) (a)), or they may grant an annual licence subject to renewal. In either case such conditions shall be attached as the justices think are best adapted for securing to the public the monopoly value of the licence (s. 14 (1) (a)). I do not think that a licence which is in fact a repetition of an old licence becomes in law a new licence merely because it is in name or in form a new licence. The character of a licence as defined by the statute cannot be varied merely by calling it a licence of a different character.

In my judgment, as soon as it is apparent that these licences were granted in respect of the same premises, and were of the same class as the existing licences, they cannot be new licences. Notwithstanding that they are in form new licences, they are in substance and in fact renewals of old licences. In both the present cases the new licences were granted on the terms of the surrender of the old licences as soon as the new licences became effective. This was done, presumably, in order that there might never be an interval of time during which no licence was in force in respect of the premises. At each of the stages of the application for the new licence care has to be taken by the applicant to preserve the old licence in order that when he presented himself to the justices he could say in effect: "I have a licence in existence in respect of my premises, and it is a full publican's licence; in truth I want a renewal of my old licence, but I want to call it a new licence so that you may revise the terms of payment imposed upon me for monopoly value." In my judgment the licensing justices had no jurisdiction to grant these so-called new licences.

On behalf of the respondent Amendt counsel took the further point that at the time of the application in 1913 for a new licence there was no similar licence in force in respect of the premises, inasmuch as the licence granted in 1906, and all subsequent renewals, were void according to the principles laid down by the Court of Appeal in R. v. Customs and Excise Comrs. (2). The argument, as I understood it, is that as that licence, and the renewals, did not fix a definite period for the payment of the annual sums to secure the monopoly value, it must be taken that the justices had not ascertained the capital value of the monopoly, or had not fixed payments representing a capital value, and that therefore the licence was void. I do not decide whether licences granted in such a form are within the powers of the licensing justices or not. Before arriving at a conclusion upon so important a point I should desire more information than is before the court. In particular it appears to me that it would be desirable to learn how the justices arrived at the conditions of payment, and why they fixed no period of time for the continuance of the definite payments. It is, in my opinion, plain that the Court of Appeal did not in terms decide the point now raised, but it is said that it follows logically from the reasoning of the court that licences granted subject to conditions of payment for an indefinite period of years are ex facie void, and that this court must now so hold in respect of the renewal licence last granted to Amendt before the date of his application in 1913 for the new licence.

In R. v. Customs and Excise Comrs. (2) the commissioners had refused to grant an excise licence on the ground that the justices' licence authorising the grant of the excise licence was void. The justices had attached to the grant of the licence conditions providing that the annual payments to secure the monopoly value should be a percentage of each year's gross takings from the sale of intoxicants. It was held that the justices had no jurisdiction to grant licences with such conditions attached, inasmuch as it was apparent on the face of the licence that they had not first fixed a capital sum to represent the monopoly value of the licence, but had made the monopoly value dependent on the future annual takings, which would consequently vary according to the amount of liquor sold. The court held that monopoly value could not be an indefinite sum varying in the future according to the annual trade of the premises, and that the commissioners were justified in refusing the excise licence, and that no mandamus should issue directing them to grant it. The objection to the licence was taken by the commissioners in the exercise of their duty in the public interest. In the present case the holder of the licence, who obtained it in 1906 and annually renewed it, and has traded under licences in this form since 1906, and was trading under such a licence at the time of his application for the so-called new licence, and agreed to surrender it to the justices, and did surrender it, in exchange for the new licence, now comes forward in a court of justice to say that these licences were all void. I do not think it is open to him to raise this contention before this court on this application. A person who has upon his own application and for his own purposes and profit obtained a licence in this form, and made use of it when obtaining the new licence, is not entitled, when it appears to his own interest, and after having had all the advantages and benefit of the licence, to repudiate it as a valid licence, and to contend that it is void. In the words of BOWEN, L.J., in Gandy v. Gandy (3) (30 Ch.D. at p. 82), "it would be playing fast and loose with justice if the court allowed that." In my judgment the grant of the so-called new licences must be quashed, and the rules must be made absolute in both cases.

BRAY, J.—A good many questions were raised in the course of the argument in these cases. The more important were as follows: (i) Whether in fact the justices when they granted the original licence did fix a capital monopoly value, and whether they can attach conditions to a new licence making the monopoly value payable annually, but providing that the annual payments shall cease when the licences are no longer in force, and whether that can be the mode best adapted for securing the monopoly value to the public. (ii) If they cannot, whether licences so granted are void. (iii) Whether the licences granted here were granted by way of renewal. (iv) Whether a new licence (other than a re-grant under s. 14 (2)) can be granted in respect of premises then licensed with a similar licence. In my opinion it is not necessary for the court to decide points (i) and (ii), which are both important and difficult, because in my opinion it is not open to the respondents to raise them. They had obtained these licences and had had them renewed annually, and had had the benefits of them and made their applications to the justices for the licences now in dispute upon the footing that they were existing valid licences, and that they were to continue in force, and indeed were to be renewed, until their surrender. They treated them as existing valid licences, and we must also treat them as existing valid licences. I prefer not to express any opinion upon these two points. It is also unnecessary to answer (iii), because, for the reasons I am about to state, the court ought to quash the granting of these licences even if they were not granted by way of renewal.

It remains, therefore, to consider the fourth question. We are dealing here with on-licences. Can new on-licences be granted in respect of premises then having an on-licence? The on-licences which the justices have jurisdiction to grant under s. 9 may be divided into four classes: (i) New licences. (ii) Re-grants under s. 14 (2). (iii) Licences by way of renewal. (iv) Licences by way of transfer. There are no others that I know of. We have not to deal here with (ii) or (iv), nor with (iii), for if these licences were granted by way of renewal they were clearly bad, because the conditions as to the payment of monopoly value were altered. Then, if the respondents are to succeed, these must be new licences. What are new licences? If the definition clause in the Act of 1874 were still in force, a new licence could not be granted because there was an existing similar licence; but this clause is repealed, and s. 12 (1) is substituted for it. Does that make any difference? If it be right to say that the on-licences which the justices have jurisdiction to grant must fall within one of the four classes I have mentioned, and the licences in question do not fall within three of them, then those licences in order to be valid must fall within the fourth class—namely, they must be new on-licences. What is the ordinary meaning of a new licence with respect to premises? Surely it means a licence granted in respect of premises which have not then a similar licence. These premises had a similar licence, consequently these licences were not new licences, and the justices had no jurisdiction to grant them. In my opinion the rule nisi to quash should be made absolute in both cases.

LUSH, J.— The short question in these two cases which we have to decide is whether the "new" on-licences which were granted and confirmed in 1913 in respect of premises in respect of which there were similar licences then in existence are valid licences. In my opinion they are invalid, and there was no jurisdiction to grant them. It is, I think, clear that if a similar licence is in force no application can be successfully made for a new licence in respect of the same premises. A new licence is thus defined by s. 32 of the Act of 1874: a licence "in respect of premises in respect of which a similar licence has not theretofore been granted." Although by the Act of 1910 a new licence is now defined as "a justices' licence granted at a general annual licensing meeting otherwise than by way of renewal or transfer as defined by this Act," the change in the definition has not made any change in the law. If the licensee of an already licensed house applies for a similar licence to that already existing it must either be granted by way of renewal or it cannot be granted at all. If, therefore, these licences were really new licences they are void for the reason I have mentioned. If they were granted by way of renewal they are void because the conditions for securing the monopoly value were altered. This would be sufficient to dispose of the cases, but counsel for Amendt contended that the existing licence was void when the new licence was granted, and that therefore there was no similar licence in existence. This point was not open in Taylor's case, because there the new licence would be void if the existing one was void, the alleged defect being common to both. In Amendt's case it was not so, as the new licence was for a fixed term of five years. The reason why counsel said that the existing licence was void was this. It was decided in R. v. Customs and Excise Comrs. (2) that if it appeared clear, as it did there, that the justices had secured a yearly payment only, as representing the annual as distinguished from the capital value, they had not dealt with or secured the capital monopoly value at all, which is what the Act requires should be secured, and that the conditions precedent to the grant of a licence had therefore not been complied with. It was said that as the annual payments in this case were only to be made as long as the licence existed or "by the licensee for the time being," which I think is the same thing, and were to continue to be payable without limit of time if the licence was continually renewed, it was equally clear that the capital monopoly value had not been considered or dealt with. I do not think it is necessary to say if this contention is well founded or not, because in my opinion it was not competent to the respondent to contend that the existing licence was void. He had before the justices contended that the licence was valid, and had even obtained a renewal of it, and had undertaken to surrender it when the new licence on more favourable terms was granted, and on that contention the new licence was granted. He accordingly continued to trade under the old or renewed licence, which he now says was void, and in pursuance of the undertaking he surrendered it in exchange for the new licence. In my opinion it is not now open to him to contend that the old licence was void.

I feel some doubt whether a licensee can assert as against the Crown that the licence which he applied for and obtained, and under which he has traded and which has not been declared void, was void, and to set up his own illegality. But, be that as it may, I do not see how a party who has set up one contention in one court and obtained an order on that contention and availed himself of it (this respondent actually obtained and traded under a renewal on this contention) can afterwards turn round in another court and raise the opposite contention in order to obtain a decision from that second court. To do that would, in the language of BOWEN, L.J., in Gandy v. Gandy (3), "be playing fast and loose with justice." This is what this respondent seems to me to be doing, and I do not think he can do it. The justices have never considered an application by the respondent as a person who had no existing licence in respect of the premises. This is, I think, the answer to counsel for Amendt's argument. I confess I should feel some difficulty in saying that the method adopted in these licences of providing for an annual payment, to last so long as a licence continues to be renewed, can be said to be a method of securing a fixed and definite capital sum representing the monopoly value, especially having regard to s. 14 (1) (b) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, which provides that the total payments shall not exceed that fixed sum. But it is unnecessary to decide the question. For the reasons I have stated I think that the existing licence must, as against this respondent, be treated for the present purpose as valid. I think that the rules should be made absolute.

Rules absolute.

SCOTT v. DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS

[King's Bench Division (Channell, Lush and Atkin, JJ.), February 27, March 13, 1914]

Gaming—Lottery—Prize competition Element of skill—Some degree of literary merit—No evidence of conduct of competition as lottery—Lotteries Act, 1823 (4 Geo. 4, c. 60), s. 41.

The appellant sold copies of a newspaper containing an advertisement of a competition called "Bounties," by which £1,000 was offered in prizes. By the scheme the competitor was to select a word from a specified list of words and was then to write down two or three words the meaning of which had some relation to the meaning of the word chosen, each of the words so written being required to begin with one of the letters in the word chosen, but so that not more than one word was to begin with the same letter unless it appeared more than once in the selected word. A coupon containing the word selected and the answer sent in by the competitor was to be sent to the office of the newspaper, with a postal order for 6d. in respect of each coupon. The editor undertook that all "Bounties" reaching him should receive careful consideration, but his decision as to the prize-winners was to be accepted as final and the names of the prize-winners were to appear in an issue of the paper about ten days after the entries were closed. The prizes varied from £500 to 10s. The appellant having been convicted under s. 41 of the Lotteries Act, 1823 [repealed: see note infra], of publishing a lottery, and the editor having also been convicted of aiding and abetting,

Held: the competition required some degree of skill and of literary merit although not of a high order, and so, on the face of the scheme the distribution of the prizes did not depend entirely on chance; there was no evidence that, despite this, the circumstances were such that the appellant must have contemplated that the scheme would be conducted, and it must, in fact, have been conducted, as a lottery; and, therefore, the appellant was not guilty of the offence charged against him.

Case Stated by an alderman of the city of London.

At the Mansion House Justice Room in the city of London on June 11, 1913, informations were laid in behalf of the respondent under s. 41 of the Lotteries Act, 1823, against the appellant William Scott "for that he in the said city on April 23, 1913, did unlawfully publish a certain proposal and scheme for the sale of certain chances in a certain lottery not then authorised by any Act of Parliament, to wit, a proposal and scheme published in the issue of the 'Sunday Chronicle' newspaper dated April 20, 1913, for the sale of chances in a lottery called 'Bounties,' contrary to the statute," and against the appellant Arthur Wellesley Woodbridge "for that he on the said April 23 did unlawfully and knowingly in the said city aid, abet, counsel, and procure the commission by the said William Scott of the said offence." The informations against the appellants were heard together on June 18, and there were proved or admitted before the magistrate in the course of the hearing the following facts. (a) That William Scott was a servant in the employ of Messrs. E. Hulton & Co., Ltd., at their premises, No. 17, Tudor Street, in the city of London, on April 23, 1913. (b) That he there sold on that day certain copies of the "Sunday Chronicle" newspaper of the issue of Sunday, April 20, 1913, to a police officer acting on behalf of the respondent. (c) That Arthur Wellesley Woodbridge was throughout April and May, 1913, the editor of the "Sunday Chronicle," acting as such in Manchester, where the newspaper was published. (d) That the appellant Arthur Wellesley Woodbridge on being served with the summons by Inspector Phillips (who had gone to Manchester for that purpose) said: "I am not the man you want. You should see the competition editor, who is responsible for the competitions," meaning the editor or person employed by the proprietors of the "Sunday Chronicle" to superintend certain competitions advertised therein and hereinafter referred to. (e) A copy of the "Sunday Chronicle" issued under date of May 4, 1913, and containing the names of the prize-winners in a competition advertised in the issue of the paper of April 20 was admitted by the appellants to have been published for the same proprietors and edited by the appellant Woodbridge and sold by the appellant Scott in the same manner as the issue of April 20. There appeared in the "Sunday Chronicle" for April 20, 1913, an advertisement of a competition called "Bounties," in which prizes aggregating to £1,000 were offered to competitors therein. The advertisement was as follows:

> "£1,000 in Prizes! Offered this week for 'Sunday Chronicle' Bounties in conjunction with 'Ideas.' First prize, £500; Second prize, £100; Third prize, £50; Twenty prizes of £5 each; 200 prizes of £1; 100 prizes of 10s. What you have to do—Choose one word from those given below: [A list of forty-two words was then given.] Having chosen a word, think of two or three other words which, in their meaning, have some bearing on the meaning of the word chosen. Each of the two or three words must begin with one of the letters in the word chosen from the list, but not more than one word must begin with the same letter unless it appears more than once in the selected word. For example:
> Word chosen. Bounty.
> Coincidence—Naturally impresses one.
> Reformation—Easy in theory.
> Servant—Appreciates respect.
> "Bounties must be plainly written on the coupon. Not more than two Bounties must be written on one coupon. Each coupon must be accompanied by a postal order for 6d., made payable to 'Sunday Chronicle' and crossed '/& Co./.' If more than one coupon is sent, one postal order for the full amount should be inclosed. . . . The editor undertakes that all Bounties reaching him shall receive careful consideration, but his decision as to the prize-winners must be accepted by all competitors as final and legally binding in all respects, and entries are accepted only on this understanding. The editor will not hold himself responsible for coupons lost or mislaid. The published decision may be amended by the editor as the result of successful scrutinies. In the event of two or more competitors sending in the same winning Bounties the prize will be divided."

Attached to the advertisement were coupon forms wherein answers sent in by competitors with names and addresses were to be entered and, by the rules of the competition, the coupons with a postal order for 6d. in respect of each coupon, were to be sent in envelopes marked "Bounties" addressed to the "Sunday Chronicle," Withy-grove, Manchester, and to reach that office not later than Thursday, April 24, 1913. It was announced in the advertisement that the result of the competition would be announced in the "Sunday Chronicle" dated May 4. The rules of the competition appeared from the advertisement. In the issue of May 4 appeared the names of the prize-winners in the competition of April 20. The "Bounties" which won the first three prizes were given as follows: (i) Undertaking—Terminates doctors' experiments; (ii) Covetousness—Sickens the charitable; (iii) Rapacity—Punishes itself repeatedly.

It was contended before the magistrate on behalf of the respondent that the appellants were upon this evidence shown to be guilty of the offences respectively charged against them; that the competition was a "lottery" within the prohibitions of s. 41 of the Lotteries Act, 1823; that the result of the competition could not in fact depend upon any skill, knowledge, or judgment on the part of the competitors; that unless the competitions were carried on at a loss it must be assumed that at least 40,000 coupons were sent in as the prizes amounted to £1,000 and there were 40,000 sixpences in £1,000; that the time allowed for the determination of the prize-winners was ten days, and that it was impossible that 4,000 coupons a day could be examined or considered in accordance with the rules of the competition; that there was no standard of literary skill which could determine to which competitor in the competition a preference over any other competitors could be given. Hall v. McWilliam (2), Willis v. Young and Stembridge (3), Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4), and Smith's Advertising Agency v. Leeds Laboratory Co. (5), were cited on behalf of the respondents in support of the contentions that the appellants were guilty of the offences charged against them. On behalf of the appellants it was contended that there was no evidence in law before the magistrate on which he could convict either or both of the appellants of the offences: that there was no evidence before him that the competition scheme was a "lottery" within the Lotteries Act, 1823; that there was no evidence as to the numbers of competitors in the competition, or that it was impossible for each competitor's solution to be considered in accordance with the rules thereof, or that the competition was one which did not involve skill or judgment or knowledge on the part of the competitors; that the rules of the competition were not shown to have been departed from and that they provided for a proper scrutiny of the coupons before or after the determination of the prize-winners in the competitions; that the magistrate was not entitled in law to assume without evidence that the competition was a lottery, or that the rules of the competition were not complied with, or that the prize-winners were not selected otherwise than upon a scrutiny and by the judgment of the person described as "the editor" in the advertisement and not arbitrarily. Hall v. Cox (1) and Taylor v. Smetten (6) were cited on behalf of the appellants.

The magistrate was of opinion that there was evidence before him upon which he was justified in coming to the conclusion that the competition was a lottery, and that the appellants were guilty of the offences respectively charged against them. He thereupon convicted them.

By s. 41 of the Lotteries Act, 1823:

> "If any person or persons shall sell any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, share or shares of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, in any lottery or lotteries authorised by any foreign potentate or State, or to be drawn in any foreign country, or in any lottery or lotteries, except such as are or shall be authorised by this or some other Act of Parliament to be sold, or shall publish any proposal or scheme for the sale of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, share or shares of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, except such lottery or lotteries as shall be authorised as aforesaid, then such person or persons shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of £50, and shall also be deemed a rogue and vagabond, or rogues and vagabonds, and shall be punished as such in the manner hereinafter directed. . . ."

Gordon Hewart, K.C. (Bodkin with him), for the appellants.—There is no evidence that this scheme was a lottery, and there is no evidence that the conditions in the scheme were not complied with, and, if they were complied with, the scheme would not be a lottery. It cannot be said that no degree of skill is required; on the contrary, there is a marked degree of skill required. In Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4) it was held that the competition was a lottery, but the main ingredient in that case was that some 60,000 last lines had been sent in to be adjudicated upon, and the decision went on the ground that, the numbers being so large, there was no possibility of having any real adjudication on the whole, and.

therefore, to that extent the question of skill was eliminated and the element of chance came in. In the present case the numbers were not nearly so large, and the first preliminary adjudication would throw out a large number as not complying with the conditions. A lottery must be an intentional scheme for distributing money according to lot or chance, and if this scheme is considered as a whole it is clear that it is not a lottery, because it is not a competition in which the prizes are to be allotted by mere chance, but is one where the prizes are to be given on the merits. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Hall v. Cox (1) shows that to constitute a lottery it must be a matter depending entirely upon chance, and if the result depends largely on chance, but not entirely so, then the competition is not a lottery. If there is an element of skill required for the investigations necessary for sending in the answers, it is not a lottery. In the judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4), one of the main ingredients upon which he decided that the competition was a lottery was that having regard to the very large number of competitors, being about 60,000, and the short space of one week allowed for the adjudication, it was impossible that there could have been any real comparison of the lines, and that, therefore, the result must have depended on chance. That cannot apply in this case, as there is no such evidence as to the numbers as there was in that case. The other cases relied on before the justices were Hall v. McWilliam (2) in which the competition took the form of a scheme called "Spots," where the winning spots were arbitrarily selected by the proprietors of the newspaper, and the winning of the prizes depended wholly upon chance; and Smith's Advertising Agency v. Leeds Laboratory Co. (5), in which the plaintiffs were employed by the defendants to advertise the conditions of certain "Limerick" competitions, and it was held that the advertisements were simply invitations to people to come in and win prizes by chance and were lotteries. Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4), and Smith's Advertising Agency v. Leeds Laboratory Co. (5) were civil cases and there were consolation prizes in both, whereas the present is a criminal case in which the burden is on the prosecutor to prove the case beyond a reasonable doubt. Upon the advertisement of this competition it is sufficiently plain that a degree of literary skill is involved, and when the conditions are taken as a whole the proper conclusion is that this was a competition involving a certain amount of skill and that negatives the view that this was a lottery. That which was sought to be proved was really assumed, and that which was proved did not establish beyond a reasonable doubt that this was a lottery. There was no evidence upon which the magistrate could come to the conclusion that it was a lottery, and therefore the conviction ought to be quashed.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Stanley Buckmaster, K.C.), (R. D. Muir and Branson with him) for the respondent.—The distinction between a civil and a criminal case in this connection has been insisted upon when distinguishing some of the cases, but there is no difference between a criminal prosecution and a civil action in this respect. The true test is this: Does the advertisement offer inducements to people to come in and win prizes by chance? It makes no difference that people should exercise skill if there is not some skill required in the advertisement. What has to be shown in the advertisement is a scheme requiring skill, something requiring a skilful judgment, and even if there were some slight degree of skill shown by the competitors that is not enough to prevent the competition from being a lottery if there is no skilful judgment required in the adjudication of the prizes. There are six classes of prizes, and if this is not a lottery, these classes would be graded according to skill, but it is impossible that that can be done here. There is nothing to show that there is anything in point of skill to take any one contribution out of one class and put it in another. But the matter does not stop there, because the editor does not profess to decide on any principle of skill. The critical part of the scheme is that there is an invitation to the public to come in, and the scheme in which they are invited to take part is one in which the editor informs them that all the Bounties reaching him will be carefully considered, but there is nothing to show through how many hands they will pass before they come to him, and when they do come to him all he says is that they will be carefully considered. There is no statement as to who will carefully consider them; it might be done by the office boy, and the scheme intentionally omits any such reference to the editor as would show that they are to be considered by the editor, though his decision is to be final and there is reserved to him an arbitrary discretion to award as he pleases, and if he merely drew the names out of a box that would satisfy the scheme. The person who selects the winning contributions may select them for any reason which is not associated with skill at all. The scheme is an invitation to persons to send in any contributions they please, and, having sent them in in conformity with the initial conditions, there is nothing in the way of skill which determines the placing of them in any one of the classes. Some standard is necessary, and here there is no standard at all. The principle laid down in Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4) and Smith's Advertising Agency v. Leeds Laboratory Co. (5) is exactly applicable to the present case and would cover a case far stronger than the appellants have. Here there was no standard at all, but the very condition insisted upon in Blyth v. Hulton & Co. Ltd. (4) was that there must be some standard, and that the adjudication must be on the merits in reference to that standard. That precisely applies here, where there is neither a standard nor an adjudication on the merits. That was followed in Smith's Advertising Agency v. Leeds Laboratory Co. (5), as to advertising certain "Limerick" competitions. FARWELL, L.J., said that it was a question of construction, and, if on the construction of the advertisements they were held to be lotteries, it did not matter what the parties thought. He considered that the advertisements invited to a gamble and were a pure lottery, and that Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4) was not distinguishable. KENNEDY, L.J., said that it was impossible to contend that any reasonable person could read these advertisements as indicating that any real competition was to take place. The advertisements in that case said that the solutions sent in by competitors would be examined by an expert literary staff. That was a far stronger case than this, and yet it was held that the competitions were lotteries. If the prize is to go to one of a group of two persons by chance, that is a lottery. In such a case as this it is impossible to apply a standard of literary merit, and, that being so, the matter falls to be decided by chance. If the determination is left to these conditions, there is no skill at all used, and no standard can possibly be assigned. Further, there is the inference that a very large number of competitions come in, which would make it impossible to consider them all on their merits in the short space of ten days. On both these grounds the case was rightly decided. [LUSH, J., referred to Barclay v. Pearson (7).]

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 13, 1914. The following judgments were read.

LUSH, J.—The appellant Scott was summarily convicted of an offence under s. 41 of the Lotteries Act, 1823. The magistrate who convicted stated a Case for the opinion of the court, and the question that we have to consider is whether, upon the facts stated in the Case, the appellant was properly convicted.

The Act makes it an offence to sell tickets or chances in any unauthorised "lottery" or to publish any scheme for the sale of any such tickets. Any person who commits such offence is to be deemed a rogue and vagabond. The word "lottery" indicates clearly enough what is the offence aimed at by the statute, and the Act has been interpreted in accordance with the obvious meaning of the term as applying only to distributions of money by chance, and nothing but chance—that is, by doing that which is equivalent to drawing lots. If merit or skill plays any part in determining the distribution, there has been no lottery, and there is no offence: Hall v. Cox (1). What the appellant did was this. He published in his newspaper a scheme to be conducted on the following lines. The competitor was to select one of a number of words, and was to compose a sentence (the initial letters being fixed by certain rules) having some appropriate bearing on the selected word. The following instances were given: "Coincidence" (that is the selected word) and the sentence is: "Naturally impresses one." "Reformation—Easy in theory." "Servant—Appreciates respect." The editor undertook to consider carefully all the sentences that reached him (this was obviously to guard against a claim by an alleged competitor who asserted that he had sent in a sentence which had been lost), but stipulated that his decision was to be final. Provision was made for a scrutiny, if necessary. Prizes were offered of amounts varying between £500 (first prize) and 10s., of which a large number were offered. A large number of persons competed and sent in answers, and prizes were awarded, the names of the winners being duly published. The first three answers to which the first three prizes were awarded were also published. They were as follows: (i) "Undertaking—Terminates doctors' experiments." (ii) "Covetousness—Sickens the charitable." (iii) "Rapacity—Punishes itself repeatedly." On these facts it was contended that the "competition" was a lottery; in other words, that the competitors were invited to take part, and had taken part, in a scheme for the distribution of money by chance and nothing but chance. It was contended, first, that the appellant must be taken to have contemplated that no less than 40,000 answers would be sent in, as one ought to assume that he would not carry on the competition at a loss. Secondly, that the time allowed for deciding as to the respective merits of the answers was so short (ten days from the sending in of the last answer) that he must have known that he could not consider all the answers. Thirdly, that there was no standard of literary skill by which to determine to which competitor preference should be given. It was also contended that the case was concluded by two recent decisions of the Court of Appeal to which I will refer. With regard to the last contention, I do not think that it is sound, for the reasons which I will state when I come to consider the decisions. We must, I think, consider for ourselves, giving, of course, proper weight to the decisions, whether the appellant was properly convicted.

Now, a scheme may either be on the face of it a lottery—that is, a scheme for distributing money according to mere chance—or, if it is not, it may be shown by extraneous evidence that the parties concerned contemplated that it would be conducted in that way. I agree with what was contended before us, that if reasonable people ought to contemplate from the facts made known to them that it would be so conducted, the scheme is none the less a lottery, although on the face of it it appears not to be; and I also agree that if the appeal to skill and merit was a mere blind or cloak to cover up the true nature of the scheme, if all the sentences, for example, which would be composed under this scheme would have practically an equal chance of obtaining the prizes, one being as "appropriate" as the other, it would be just as much a distribution by mere chance as if the scheme were so described. The Solicitor-General contended that the literary merit was of such a low order that one cannot say that one answer is "better"—that is, more appropriate and more happily and neatly put together—than another. This I take to be the argument raised before the magistrate—namely, that there was no standard by which to adjudicate—in another form. The literary merit was, no doubt, not of a high order, and if the Lotteries Act had made it an offence to distribute money prizes unless it was of a high order, it would be an important observation. But, unless one is prepared to say that no honest person can come to the conclusion that such answers as those to which the first three prizes were awarded are more pointed, more amusing, than any other answers would be—unless he must, if he expresses an honest view say, for example, that the sentence given in the newspaper, "Appreciates respect," for the word "Servant," is as appropriate a sentence as "Terminates doctors' experiments" for the word "Undertaking"—I do not see how the poor degree of literary merit can convert the competition into a scheme for distributing money by mere chance. The answers appeal, no doubt, only to the taste or fancy of the person who is to adjudicate, and there was an element of chance in that sense in the competition, but that does not make the adjudication a mere determination by chance and nothing but chance. The same observation appears to me to apply to the other way of stating the contention namely, that there was no standard by which to adjudicate.

I am aware that there is a dictum in the case Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4), to which I will refer in a moment, which supports the Solicitor-General's argument as to this, but it was not the decision in the case, and the view was expressed with regard to a different subject-matter, so that I cannot treat it as concluding my own opinion. With all respect to the dictum and to the argument, I cannot see how the absence or presence of a "standard" can convert an adjudication into a lottery or not a lottery according as the merit is of a low or high order. Taste and fancy are as much the test in one case as in the other. I do not know that there is any standard by which one can even discriminate between the two classes of merit, and the division itself seems to break down under the same test. At all events, it appears to me that a decision according to honest taste or fancy is not a decision by chance and nothing else, however justly one may belittle the class or degree of merit. The distinction is a very plain one between a person who buys a ticket for a lottery and a person who competes even in a scheme like this. Nothing that the former does or can do can affect the result. He only awaits the result of the drawing of lots. The other invents an answer which he thinks most likely to appeal to the taste or fancy of the editor; and, if the competition is honestly conducted, it is what he does that determines the result. So far, therefore, as the scheme appears on the face of it, I am of opinion that it was not a lottery.

Now, was there any evidence on which the appellant could properly be convicted, because it must have been contemplated that the scheme would be conducted as a lottery—that is, that the moneys would be distributed according to chance and nothing but chance? The prosecution relied on two assumptions: first, that the editor would not contemplate selling his paper at a loss, and, therefore, must have expected 40,000 answers; and, secondly, that, on that footing, there would be no sufficient time for him to look through and consider the answers. To convict an accused person of a criminal offence on such assumptions seems to me to be of more than doubtful propriety, but I do not see that they are well founded in fact. It is a much more probable assumption that a large number of the answers would be rejected either through not complying with the conditions or through their being so pointless in comparison with the others as not to be worth considering. But one must take the published answers into consideration, and, poor as the degree of literary merit may be, I cannot doubt that they show that mere chance was not in fact the only determining factor. They not only do not indicate that, but they indicate the contrary. These assumptions are, I think, purely gratuitous and not founded on any real basis, and this contention also, in my opinion, fails.

It remains to consider whether we are bound by the authorities that were cited to us namely, Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4) and Smith's Advertising Agency v. Leeds Laboratory Co. (5). In those cases—they were civil actions—the Court of Appeal on different facts and with respect to different competitions arrived at the conclusion of fact that the parties did contemplate that the scheme would be conducted as a lottery. I have already referred to the dictum on which the Solicitor-General relied, which was not the decision of the court, and which, again, related only to the facts of the particular case. I fail to see how a finding of fact on one set of circumstances can be said to establish a legal principle which

A we are bound to apply to a different set of circumstances. The decision in Hall v. Cox (1), which was also a decision by the Court of Appeal, was certainly not overruled. I do not see how, if this case could have been, and had been, tried by a jury, one could have directed them as a matter of law, because of those authorities, that the scheme was a lottery. Further, I do not think, for the reasons I have given, that there was any evidence on which they could properly B have found that it was. It is to be observed that in Barclay v. Pearson (7), which was cited by BUCKLEY, L.J., in Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4) without disapproval, STIRLING, J., citing a judgment of the chief magistrate at Bow Street, apparently assented to the view that if the object of the competition was to find the most "appropriate" word, that is, most appropriate in the opinion of the editor—which is very similar to the object of this competition—the scheme would C not be a lottery.

I wish to add that I have realised that the consequences of these competitions where the sums offered are very large and the degree of skill is very small may be, and probably are, mischievous, and that in many cases the real incentive to the readers of the newspapers to take part in them is something not far removed from the spirit of gambling. It is not perhaps to be wondered at that an Act D which was passed nearly one hundred years ago, when the conditions were so different, is not effective to deal with this state of things. Newspapers circulate more widely now than they did then, and the competitive spirit has stimulated those who desire to find fresh fields for their enterprise. But if a case is plain, as I think this is on these facts, such considerations cannot affect the interpretation of a statute not ambiguous in its terms. They are for the legislature, and E not for the court. I think that the conviction must be quashed.

ATKIN, J.—The appellant was prosecuted and convicted under the Lotteries Act, 1823, for unlawfully publishing a proposal and scheme for the sale of chances in a lottery not sanctioned by Act of Parliament. The proposal and scheme was contained in an issue of the "Sunday Chronicle" dated April 20, 1913, and took F the form of a prize competition entitled "Bounties." In order to succeed, the prosecution have to establish that the winning of a prize depends entirely upon chance.

> "The result, no doubt, depends largely on chance, but not entirely, and the cases show that to constitute a lottery it must be a matter depending entirely upon chance":

G

Hall v. Cox (1), [1899] 1 Q.B. at p. 200, per A. L. SMITH, L.J. This is a decision of the Court of Appeal which, as far as I am aware, has never been questioned, and is binding on us. The only evidence apart from evidence of publication produced by the prosecution was copies of issues of the "Sunday Chronicle" of April 20, 1913, containing the terms of the competition, and of May 4, H 1913, containing the names of the prize-winners. The defendants called no evidence, and the question is whether there was evidence before the alderman on which he could find that the scheme was one the result of which depended entirely upon chance. It is unnecessary to read the whole of the terms, which have been referred to by LUSH, J., but I should call attention to the fact that, in addition to the suggestions made and the illustrations given, the terms contained I at the bottom: "A full list of prize-winners in 'Bounties' No. 11 is given on p. 13," and on p. 13 the winning competitions there were under apparently similar conditions: First prize: "Pensioner—Enjoys prolonged existence." Second prize: "Subterfuge—Brings temporary relief." Third prize: "Remuneration—"Regulates toilers' exertions."

It was contended by the Solicitor-General that the scheme on the face of it was one that depended entirely on chance. First, it was said that the regulations nowhere stated that the prizes would be given for the best answers, and that there was no criterion of merit, and that the offer was, therefore, merely to give prizes in accordance with chance only. It appears to me plain that reading the offer as a whole, even without the examples of prize-winning answers, and certainly with them, the offer was intended to be, and would reasonably be understood to be, an offer of prizes for the best answers. The quality of goodness would be neatness, appropriateness, truth, humour; the test of merit would be the individual taste of the editor. Apart from considerations of money prizes, if this were a proposal written out for a family game I cannot imagine its being understood in any other way. Secondly, it was said that, even if it were an offer of prizes for the best answers, yet the competition was such as to admit of no gradation of merit at all. No literary skill, it was said, was required or could be shown; one answer equalled another answer in inanity, and where all were equal prize-winning could depend only upon chance. I do not agree that literary skill is essential. Any kind of skill or dexterity, whether bodily or mental, in which persons can compete would prevent a scheme from being a lottery if the result depended partly upon such skill or dexterity. Many innocent puzzles or parlour games require no literary skill, and yet lend themselves to competition not merely the result of chance. It seems to me impossible, having in view the conditions and taking into account the prize-winning examples, to say that no varying degrees of skill and ingenuity can be shown or would be shown in complying with the terms of the proposal.

Thirdly, it was said that the prizes offered amounted to £1,000, and that to recoup such a sum would require 40,000 entries at 6d. each; that the time between the last date of entry, April 24, and the day of publishing the answers, May 4, was only ten days; and that, therefore, the proper inference was that the answers could not in the time be examined for merit, and the prizes must, therefore, be taken to be awarded by chance. I do not think this a legitimate inference from the facts above stated. I see no reason for inferring that the proprietors expected or received a sufficient number of coupons with 6d. to recoup themselves £1,000. Advertisement and competition might well account for the offer. No doubt they would receive large numbers of entries. Still less do I see any reason for inferring against a person charged with a crime that he must have intended, or committed, a fraud. There seems to me no reason to suppose that many more than 40,000 answers could not have been examined in the time if a sufficient staff were brought to bear upon them. In the two cases cited to us in the Court of Appeal the actual facts had been investigated and the case did not rest on inference from the amount of the proposed prizes.

I think, therefore, that on the points urged by the prosecution there was no evidence upon which the alderman could find that the offence had been committed. I am far from saying that upon an investigation of the facts it was impossible for the scheme to be proved to have been a lottery. If, for example, it was found that in fact the prizes, or some of them, were distributed by chance, I think the offence might be proved. I doubt whether it is necessary for the prosecution to prove that some or all of the competitors intended to take part in a lottery. If a man publishes a scheme which he intends to conduct as a lottery by making the prizes depend entirely upon chance, it appears to me that he might be said to publish a proposal or scheme for the sale of chances in a lottery, though they are not bought as chances. It is not, however, necessary to decide this. In my opinion, in this case the copies of the newspapers alone were not evidence on which the defendants could have been convicted. I think, therefore, the conviction should be quashed.

CHANNELL, J. (read by LUSH, J.).—I have had the opportunity of reading the judgments of my brothers LUSH and ATKIN in this case, and I concur with some reluctance in the result at which they have arrived. The competition in question seems to me within the mischief of the Lottery Acts, but the reasoning of my brothers' judgments seems to me to be quite sound. Here there is no extrinsic

A evidence upon which it could properly be held that the competition could not be, and could not have been intended to be, carried out according to its terms. That distinguishes the case from Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4), at least so far as the main ground is concerned upon which the lords justices proceeded in that case. Looking at the terms of the advertisement, although it is not stated expressly here (as it was in the advertisement the subject of Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4)) that the prizes are to be adjudged according to merit, yet I agree that, looking at it as a whole, it does bear the interpretation that the prize is to be given to the most witty or epigrammatic sentence which complies with the conditions as to the initial letters of the words. That being so, the appointment of a judge whose decision is to be final does not make it a lottery any more than the appointment of such a judge to decide a horse race or a lawsuit makes either a lottery. I have no doubt, therefore, that, so far as regards the first, second, and third prizes, the competition cannot be held proved to be a lottery, but I have much more doubt so far as regards the 200 prizes of £1 and 100 prizes of 10s. These are very like the "consolation" prizes which FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., much relied on in his judgment in Blyth v. Hulton & Co., Ltd. (4), but those were boldly stated to be "consolation" prizes, which does not appear to oblige the judge to decide by his idea of merit at all, and I think that the editor, who was the judge there, might according to the terms, and very likely would, give a consolation prize to a person who had frequently competed without success. Here the terms of this competition suggest that the editor can distinguish between the 203rd and the 204th competition in order of merit, and between the 303rd and the 304th. I suspect that long before he got so far in placing his competitors he would be driven by what one of my brothers called the "inanity" of the sentences to decide by chance or even by favouritism. This, perhaps, is only a suspicion. I do not myself think there is much, if any, difference between a criminal case and a civil case on such a point as this, but I think that neither in a civil case nor a criminal case is the burden of proof satisfied, or even shifted, by mere suspicion. I agree that the appeal must be allowed and the conviction quashed.

Conviction quashed.

Licence—Revocation—Licence coupled with grant—Irrevocability—Licence to enter theatre to see performance—Payment by licensee for seat.

The plaintiff entered a cinematograph theatre belonging to the defendants, paid for a seat, entered the auditorium, and was shown to a seat. Later, servants of the defendants alleged that he had not paid, requested him to leave the theatre, and, when he refused, removed him by force. In an action by the plaintiff claiming from the defendants damages for assault and false imprisonment,

Held (by BUCKLEY and KENNEDY, L.JJ., PHILLIMORE, L.J., dissenting): the plaintiff paid his money to enjoy the sight of a particular spectacle during the time that spectacle last, the licence to enter the defendants' premises was only given to him to enable him to see that spectacle, and, therefore, the right to enter those premises was a licence coupled with a grant, and was irrevocable; alternatively, there was a term implied in the licence that it would not be revoked until the spectacle was ended; and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed.

Appeal by defendants from a decision of CHANNELL, J., in an action tried by him with a jury.

The plaintiff, J. P. Hurst, sued the defendants, Picture Theatres, Ltd., who were the proprietors of a cinema theatre in High Street, Kensington, to recover damages for assault and false imprisonment in removing him from his seat in the theatre which, as he alleged, he was peacefully occupying and for which he had paid. According to the plaintiff's evidence he had visited the theatre several times before Mar. 17, 1913, and was known to the commissionaire who stood at the door of the theatre. On Mar. 17 he went to the pay box, tendered a florin, and asked for a sixpenny seat, and received a metal check and his change. He then went up the passage towards the theatre, but turned back to speak to the commissionaire at the door about certain advertisements with regard to the pictures. He then returned, and was shown to his seat after giving up his check. He was subsequently asked if he came in with a ticket, and was requested to go out and see the manager, which he refused to do. Ultimately a porter, a servant of the defendants, lifted the plaintiff out of his seat, using no unnecessary force, and the plaintiff then walked quietly out. The defendants at the trial sought to prove that the plaintiff had not taken a ticket on the day in question, and, relying on Wood v. Leadbitter (1), they contended that they were justified, without giving any reason, in calling upon the plaintiff to leave the theatre and, if necessary, to have him forcibly removed. CHANNELL, J., held that, if a visitor to a place of public entertainment had paid for a seat at a performance, he was entitled to retain his seat during the performance, provided he conducted himself properly and observed the regulations of the management, and he expressed the opinion that Wood v. Leadbitter (1) was now obsolete. He left to the jury the question whether the plaintiff had paid for his seat, and the jury found that he had and returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £150 damages. The defendants appealed.

F. D. Mackinnon for the defendants.

J. A. Hawke, K.C., and T. E. Haydon for the plaintiff.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—We have listened in this case to a very ingenious and interesting argument from counsel for the defendants, but, if I may borrow the words of LORD ESHER in Butler v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (2), although it may have been quite right for him to suggest the point, it seems to me, when considered, to be contrary to good sense. I may add to that that I think it is not only contrary to good sense, but it is contrary to good law as administered since the Judicature Act in this court.

The proposition which counsel sets out to affirm is that if a man has paid for his seat at the opera, or the theatre, and has entered and taken his seat, and is behaving himself quite properly, it is competent to the proprietors of the theatre, merely because they choose so to do, to call upon him to withdraw before he has seen the performance for the enjoyment of which he has paid, and that what he holds, and what he has obtained for his money, is a mere revocable licence to come upon the land of the proprietor of the theatre, who, simply because he chooses, may say, "I revoke that licence. Go." If that proposition be true, it involves the most startling results. KENNEDY, L.J., has suggested one. Suppose that there be sitting in the stalls a man who is a constant patron of the opera or the theatre, to whom the management pay great deference, whether from his rank or his habit of attendance, and he goes to the management and says: "I do not like the person sitting in front of me or next to me; ask him to go." It would be competent to the management to go to that person and say, "Please go. You cannot have your money back. Go." For my own part, I do not see that there is anything to prevent this if the proposition is right, that, having let the seat to A., the management may come to A. at the end of the first act, or before it, and say: "I revoke your licence. Go," and A. has to go out. The management may let the seat to B. for the rest of the performance, and at the end of the second act or sooner they may come to B. and say: "I revoke your licence. Go." He will have to go, and they may let the seat a third time to C. Those are consequences which ensue from this proposition if it be well founded. It was for that reason I said at the outset of my remarks that it seems to me, when the point comes to be considered, it is contrary to good sense. And to my mind it is also contrary to good law.

The proposition is based upon the well-known decision in Wood v. Leadbitter (1). I want, at the outset, to say what it seems to me Wood v. Leadbitter (1) decided. In the first place, it affirmed that a mere licence, whether it be under seal, by which I mean a licence not coupled with an interest or a grant, is revocable. It does not matter whether it is sealed or not; it may be revoked. On the other hand, also, it affirmed that if there be a licence coupled with an interest or coupled with a grant, that is not, or at any rate in general is not, revocable. For those two propositions, I read these two sentences from Wood v. Leadbitter (1) (13 M. & W. at p. 844):

> "A mere licence is revocable; but that which is called a licence is often something more than a licence; it often comprises or is connected with a grant, and then the party who has given it cannot in general revoke it, so as to defeat his grant, to which it was incident. It may be further observed that a licence under seal (provided it be a mere licence) is as revocable as a licence by parol, and on the other hand a licence by parol coupled with a grant is as irrevocable as a licence by deed provided only that the grant is of a nature capable of being made by parol."

Those are propositions with which, as it seems to me, no one can quarrel. What was decided in Wood v. Leadbitter (1), I think, was this. The decision might have been on either of two grounds—I will indicate them both—but I think it was on the second of those which I am going to mention. It may have been on the ground that the plaintiff who had bought his ticket for the race meeting had not obtained any grant of the right to come during the currency of the meeting to see a particular spectacle from its commencement to its termination. If that were the ground, I think that would be erroneous, and that there was a grant, when he paid for his ticket, of the right to go on each day. I conceive he had the right to see what was to be seen on those days, and to do that which he was minded to do in connection with racing during those days. But I do not think that was the ground on which the court decided the case. They decided it upon the ground that no incorporeal right affecting land could be created or transferred otherwise than by deed, a proposition which was discussed with some elaboration in the course of the judgment. What ALDERSON, B., was saying there was: This man has no deed; he has nothing under seal; he has, therefore, no grant; he cannot in this court be heard to say he is a grantee, and because he is not a grantee he is a mere licensee, and being a mere licensee (whether it is under seal, or not under seal, does not make any difference) the licence is revocable.

Let me for a moment discuss this present case upon the footing that Wood v. Leadbitter (1) stands as good law at this date. I am going to say presently that, to my mind, it does not, but suppose it does. What are the facts of this case, and what is the grant? What the plaintiff in the present action paid his money for was to enjoy the sight of a particular spectacle. He was anxious to go into a picture theatre to see a series of moving pictures during an hour or a couple of hours, whatever the time might be. That which was granted to him, that which was sold to him, was a right of enjoyment by looking at something or other, to attend a performance from its beginning to its end. That which was called the licence, the right to go upon the premises, was only something granted to him for the purpose of enabling him to enjoy that which had been granted him—namely, the right to see. He could not see the performance unless he went into the building. His right to go into the building was something given to him in order to enable him to have the benefit of that which had been granted to him—namely, the right to see the moving pictures. So that here, to my mind, there was a licence coupled with a grant. If so, Wood v. Leadbitter (1) does not stand in the way at all. A licence coupled with a grant is not revocable. Wood v. Leadbitter (1) affirmed as much.

So far I have been treating the case as if Wood v. Leadbitter (1) were law now as administered in every court. Let us see how that matter stands. Wood v. Leadbitter (1) was decided in a court of law before the Judicature Acts. Therefore, it was a case to be decided simply upon the principles which are applicable in a court of law as distinguished from a court of equity. What was the principle which would have been administered in a court of equity in the year 1845, the date of Wood v. Leadbitter (1), or subsequently? I find that elicited best, I think, from looking at the decision of PAGE WOOD, V.-C., in Frogley v. Earl Lovelace (3). Other cases have been cited to us, but I select this one because it seems to me the most pertinent, and to state the proposition in the most plain manner. The facts in Frogley v. Earl of Lovelace (3) were these. The defendant was lessor to the plaintiff of certain lands for twenty-one years; he had executed a lease to him, but previously to the execution of the lease this memorandum, which was not under seal, was indorsed on the lease:

> "It is hereby agreed that the lessee should have the exclusive right of sporting over, and killing the game upon, the lands included in the within written lease, and also upon the lands adjacent thereto belonging to the said earl during the continuance of the said term, if the lessee shall so long live; he undertaking to keep and leave a fair stock of game thereupon, and not to keep such an excessive quantity of hares and rabbits as to do damage to the said earl or his under-tenants in the neighbourhood."

On Feb. 9, 1859, the lessor served the lessee with a notice that after that date he revoked, rescinded, and put an end to that agreement. The question was whether he could do so or not. The suit was brought in a court of equity for specific performance for the execution of a proper instrument under seal giving effect to the document which is not under seal, and the plaintiff moved for an injunction as prayed by his bill, which was an injunction to give effect to his rights until that deed had been executed, and that was the matter which came before the vice-chancellor. The vice-chancellor says this (John. at p. 333):

> "The memorandum is a mere writing not under seal, and the case of Wood v. Leadbitter (1) has decided that, in order to acquire a right such as that which is here claimed by the plaintiff, an instrument under seal is necessary; and that, at law, an instrument purporting to grant such a right, though given for a valuable consideration, is revocable at any time, and without paying back the money. At law, therefore, the plaintiff has no remedy until the defendant shall have executed a deed containing a proper and legal grant of the exclusive right of sporting in accordance with the terms of the agreement."

Finding, however, that the plaintiff's interest was incapable of being supported at law upon the footing of Wood v. Leadbitter (1), he gave him relief in equity, and in so doing he says:

> "It appears to me that the plaintiff is clearly entitled to an injunction in the interval until the defendant shall have executed a proper legal grant of the right claimed by the plaintiff."

What could be plainer? According to Wood v. Leadbitter (1) the plaintiff would have been dismissed from a court of law; he would have had no case. He comes into a court of equity, and he obtains relief in equity his remedy being given until he has been clothed with such rights under a proper instrument as would give him a remedy at law, and then he is left to his legal rights. I will only read a few words from the judgment of KAY, J., in McManus v. Cooke (4) which is really to the same effect. I need not state the facts. KAY, J., says (35 Ch.D. at p. 695):

> "Hewlins v. Shippam (5), Wood v. Leadbitter (1), and other authorities at common law, were cited, and it was argued that the right claimed could only be granted by deed, and that therefore the licence was revocable; but this common law doctrine was not allowed to prevail in equity."

As I have shown in Lord Lovelace's Case (3), it was not allowed to prevail in equity.

The position of matters now is, that the court is bound under the Judicature Acts to give effect to equitable doctrines. The question we have to consider is whether, having regard to equitable considerations, Wood v. Leadbitter (1) is now law, meaning that it is a decision which can be applied in its integrity in a court which is bound to give effect to equitable considerations. In my opinion, it is not. COZENS-HARDY, J., in Lowe v. Adams (6) said this ([1901] 2 Ch. at p. 600):

> "Whether Wood v. Leadbitter (1) is still good law having regard to Walsh v. Lonsdale (7) is very doubtful."

PARKER, J., in James Jones & Sons, Ltd. v. Earl of Tankerville (8), says this ([1909] 2 Ch. at p. 443):

> "An injunction restraining the revocation of the licence when it is revocable at law may in a sense be called relief by way of specific performance, but it is not specific performance in the sense of compelling the vendor to do anything. It merely prevents him from breaking his contract, and protects a right of equity which, but for the absence of a seal, would be a right at law, and since the Judicature Act it may well be doubted whether the absence of a seal in such a case can be relied on in any court."

Now, of course, what was relied on in Wood v. Leadbitter (1), and rightly relied on at that date, was that there was not an instrument under seal, and, therefore, there was not a grant and the licensee could not say that he was not a mere licensee, but a licensee with a grant. That is now swept away. It cannot be said as against the man that he is a licensee with no grant merely because there is not an instrument under seal which gives him a right at law.

There is another way in which this matter may be put, and that is this. If there be a licence with an agreement to give a person a right (an agreement not to revoke the licence) that, if given for value, is an enforceable right. If the facts here are, as I think they are, that the licence which was granted was a licence to enter the building, and see the spectacle from its commencement until its termination, then there was included in that contract a contract not to revoke that until the play had run to its termination. It was then a breach of contract to break the obligation not to revoke the licence, and for that the decision in Kerrison v. Smith (9) is an authority. So far I have dealt with the law.

On the facts of the case there was an assault on the plaintiff, and an assault of a grievous kind. He was exposed to indignity, and for that indignity the jury have given him a verdict. The defendants had, I think, for value contracted that the plaintiff should see a certain spectacle from its commencement to its termination, whatever it was. They broke that contract, and it was a tort on their part to remove him. I do not say the assault was of violent kind because, like a wise man, the plaintiff gave way to superior force, and left the theatre. The defendants sought to justify the assault by saying that they were entitled to remove him because he had not paid. He had paid, and the jury have so found. Failing on that question of fact, they say that they were entitled to remove him because his licence was revocable. In my opinion, it was not. There was no justification for the assault here committed, and under the circumstances it was for the jury to give the plaintiff such a sum as was right for the assault which was committed upon him, and for the serious indignity to a gentleman of being seized and treated in this way in a place of public resort. The jury have found that he was originally in the theatre as a spectator, that the assault was committed upon him, and that it was a wrongful act. I think that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

KENNEDY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. We have heard a very careful and interesting argument chiefly affecting the character of Wood v. Leadbitter (1). Personally I am indifferent whether that case has or has not been subjected to some slight imputations upon its character. It was a decision of a great court, and I desire to treat it myself with the utmost respect, but I do not think it touches this case at all.

The plaintiff was in this picture theatre, and was assaulted and subjected to indignities which were entirely unjustifiable by those who handled him and compelled him to go out. What is his position? He says: "I was there by right; I was occupying a seat for which I had paid in a place of public entertainment"; and he says that if you pay a certain price you must be entitled to the possession of the seat. The seat, I understand, is one which he may choose; it is not a reserved seat. He did enter that seat, and they took him out again practically, in the eyes of the law, by force. The defendants have to justify that, and they justify it by saying that there is a point of law apart from the defence in fact which failed—namely, that the plaintiff was not there by right because he had not fulfilled the condition of payment. The defendants say through counsel in this court: "In point of law, even if you did pay, even if you had performed those conditions, I had a right to turn you out, although you might be behaving in the way which those who go into places of public entertainment (by implied contract at any rate) are bound to behave." But the burden, remember, lies upon the defendants. The plaintiff is there primâ facie in possession of a place in the theatre, and they must justify this taking of him out. They say: "In law we are justified because all that you had was a revocable licence. When we use the words 'revocable licence'," says the defendants, "we meant that we can at will require you, and you are bound to obey, to leave this building. Therefore, as we can do so, you must go quietly, and if you do not go quietly we were right, using no more force than was necessary, in putting you out." For the reasons I ventured to refer to in the course of the argument by way of illustration (which have been better illustrated by BUCKLEY, L.J., in his judgment) such an astounding conclusion is one which one would require, as a matter of law and as a matter of common sense, to be strictly justified. The justification is hung entirely on the peg of the doctrine which is said to be the doctrine established, by the considered decision of a great Court of Exchequer in the year 1845 in Wood v. Leadbitter (1).

With regard to that decision, I am not going myself to say, and I should feel I was presumptuous in saying, that it was not at the time a perfectly good decision. It has been quoted frequently with respect, and I am not going to say a word in diminution of that respect. But what was the decision? It is stated, and I think with perfect correctness, in 13 M. & W. at p. 838,

> "A right to come and remain for a certain time on the land of another can be granted only by deed; and a parol licence to do so, though money be paid for it, is revocable at any time, and without paying back the money."

One must be to some extent guided by the view which I hold that in this case, as BUCKLEY, L.J., has intimated, the contract would not be correctly expressed by saying that there was a right to come and remain for a certain time on the land of another. In this case, I think there was, if you were to put the contract into terms, a contract that there should be an irrevocable right to remain until the conclusion of this performance which lasted one or two hours, longer or shorter as the case may be. I do not rely upon that, and for this reason, that in Wood v. Leadbitter (1), which one is bound to examine with absolute candour and frankness—and I will assume it was not absent from the minds of counsel and the judges—the man who was upon the racecourse might have said: "I have the same sort of contract," but he did not say it, and, therefore, I will leave the matter alone. What was decided is stated there, namely, that the grant, to be effectual and irrevocable, must be a grant valid in law, and such a grant could only be made by deed. Passages have been quoted from that judgment, and I am not going to take up time by quoting them again, but I do think that it is important to remember that at the very commencement of the judgment of ALDERSON, B., he points out that the question arose upon the plea and its replication, and the replication, he points out, is that: "At the time of such removal, the plaintiff was in the said close by the leave and licence of Lord Eglintoun." Therefore, it was not there suggested by the plaintiff, who had to reply: "My right to remain is not merely by leave and licence of Lord Eglintoun: I have an implied contract that I should be there without revocation." Therefore, as I say, one must deal with the matter upon that pleading, and upon that pleading the judgment of the court cannot be put more specifically or more correctly than in the passage I have quoted from the headnote (13 M. & W. 838). In order to make good your case, you must show that there was a grant by deed; if you show only a parol licence, you have no case. There are many passages which show that. When the learned ALDERSON, B., is commenting on the case, with which they differ, of Tayler v. Waters (10), he says (13 M. & W. at p. 854):

> "It was taken for granted that, if the Statute of Frauds did not apply, a parol licence was sufficient, and the necessity of an instrument under seal, by reason of the interest in question being a right in the nature of an easement, was by some inadvertence kept entirely out of sight."

There is language used in the passage (ibid. at p. 845) which has been already cited by BUCKLEY, L.J., to the same effect, and which states this in one sentence only which I need repeat:

> "But where there is a licence by parol, coupled with a parol grant, or pretended grant, of something which is incapable of being granted otherwise than by

Does that apply now? Since the Judicature Acts there is no doubt that we have to apply the principles of equity, and can there be any doubt that according to the principles of the cases which have been cited, there was in this case that B which was not granted by a deed, and which need not be granted by a deed, and that, therefore, there was that which is valid now in equity as a good title upon which the plaintiff, being in possession of a seat, had a right to stay and say: "It is no use your saying to me I am obliged to go because I have not got in the language of Wood v. Leadbitter (1) a grant by deed; this is an interest which, whether you call it an easement or not, is an interest which I can now acquire C in equity by parol, and I have that interest."

The passage which has been quoted from PARKER, J.'s judgment, in James Jones & Sons v. Earl of Tankerville (8) states that which I assume to be right—namely, that it is not merely a question of obtaining specific performance and compelling a person to do anything. The right which we have to administer in equity is one which prevents either party from breaking his contract, and protects D a right in equity which, but for the absence of the seal, would be a right of law. There is also the judgment of KAY, J., in McManus v. Cooke (4), where the learned judge sets out a number of propositions established by the authorities in regard to these questions, and among other things says (35 Ch.D. at p. 697) that the equity applies

E "wherever the defendant has obtained and is in possession of some substantial advantage under a parol agreement which, if in writing, would be such as the court would direct to be specifically performed. The doctrine applies to a parol agreement for an easement, though no interest in land is intended to be acquired."

F I have come to the conclusion, therefore, putting aside altogether the question what the contract was in this case, that in fact to treat it upon the basis of Wood v. Leadbitter (1) being good law is wrong because of modern legislation. It is, and, I will say, happily, no longer good law to justify such an act as the defendants have done here. In this particular case I think I ought to add that that which we are now asserting has already been recognised in the passage to which I referred G in the course of the argument in SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK'S works upon TORTS, and also in ROSCOE'S NISI PRIUS. The former points out carefully, 9th Edn. p. 390, referring to Wood v. Leadbitter (1), and Tayler v. Waters (10), which was there overruled, that even in such a case, where there had been part performance, specific performance is sometimes decreed, and equitable rights are now enforced by all the courts. Under those circumstances it seems to me that there was here H a good equitable right which rendered the act of the defendants bad in law.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—All one's sympathy in this case must be for the plaintiff, and if he had failed in getting his judgment for the sum given to him by the jury for the unjustifiable assault, I should have thought at any rate he ought to have had judgment for his sixpence, and very properly, as the issue which was raised I reflected upon his character, with costs, and I should not have seen any reason to differ from a learned judge who certified for High Court costs. But one must not allow one's sympathy for him to make one decide that which one does not think good law. Although I express my opinion with the very greatest diffidence, and put it, as will be seen later, in the nature of doubts, more as if the matter were non-proven than as a decision, I still feel bound to express those doubts. My diffidence arises, first of all, from the fact that I am differing from an opinion of CHANNELL, J., from whom, in a long course of simultaneous judicial career I hardly ever found myself in disagreement; secondly, of course, and even more strongly, because my brethren here feel so clearly about the case. With regard to the results which are supposed to flow from an opposite conclusion, I can only say that if people are impracticable and unbusinesslike, very serious results would flow in either direction. Certainly I should advise the owners of places of entertainment, and still more the owners of picture theatres who have not the remedy of refusing to continue the performance if a person is intractable, to put conditions upon their tickets in future.

I start by saying that I think the circumstances in this case make it indistinguishable from Wood v. Leadbitter (1)—not only from Wood v. Leadbitter (1), but from Tayler v. Waters (10) which was overruled by Wood v. Leadbitter (1) and Malone v. Harris (11), which is, I think, a case of great importance and approves Wood v. Leadbitter (1) and the overruling of Tayler v. Waters (10) by Wood v. Leadbitter (1). In all these cases for a sum of money a ticket is given which purported to admit to the defendants' close for the purpose of enabling the person admitted, not to have any particular spot which could be said to be in any sense demised to him, but to stand or sit, or stand and sit during the progress of an entertainment which was conducted in the close, or was visible from the close. It seems to me the circumstances, therefore, are indistinguishable from Wood v. Leadbitter (1). My second stage is that Wood v. Leadbitter (1), when it was decided, was good law. I am aware that it is only a decision of the Court of Exchequer, and not of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but it received very shortly afterwards the approval of both the other courts, and, therefore, has the weight of all the common law judges at the time. It was decided in 1845. Incidentally, no doubt, it was referred to and approved in 1850 in Adams v. Andrews (12) by the Court of Queen's Bench. It was referred to and approved in 1851 in Taplin v. Florence (13), by the Court of Common Pleas, and a later approval of the same case is furnished by Cornish v. Stubbs (14) in 1870, when the great weight of WILLES, J., was added. It was also approved (I am speaking again before the Judicature Act) in Malone v. Harris (11), where the Lord Chancellor stated that an action at law had been brought, but had failed, and rightly failed, on the ground that the case was indistinguishable from Wood v. Leadbitter (1), and from Tayler v. Waters (10), which Wood v. Leadbitter (1) had very properly overruled. Therefore, I think the weight of Wood v. Leadbitter (1) was exceedingly great. The equity cases—I am speaking of the equity cases before the Judicature Act—do not, in my opinion, detract in any way from Wood v. Leadbitter (1). All the cases which have been cited relate to an interest given in land, and the whole point of the decision in Wood v. Leadbitter (1) was that the grant of the ticket there gave no interest in land, but only a licence—it mattered not whether by deed or otherwise, all licences, whether by deed or otherwise, being at law revocable. Not only did Wood v. Leadbitter (1) receive that approval before the Judicature Act, but, to my mind, it has been inferentially approved in Butler v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (2), and certainly approved by COLLINS, J., in Kerrison v. Smith (9) [both after the Judicature Act]. In Butler v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (2), of course, it was only approved in the sense that it was distinguished, but, without going into detail about it, there are expressions of each of the three judges, the Master of the Rolls, LINDLEY, L.J., and, perhaps most clearly, LOPES, L.J., which show the grounds upon which they distinguish the case without detracting from its value.

The next point I have to consider is: Has the Judicature Act made a difference? If there was a grant of an interest in land, yes. If there was not a grant of an interest in land, no. Walsh v. Lonsdale (7) is a case very much in point. I assume for this purpose that the law may be taken to be stated by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., the other learned judges only dealing with details. He puts the point with that breadth and clearness which everybody who has pleaded before that great judge.

A or has read his judgments, knows was his characteristic. In the course of the argument he said (21 Ch.D. at p. 14):

> "A tenant holding under an agreement for a lease of which specific performance would be decreed stands in the same position as to liability as if the lease had been executed. He is not since the Judicature Act a tenant from year to year; he holds under the agreement, and every branch of the court must now give him the same rights."

Still more clearly in his judgment he says (ibid.):

> "There is an agreement for a lease under which possession has been given. Now since the Judicature Act the possession is held under the agreement. There are not two estates as there were formerly: one estate at common law by reason of the payment of the rent from year to year, and an estate in equity under the agreement. There is only one court, and the equity rules prevail in it."

In other words, the lessee has the estate which equity thinks he ought to have. That has no bearing on the question if there is no estate, and no interest in land given by the document relied on. Assume, therefore, that there was a contract, and assume that the purported revocation was a breach of the contract, and assume that of which I am not certain, that equity would give specific performance of such a contract. Specific performance does not necessarily put a man before he has got specific performance in the legal possession which he gets after he has got specific performance. It does in the case of interests in land, because the interest in land now is the interest which he had before. But it does not necessarily do so with regard to interests arising on a contract. I do not say that from my own view only; it appears to be the view taken by two text-book writers of importance —CLERK AND LINDSELL, and SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK. I should not myself have much relied on text-book writers, but I have the example of COLLINS, J., for citing the one, and KENNEDY, L.J., for citing the other. COLLINS, J., in Kerrison v. Smith (9), puts it in this way ([1897] 2 Q.B. at p. 448):

> "It was conceded that the grantor has a right to revoke a licence, but the point set up by the plaintiff that there was a contract, for the breach of which the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages, was never properly dealt with. There appears to be no case in which the point has been specifically raised and decided as to whether there is a right to maintain an action for breach of contract if a licence is revoked, although there is a right to revoke the licence, but on principle it seems to me that the two rights are compatible with one another."

G

That is to say, the licence can be revoked, in which case the licensee becomes a trespasser if he stays on, but nevertheless there may be a contract for which he may recover damages. I do not say myself that that is necessarily sound law, but it is the view taken by COLLINS, J. At the end of his judgment he quotes CLERK AND LINDSELL ON TORTS (2nd Edn.), p. 302:

H

> "Such a licence, though it may have been made by deed and for valuable consideration, is revocable at any time by the licensor; the licensee cannot after revocation justify entering upon the land for the purpose of using the privilege; his only remedy against his licensor where the revocation is wrongful is upon the contract."

SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK ON TORTS ((9th Edn.), p. 390) is even more explicit:

> "The revocation of a licence is in itself no less effectual, though it may be a breach of contract. If the owner of land or a building admits people thereto on payment, as spectator of an entertainment or the like, it may be a breach of contract to require a person who has duly paid his money and entered, to go out, but a person so required has no title to stay, and if he persists in staying he is a trespasser. His only right is to sue on the contract, as he clearly may do where a contract exists, when, indeed, he may get an injunction, and so be indirectly restored to the enjoyment of his licence." A

I repeat some words for particular reasons: "But a person so required has no title to stay, and if he persists in staying, is a trespasser." That is the issue to be determined in this case. The action is for assault, and the defence is: You were a trespasser; you had a warning to go, and I removed you, using no more force than necessary. The question is whether the plaintiff was a trespasser. Therefore, it does not follow, because specific performance of the contract could be obtained, that till the contract has been specifically performed, the plaintiff has the rights which he will get when the contract has been given specific performance. B C

However, there is a possible view of this case which may not make it necessary to take that view. I am not at all sure (here, I think, I differ from COLLINS, J.) that the real construction of Wood v. Leadbitter (1) is not that the contract is not that which people think it was. I am not at all sure that the contract must not be said to be this: "I cannot grant you a licence because I cannot bind myself not to make it revocable, not even if I do so by deed; therefore, I do not because the law does not allow me to do so. The real contract is this: In consideration of such a sum of pounds, shillings, and pence, I give you a licence to enter my close, and to remain there during a certain entertainment. If I revoke the licence for other than good cause I will repay you the money you have paid." I put carefully "during the entertainment." I think, unless the licensor lets the licensee stop until the end, he must return him all his money, and I throw out for consideration whether the real virtue of the decision in Wood v. Leadbitter (1) is not that that is the nature of this contract. However that may be, not being able to distinguish this case from Wood v. Leadbitter (1), and thinking Wood v. Leadbitter (1) was and remains good law and that the equity doctrines do not affect it, I am obliged to come to the conclusion, which I have tried to express with clearness, and I hope to be considered to express with diffidence, that my view as it at present exists, unmoved by further argument, is that the appeal ought to be allowed. SPALDING v. A. W. GAMAGE, LTD. AND ANOTHER

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Sargant, J.), June 24, 25, 1914]

Costs—Taxation—Review—Separate defences and counsel of two companies appearing by same solicitor—Disallowance on taxation of separate defence of one company—Discretion of master—Three-fourths of share capital of that company held by other company—R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (8), r. 27 (41).

G., Ltd., and B., Ltd., the defendants to an action, appeared by the same solicitor, but put in separate defences and employed separate leading counsel at the trial. The plaintiffs won the action at first instance, but on appeal to the Court of Appeal the defendants succeeded and the action was dismissed, with costs in the court below and in the Court of Appeal. On taxation the taxing master, acting under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (8), disallowed the costs of the separate defence put in by B., Ltd., and of their counsel on the ground that the two companies were practically identical and should have joined in the same defence. G., Ltd., held three-fourths of the share capital in B., Ltd. On a summons to review the taxation taken out by the defendants, Held: under Ord. 65, r. 27 (41), the court had power to review the discretion exercised by the taxing master under r. 27 (8) of Ord. 65, and in the present case the court would direct the taxing master to allow the costs he had disallowed because on the facts the two defendants were not practically identical and there was a reasonable probability of there being substantial differences in their defences at the trial.

Ager v. Blacklock & Co. (1) (1887), 56 L.T. 890, applied.

Boswell v. Coaks (3) (1887), 36 Ch.D. 444, distinguished.

Notes. The whole of Ord. 65, except certain irrelevant rules, was revoked by the Rules of the Supreme Court (No. 3), 1959, and replaced by the rules set out in Sched. 2 thereto, cited as the Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959. It would appeal from the discretion of the taxing master. It was held, on appeal to the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1962, at pp. 1879, 1880, that the present decision remains for consideration under r. 7 of the 1959 rules.

Summons to review taxation.

On Aug. 30, 1912, A. G. Spalding commenced an action against A. W. Gamage for an injunction to restrain them from selling, advertising, offering for sale, or supplying footballs other than the plaintiffs' "Improved Orb" or "Specially tested Orb" footballs as and for the plaintiffs' "Improved Orb" or "Specially tested Orb" footballs, and damages. In the following October the defendants Messrs. Benetfink & Co., Ltd., a company in which A. W. Gamage held a controlling interest, were added as defendants to the action, and the same relief was sought against both defendants. Both defendants appeared by the same solicitors, but they put in separate defences and employed separate leading counsel at the trial. The plaintiffs won their action before SARGANT, J., and an injunction was granted with an inquiry as to damages. The defendants appealed, and appeared on the appeal by the same counsel, and the decision of the court below was reversed and the action was dismissed with costs in the court below and in the Court of Appeal. On taxation the taxing master, after considering certain objections carried in by the plaintiffs, disallowed the costs of the separate defence put in by Benetfink & Co. and the costs of their counsel, giving as his reason that the two companies were practically identical, and that the defendants should have joined in the same defence. The defendants then carried in counter-objections to the taxation on the ground that the two defendants were separate and distinct companies and that the severance of the defence of the defendants Benetfink & Co. and their separate representation at the trial were necessary and proper steps for their protection in the circumstances of the case. The defendant companies, A. W. Gamage and Benetfink & Co., were separate companies and separate and distinct entities, although A. W. Gamage, Ltd., had a controlling interest in Benetfink & Co. by reason of the fact that they held upwards of three-fourths of the issued capital. Had Benetfink & Co. appeared in the action by a separate solicitor, it could not be contended that they were not entitled to all their costs under the order of the Court of Appeal herein. Primâ facie, Benetfink & Co. were entitled to their costs (being the items disallowed by the taxing master), and the onus was on the plaintiff to show that the case was within the terms of Ord. 65, r. 27, sub-r. 8. The action was divided into two separate parts, first, the case based on the newspaper advertisements which were complained of, and secondly, the case based upon actual passing off and incidents in the shops of the different defendants alleged to amount to passing off. As regards the first part, the common case of both defendants was that the newspaper advertisements were not actionable, and the separate case of Benetfink & Co. was that they were not responsible for the advertisements or their consequences. This latter defence failed before SARGANT, J., and was not argued in the Court of Appeal, but it was their substantial independent defence and it could not have been properly or conveniently argued together with the defence of A. W. Gamage. As regards the second part of the case, the incidents affecting the two defendants were wholly distinct, and it might well have been necessary or prudent for the counsel representing them to take distinct and even inconsistent lines in dealing with the evidence of the plaintiffs. In any case, Benetfink & Co. were advised by counsel that they should deliver a separate defence and be separately represented at the trial, and it was a reasonable precaution for them to adopt and act upon such advice. In answer to these counter-objections the taxing master stated his reasons for the disallowance as follows:

> "Messrs. Gamage in their advertisements describe Messrs. Benetfink as their city depot. See advertisement herewith. And at the meeting of Gamages, the chairman referred to the profits of their city branch Benetfinks. I have come to the conclusion that as the parties are practically identical and the defences practically identical, separate defences and a separate leader should not be allowed; and these objections are therefore overruled."

This summons was taken out by the defendants, Benetfink & Co. asking that the defendants' counter-objections might be allowed and that it might be referred back to the taxing master to vary his certificate.

Romer, K.C., and D. M. Kerly for the defendants.
Martelli, K.C., and A. F. Topham for the plaintiffs.

SARGANT, J.—This is a summons asking that certain counter-objections by the defendants to a taxation of costs in the action may be allowed and that it may be referred back to the taxing master to vary the certificate accordingly. The matter arises in this way. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and read the taxing master's reasons, and continued:] With regard to the practical identity of the defendants it seems to me that the taxing master must have been adopting the view put before him on behalf of the plaintiffs that by reason of the identity of the holding of the share capital in the two companies the two defendants were to be treated as substantially one entity, although I am not in the least suggesting that the taxing master meant to say that they were the same entity in point of law. The facts appear to be that A. W. Gamage hold a controlling interest, that is to say, more than three-fourths of the share capital in Benetfink & Co., but to my mind that makes very little difference. I have to consider at any rate the shareholders who hold the remaining portion of the capital of Benetfink & Co., and I can imagine that when the two concerns are being carried on under different names it may be of great importance to the undertaking carried on under the name of Benetfink & Co. that they should not be held liable in an action of this kind, although at the same time A. W. Gamage should be held liable. With regard to that portion of the taxing master's reasons it seems to me that he has allowed certain considerations to influence him which should not have been allowed to influence him.

Then I come to the more important question whether the defences of Benetfink & Co. and A. W. Gamage were practically identical, because, even though the parties were not practically identical, still, if I thought that the defences were practically identical I should hold, under the circumstances, that they were not entitled to put in separate defences or to appear separately at the trial. [HIS LORDSHIP considered the facts and came to the conclusion that there was a reasonable probability that at the trial the case of Benetfink & Co. would be in one or more respects substantially different from the case of A. W. Gamage, and continued:] Taking that view of the case I am of opinion that the two defendants were entitled to put in separate defences, and if the matter lay with me I should come to the conclusion that they were well advised in so doing. It is extremely awkward for counsel when the cases of two sets of defendants are at all different to throw themselves first into the defence of one set of defendants and afterwards into that of the other set of defendants, although there may not be any material incompatibility between them. I am relieved, however, from pursuing that subject because counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs admitted that for the purposes of the problem which I have to consider, the question is whether there was a reasonable probability of there being a substantial difference in the two defences, and in my opinion there was.

There arises a more important general question whether this is a case in which I am entitled to review the taxation of the taxing master, or whether it is a case in which he has such a discretion that I am precluded from reviewing it. The terms of sub-r. (8) of Ord. 65, r. 27 are these:

> "Where the same solicitor is employed for two or more defendants, and separate pleadings are delivered or other proceedings had by or for two or more such defendants separately the taxing officer shall consider in the taxation of such solicitor's bill of costs, either between party and party or between solicitor and client, whether such separate pleadings or other proceedings were necessary or proper, and if he is of opinion that any part of the costs occasioned thereby has been unnecessarily or improperly incurred the same shall be disallowed."

Counsel on behalf of the defendants has contended that this sub-rule does not apply to a case which involves the whole costs of the action when ordered to be paid by one party to the other. He says that, in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal dismissing this action with costs, it was not open to the taxing master to disallow altogether the bill of costs of one set of defendants unless some special direction to that effect had been given by the Court of Appeal. He says that the sub-rule only applies to interlocutory proceedings in the course of an action and not to the defence at the trial. I see no reason for so limiting the general effect of the sub-rule, at any rate, no fresh reason arising since the decisions to which I am about to refer, and I hold that the sub-rule is one which is applicable to the present case. But is the taxing master under that sub-rule the sole judge? Has he such a discretion that it is not open to review? On that point three cases have been cited to me, one—Beattie v. Lord Ebury (2)—a case under the old practice of bill and answer decided in 1873, in which BACON, V.-C., undoubtedly came to the conclusion that the discretion was thrown on the taxing master and that the court could not interfere with the exercise of that discretion. The matter afterwards came before KEKEWICH, J., in Ager v. Blacklock & Co. (1), a case in which the defendants had joined in a statement of defence and afterwards had appeared separately at the trial, so that it was a stronger case than the present in favour of the disallowance of separate sets of costs. The action was brought against printers and publishers, and KEKEWICH, J., held that the matter was not one purely in the taxing master's discretion, and came to the conclusion that the defences of the two defendants were so separate in principle that two sets of costs ought to be allowed, and held that he was entitled, as a question of principle, to overrule the decision of the taxing master, and make an order accordingly under which both sets of defendants would get their costs.

The only other authority is the well-known case of Boswell v. Coaks (3), where the House of Lords, in allowing an appeal from the Court of Appeal and re-affirming the judgment of FRY, J., made a special order (36 Ch.D. at p. 445) that > "in taxing the costs below, both in the High Court of Justice and in the Court of Appeal, the taxing master do consider whether any of the defendants in the cause who appeared separately had sufficient reason for severing in their defences, and if and in so far as it shall appear that they had not, then the said taxing master shall allow only one set of costs, or only as many sets of costs as he shall think right."

The taxing master allowed six separate sets of costs to six separate defendants, and, on a summons to review the taxation, NORTH, J., held that there was no appeal from the discretion of the taxing master. It was held, on appeal to the Court of Appeal, that, as the House of Lords had delegated to the taxing master the decision of the question how many sets of costs should be allowed, no appeal would lie from his decision unless he altogether omitted to exercise his discretion. In my opinion, that decision was not a decision at all upon the terms of the sub-rule now in question. It was a decision upon the meaning of the special order made by the House of Lords in that particular case, and the reason for the decision is perhaps most neatly put in an interlocutory observation of BOWEN, L.J., where he says (36 Ch.D. at p. 451), "Has not the House of Lords delegated its jurisdiction as to costs to the taxing master?" That being so, I prefer to follow the decision of KEKEWICH, J., in Ager v. Blacklock & Co. (1) as against the decision of BACON, V.-C., in Beattie v. Lord Ebury (2). Taking, as I do, the view that the case is one not purely for the discretion of the taxing master, but that I have power to review the taxation under sub-r. (41) of r. 27 of Ord. 65, and coming, as I do, to the conclusion that no importance is to be attached to the fact that the share capital of Benetfink & Co. is very largely held by A. W. Gamage, and also holding, as a matter of fact, that there were sufficient reasonable grounds for thinking that there would be a divergence between the defences of the two defendants at the trial on material points, I am of opinion that the decision of the taxing master to strike out altogether the items referring to the separate costs of Benetfink & Co. cannot be sustained, and that the matter should be referred back to him to be reviewed in the light of the judgment which I have pronounced.

Order accordingly.

Re LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE BANK'S LEASE. W. DAVIS & SON v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE BANK

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Eve, J.), January 16, 1914]

Landlord and Tenant—Notice to quit—Time for giving—Tenancy for term of years certain determinable "after expiration of first three years of term"—Notice given before expiration of three years to quit on date after expiration.

Lessors demised premises to lessees for a term of five years from Mar. 25, 1911, at a yearly rent of £225 payable by equal payments on the usual quarter days. The lease provided that "after the expiration of the first three years of the term . . . if the lessees shall desire to determine this lease and shall give to the lessors six calendar months' previous notice in writing . . . such notice to determine on any quarter day" then immediately on the expiration of such notice the lease should cease and be void. On Nov. 14, 1913, i.e., before the first three years of the term had expired, the lessees gave six calendar months' notice to quit the premises on June 24, 1914, which was after the expiry of the first three years of the term.

Held: the notice was invalid since on the true construction of the lease notice to quit could not be given before the expiration of the first three years of the term on Mar. 24, 1914, and, therefore, the earliest date at which the lessees could determine the tenancy was Sept. 29, 1914.

Originating Summons raising the question whether on the true construction of a lease plaintiffs, the tenants, were entitled to determine the lease on June 24, 1914, by six months' prior notice given on Nov. 14, 1913, before the expiry of the first three years of the lease.

The agreed facts were as follows. A ground-floor messuage or shop and yard, No. 381, Lord Street, Southport, were demised by the defendants to the plaintiffs for a term of five years from Mar. 25, 1911, at the yearly rent of £225, to be paid by equal quarterly payments on June 24, Sept. 29, Dec. 25, and Mar. 25 in every year of the tenancy, the first of such payments to be considered due on Mar. 25, 1911, and every succeeding quarter's rent to become due and to be payable (if required) and recoverable in advance. The indenture of lease contained a provision in the following terms:

> "And it is hereby further agreed and declared that after the expiration of the first three years of the term hereby granted, if the lessees shall desire to determine this lease and shall give to the lessors six calendar months' previous notice in writing of such their desire, such notice to determine on any quarter day, and shall up to the time of such determination pay the rent and observe and perform the covenants on their part hereinbefore contained, then and immediately on the expiration of such notice this present demise and everything herein contained shall cease and be void, but without prejudice to the remedies of either party against the other in respect of any antecedent claim or breach of covenant."

On Nov. 14, 1913, the plaintiffs gave notice to the defendants' agent "in accordance with the option contained in our lease" that it was their "intention to quit and deliver up possession of the messuage and shop," No. 381, Lord Street, Southport, on June 24, 1914.

The plaintiffs contended that, according to the true construction of the lease, they had power to determine the lease on June 24, 1914, on giving six months' previous notice in writing, and that this notice, dated Nov. 14, 1913, was a good and effective notice for this purpose. The defendants' contention was that no notice to determine the lease could, according to the true construction of the lease, be given prior to the expiration of three years of the term—namely, Mar. 24, 1914.

Courthope Wilson for the plaintiffs.
J. Rutherford for the defendants.

EVE, J.—If this question of construction were free from authority, I am by no means certain that my decision would take the form which, since there is authority, it must take.

I think, after a careful examination of the proviso here, it is impossible to distinguish this case from Gardner v. Ingram (1), on which counsel for the defendants relies. I need not read the proviso over again, but it comes, I think, to this, that the term created shall cease and determine if after the expiration of the first three years thereof the lessees shall so wish and shall give to the lessors six calendar months' notice in writing of their wish, and then, in their favour, it is added that such notice need not expire on the anniversary of the day on which the tenancy commenced, but may expire on any quarter day. So read, the clause in this lease is indistinguishable from the clause construed by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Bowen, L.J., in the case of Gardner v. Ingram (1). Counsel for the lessees has endeavoured to distinguish the two cases on the ground that whereas in this case the notice may expire on any quarter day, in Gardner v. Ingram (1) the notice could only be effective if it expired on the anniversary of the quarter day on which the term commenced, and from this he argues that whereas in this case the notice in fact would take effect after the expiration of the first three years of the term, the notice in Gardner v. Ingram (1), being given for the third anniversary of the day on which the tenancy commenced, was in substance a notice to determine "at" and not "after" the expiration of the first three years. This element, he urges, sufficiently distinguishes the two cases. The point he takes was not mentioned in Gardner v. Ingram (1), but it is, I think, disposed of by what was said by LINDLEY, L.J., in delivering the judgment of himself and LORD HALSBURY in Sidebotham v. Holland (2) ([1895] 1 Q.B. at p. 383), where he points out that a notice to determine an annual tenancy commencing on or from a particular day in one year is a good notice if given for the day immediately antecedent to the anniversary in another year. From this it follows that in Gardner v. Ingram (1) the three years could properly be treated as expiring at midnight on Sept. 28, and the notice for Sept. 29 as taking effect after that expiration, and, if so, the point on which counsel for the plaintiffs seeks to distinguish the two cases vanishes. For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the contention put forward on behalf of the landlords is right, and that on the summons I must hold that the notice purporting to determine this tenancy on June 24, 1914, is invalid, and that the earliest date at which the lessees can determine the tenancy is Sept. 29, 1914. The costs must follow the result.

Order accordingly.

MORISON v. LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINISTER BANK, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Reading, C.J., Buckley and Phillimore, L.JJ.), January 19, 20, 27, 28, 29, April 8, 1914]

Bank—Negligence—Cheque—Conversion—Cheque signed by agent per pro.—Signature in fraud of principal—Agent credited with proceeds—Money had and received—Forgery—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 25.

The plaintiff, who carried on business under the style of B. M. & Co., gave H. A., his manager, authority to draw cheques, signed by him per pro. B. M. & Co., for business purposes on the firm's account at the N. P. Bank, whom the plaintiff directed to honour such cheques. In 1905 H. A. opened an account at the defendant bank, and from 1907 to 1911 he fraudulently drew fifty per pro. cheques on the plaintiff's account, and paid them into his account at the defendant bank who credited him with the proceeds thereof. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendant bank to recover damages for the conversion of the cheques, Held: (i) the defendant bank's title to the cheques was defective as H. A. had issued them to the bank in fraud of the plaintiff; the bank had dealt with the cheques in a manner inconsistent with the rights of the plaintiff, their true owner; and, therefore, primâ facie, the bank was liable to him for the conversion of his property, the damages being the face value of the cheques; but, on the evidence, the plaintiff had ratified H. A.'s transactions, and so the action failed.

Per LORD READING, C.J.: [As regards the cause of action] the plaintiff was entitled to waive the tort of conversion and sue for the same amount as money had and received.

(ii) section 25 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which provides: "A signature by procuration operates as notice that the agent has but a limited authority to sign, and the principal is only bound by such signature if the agent in so signing was acting within the actual limits of his authority" is declaratory of the common law and does not extend beyond it or alter it. The effect of the section is that, notwithstanding the negotiable character of the instrument, the principal is not liable on the instrument, even to a holder in due course, if the agent in so signing the cheque has exceeded the limits of his authority; when a bill of exchange so signed in excess of authority has been honoured, s. 25 does not confer a right to recover the proceeds—the section goes to the validity of the instrument: it does not deal with rights arising in respect of the disposition of the proceeds; nevertheless, when considering whether a bank has acted negligently in accepting a cheque as valid, the fact that the signature to the cheque was made per pro. and was not the signature of the principal is not to be entirely disregarded.

(iii) the cheques were not forgeries, for, although they had been created for an improper purpose and in fraud of the plaintiff, they had been created by a person authorised to create them, and the plaintiff's bank was bound to honour them, and a signature cannot be valid in the hands of one person today and a forgery in the hands of another person tomorrow.

Appeal by the defendants against a decision of LORD COLERIDGE, J.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of LORD READING, C.J.:—The plaintiff brought his action to recover £1,885 3s. 9d. damages for the conversion of fifty cheques drawn upon and honoured by the National Provincial Bank for his account, or, alternatively, for the same amount as money had and received by the defendants to his use. At the trial of the action without a jury LORD COLERIDGE, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff against the defendants for the amount claimed, and the defendants appeal from that judgment. The plaintiff carried on business as an insurance broker in the city of London in the name of Bruce Morison & Co. In 1888 he gave authority to one Harry Abbott, who had been some years in his employment, to draw cheques for the purpose of the plaintiff's business on the banking account of Bruce Morison & Co. at the National Provincial Bank, and to sign them "per pro. Bruce Morison & Co., H. Abbott," and the plaintiff gave written directions and authority to that bank to honour for his account all cheques so signed by Abbott. From 1888 until the end of 1911 Abbott signed cheques per procuration for the plaintiff which were duly honoured. In 1900 the plaintiff, who continued to have implicit confidence in Abbott, appointed him manager of his business, and thenceforward until the end of 1911 Abbott acted as manager of such business. About January, 1912, the plaintiff discovered that Abbott by means of the per pro. signature had drawn a number of cheques on the plaintiff's aforesaid banking account, and had fraudulently applied them to his own use. In June, 1905, Abbott had opened a banking account in his own name for his own private purposes and without the knowledge of the plaintiff at the Euston branch of the defendant bank. He was introduced to the defendants by one of their staff as the manager of a firm of insurance brokers. He continued to draw cheques upon and pay cheques into this account with the defendants until the beginning of 1912, when the defendants were first made aware that Abbott had grossly abused the plaintiff's confidence, and had by means of the per pro. signature drawn a number of cheques for his own purposes on the plaintiff's account at the National Provincial Bank, which had been duly honoured. It appeared that from May 29, 1907, until Nov. 23, 1911, fifty cheques so drawn, and when necessary so indorsed, for sums amounting, in the aggregate, to £1,885 3s. 9d. had been paid by Abbott into the defendants' bank at Euston for collection by the defendants on his behalf. All the cheques with the exception of two open or uncrossed cheques were crossed, forty-six were crossed generally, and two were crossed to the defendants. The sums were collected in the ordinary way by the defendants during the said period from the National Provincial Bank, and the plaintiff's account was duly debited with the same. The plaintiff makes no complaint against the National Provincial Bank. It is clear that they were bound in pursuance of the directions and authority given in 1888 to honour the said cheques on his account. The defendants placed the amount of such cheques to the credit of Abbott's account with their branch as and when they were paid in, and Abbott drew against them when the cheques had been cleared. During the currency of his banking account with the defendants Abbott paid in other moneys and cheques. It was, as the manager said, not a very active account, but a satisfactory account from the bank's point of view. Abbott drew cheques against his credit balance with the defendants, which were in the ordinary course duly honoured by them.

With reference to the earlier cheques, LORD COLERIDGE, J., thus stated the facts: The proceeds of six cheques were collected in 1907 and 1908 for Abbott by the defendants. The first was an open or uncrossed cheque, to which s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 [repealed: see now Cheques Act, 1957, s. 4], does not apply. The next three were drawn to "selves or order," and indorsed by Abbott per procuration. The other two were made payable to "Abbott or order," and were indorsed by Abbott. As to the later cheques during the later years 1909, 1910, and 1911 the defendants collected for Abbott's account proceeds of forty-four cheques signed by him per procuration for the plaintiff, most of which were drawn to the defendants or bearer, as appears from the following list: One, dated Aug. 27, 1909, not crossed and therefore not within s. 82; five were drawn to "selves or order," four to "Abbott or order," one to defendants or order, one to "bearer," one to "selves or bearer," one to "Abbott or bearer," and thirty to defendants or bearer.

The original authority from the plaintiff to Harry Abbott, as shown by the plaintiff's letter of April 7, 1888, to the National Provincial Bank, was a general authority "to pay and honour all cheques drawn per procuration by Abbott on the plaintiff." The balance-sheet of Bruce Morison & Co. for 1907 showed loss of capital. Abbott's explanations did not satisfy the plaintiff, and the plaintiff had the accounts investigated by accountants. Part of the £5,929 deficiency was debited to Abbott. The two cheques in question in that year formed part of the balance, and the balance-sheet contained an entry of what was on Dec. 31, 1907, the balance of an account in the firm's books called "exchanged cheques account." The balance-sheet for the year 1908 showed the debit balance against Abbott in an account in the firm's books called Abbott's "private account." On Oct. 1, 1909, a copy of Abbott's "private account" from Jan. 1, 1908, to May 22, 1909, was forwarded to the plaintiff. On Nov. 16, 1909, the plaintiff wrote to Abbott confirming his engagement as manager of his insurance broker's business on terms that Abbott should not incur liabilities, except in ordinary business transactions of the firm, without the plaintiff's previous sanction.

In their statement of defence the bank claimed that they became holders in due course of the cheques and credited them in good faith as cash to Harry Abbott and as to such of the cheques as were crossed in good faith and without negligence within s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. They also relied upon the fact that the National Provincial Bank paid the cheques as bankers of the plaintiff without objection by the plaintiff, and on the fact that the plaintiff did not object during the period in which such payments had been made to Abbott's drawing and dealing with the cheques, and that if Abbott was acting without authority the plaintiff ratified Abbott's dealings by not objecting to the sums represented by the cheques being debited in his account with the National Provincial Bank. They, further, pleaded estoppel.

By the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882:

> "Section 25. A signature by procuration operates as notice that the agent has but a limited authority to sign, and the principal is only bound by such signature if the agent in so signing was acting within the actual limits of his authority. . . . Section 82. Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment."

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., and R. A. Wright for the bank.
Greer, K.C., Bartley Denniss and Harold Christie for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 8, 1914. The following judgments were read.

LORD READING, C.J., stated the facts, and continued: Upon these facts the plaintiff, in my judgment, is entitled primâ facie to recover the sum claimed either as damages for conversion or as money had and received. LORD ELLENBOROUGH in M'Combie v. Davies (1) said (6 East. at p. 540):

> "A man is guilty of conversion who takes my property by assignment from another who has no authority to dispose of it; for what is that but assisting that other in carrying his wrongful act into effect?"

This principle has been frequently applied in actions to recover the proceeds of cheques or other negotiable instruments for the payment of money, collected by a bank without authority: see Gordon v. London, City and Midland Bank (2), [1902] 1 K.B. at pp. 264-5; and Fine Art Society, Ltd. v. Union Bank of London, Ltd. (3), and cases therein cited. In the present case the defendants were not mere intermediaries, but became the holders of the cheques when these were issued to them by Abbott. It is not disputed that the defendants received them in good faith, but it is contended that they received them from a person who had no authority to draw them or to issue them to the defendants, and could give no title, or only a defective title, to the defendants. The cheques were at all times, till issued, the property of the plaintiff. They never were the property of Abbott, who had no title to them. The defendants, having received the cheques for collection on behalf of Abbott, presented them, and obtained the proceeds from the

A plaintiff's bank, and applied the same to the credit of Abbott's account. Abbott had no account at the National Provincial Bank, and was only in possession of the cheque forms as manager for the plaintiff. When he had filled up the forms and signed them "per pro. Bruce Morison & Co.," the plaintiff was the true owner of the instruments and Abbott had no authority to dispose of the cheques for his own purposes, or to pay them into his own banking account. They came into existence B as cheques on the plaintiff's banking account by the fraud of Abbott and were issued by him to the defendants in fraud of the plaintiff. The defendants collected the proceeds, and their right to retain the money so collected must depend upon the validity of Abbott's title to the cheques, and if such title was invalid, upon the protection of s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. In my judgment, the defendants' title to such cheques was defective, as Abbott issued them to the C defendants in fraud of the plaintiff. The defendants dealt with them in a manner inconsistent with the rights of the plaintiff, who was the true owner, and are liable to him for the conversion of his property. Damages for such conversion may be, and, in my opinion, are, in this case the face value of the instruments. The plaintiff is entitled to compensation for the loss he has suffered by reason of the conversion, and that loss is the equivalent of the amounts paid to the defendants D by the National Provincial Bank and debited to the plaintiff's banking account. The defendants have wrongfully obtained money on valuable instruments of the plaintiff, and his banking account at the National Provincial Bank has been depleted to the amounts paid on the cheques. The plaintiff has lost the sums which the defendants have wrongfully received, and the plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to recover such sums as damages for the conversion. That such damages E may be given for the conversion of a cheque or bill of exchange has been decided in many cases: see Bobbett v. Pinkett (4); Fine Art Society, Ltd. v. Union Bank of London, Ltd. (3); Kleinwort, Sons & Co. v. Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris (5); Bavins Junior and Sims v. London and South Western Bank, Ltd. (6); Capital and Counties Bank, Ltd. v. Gordon (2); Macbeth v. North and South Wales Bank (7). The same result would be reached by the plaintiff upon the F alternative claim for money had and received. The plaintiff is entitled to waive the tort and sue for the same amount as money had and received to his use: Hollins v. Fowler (8).

The plaintiff further contended that the signatures per procuration by Abbott to the cheques were forgeries, and that, therefore, the instruments were nullities G and the defendants could not retain the proceeds obtained by means of forged instruments. In fact the signature was the genuine signature of Abbott in the form authorised by the plaintiff. The forgery was, as alleged by the plaintiff, in the misuse of his authority to sign cheques per procuration as this amounted to the making of a bill per procuration without lawful authority or excuse and with intent to defraud, and it was contended that all the necessary elements of a statutory H forgery under the Forgery Act, 1861 s. 24 [repealed: see now Forgery Act, 1913, s. 2 (2) (a)], were thus present. I cannot accept this contention. The National Provincial Bank, the plaintiff's bankers, were admittedly bound to honour the cheques so signed by Abbott under the direction or authority given to them by the plaintiff in 1888. The cheques bore genuine signatures by Abbott notwithstanding that these were made by Abbott with the intention of misapplying the I cheques and the proceeds. If, as is admitted, the National Provincial Bank were entitled, and, indeed, bound, to honour cheques so signed, these were valid instruments for that purpose, and, if so, they cannot be forgeries in the hands of the defendants. The signature to a cheque cannot be a valid signature in the hands of one person and a forgery in the hands of another; it cannot be valid today and a forgery tomorrow, although in some circumstances, by the application of the doctrine of estoppel, a person whose money has been wrongfully obtained by a forgery might be precluded from setting it up. In my judgment, the statute mentioned does not make it a forgery if a genuine signature is affixed by a person who indicates on the face of the document that he signs per procuration on behalf of another, notwithstanding that the authority so to sign has been misused and fraudulently used. Section 24 of the Act of 1861 was passed to meet the difficulty created by the decision in R. v. White (9), where it was held that a person who signed the name of another per procuration could not be convicted under s. 39 of the Forgery Act, 1830 [repealed]. The recent case of R. v. Holden (10) does not assist the plaintiff. It decides that a partner who has no authority to sign the firm name to a bill and makes and issues a bill signed with his partner's name without authority and also with his own name is guilty of forgery. The question we are considering is whether Abbott in so drawing and issuing the cheques had committed the crime of forgery, and not whether he had committed a criminal offence.

To the claim thus primâ facie established by the plaintiff the defendants set up a defence based upon the protection afforded by s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, to bankers who collect payment of cheques for their customers if the bankers have acted in good faith and without negligence. The defendants' good faith is not questioned, but it is contended that they did not act without negligence. LORD COLERIDGE, J., being of opinion that s. 25 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, must be read with s. 82, came to the conclusion that the defendants were put upon inquiry by the mere fact that the cheques bore a signature per procuration, and that as the defendants failed to make inquiry they cannot be held to have acted without negligence. I do not agree with this view of the effect of s. 25. Section 82 only comes into operation when a banker receives payment of the proceeds for his customer, and, therefore, when the cheque has been honoured. The effect of s. 25 is that, notwithstanding the negotiable character of the instrument and the obligations upon the signatory to such an instrument to holders, and more particularly to a holder in due course and notwithstanding the authority given by the principal to the agent to sign negotiable instruments per procuration so as to bind the principal, the principal is not liable upon the instrument, even to a holder in due course, if the agent in so signing the cheque has exceeded the actual limits of his authority. The principal in such circumstances and before the instrument is honoured could refuse to pay the cheque or bill upon presentation, and would have a good defence to a claim, even when made by a holder in due course, upon the cheque or bill. I agree with LORD COLERIDGE, J., that this section is declaratory of the common law: see Stagg v. Elliott (11); but it does not, in my judgment, extend beyond it or alter it. When a bill so signed in excess of authority has been honoured, s. 25 does not confer a right to recover the proceeds. If such a right exists in the particular case it must be found elsewhere. Nevertheless, the fact that the signature to the cheques is made per procuration and is not the signature of the principal is not to be entirely disregarded. In my opinion, when considering whether the bank has acted without negligence, it is to be borne in mind with other facts and circumstances. It is also to be observed that LORD COLERIDGE, J., did not rely exclusively upon his view of s. 25 as bearing upon s. 82, for in a later part of his judgment he refers to the payment in of these cheques by the agent to his private account at another bank as another circumstance which should have caused the bank to make inquiries. Whether or not the evidence establishes that the bank did not act without negligence is a question of fact, and in strictness should be determined separately with regard to each of the fifty cheques signed by Abbott.

With reference to the earlier transactions, limited to the years 1907 and 1908, I agree with the decision of LORD COLERIDGE, J., that the defendants did not act without negligence. The defendants knew that Abbott was manager to a firm of insurance brokers, and the signature on the cheques was express notice to them that he was purporting to act in the signing and indorsing of these cheques as agent. The most cursory examination would have shown the defendants that they were collecting payment for their customer of cheques drawn by him as agent upon

A the account of his principal at another bank, and that the first three of these crossed cheques were made payable on the face of the instruments to the principal or order and issued to the bank by means of the indorsement of the agent purporting to act for the principal. For a firm to pay salary or commission or any debt to a manager by cheques made payable to the firm or order, and for a manager to pay cheques so drawn to his own private banking account after himself indorsing them B as agent for the payees, appear to me transactions so out of the ordinary course that they ought to have aroused doubts in the defendants' mind and caused them to make inquiry. Counsel for the bank argued that the courts had only deprived bankers of the immunity afforded to them by s. 82 when the cheques collected by the bank were signed by third persons in favour of the principal, and he sought thus to distinguish this case from Bissell & Co. v. Fox Bros. & Co. (12); Hannan's C Lake View Central, Ltd. v. Armstrong & Co. (13); Gompertz v. Cook (14); Bevan v. National Bank, Ltd. (15), and other such cases, but I can see no distinction in principle between these authorities and the present case. They are merely instances of the application of the principle of law to the facts and circumstances of particular cases.

Different considerations apply, however, to the collection of the later cheques D issued in 1909, 1910 and 1911. No question had been raised in reference to the cheques paid into Abbott's account in the preceding two years and any doubt or suspicion which the defendants ought to have had of these earlier transactions would have disappeared by this time. I cannot think that the defendants were guilty of negligence in not making inquiries in reference to these cheques after their experience of Abbott's transactions with them in the preceding two years. E It is true that the plaintiff owed no duty to the defendants to examine his pass books or check his accounts with them or with Abbott, but when we are asked to find as a fact that the defendants were negligent, it is necessary to consider all the circumstances, and, in my judgment, as these transactions were only repetitions of those of the previous years which had passed unchallenged, the defendants should not be deprived of the protection of the statute. It is argued by the plaintiff that as the amount so collected increased yearly this was an additional circumstance which established the negligence of the defendants. By reference to Abbott's banking account it will be seen that the cheques of the plaintiff paid in by Abbott to the credit of his account had increased in number and amount every year since 1907. The summary is as follows: 1907, two cheques, £82; 1908, four cheques, £188 17s. 6d.; 1909, nine cheques, £260; 1910, twelve cheques, £591 6s. 3d.; 1911, twenty-three cheques, £763; total, £1,885 3s. 9d. This yearly increase would not of itself arouse doubt or suspicion. Abbott's salary or commission or share of profits might easily have risen in amount, and as each year passed there would appear to be less and not more reason for inquiry. In my judgment, therefore, the defendants are entitled to the protection of s. 82 and are not liable to the plaintiff in this action in respect of the forty-three crossed cheques during the three later years.

[HIS LORDSHIP then considered the position of the parties in reference to the earlier crossed cheques and the two uncrossed cheques in respect of which the defendants contended that upon the facts proved, and even assuming that they had been negligent in not making inquiry, they were not liable in this action because the plaintiff had ratified the acts of Abbott. HIS LORDSHIP examined the evidence and said that on it he came to the conclusion that the plaintiff must be held to have ratified those transactions of Abbott, and, therefore, that the plaintiff's claim in respect to the cheques for 1907 and 1908 and the uncrossed cheque for 1909 failed. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] As I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain his action for damages for conversion of the cheques and is not driven to rely upon the alternative count for money had and received to the plaintiff's use, it is unnecessary to deal in detail with the points raised by counsel for the bank in answer to the alternative claim. They would, in my judgment, in themselves form an answer to the alternative claim. I content myself with expressing my view that the principle in London and River Plate Bank v. Bank of Liverpool (16) and not that in Holland v. Russell (17) governs this case. The addition of the words "not negotiable," and, in some cases, "not negotiable: account payee," to some of the crossed cheques under consideration has, in my opinion, no bearing upon the matters to be decided in this case. The protection of s. 82 is afforded to crossed cheques marked "not negotiable," as well as to cheques not so marked. The collection of cheques so crossed is not conclusive evidence of negligence: see Gordon v. Capital and Counties Bank (2) [1902] 1 K.B. at p. 275. Even if I assume that the taking of a crossed cheque bearing these words would be some evidence of negligence, it could not affect my decision upon the later cheques, as the other considerations, to which I have referred, would outweigh any value I could attribute to such evidence. The words "account payee" never appear upon any of the crossed cheques made payable to "selves or order" or to "selves or bearer." They are only to be found on the crossed cheques made payable to "Abbott or order," "Abbott or bearer," defendants "or bearer," and defendants "or order." The words "account payee" are a direction to the bankers collecting payment that the proceeds when collected are to be applied to the credit of the account of the payee designated on the face of the cheque. They do not, on the facts of this case, afford any evidence of negligence, for if, as the defendants thought, Abbott was entitled to issue the cheques to the defendants for collection, the directions to them by the addition of these words would be quite natural and correct. In one case (Jan. 27, 1911) a cheque so marked was made payable to the defendants "or order," and was indorsed by their manager per procuration for them, and the proceeds, when collected, were credited to Abbott's account. It was argued that this indorsement was a wrongful dealing by the defendants with the cheque outside the protection of s. 82, but, in my view, the indorsement by the defendants was made in the ordinary course and merely for the purpose of collecting the proceeds. It was unobjectionable if, as they thought, Abbott was entitled to issue the cheque to them, and the plaintiff's claim on this cheque stands or falls with the other cheques. I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed, and that judgment should be entered for the defendants.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—I am also of opinion that this appeal succeeds. As we are differing from the learned judge from whom this appeal is brought, I add a few words of my own upon some of the points which have been argued before us.

The authority which Morison gave to the National Provincial Bank on April 7, 1888, was in general terms. There is no question but that as between Morison and the National Provincial Bank the cheques signed per pro. by Abbott were effectual, and the bank were entitled and bound to pay them. Under these circumstances it is impossible to say that the instrument was not a cheque. As between Morison and the National Provincial Bank it was a cheque and not a forged instrument. A document cannot be a forged instrument as between certain persons and not as between others. The decision in R. v. Holden (10) does not, I think, apply. The instruments were Morison's cheques and none the less because they were cheques drawn in fraud of Morison.

The next question is whether Morison was the true owner of the cheques. If he was not, the defendants cannot be liable in conversion. If he was, then s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, applies unless the words "true owner" in that section bear some meaning different from that which they bear when the subject under consideration is conversion. Having regard to what LORD HALSBURY said in Great Western Rail. Co. v. London and County Banking Co., Ltd. (18) ([1901] A.C. at p. 418), it seems to me that I ought not to draw a distinction between the title to the cheque itself and the title to the money obtained or represented by it. In the case referred to the cheque was one drawn by the appellants, the Great Western Railway Co. The bank were held liable to them for the amount of the

A cheque. In Ogden v. Benas (19) the plaintiff was again the drawer, and he recovered upon the footing that the money paid was money of the plaintiff which the defendant had no right to receive, and that consequently the plaintiff was entitled to recover it back.

Next, treating the plaintiff as true owner of the cheque within s. 82, does s. 25 apply to a case in which the instrument has served its purpose and the money has been paid under it? Can the principal then claim to recover the money on the ground, in the words of s. 25, that he is not bound by the signature because the agent was not acting within the limits of his authority? Counsel for the bank has argued, and I think his argument is sound, that s. 25 is not addressed to that case. In any action brought upon the instrument s. 25 applies. But to such a case as the present it has no application. The section is found as one of a group of sections dealing with the capacity and authority of the parties as persons concurring in the instrument. It goes, I think, to the validity of the instrument as an instrument. It does not deal with the case of rights arising in respect of the disposition of the proceeds when the instrument has served its purpose and the amount has been paid. In considering, therefore, s. 82 as a defence, I think s. 25 may be set out of consideration.

There remain those which are, to my mind, the important points of this case—namely, the questions, first, whether there was negligence; secondly, whether there was ratification; and, thirdly, whether Morison with the knowledge which he had can render the defendants liable for the loss which he sustained by continuing to employ a dishonest agent. For convenience I collect the main significant dates upon these points.

The first agreement of employment was on Nov. 2, 1900; Abbott's account with the defendants was opened in June, 1905; and the first relevant cheque was on May 29, 1907—£26. The second was on June 10, 1907—£56. The balance-sheet of Dec. 31, 1907, disclosed the £5,929, of which £2,929 was debited to Abbott and £3,000 to goodwill. On Aug. 12, 1908, Morison wrote a letter of that date to the accountants from which it is plain that he knew that Abbott had lost money (as he said) in speculation. By that letter Morison urged that the losses should be proved by cheques which must, he said, have been drawn, and added that he ought to know that the money lost was actually lost in speculation and not used for any other purposes. The two cheques of £26 and £56 must, of course, have formed items in arriving at that balance-sheet. The balance-sheet further contained under the head of "Sundries, £3 1s. 9d." that which was at Dec. 31, 1907, the balance of the "exchange cheques account." The balance-sheet to December, 1907, was prepared subsequently to the date of that letter—viz., in September, 1908. These two cheques as to which there must have existed in the possession of Morison at his office every means of knowledge, either were not traced, which was wrong, or were traced and the defendants were not informed of it, which was worse. On Sept. 28, 1909, Morison received the balance-sheet of the following year—viz., to Dec. 31, 1908. That brought forward as a debit to Abbott the £2,929 of the previous balance-sheet and further debited him with £306 0s. 4d. which was on Dec. 31, 1908, the debit of his private account in Morison's books. On Sept. 30, 1909, Morison wrote to the accountants about the deficit in Abbott's name and the balance on the wrong side. On Oct. 1, 1909, the accountants sent him a copy of Abbott's private account as appearing in the firm's books from Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 1908, and from Jan. 1 to May 22, 1909. Under these circumstances Morison, with all this knowledge and means of knowledge, on Nov. 16, 1909, affirmed Abbott's engagement as his manager upon the terms stated in the letter of that date. The engagement was for the period of their joint lives and ten years after Morison's death during the remainder of Abbott's life, until determined by notice as in the letter mentioned, with a stipulation that Abbott should not incur any liabilities without his previous sanction except in the ordinary business transactions of the firm and should not bet, gamble, or speculate either in his own name or that of the firm or otherwise. The balance-sheet of Dec. 31, 1908, was thereby agreed as a basis of the accounts between the parties. Down to the end of 1908 the total of the funds misappropriated which it is sought to recover in this action was £270 17s. 6d. After the end of 1908 Abbott misappropriated a further sum of £1,614 6s. 3d., and for all these the plaintiff seeks to make the defendants liable.

Quite shortly it seems to me that, assuming as I do that when the cheques, say, in 1907, two in number, were dealt with by the defendants, there was enough to put them upon inquiry, the position after (say) the end of 1907 was such that any suspicion which they ought to have had would have been lulled to sleep by the action of Morison himself. Such a sufficient time had then elapsed during which the customer had received back his pass book and his cheques and had raised no question as to the validity of the cheques as that the defendants were entitled to assume that there was no cause for suspicion or inquiry. As from that time no negligence is to be imputed to the defendants because they did not inquire whether the cheques were justified or not. As regards the earlier cheques at a date before such time had elapsed, it seems to me that the plaintiff's action was such as to adopt and ratify Abbott's acts in the matter. The fact is that after these proceedings Morison, whose fault or misfortune it is that he has employed a dishonest agent, is seeking to throw the consequences of his dishonesty upon the persons who are not in any way responsible for that dishonesty—persons who dealt with the cheques in the ordinary course of business and, as is admitted, in perfect good faith. The principle of Cocks v. Masterman (20) and of London and River Plate Bank v. Bank of Liverpool (16) is, I think, applicable. The principle is larger than that in Holland v. Russell (17). It is, I think, the case that the bank are not here to be treated simply as agents who paid money to Abbott as their principal before the bank received notice not to pay it. The money here has been received by the defendants in good faith and paid to their customer Abbott in good faith. Since its receipt they have altogether altered their position in that they have in good faith paid the money away to Abbott. Under these circumstances I think the principle of Cocks v. Masterman (20) applies, and that the defendants cannot be rendered liable for it to Morison. On these grounds I think this appeal succeeds.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—The plaintiff, in my judgment, has made out a prima facie case for recovering in trover against the defendant bank for the conversion of his cheques, and to obtain as damages the face value of the cheques. I say his cheques, and I make out his right in the following manner. The cheques as originally drawn were instruments whereby the plaintiff, or a person to whom the plaintiff was bound or desired to pay money, could obtain out of the moneys standing to the plaintiff's credit with his bank the sum specified on the face of the cheque. The cheques were the plaintiff's instruments till he chose—or till Abbott on his behalf chose—to issue them to some outside person. As regards two of the cheques, which were open ones and drawn to "bearer," they need never have been further issued than by presenting them to the plaintiff's bank and getting them cashed. As regards the others, no doubt it was in contemplation that they should be issued, to the extent of passing through another bank, because they were crossed. And one cheque would require further negotiation because it was drawn to the order of somebody outside, to wit, the defendant bank. But all of them till issued remained the plaintiff's property. Till Abbott took them to the defendant bank they had not been issued. In Abbott's hands they were still his employer's property, and Abbott could not and did not give to the defendant bank any title in them. Therefore, they were the plaintiff's cheques at the time when they came into the possession of the defendant bank. The defendant bank, as the collecting bank, presented them to the plaintiff's bank and collected the proceeds, and did not do this as a bare messenger. The defendant bank was the holder of the cheques, which, with the exception of the one of which I have already spoken,

A were, by the time they reached it, bearer cheques, and it collected the proceeds in its own right, and probably settled for them in account with the paying bank, very likely through the clearing house, and gave its receipt. Therefore, the defendant bank converted the cheques.

That the damages for such conversion are (at any rate, where the drawer has sufficient funds to his credit and the drawee bank is solvent) the face value of the B cheques is established in a series of cases—such as Bobbett v. Pinkett (4), Fine Art Society v. Union Bank (3), Bavins Junior & Sims v. London and South Western Bank, Ltd. (6), and Macbeth v. North and South Wales Bank (7)—so well established that it is not necessary to inquire into the principle which may underlie the authority. But the principle probably is that, though the plaintiff might at any moment destroy the cheques while they remained in his possession, they are C potential instruments whereby the sums they represent may be drawn from his bankers, and if they get into any other hands than his he will be the loser to the extent of the sums which they represent. It may be also that anyone who has obtained its value by presenting a cheque is estopped from insisting that it has only a nominal value.

Having got so far as determining that the plaintiff has made out a primâ facie D case, I have now to consider the several defences raised by the defendant bank. But before I enter upon these, there is a preliminary point raised by the plaintiff which, if established, would destroy or seriously affect several of these defences. He contends that these cheques are forgeries—statutory forgeries, as one of his counsel put it. Apart from the statute, which I will consider in a minute, this contention cannot be supported. These cheques are real documents which, when E they reach their destination, will be honoured, and properly honoured, by the plaintiff's bank. They have been created for an improper purpose and in fraud of the plaintiff, but they have been created by a person whom the plaintiff had put in his place to create them. How, as was observed in the course of the case, they can be no forgeries when they reach their destination and yet be treated as forgeries while in the hands of other parties during the course of their journey, F I fail to see. But it is said that the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 24, makes it forgery to sign with intent to defraud any bill of exchange, by procuration or otherwise, for or in the name of or on the account of any other person without lawful authority or excuse, and that this enactment covers the case where a man having authority to sign uses his authority for an improper and fraudulent purpose, to the detriment of his principal. This, again, I think is an error. The reason why the words "by procuration or otherwise" were inserted in this statute is well known. It was always forgery to counterfeit a man's signature to certain important documents unless, indeed, you had the man's authority to write his name for him; but it was a different thing to append a man's signature with a statement showing that you were not claiming that it was his hand, but that you signed for him under a I supposed power. The point seems to have been mooted in one or two cases, and it was finally decided in R. v. White (9) not to be a forgery under the law, as it then stood, the argument which prevailed being thus summarised by counsel for the prisoner:

> "The prisoner has counterfeited nothing; the writing is not made as the writing of another, but avowedly as that of the prisoner himself; and though he may have committed fraud in saying that he was authorised to make the indorsement, that is not a forgery, but a mere false pretence."

In R. v. White (9) the prisoner, though at one time a clerk of the man in whose name he signed, had not and never had authority to sign for him. To meet this, the section I have quoted was passed, and it has no further application. It does not extend the law to cases where a man, having authority to sign the name of another per pro., misuses his authority, just as I think, under the old law, if a man had authority to sign the name of another and misused that authority, he would not be indictable for forgery.

I have not, in stating these various propositions, added the phrase "with intent to defraud," which is always an ingredient in the charge of the crime. The words are used to meet the possible, though rare, case of innocent forgery; for example, for a wager, or for a joke, as suggested by WALTON, J., in R. v. Muirhead (21), where the analogous subject of false pretences was being discussed. I merely say this to guard my propositions. R. v. Holden (10) does not decide anything to the contrary of what I have said. There are partnerships which, from the nature of their business, imply an authority in each partner to sign the firm's name to bills, &c. There are others where no such authority is to be implied, and, unless it is given in express terms, the partner has not got it. AVORY, J., stated for the purposes of the point on which the opinion of the court was to be taken that the prisoner had no authority—meaning, I take it, no general authority as partner—and then to stop a possible hole took the opinion of the jury as to whether or not a particular authority had been given to him. That there was no suggestion that the prisoner had such general authority as partner, or under the partnership articles, appears from the argument of his counsel. They take no such point, but rely upon the general right of a partner to trade in the firm's name, and refer to Banks v. Gibson (22) and decisions in Chancery to that effect. The Lord Chief Justice has sent for all the papers in the case, and a perusal of them confirms this view of the case. The court, therefore, in R. v. Holden (10) only decided that the prisoner, having no authority to sign the name of his firm to bills, could not ride off on the fact that his firm's name was a partnership asset. It comes back to the same principle. Where there is power to sign per pro., a document so signed is not a forgery to the party to whom it is addressed, who can, or à fortiori must, act upon it, and, therefore, is not a forgery at all. The misuse by an agent of his power of writing his principal's name, either as a simple signature or by signing per pro., may, however, be indictable as some form of fraud.

I now come to the defences, and the first defence raised is under s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which protects the bank which collects a crossed cheque, and receives payment for its customer in good faith and without negligence, from incurring a liability to the true owner of the cheque. As the plaintiff sues as owner and as these cheques are not forgeries, the section applies. The good faith of the defendant bank is not questioned. The point left for decision is whether it has received payment for its customer Abbott without negligence. The learned judge has held that there was negligence. In the appropriate part of his judgment he seems to have rested that negligence on one ground only—namely, that the collecting bank, seeing that the signature was per pro., had thereby notice under s. 25 of the Act that the agent had but a limited authority to sign, and was, therefore, bound at its peril to make due inquiries as to the extent of the authority, and that it made none. A conclusion so sweeping would make cheques signed per pro. and crossed either useless or mere incentives to gambling. I think the true answer is that s. 25 is without relevancy to s. 82. Under s. 25, he who takes a negotiable instrument signed per pro. has notice that he may, when he comes to present it for payment, or when someone else to whom he has negotiated it presents it for payment, find that he or his transferee may fail to get payment because the limited authority of the agent may have been exceeded. It is a question of infirmity of title, but when once the instrument has been discharged by payment, neither the presenter nor his predecessors or successors in title are put under a liability to repay because he or they had originally notice that they might not get their money. If it were otherwise, there would be two objections to the point as a point in favour of the plaintiff: (i) That the only person who could avail himself of the right to recover would be the man who discharged the instrument—that is, the plaintiff's bank, not the plaintiff; (ii) that if the plaintiff's bank sought to do it, the special rule as to prompt recovery of money wrongly

A paid to discharge a negotiable instrument laid down in such cases as London and River Plate Bank v. Bank of Liverpool (16) and Imperial Bank of Canada v. Bank of Hamilton (23) would apply. I should here, perhaps, add that the cases cited in the judgment of the learned judge as authority for the duty of the collecting bank to inquire when it deals with cheques with per pro. signatures are cases of cheques not drawn for the principal by the dishonest agent signing per pro., but cases of B cheques in favour of the principal indorsed by the agent per pro. and then paid by him into his own account—a most suspicious proceeding.

But though, in the appropriate part of his judgment the learned judge has apparently relied upon the fact of the signature being per pro. as sufficient to make the collecting bank negligent for non-inquiry, he has in another part of his judgment taken another fact into consideration, a fact which, we are told by counsel, C he mentioned as impressing him during the course of the trial; and I think we must take this fact into consideration as it certainly arises upon evidence. Abbott was a customer of the collecting bank, well recommended, no doubt, but known to be an employé, and a manager; and, being a manager and having the power of signing per pro. for his employer, he was placing cheques which he drew for his employer to his private account. If this happened often enough and with regard to sufficiently D large sums, I think it ought to give rise to some suspicion in the breast of the bank manager or the cashier. If it were material, I do not think that I should be prepared to dissent from the conclusion to which I think the learned judge intended to arrive—that there was negligence in cashing some of the earlier cheques, cashing them and paying them to Abbott's account without at least some inquiry. But as regards all the middle and later cheques a suspicion which might have been E reasonably entertained would with at least equal reason be lulled to sleep. No business man need anticipate that a series of cheques ranging over more than a twelvemonth, for appreciable sums, occasionally large ones, would pass unnoticed, if they had been improperly drawn by an employé. The plaintiff may be under no duty to the defendant bank to examine his pass book, or to check his accounts, or to have them vouched or examined; but the defendant bank was entitled to act F as a reasonable man of business would, and to assume that—duty or not—the employer would in no very great length of time discover that he was being robbed in a mode so easily capable of detection. While inclining, therefore, against the collecting bank as to the few earlier cheques I decide, as far as I am concerned, that the collecting bank without negligence collected and recovered payment for Abbott of the bulk of the crossed cheques which are the subject-matter in this G action.

I am not impressed by the points made as to special cheques which were drawn to the London County and Westminster Bank or bearer, and crossed generally with the addition of the words "Not negotiable. Account payee," or as to the one cheque which was drawn to defendant bank or order, the cheque forms used being forms with the word "order" printed, and in the one case the word "bearer" H not having been substituted. On the assumption that Abbott was justified in paying these cheques to his account, there was nothing objectionable in his bank being the nominal payee, and in the order case the indorsement by the bank would be merely what is called "the necessary dealing with the instrument," in the language of COLLINS, M.R., in Gordon v. London City and Midland Bank (2) ([1902] 1 K.B. at p. 276).

I There are two cheques not crossed. As to these the defence of s. 82 does not apply, and the defendant bank is driven back upon its next line of defence which, if sound, covers them and the earlier crossed cheques, as to which there may have been negligence, and the later cheques to the end of 1908. It is the defence that the plaintiff ratified the drawing and cashing of these dishonest but genuine cheques. As to this defence, counsel for plaintiff make two answers. They deny that in fact there was ratification, and they say—and truly say—as the learned judge in the court below has said, that there can be no ratification without knowledge of what you are ratifying, and they contend that the plaintiff had no knowledge [His Lordship referred to the evidence]. In my view, there was ratification of those acts of Abbott which depleted the plaintiff's banking account by the use of the cheques in question, as well as of other acts of Abbott which must have swelled the depletion. The plaintiff's remedy against Abbott for his misappropriation was abandoned; as to part without any quid pro quo except the continuance of Abbott's services; as to the rest, by converting him into an ordinary debtor with certain terms as to repayment, and this, I think, makes ratification. As to knowledge, it is unnecessary to decide what inference should be drawn when a principal knows so much that it is the policy of an ostrich to know no more. I am not sure that in that case we can altogether rely upon the doctrine that for this purpose means of knowledge are not the same as knowledge. It is unnecessary to decide this, for here the plaintiff put the accountants in his place, and we really cannot believe that the accountants did not know that Abbott had been passing per pro. cheques to his private account. Each cheque so passed would bear the stamp of the collecting bank, and would either, according to modern practice, be returned by the paying bank to the customer, or would be available at any moment if the customer or his accountant demanded it. Ratification, therefore, covers a gap in the defences quoad the uncrossed cheques and any of the early cheques, as to which there may have been negligence. It is not wanted for the later crossed cheques, and on the whole the defendant bank succeeds.

I have not thought it necessary to determine upon the defence of estoppel by negligence, which involves considerations of some difficulty. I have only to add that two further defences raised for the defendant bank by counsel in reply before us do not seem to me to help it. The doctrine with regard to prompt notice and demand where a negotiable instrument has been discharged in error only applies, as I have already incidentally said, where it is the payer of the instrument who seeks to recover back. And the doctrine that an agent who has in good faith paid to his principal money to which it is subsequently discovered the principal had no right cannot be required to return money which he has so paid over only applies where the action is for money had and received to the plaintiff's use—an action which assumes that there was no wrongful act in receiving the money. In such a case the plaintiff's licence to receive the money is presumed, and, therefore, the plaintiff cannot complain if it is properly paid over before the licence is revoked. In the present case the plaintiff, though he has in the alternative shaped his case as for money had and received, has a right to sue in trover for the conversion of his cheques, and, accordingly, would not be defeated by the fact that the defendant whom he sues for the misuse of his temporary dominion of the property claims to be an agent for someone else. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

County Court—Appeal to Divisional Court—Right of appellant to raise points not taken by him in county court.

On an appeal from the county court to the Divisional Court an appellant can only appeal with regard to a point of law which has been raised by him C at the trial even though the point he wishes to raise is one touching the jurisdiction of the county court.

Smith v. Baker & Sons (1), [1891] A.C. 325, applied.

Notes. The National Insurance Act, 1911, s. 67, and the National Insurance Act, 1913, s. 27, were repealed by the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, s. 133 and Sched. 7.

D Since the Administration of Justice (Appeals) Act, 1934, s. 2 (18 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 524), appeals from the county court lie to the Court of Appeal and not as formerly to the Divisional Court of the High Court except that in certain cases appeals still lie to the High Courts, i.e., in bankruptcy matters; appeals from orders made by a county court under the Settled Land Act, 1925 (ibid., vol. 23, p. 12) and the Land Registration Act, 1925 (ibid., vol. 20, p. 940); certain enact- E ments which provide for appeal from the county court to the High Court saved by s. 2 (2) of the Administration of Justice (Appeals) Act, 1934, which subsection has been replaced by s. 205 (5) of the County Courts Act, 1959 (ibid., vol. 39, pp. 238, 239).

Appeal from the decision of His Honour JUDGE WIGHTMAN WOOD, sitting at the Coventry County Court.

An action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants, who were an approved society under the National Insurance Act, 1911 [repealed], to recover the sum of £9 10s. to which he claimed to be entitled in respect of sickness benefit as a member of the society. The defendants filed the following notice of defence: "That, in accordance with s. 67 of the National Insurance Act, 1911, this court has no jurisdiction to try the dispute the subject of this action." The section in question provides (inter alia) that any dispute between an approved society and an insured person who is a member of such society relating to anything done or omitted by such person or society shall be decided in accordance with the rules of the society. Rule 43 of the defendant society's rules provided that if any dispute should arise between an insured person and the society it should be decided by arbitration. It was not admitted by the defendants that the plaintiff was a member of the society, and the learned judge entertained the action on the ground that s. 67 of the National Insurance Act only applied in the case of a person who was admittedly a member of the society with whom the dispute arose. After hearing evidence he gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, and also made a declaration that the plaintiff was a member of the society. The National Insurance Act, 1913 [repealed], s. 27, provides that any dispute between an approved society and person as to whether that person is or was at any date a member of that society shall be decided in like manner as a dispute between an approved society and an insured person who is a member thereof. This section was not called to the attention of the learned judge, and no point was taken by the defendants at the trial that it ousted his jurisdiction. The defendants appealed upon the grounds that the learned judge was wrong: (i) In holding that he had jurisdiction to try the action having regard to the National Insurance Act, 1911, and the rules of the defendant society. (ii) In allowing the plaintiff after judgment to amend his particulars of claim by claiming a declaration that he was a member of the defendant society. (iii) In holding that he had under his equitable jurisdiction power to try the action in the amended form. (iv) In holding that he had power to assess the amount payable to the plaintiff and deciding that the same should not be assessed by arbitration in accordance with the rules of the defendants.

A. S. Comyns Carr for the appellants.

R. A. Willes for the respondent.

RIDLEY, J.—In this case, in my opinion, the appeal fails, and the judgment of the learned judge must be affirmed. The action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant society claiming to recover the benefits which would be due to him as the result of an illness if he were a member of the society. The defendants denied that he was a member of the society, and when the matter came before the court they gave notice that they were going to take the point that under s. 67 of the National Insurance Act, 1911, the court had no jurisdiction to try the dispute between the parties. The learned judge heard the evidence given by the plaintiff, and said that in his opinion the plaintiff was a member of the society, and made a declaration to that effect. He also gave judgment for the plaintiff for £9 10s. damages. He further stated that in his opinion s. 67 of the National Insurance Act, 1911, did not affect his right to hear the action because that section only applied in cases where the dispute was between a person who was admittedly a member of a society such as the defendants and the society, and consequently he held that he had jurisdiction to entertain the action. It appears to me that the learned judge was right in so holding. The decisions which have been quoted to us show that in cases arising under the Friendly Societies Acts it was held that when a question such as that now before us arose, and it was contended that the dispute fell within the arbitration clause of the rules of the society, in order for the rules to apply it must be shown that the dispute was one which arose between the trustees of the society and a person who was a member, and that if it was denied that the person suing was a member of the society, then the case was not governed by the rules, and the court was at liberty to entertain the matter. The first case dealing with this question was Prentice v. London (2). There the trustees of the friendly society denied that the plaintiff was a member of the society, and it was held that they were estopped from saying that the dispute was a dispute between the society and one of its members within a rule providing for the settlement of such disputes. It appears to me that that case applies to the present, and that the defendants here, having denied that the plaintiff was a member of the society, are estopped from saying that the dispute was one between the society and one of its members. That case was followed by two others, Willis v. Wells (3) and Palliser v. Dale (4), which were quoted to us by counsel for the respondent. He also referred to the Scottish case of Blue v. West Kilbride Free Gardeners' Society (5) which appears to me to show that when once the court has established its right to hear a case it has the right to hear it out, and that, if in such a case as the present, it decides in favour of the plaintiff, it may also determine the damages to which he is entitled. Therefore the statutory defence under s. 67 of the National Insurance Act, 1911, failed.

But it was urged by counsel for the appellant that on Sept. 1, 1913, there came into operation the National Insurance Act, 1913, s. 27 of which provided that any dispute as to whether a person was a member of the society in question should be decided under the rules of the society in like manner as a dispute between the society and an insured person who is a member thereof. If that section had been before the learned judge it would, as it appears to me, have dealt with the point raised because it would have taken out of his jurisdiction the very matter left within it by the former Act. No point, however, was taken upon the section. It was not apparently known to the parties nor present to the mind of the learned judge. Counsel for the appellant now contends that because the point is one which goes to the jurisdiction of the court it can be taken at any time without the attention of the learned judge having been called to it in the first instance. Probably in the case of the High Court this contention might be sound in view of the decision in Norwich Corpn. v. Norwich Electric Tramways Co. (6) where VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said ([1906] 2 K.B. at p. 125):

> "The first point made for the plaintiffs in answer to that contention [i.e., that the dispute should be determined by some person appointed by the Board of Trade] is that it is too late at the present stage of the proceedings to raise this objection to the jurisdiction, and that it ought to have been raised at the trial. I can only say with regard to that point that I have always supposed it to be well established law that the objection that the tribunal has no jurisdiction to entertain the case is one which, at all events in reference to proceedings in the High Court, may be taken at any time. If the court in any case is itself satisfied that it has no jurisdiction to entertain the application made, it is its duty, in my opinion, to give effect to that view, taking, if necessary, the initiative upon itself."

I think that statement leaves open the question whether the principle there referred to applies to proceedings in the county court. In my view, the same rule does not apply. In Smith v. Baker (1) LORD HALSBURY, L.C., speaking of appeals from county courts, said ([1891] A.C. at p. 325):

"A matter of law can be made the subject of appeal, but then only when the point has been raised at the trial before the judge."

Looking at those words, I am of opinion that the principle which VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., lays down as applicable to the High Court does not properly apply to the county court, and that if an objection to the jurisdiction is sought to be raised in the Divisional Court, it must first be taken in the court below. For the reasons I have given I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

BANKES, J.—I agree. I think the case has been very well and fully argued on both sides, and I somewhat regret that so much learning has been expended upon a point which is really more one of form than of substance. There can be no question, it seems to me, having regard to s. 27 of the National Insurance Act, 1913, that the learned judge as a matter of fact had no jurisdiction to try the question involved in the action, and that being so the proper course to adopt in challenging his jurisdiction to try the case would have been by prohibition. If an application for prohibition had been made, I do not think there would have been any answer to it. Instead of doing that the defendants appealed, and the only question we have to decide is whether, having adopted that course they are entitled to succeed.

Many points were taken during the argument, and I will deal shortly with them. The plaintiff in his particulars of claim alleged that he was entitled to a sum of £9 10s. under a contract of insurance made between himself and the defendants. The claim so formulated raised the issue whether or not he was a member of the defendant society, because if the defendants challenged the existence of the contract they challenged the fact that he was a member of the society, and we know that that was the real dispute between the parties. Therefore, it seems to me that the particulars of claim were framed in a way which enabled that question to be raised before the learned judge. The next step was that the defendants put in a form of statutory defence. They limited themselves in their notice to a defence resting upon s. 67 of the National Insurance Act, 1911. I agree with counsel for the appellant that where a person challenges the jurisdiction of the court it is not necessary for him to put in a notice of defence, and that the document in question was not within the meaning of the County Court Rules and the County Courts Act, 1888, a statutory defence at all, and that consequently the defendants were not limited in setting up that the court had no jurisdiction to what appeared in the notice given by them. Then the matter came before the learned judge, and the only point taken by the defendants was that his jurisdiction was ousted by reason of s. 67 of the National Insurance Act, 1911. It seems to me that the point of law which the learned judge was asked to decide was whether or not the terms of that section were such as to oust his jurisdiction. That question of law the learned judge decided by saying that the dispute between the parties being whether or not the plaintiff was a member of the defendant society he was entitled to exercise jurisdiction in the matter because of the authorities to which he was, I suppose, either referred or which he had in his mind. I think it is plain that Prentice v. London (2) and the other cases of that class do decide that where a statute or a rule is framed in language to the effect that all disputes between a member and the society to which he belongs shall be referred to arbitration that does not include the case of whether or not a person is a member of the society, and therefore I think the learned judge was right in holding that so far as s. 67 was concerned it did not oust his jurisdiction. It was then contended that the learned judge amended the particulars of claim by inserting a claim for a declaration that the plaintiff was a member of the society, and thus gave himself jurisdiction. In the view I take of the particulars of claim, that contention is not well founded in fact, because I think the particulars were sufficiently wide in the circumstances to raise the points in dispute, and that the learned judge by his amendment only made it plain what he intended to do or had done. I go further, because I think the cases cited to us, and particularly Blue v. West Kilbride Free Gardeners' Society (5), establish the proposition that when once the court has jurisdiction to decide the question whether or not a person is a member of a society, it also has the right to give the consequential relief the person is claiming in the same action, and it is not right to say that the learned judge is confined to deciding whether the man was or was not a member of the society, and that when he has decided that he must go on to say that he has no jurisdiction to award compensation because the plaintiff must proceed to recover the same by arbitration if it is so provided in the rules.

The only material question in this case, to my mind, is whether or not it is open to the defendants to challenge the jurisdiction of the learned judge by way of an appeal when they did not raise before him the particular point of law which, if it had been raised, would have entitled them to judgment. There is no statute which says in terms that there shall be no right of appeal except with regard to points of law which have been raised before the judge; but I think the decision in Smith v. Baker (1), which followed on Clarkson v. Musgrave (7), does decide that a party can only appeal in regard to a particular point of law which has been raised before the county court judge, and that the question does not depend on whether the point is of such a nature that evidence might have been called in the county court with regard to it. I think if the decision of Clarkson v. Musgrave (7) is looked at, the real ground of the rule will be found. FIELD, J., in giving judgment, after referring to s. 6 of the County Court Act, 1875, which for this purpose is in the same language as s. 120, which gives the right of appeal under the County Courts Act, 1888, continued (9 Q.B.D. at p. 391):

> "Then the section provides further that at the trial or hearing the judge shall at the request of either party 'make a note of any question of law raised at such trial or hearing and of the facts in evidence in relation thereto, and of his decision thereon,' and he shall furnish a copy of the note so taken by the person requiring the same for the purpose of appeal. I am clearly of opinion that every question of law upon which it is desired to appeal must be raised at the trial. Unless it is, there is no 'ruling order, direction, or decision of the judge within s. 6 upon which to appeal'."

I think that the scheme of the legislation as defined by these authorities is that there shall be no appeal on a question of fact from a county court judge, nor upon a question of law unless such question has been definitely brought to his attention, and in regard to which he has been asked to decide.

In the present case, in my opinion, the learned judge was not asked to decide the particular question of law upon which the defendants appeal here, and that being so, this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal Law—Evidence—Admissibility of admission made by accused to person with authority over him—Answer to question put by that person.

The appellant, a private in the Indian Army, was convicted of the murder of a native officer. Shortly after the murder the commanding officer went to see the appellant, who was in custody, and said to him: "Why have you done such a senseless act?" The appellant replied: "Some three or four days he has been abusing me; without a doubt I killed him." No threat or inducement was offered to the appellant before he made this statement. At the trial evidence of this conversation was admitted.

Held: without deciding whether or not the answer made by a person in custody to a question put to him by a person with authority over him was admissible in evidence, the general circumstances of the case were such, and the preponderance of unquestioned evidence so great, that it was unlikely that the jury were substantially influenced by the disputed evidence, and there was, therefore, no substantial miscarriage of justice as would justify interference by the Board.

Appeal by special leave from a decision of the Supreme Court of Hong Kong, dated Dec. 16, 1912, affirming a conviction of the appellant for the wilful murder at Canton, in China, of a native officer one Subadar Ali Shafa, and a sentence of death pronounced by the Chief Justice.

The appellant was a native of Afghanistan and was enrolled as a private in the 126th Baluchistan Infantry Regiment of His Majesty's Indian Forces in June, 1911, and at the time of the commission of the offence was stationed at Shameen Island, Canton, in China. After his enrolment the appellant duly made a solemn affirmation that he would be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty and honestly and faithfully serve in His Majesty's Indian Forces, and go wherever he might be ordered by land or sea, and would observe and obey all commands of any officer set over him. The murder of which he was convicted was that of Ali Shafa, a subadar or company commander in his regiment who was shot with a rifle. The appellant was immediately arrested and charged with the murder. In accordance with the provisions contained in s. 6 of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890, and art. III, V. & L., of the China and Corea Order in Council, 1904, the appellant was sent to Hong Kong for trial by the Supreme Court. An indictment was preferred by the Attorney-General of Hong Kong against the appellant charging him with the murder, and he was tried before the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Hong Kong and a jury on Oct. 21, 22, 23 and 24, 1912, but the jury failed to agree and were discharged. The appellant was tried a second time before the Chief Justice and a jury on Nov. 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22, 1912, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty. Sentence was postponed pending the hearing by the full court of Hong Kong of certain points raised on behalf of the appellant during the trial. These points were shortly: (i) That the court had no jurisdiction to try the prisoner, who was not a British subject, and (ii) that the judge at the trial had improperly admitted as evidence a statement of the prisoner, amounting to a confession, made in answer to a question put to him by the commanding officer after he was in custody, who asked: "Why have you done such a senseless Act?" The full court confirmed the conviction, and the Chief Justice sentenced the appellant to death, but special leave to appeal in formâ pauperis was granted by the Board.

A. Romer Macklin for the appellant.

Sir R. Finlay, K.C., and E. W. Hansell, for the respondent, were not called on to argue.

Mar. 6, 1914. LORD SUMNER.—The appellant, Ibrahim, is a natural-born subject of the Ameer of Afghanistan, who was duly enlisted and enrolled on Jan. 12, 1911, in the 126th Regiment of Baluchistan Infantry at Quetta. He took the oath of allegiance to His Majesty and made a solemn declaration undertaking among other things to go wherever ordered by land or sea. On Sept. 4, 1912, he was a private serving with the detachment of that regiment which was encamped on Sha-mien or Shameen Island at Canton as guard of the concession. On Shameen are situated the various European settlements including the British. About 10.30 p.m. Subadar Ali Shafa, a native officer in the same regiment, was murdered. Ibrahim was charged with the crime, tried before the Supreme Court of Hong Kong, and convicted. He was sentenced to death, but sentence was respited pending the hearing of this appeal, which is brought by special leave in formâ pauperis. His grounds are two: first, that the jurisdiction of the court was not established, and, second, that there was a grave miscarriage of justice by reason of the misreception of evidence. [The first ground of appeal no longer calls for report.]

The second ground for this appeal is as follows: Some ten or fifteen minutes after Subadar Ali Shafa was shot Major Barrett, the officer commanding the detachment, who had been summoned from a little distance, arrived at the camp. He found Ibrahim in custody and in bonds, sitting on the step of the guard-room. "When I got up to Ibrahim," says the Major, "I said, 'Why have you done such a senseless act?' I said nothing else. Did not threaten him in any way. I offered no inducement of any kind, nor did anybody else to my knowledge or in my presence . . . when I spoke to accused I was sorry for him because he had killed the Subadar."

This last observation their Lordships treat only as evidence of the way in which the question was put, tending to show that it did not convey a command or inducement to Ibrahim of any kind. In truth, except that Major Barrett's words were formally a question they appear to have been indistinguishable from an exclamation of dismay on the part of a humane officer, alike concerned for the position of the accused, the fate of the deceased, and the credit of the regiment and the service. To this Ibrahim replied in Hindustani, "Some three or four days he has been abusing me; without a doubt I killed him."

It is argued that Ibrahim's statement was inadmissible, (a) as not being a voluntary statement but obtained by pressure of authority and fear of consequences; and (b) in any case as being the answer of a man in custody to a question put by a person having authority over him as his commanding officer and having custody of him through the subordinates who had made him prisoner. On this it becomes incumbent on their Lordships to consider the rule of English criminal law applicable to such circumstances. This somewhat exceptional duty arises because, by art. XXXV (2) of the China and Corea Order in Council, it is provided that "subject to the provisions of this order criminal jurisdiction under this order shall, as far as circumstances admit, be exercised on the principles of and in conformity with English law for the time being." There are no provisions in the order material on this point as modifying or excluding the principles and practice of English law, and their Lordships think that the matter may be justly treated as if English criminal law and practice applied to the criminal jurisdiction of the Supreme Court at Hong Kong. At the same time they are not to be understood to decide, that such law and practice are in all respects and particulars binding on that court, nor do they overlook in any way the necessary distinction that must sometimes be drawn between the criminal procedure of a European country, whose jurisprudence has a defined history extending over many centuries, and that applicable to a British possession in the far East, where a mixed and fluctuating population is subject to the administration of the law by European judges, whose duty it is to have regard alike to the principles of British justice and to the necessities of local order. Nor do their Lordships fail to observe that the words, "so far as circumstances admit" may well be applicable to such circumstances in the present case as the facts, that the facilities for formal proof of statutes passed and administrative orders made in various parts of His Majesty's dominions cannot be as copious in Hong Kong as they are in this country, and further that when, as in the present case, a force detailed for the protection of Europeans resident beyond His Majesty's dominions in the midst of a population, often turbulent and at the particular time disturbed, is itself disturbed by such a crime as the murder of a subadar by a native private in the ranks, such words may well cover and be designed to cover some necessary departure from the formalities only as distinguished from the essentials of English justice.

It has long been established as a positive rule of English criminal law, that no statement by an accused is admissible in evidence against him unless it is shown by the prosecution to have been a voluntary statement, in the sense that it has not been obtained from him either by fear of prejudice or hope of advantage exercised or held out by a person in authority. The principle is as old as LORD HALE. The burden of proof in the matter has been decided by high authority in recent times in R. v. Thompson (1), a case which, it is important to observe, was considered by the trial judge before he admitted the evidence. There was, in the present case, Major Barrett's affirmative evidence that the prisoner was not subjected to the pressure of either fear or hope in the sense mentioned. There was no evidence to the contrary. With R. v. Thompson (1) before him, the learned judge must be taken to have been satisfied with the prosecution's evidence that the prisoner's statement was not so induced either by hope or fear, and, as is laid down in the same case, the decision of this question, albeit one of fact, rests with the trial judge. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the admission of this evidence was no breach of the aforesaid rule.

The appellant's objection was rested on the two bare facts that the statement was preceded by and made in answer to a question, and that the question was put by a person in authority and the answer given by a man in his custody. This ground, in so far as it is a ground at all, is a more modern one. With the growth of a police force of the modern type, the point has frequently arisen, whether, if a policeman questions a prisoner in his custody at all, the prisoner's answers are evidence against him, apart altogether from fear of prejudice or hope of advantage inspired by a person in authority. It is to be observed that logically these objections all go to the weight and not to the admissibility of the evidence. What a person having knowledge about the matter in issue says of it is itself relevant to the issue as evidence against him. That he made the statement under circumstances of hope, fear, interest, or otherwise strictly goes only to its weight. In an action of tort evidence of this kind could not be excluded when tendered against a tort-feasor, though a jury might well be told as prudent men to think little of it. Even the rule which excludes evidence of statements made by a prisoner, when they are induced by hope held out or fear inspired by a person in authority, is a rule of policy.

> "A confession forced from the mind by the flattery of hope or by the torture of fear comes in so questionable a shape, when it is to be considered as evidence of guilt, that no credit ought to be given to it" (R. v. Warickshall (2)).

It is not that the law presumes such statements to be untrue, but from the danger of receiving such evidence judges have thought it better to reject it for the due administration of justice: R. v. Baldry (3). Accordingly, when hope or fear were not in question, such statements were long regularly admitted as relevant, though with some reluctance and subject to strong warning as to their weight.

In the earlier part of the nineteenth century there was strong judicial authority for admitting a prisoner's statements, even though obtained by constables, who had him in custody, by considerable insistence in the way of interrogation (R. v. Thornton (4); R. v. Wild (5); R. v. Kerr (6); and even so late as R. v. Baldry (3), a case decided on the rules as to hope and fear, PARKE, B., observed (2 Den. at p. 445):

> "by the law of England, in order to render a confession admissible in evidence, it must be perfectly voluntary, and there is no doubt that any inducement in the nature of a promise or a threat held out by a person in authority vitiates a confession. The decisions to that effect have gone a long way: whether it would not have been better to have allowed the whole to go to the jury it is now too late to inquire, but I think there has been too much tenderness towards prisoners in this matter. I confess that I cannot look at the decisions without some shame, when I consider what objections have prevailed to prevent the reception of confessions in evidence . . . justice and common sense have too frequently been sacrificed at the shrine of mercy."

The law, however, was considered to be fairly settled: see R. v. Cheverton (7); R. v. Reason (8); R. v. Fennell (9); 7 Q.B.D. at p. 150, and the references collected in the note to R. v. Brackenbury (10). When judges excluded such evidence, it was rather explained by their observations on the duties of policemen than justified by their reliance on rules of law: e.g., R. v. Pettit (11); R. v. Berriman (12), a case when the accused was not yet in custody.

In 1885 R. v. Gavin (13) re-opened these questions. Then A. L. SMITH, J., excluded a statement made to a constable, who questioned his prisoner in a way that amounted to cross-examination. He laid it down that a constable has no right to ask questions without expressly saying that the answers cannot be relevant evidence. In 1893 DAY, J., in R. v. Brackenbury (10), declined to follow this decision, in a case when the question and answer preceded the arrest, and CAVE, J., in R. v. Male and Cooper (14), rejected a statement made by a prisoner in custody to a constable who had cross-examined him, saying merely that the police have no right to manufacture evidence, though in 1896, in R. v. Goddard and Hurst (15), he appears to have concurred in the admissibility of very similar matter. Two years later HAWKINS, J., in R. v. Miller (16), allowed the accused's answers to be proved against him, when he had been cross-examined before arrest, saying that he did not expressly dissent from R. v. Gavin (13), but that "every case must be decided according to the whole of its circumstances," but in 1898 (R. v. Histed (17)) he excluded the answers of a prisoner in custody, on the authority of R. v. Gavin (13), saying that the constable was entrapping the prisoner and trying by a trick to set a broken-down case on its legs again. Since then the current of authority has run the other way. In Rogers v. Hawken (18), a case of questions before arrest, a Divisional Court, consisting of LORD RUSSELL, C.J., and MATHEW, J., judges not prone to lean against a prisoner, held that the statement was admissible, and observed that

> "R. v. Male and Cooper (14) must not be taken as laying down that a statement of the accused to a police constable without threat or inducement is not admissible. There is no rule of law excluding statements made in such circumstances;"

and in R. v. Best (19) the Court of Criminal Appeal (including CHANNELL, J.) held that > "it is quite impossible to say that the fact that a question of this kind has been asked invalidates the trial," adding that R. v. Gavin (13) is not a good decision. Here, however, it is to be observed that the actual decision was that under the proviso of s. 4 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, the court would not interfere in that case. It did not expressly declare that statements of an accused, when in custody, in reply to a policeman's questions, are always admissible evidence against him unless they are rendered involuntary by reason of hope or fear induced by a person in authority. The point has been before the Court of Criminal Appeal more recently. In 1905 (R. v. Knight and Thayre (20)) statements were rejected, because obtained from the accused before arrest by means of a long interrogation by a person in authority over him. CHANNELL, J., adverted thus to the case of questions put by a constable after arresting:

> "When he has taken anyone into custody . . . he ought not to question the prisoner . . . I am not aware of any distinct rule of evidence that, if such improper questions are asked, the answers to them are inadmissible, but there is clear authority for saying that the judge at the trial may in his discretion refuse to allow the answers to be given in evidence."

The same learned judge in R. v. Booth and Jones (21) in 1910 observes (5 Cr. App. Rep. at p. 179),

> "the moment you have decided to charge him and practically got him into custody, then, inasmuch as a judge even cannot ask a question or a magistrate, it is ridiculous to suppose that a policeman can. But there is no actual authority yet that if a policeman does ask a question it is inadmissible; what happens is that the judge says it is not advisable to press the matter;"

and of this DARLING, J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal, observes: "The principle was put very clearly by CHANNELL, J."

The learned trial judge in the present case, in addition to the argument of counsel for the defence had before him a case decided in 1908 by the full court at Hong Kong, R. v. Wong Chin Kwai (22), in which the English authorities up to that time were very fully examined. Before admitting the evidence of the appellant's statement he consulted GOMPERTZ, J., who had been a party to that decision, and accordingly it is clear that he admitted the statement only after the fullest consideration. The English law is still unsettled, strange as it may seem, since the point is one that constantly occurs in criminal trials. Many judges, in their discretion, exclude such evidence, for they fear that nothing less than the exclusion of all such statements can prevent improper questioning of prisoners by removing the inducement to resort to it. This consideration does not arise in the present case. Others, less tender to the prisoner or more mindful of the balance of decided authority, would admit such statements, nor would the Court of Criminal Appeal quash the conviction thereafter obtained, if no substantial miscarriage of justice had occurred. If, then, a learned judge, after anxious consideration of the authorities, decides in accordance with what is at any rate a "probable opinion" of the present law, if it is not actually the better opinion, it appears to their Lordships that his conduct is the very reverse of that "violation of the principles of natural justice" which has been said to be the ground for advising His Majesty's interference in a criminal matter. If, as appears even on the line of authorities which the trial judge did not follow, the matter is one for the judge's discretion, depending largely on his view of the impropriety of the questioner's conduct and the general circumstances of the case, their Lordships think, as will hereafter be seen, that in the circumstances of this case his discretion is not shown to have been exercised improperly.

Having regard to the particular position in which their Lordships stand to criminal proceedings, they do not propose to intimate what they think the rule of English law ought to be, much as it is to be desired that the point should be settled by authority, so far as a general rule can be laid down where circumstances must so greatly vary. That must be left to a court which exercises, as their Lordships do not, the revising functions of a general court of criminal appeal: (Clifford v. King-Emperor (23)). Their Lordships' practice has been repeatedly defined. Leave to appeal is not granted "except where some clear departure from the requirements of justice" exists: (Riel v. R. (24), 10 App. Cas. at p. 675); nor unless "by a disregard of the forms of legal process, or by some violation of the principles of natural justice or otherwise, substantial and grave injustice has been done" (Dillet's Case (25)). It is true that these are cases of applications for special leave to appeal, but the board has repeatedly treated applications for leave to appeal and the hearing of criminal appeals as being upon the same footing (Riel's Case (24); Ex parte Deemin (26)). The Board cannot give leave to appeal where the grounds suggested could not sustain the appeal itself; and, conversely, it cannot allow an appeal on grounds that would not have sufficed for the grant of permission to bring it. Misdirection, as such, even irregularity as such, will not suffice (Ex parte Macrea (27)). There must be something which, in the particular case, deprives the accused of the substance of fair trial and the protection of the law, or which, in general, tends to divert the due and orderly administration of the law into a new course, which may be drawn into an evil precedent in future (R. v. Bertrand (28)).

Their Lordships were strongly pressed in argument with the case of Makin v. A.-G. for New South Wales (29), in which LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., delivered an elaborate exposition of the principles on which a Court of Criminal Appeal should act. Although in that case these observations are technically obiter dicta, since the board held that the evidence complained of at the trial had been rightly admitted, they are most weighty in themselves, and they have since been adopted by the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Dyson (30), though with some later qualification. In Makin's Case (29), however, their Lordships had to determine the true construction of s. 423 of the New South Wales Act 46 Victoria, No. 17, which in defining a strictly appellate jurisdiction in criminal matters, provided

A "that no conviction or judgment thereon shall be reversed, arrested or avoided in any case so stated, unless for some substantial wrong or other miscarriage of justice."

It was held there that to transfer the decision of the guilt of the accused from a jury, acting on oral testimony, to an appellate tribunal, possessing that testimony only in writing, cannot be said to involve no miscarriage of justice, and hence that B a court of criminal appeal is not entitled to dismiss the appeal by re-trying the case on shorthand notes, or by holding that, if the trial judge had excluded the evidence, which he wrongly received, the verdict would probably have been the same. In other words such a proviso is not to be construed as investing a statutory court of criminal review with the functions of the original trial judge and jury. This is a very different matter from the duty of this Board in advising His Majesty C as to the exercise of his prerogative in relation to facts as they are made to appear to this Board by admissible material. Even in Makin's Case (29), however, reservation was made of cases

"where it is impossible to suppose that the evidence improperly admitted can have had any influence on the verdict of the jury,"

D and this reservation is not to be taken as exhaustive. In England, where the trial judge has warned the jury not to act upon the objectionable evidence, the Court of Criminal Appeal under the similar words of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 4, may refuse to interfere, if it thinks that the jury, giving heed to that warning, would have returned the same verdict—(R. v. Lucas (31); R. v. Stoddart (32); R. v. Norton (33); R. v. Loates (34); R. v. Wilson (35))—or where evidence has been E admitted inadvertently or erroneously, which is inadmissible but of small importance—(R. v. Westacott (36); R. v. Mullins (37))—or most unlikely to have affected the verdict (R. v. Solomon (38)). Where the objectionable evidence has been left for the consideration of the jury without any warning to disregard it, the Court of Criminal Appeal quashes the conviction, if it thinks that the jury may have been influenced by it, even though without it there was evidence sufficient to F warrant a conviction (R. v. Fisher (39)). The rule can hardly be considered to be settled, but at any rate it seems to go so far as to substitute "highly improbable" for "impossible" in LORD HERSCHELL'S reservation above quoted.

Their Lordships think that the jurisdiction, which they exercise in appeals in criminal matters, involves a general consideration of the evidence and of the circumstances of the case in order to place the irregularities complained of, if substan- G tiated, in their proper relation to the whole matter. The facts of the present case must, therefore, be stated. They are briefly as follows. During the hot weather of 1912 the Sepoys of the 126th Beluchistan Regiment at Shameen lived and slept a great deal in the open air. The camp was near the Central Avenue, shaded by trees and lit by the electric light standards in the Avenue. On the night in question H the native officers, including Subadar Ali Shafa, were sitting in chairs near the road. Ibrahim and three other Sepoys were not far off in a group playing cards. The time was about 10.30 p.m. The subadar went up to them, accused them of gambling, searched them, took away 3·80 dollars of Ibrahim's money and ordered them to be confined to the lines. He abused Ibrahim with offensive language, against which Ibrahim protested, and then returned to his chair. A little time I afterwards the sentry saw a man going into the camp itself to the place where the men's rifles were kept, and gave an alarm. A shot was fired, and the subadar, after calling to the guard to turn out, and walking a few steps, fell dead, a bullet having passed through his body. Almost at once a man was seen a few paces from the sentry, standing behind a tree and pointing his rifle in the direction of the place where the native officers were sitting. This last significant fact was elicited by the jury themselves. He was immediately seized and proved to be Ibrahim. He had his own service rifle in his hand, identified by its number. Five rounds, enough to fill one clip, were missing from his bandolier. Four cartridges were in the magazine of his rifle, the bolt of which was open; one, empty and still hot, was found on the ground. The rifle was fouled from recent discharge. No one else with a rifle was seen outside the camp when Ibrahim was seized. This story, which did not depend at any point on the evidence of one witness only, was amply corroborated in various ways. Beyond an indefinite suggestion that Ibrahim had been instigated to commit this crime, which came to nothing, the only attack on the witnesses was founded on discrepancies between them in matters of detail, or on the suggestion that they had amplified their evidence between the first trial, when the jury disagreed, and the second. It appears to their Lordships that a clearer case there could hardly be, and that it would be the merest speculation to suppose that the jury was substantially influenced by the evidence of what Ibrahim said to Major Barrett. If not impossible, it is at any rate highly improbable, that this should have been so, and when the preponderance of unquestioned evidence is so great, their Lordships cannot in any view of the matter conclude that there has been any miscarriage of justice, substantial, grave or otherwise. They will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. CLAY. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. BUCHANAN

[Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Swinfen Eady and Pickford, L.JJ.), May 26, 28, 1914]

Land Tax—Valuation of property—"Open market"—"Willing seller"—Special circumstances—Property required for particular purpose—Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. 7, c. 8), ss. 2, 25 (1).

The term "open market" in s. 25 (1), of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910 [repealed], included, but was not confined to, a sale by auction or a sale through publication in the lists of house agents; it did not necessarily involve a sale without reserve. The term "willing seller" in the same subsection meant a free agent who could not be required by virtue of compulsory powers to sell.

The value of the fee simple of a certain dwelling-house and garden, if purchased by an ordinary individual and used as a private dwelling-house, was £750 and no more. Owing to the fact that the property was situate near a certain institution, the trustees of which were desirous of extending their premises, and that the property was well adapted for the special purposes for which the institution required it, the trustees were willing to pay £1,000 for it, and it was purchased by them at that figure. On appeal against valuations of the property, under the Act, at £1,000,

Held: the valuations should be affirmed because the value of a property if sold in the "open market" by a "willing seller," might be ascertained with reference to the fact that a price in excess of what the property might otherwise have realised had been paid by one particular purchaser owing to special circumstances.

Decision of Scrutton, J., [1914] 1 K.B. 339, affirmed.

Notes. Land values duties have now been abolished, and the sections of Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, considered in this case have been repealed. The case

A is reported, however, because it may be of assistance in construing the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1 and s. 7 (5), that estate duty is payable, where property passes on death, on the price which, in the opinion of the commissioners, it would fetch if sold in the open market at the time of the death. The case must be read subject to the decisions of the House of Lords in I.R. Comrs. v. Crossman, [1936] 1 All E.R. 762, that the open market price is not necessarily as high as B the price which a particular purchaser may, for special reasons, be prepared to pay; and of the Scottish Court that it is not necessarily the price at which the property is in fact sold after the death (I.R.C. v. Marr's Trustees (1906), 44 Sc.L.R. 647).

The principle laid down in this case does not apply to valuations for the purpose of assessing compensation on compulsory purchase: see Acquisition of Land C (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, s. 2 (3).

Appeals against two decisions of SCRUTTON, J., on petitions against decisions of a referee on the value of a certain property for the purposes of Land Values Duty.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. CLAY

The petitioners R. H. Clay and others were persons aggrieved by a decision of a referee within the meaning of s. 33 (4) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, in respect of a dwelling-house and garden, being No. 83, Durnford Street, East Stonehouse, Plymouth.

In January, 1911, there was duly served by a district valuer appointed by the petitioners, a provisional valuation made under and by virtue of the Act. The provisional valuation showed original gross value £750; original total value £750; difference between the gross value and the value of the fee simple divested of buildings, trees, etc., £560; original full site value, £190; original assessable site value £190. By a notice of appeal dated Oct. 12, 1911, the petitioners intimated their intention to appeal to the referee against the total and site value fixed in the provisional valuation on the ground that those values were insufficient. At the hearing of the appeal at Plymouth, on Mar. 8 and 9, 1912, before the referee, the evidence called by the petitioners showed that the gross value on April 30, 1909, as defined by s. 25 (1) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, did not exceed the figure fixed in the provisional valuation. The witnesses called on behalf of the petitioners did not dispute that apart from one special circumstance the gross value was fairly fixed at £750. The special circumstance referred to was that the proprietors of a nurses' home, who at all material times occupied the house next door to the house now in question, and were desirous of extending their premises, did, at a later time, give the sum of £1,000 for the house now in question, and were as it appeared on the evidence willing at April 30, 1909, to have given that sum if the house now in question could have been obtained for it. It was contended that the above circumstance constituted a special adaptability of the house now in question, enhancing its value and rendering £1,000 a proper value to be fixed.

On April 26, 1912, the referee gave his decision in relation to the appeal as follows:

"The decision on the appeal in respect of which the annexed notice of appeal has been given is that items numbered 1, 2, and 12 in the provisional valuation are insufficient, and that the amounts of these should be as follows:

1. Gross value		£1,000
Deductions from gross value.
2. Difference between gross value and value of fee simple of land divested of buildings, trees, &c.	£800
Full site value	£200	—£1,000
Deductions from total value.
12. Deductions from gross value to arrive at full site value (as above)		£800
Assessable site value		£200

I further decide that the expenses of the appellants in connection with the appeal shall be paid by the commissioners."

This was the decision by which the petitioners were aggrieved, and against which the present petition was brought.

The petitioners submitted that the decision of the referee was erroneous and should be reversed upon the following grounds: (i) That the values fixed in the provisional valuation were correct; (ii) that there was ample evidence that the fee simple sold on April 30, 1909, in the "open market" by a "willing seller" would not have fetched more than £750; (iii) that there was no evidence of any special adaptability in the house now in question; (iv) that the price that one particular purchaser might, owing to special circumstances, be prepared to give was not the measure of the market value of the house; (v) that the witnesses on behalf of the petitioners, in arriving at their valuation, allowed for the fact that the proprietors of the nurses' home were anxious to buy; (vi) that the decision of the referee proceeded upon an erroneous view of the law; and that the referee misconstrued s. 25 (1) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. The petitioners, therefore, prayed (a) that it might be declared that the provisional valuation of Jan. 24, 1911, was correct and ought to be restored; (b) such further or other order as the court might think fit.

Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Buchanan

The petitioners, Mrs. E. J. Buchanan and others, were persons aggrieved by the decision of the referee relating to the same dwelling-house and garden. As in the preceding case, the provisional valuation with reference to which house was as set forth above. The appeal to the referee in respect of that valuation was heard together with the appeal which is the subject of the petition in the preceding case.

By an indenture of conveyance dated Sept. 29, 1910, the dwelling-house and garden now in question were conveyed in fee simple by Mrs. E. J. Buchanan to the before-mentioned R. H. Clay and others, in consideration of £1,000. Particulars of the conveyance were duly delivered to the petitioners, and the conveyance being an "occasion" under and by virtue of s. 2 (2) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, particulars as provisionally determined of the values on the occasion aforesaid were duly made under the hand of the petitioners' valuer, dated Feb. 21, 1911, and were served on the said Mrs. E. J. Buchanan, R. H. Clay and others. The particulars showed: Value of land on the occasion £1,000; difference between gross value and value of the fee simple divested of buildings, trees, &c., £560; site value on the occasion £440. The original site value, as stated in the provisional valuation, was £190, and as found by the referee was £200. Notice of appeal was duly given on behalf of Mrs. E. J. Buchanan, R. H. Clay and others, against the provisional determination of the site value on the "occasion," the ground of appeal being that such site value on the occasion was not correct. At the hearing of the appeal by the referee at Plymouth, on Mar. 8 and 9, 1912, together with the appeal in the preceding case, the evidence called by the petitioners showed that the gross value of the land on the "occasion" did not exceed £750.

The witnesses called on behalf of the petitioners did not dispute that, apart from the special circumstances of the sale to the proprietors of the nurses' home, the gross value was fairly fixed at £750. The proprietors of the nurses' home, who at all material times occupied the house next door to the house now in question, and were desirous of extending their premises, were prepared to give and did give the sum of £1,000 for the house now in question. It was contended that the above circumstance constituted a special adaptability of the house now in question, enhancing its value, and rendering £1,000 a proper value to be fixed. On April 26, 1912, the referee gave his decision in relation to the appeal as follows:

> "The decision of the appeal, in respect of which the annexed notice of appeal has been given is that the site value on the occasion of the sale to and the purchase by the appellants is not correct, and that the amount should be as follows:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Value of land on the 'occasion' ... ... | £1,000 |
> | Deduction to arrive at site value on the 'occasion': | |
> | Difference between gross value and value of the fee simple divested of buildings, trees, &c. ... ... | £800 |
> | Site value on the 'occasion' ... ... | £200 |
> And I further decide that the expenses in connection with the appeal shall be paid by the commissioners."

This was the decision by which the petitioners were aggrieved and against which the present petition was brought.

The petitioners submitted that the decision of the referee was erroneous and should be reversed on the following grounds: (i) that the gross value of the land on the occasion was £750; (ii) that there was ample evidence that the fee simple of the land sold on Sept. 29, 1910, in the "open market" by a "willing seller" could not have fetched more than £750; (iii) that there was no evidence of any special adaptability in the house now in question; (iv) that the price that one particular purchaser might, owing to special circumstances, be prepared to give, and had in fact given, was not the measure of the market value of the house; (v) that the site value on the occasion was correctly deduced in the particulars of value as provisionally determined on the occasion; (vi) that the decision of the referee proceeded upon an incorrect construction of ss. 2 and 25 of the Finance (1909–10)

Act, 1910. The petitioners, therefore prayed, (a) that it might be declared that the particulars of value as provisionally determined were correct and that the conclusion arrived at by the referee was erroneous; (b) such further or other order as the court might think fit.

Section 25 (1) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, provided:

> "For the purposes of this part of this Act, the gross value of land means the amount which the fee simple of the land, if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller in its then condition, free from incumbrances, and from any burden, charge, or restriction, (other than rates or taxes) might be expected to realise."

In December, 1913, the petition came on to be heard before SCRUTTON, J., when judgment was reserved. On Dec. 13, 1913, SCRUTTON, J., held that the gross value of the property for the purpose of the subsection was £1,000, as fixed by the referee; and that in considering the value of the fee simple, if sold in the "open market" by a "willing seller," the referee was perfectly entitled to take into account the price actually offered and paid for the property, although the same was in excess of what it might otherwise have realised, owing to the fact that the particular purchaser required it for a particular purpose. From that decision the Commissioners appealed to the Court of Appeal.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Stanley Buckmaster, K.C.) and William Finlay for the appellants, the Inland Revenue Commissioners.

Freeman, K.C., and William Allen for the respondent taxpayers.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 28. The following judgments were read.

COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This appeal—for I think that the two cases really form one appeal—raises an important question under s. 25 of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910. That section provides that > "the gross value of land means the amount which the fee simple of the land, if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller in its then condition [subject to certain deductions] might be expected to realise."

The facts are not in dispute. The respondent Mrs. Buchanan was owner and occupier of No. 83, Durnford Street, East Stonehouse, having purchased it in 1902 for £700. In September, 1910, she sold it to the respondents Clay and others for £1,000. The purchasers were the trustees of a nurses' home, No. 84, who wanted the house for the purpose of extending their home. In 1908 they had offered Mrs. Buchanan £850 which she declined. Negotiations were resumed in 1910 and after some bargaining she agreed to sell for £1,000. The trustees would have been prepared to give £1,100. Regarding No. 83 solely as a residence for private occupation, its value was not more than £750. The referee found the gross value as on April 30, 1909, to be £1,000, and SCRUTTON, J., has upheld that view. The contention of the appellants is that the gross value is £750 only. The contest before us has turned mainly on the words "open market" and "willing seller." I think the view ultimately taken by counsel for the appellants, and also for the respondents, as to the meaning of "open market" is correct. "Open market" includes a sale by auction, but it is not confined to that. It would include property publicly announced in the usual way by insertion in the lists of house agents, but it does not necessarily involve the idea of a sale without reserve. I can see no ground for excluding from consideration the fact that the property is so situate that to one or more persons it presents greater attractions than to anybody else. The house or the land may immediately adjoin one or more landowners likely to offer more than the property would be worth to anyone else. This is a fact which cannot be disregarded. Counsel for the appellants ultimately admitted that some regard must be had to that fact, but he urged that you ought to consider, first, what an outside purchaser would give, say, £750, and then allow the adjoining owner one more bid. In other words, something very small beyond the £750. We had our attention called to the valuable judgments of LORDS JOHNSTON and SALVESEN in the recent Scottish case, Glass v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), and I accept their view of the meaning of the words "open market." The price at which the property was sold in 1910 is not the test of the gross value in April, 1909, but it cannot be disregarded. I adopt the language of SCRUTTON, J. ([1914] 1 K.B. at p. 350):

> "He [the referee] was right in this, not because of the sale for £1,000, but because of the reasonable expectation that a willing seller could get £1,000 or more from the nurses' home."

An "open market" sale of property "in its then condition" presupposes a knowledge of its situation with all surrounding circumstances. To say that a small farm in the middle of a wealthy landowner's estate is to be valued without reference to the fact that he will probably be willing to pay a large price, but solely with reference to its ordinary agricultural value, seems to me absurd. If the landowner does not at the moment buy, land brokers or speculators will give more than its pure agricultural value with a view to re-selling it at a profit to the landowner. It is for the referee, whose competence is not challenged, to arrive at a figure. The court ought not, as a rule, to review his decision on what is in truth a question of fact. I see no ground for supposing that there has been any misdirection in point of law.

The other point is as to the meaning of "willing seller." It is urged that Mrs. Buchanan never was a willing seller; that she never wished to vacate the house in which she was living; and that it was only after pressure from the trustees that she agreed to sell for £1,000. I am disposed to think that a "willing seller" is a person who is a free agent and cannot be required by virtue of compulsory powers to sell, and that Mrs. Buchanan was a "willing seller" when, in 1910, she voluntarily agreed to accept £1,000. If, however, contrary to my view, she was not a "willing seller," the problem still remains, for the existence of a willing seller, whether Mrs. Buchanan or not, must be assumed for the purpose of the section.

In my opinion, the judgment of SCRUTTON, J., affirming the decision of the referee was correct, and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—The Solicitor-General has contended that in arriving at "the gross value of land" pursuant to the provisions of s. 25 (1) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, and in ascertaining the amount "which the fee simple of the land, if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller . . . might be expected to realise" you must disregard the fact that the property has a special value to one particular person who would be willing to give substantially more than any other person and also disregard the influence upon the market which the knowledge of this fact would create. He further urged that at most there could only be allowed some slight increase, on what he contended would otherwise be the market value of the land, so as to represent the amount of one bid at an auction which the particular person would probably make over all other persons to secure the property—say £50 extra or the like.

The house in question—No. 83, Durnford Street, East Stonehouse, Plymouth—has been valued in the Provisional Valuation as of April 30, 1909, as altered and settled by the referee at £1,000 and deducting £800, the assessable site value fixed at £200. On the occasion of a sale the amounts as altered and settled by the referee are the same, so that no increment duty is payable. The appellants claim that the original amount in the provisional valuation—namely, £750, should be restored as that figure represented the market value of the house—irrespective of the wants of the nurses' home next door. On Sept. 18, 1908, Mrs. Buchanan refused an offer of £850 made by the nurses' home for the house. On Mar. 2, 1910, it was reported to the nurses' home that Mrs. Buchanan would not take less for the house than £1,100, and in August, 1910, the nurses' home determined to offer £1,100 if it could not be obtained for less, but on Sept. 29, 1910, it was agreed to be sold by Mrs. Buchanan to Dr. Clay and others on behalf of the nurses' home for £1,000. The referee found the value both on April 30, 1909, and on Sept. 29, 1910, was £1,000—this was less than the nurses' home had determined to give and was prepared to offer, if they could not obtain the property cheaper. The house could not be rebuilt so as to give the same accommodation as at present for less than £1,200. The learned judge in the court below found as a fact that as a private residence, and having regard to the other houses offering, No. 83 was not worth more than £750, which was the utmost such people could be expected to give, but that to the nurses' home which owned the neighbouring house, and needed further accommodation near, No. 83 was so adjacent and offered such suitable accommodation that it would be advantageous to them to pay at least £1,000 and probably more for it, and that the £1,000 actually paid was a profitable business transaction to the nursing home and not a fancy price. It was not worth anyone else's while to pay a sum substantially larger than £750 except in the hope of re-selling to the nurses' home to which the house was obviously of considerable value and a likely subject of purchase.

The Solicitor-General contended that as the section said "if sold at the time in the open market" the price which only one particular buyer was prepared to pay must be excluded from all consideration. It might possibly be a fancy price which had no relation to market price; that a reference to open market showed that the statute referred to a current market price of land a price which one or more valuers might determine to be the market value of the land.

In my opinion, this contention is unsound. A value, ascertained by reference to the amount obtainable in an "open market," shows an intention to include every possible purchaser. The market is to be the open market as distinguished from an offer to a limited class only such as the members of the family. The market is not necessarily an auction sale. The section means such amount as the land might be expected to realise if offered under conditions enabling every person desirous of purchasing to come in and make an offer, and if proper steps were taken to advertise the property and let all likely purchasers know that the land is in the market for sale. It scarcely needed Mr. Body's evidence to inform us—it is common knowledge—that when the fact becomes known that one probable buyer desires to obtain any property, that raises the general price or value of the thing in the market. Not only is the probable buyer a competitor in the market but other persons—such as property brokers—compete in the market for what they know another person wants with a view to a re-sale to him at an enhanced price so as to realise a profit. A vendor desiring to realise any land would ordinarily give full publicity to all facts within his knowledge likely to enhance the price. The local conditions and requirements, the advantages of the situation of the property for any particular purpose, and the names of the persons who are probable buyers would ordinarily be matters of local knowledge to the property brokers, agents, and speculators. In order to arrive at the amount which land might be "expected to realise" all these matters ought to be taken into consideration. "Expected" refers to the expectation of properly qualified persons who have taken pains to inform themselves of all the particulars ascertainable about the property and its capabilities, the demand for it and the likely buyers. The price actually realised by a sale is not necessarily the price which it might have been expected to realise. But if the valuer be competent and has taken proper pains in the matter there ought to be little difference between the two figures. The fact that No. 83 had a potential value by reason of its proximity to the nurses' home and to the very rapid increase of the work of that institution, pointing to a necessary extension at an early date ought properly to be taken into consideration in arriving at the value it might be expected to realise. The Solicitor-General urged that after the addition of the new wing to the old building, which followed upon the refusal by Mrs. Buchanan of the offer of £850 on Sept. 18, 1908, this element of value disappeared. This is not the case in fact. The report of the institution for 1908–9 shows the leaps and bounds by which the work was increasing, and points to a further extension of premises being necessary in the near future, and this extension indeed became extremely urgent in the following year.

It was then urged by the Solicitor-General that if the probability of this special buyer purchasing above the price which but for his needs would have been the market price could be taken into consideration at all, then only one further point or bid could be allowed, and it must be assumed that this special buyer would have become the purchaser upon making this one extra bid. Such an assumption would ordinarily be quite erroneous. The knowledge of the special need would affect the market price, and others would join in competing for the property with a view to obtaining it at a price less than that at which the opinion would be formed that it would be worth the while of the special buyer to purchase.

It was then urged that the vendor in the present case was not a "willing seller," as she had to be persuaded to sell at the sum of £1,000. It was, however, true that her son-in-law was consumptive, and that his wife did not think Durnford Street quite the right place for him to live in, and that was one motive for her yielding to the solicitations of Dr. Clay on behalf of the home. She was, however, a "willing seller" at £1,000. A sale by a "willing seller" is distinguished from a sale which is made by reason of compulsory powers where the vendor frequently obtains an addition to the price, because of being under compulsion to sell. It does not mean a sale by a person willing to sell his property without reserve for any price he can obtain. Mrs. Buchanan was a "willing seller" when she accepted £1,000. The fact that she was persuaded or induced to agree voluntarily to sell at that price, did not make her any the less a willing seller. There was no evidence of any compulsion; there was friendly bargaining, some discussion, some higgling about price, and then an agreement come to. This is the normal course of most private contract sales. She was none the less a willing seller because she had not previously put the property into the hands of an agent for sale. She was willing to sell at a price; she was offered a price less than the maximum which the intending purchasers were willing to give, and she took it. There was a considerable body of evidence re-heard before SCRUTTON, J., and the sum of £1,000 was arrived at because that was the sum which the land, if sold at the time in the open market in its then condition, might be expected to realise. It happens, also, to be the price actually realised, but the figure was not arrived at on the latter ground.

I agree with the judgment of SCRUTTON, J., and also with the reasons given in the judgments of LORD JOHNSTON and LORD SALVESEN in the Court of Session in the unreported case of Glass v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) of which shorthand notes have been furnished to us. This appeal should be dismissed.

PICKFORD, L.J.—This is an appeal from SCRUTTON, J., relating to the gross value of premises in Stonehouse under the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910. [HIS LORDSHIP summarised the facts and continued:] Upon this state of facts the referee and SCRUTTON, J., fixed the gross value at £1,000. The appellants contended that the gross value should be £750 and a small sum which I will mention later. The case turns on the application to the facts of s. 25 (2) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, by which the gross value is defined as the amount which the fee simple of the land, if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller, might be expected to realised.

It was argued for the appellants that the respondent was not a "willing seller" as she was only tempted by an exceptionally high offer and that the market value to a "willing seller" was not to be measured by the price given by the trustees of the nurses' home in consequence of their special wants.

I think that sold in the "open market" means sold in such a way that anyone wishing to purchase was able to do so, e.g., by auction or by putting the house into the hands of an agent to sell, and I think a "willing seller" means one who is prepared to sell provided a fair price is obtained under all the circumstances of the case. I do not think it means only a seller who is prepared to sell at any price and on any terms or who is actually at the time wishing to sell. In other words, I do not think it means an anxious seller.

In this case the house was only worth £750 if it was sold as a dwelling-house, and unless there were some other elements to be considered that would be its value; but there was another element here, i.e., the fact that the trustees of the nurses' home wished to buy the house and were willing to give more than its value as a dwelling-house for it, although it was not known to what price they would go and the exact amount of knowledge of their intentions amongst those persons who were likely to buy houses was not clearly shown. It is, however, impossible to suppose that the wish of the trustees to buy the house was entirely unknown to those interested in property sales, and if the sale took place either by auction or through an agent the willing seller would be careful to see that that fact were made known. I assume that the gross value is not to be measured necessarily by the price given by a buyer who is peculiarly in need of the particular piece of property. But it seems to me clear that the fact of there being such a person in the market must have an influence on the value in the "open market."

The position is well expressed by LORD JOHNSTON in the Scottish case, Glass v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), to which we were referred. Substituting trustees of the nurses' home for commissioners this applies to this case. It is not denied by the appellants that the wish of the trustees to buy the house is a fact to be considered, but it is said that the only effect to be given to it is that a small sum is to be added to the value of £750 to represent a final bid made by the trustees in order to acquire the property. This seems to me to be a fallacy, and to ignore common experience. It assumes that the dwelling-house value £750 having been reached, everybody except the trustees will decline to make any further offer and allow the trustees to become the purchasers by a single offer which exceeds that amount in however small a degree. It is not uncommon that where a person or public body is known to be very anxious to purchase a piece of property speculators will run the price up on the chance of buying it at a price to which the person or body is not prepared at that moment to go, and hoping that their needs will eventually oblige them to buy from the speculator at a profit. I do not think that the effect of the needs of a probable purchaser can be confined to the amount of the one bid which will take the offer above the bare dwelling-house value. The effect on the market of such a probable purchaser is a matter to be estimated by the referee. I agree with SCRUTTON, J., that he is not bound to take the actual figure given, and should not do so arbitrarily, but should consider all the circumstances and estimate what he considers the value in the "open market." Here he has done so, and has come to the conclusion that under all the circumstances the amount this house might be expected to realise in the "open market" would be £1,000—an amount, it is to be noticed, less than the trustees were in fact willing to give if compelled. I do not see that he has applied any wrong principle, and I do not see my way to say that he and SCRUTTON, J., who also had evidence before him and came to the same conclusion, were wrong. I think he would have applied a wrong principle if he had said that he was limited to the dwelling-house price plus one bid of a small sum by the trustees. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

Criminal Law—Vagrancy—Begging—Collection for charitable object—Money for men out of work—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 3.

The respondent, who was a member of a branch of a trade union, was in a public place soliciting contributions for members of his branch, including him-
C self, who were out of work in consequence of a dispute in the trade. He was authorised by his branch to collect subscriptions, and he had to return to the committee of the branch all the money he collected, which was divided equally among all the unemployed men, including himself. The respondent having been summoned, under s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, for wandering abroad in a public place to beg, and the summons having been dismissed,

D Held: a person who was found in a street making a bonâ fide collection for some charitable object was not within the mischief or the language of the Act, and so the respondent, although he might himself receive some benefit from the money collected, was not "begging" within the meaning of s. 3 of the statute, and, therefore, the information against him was properly dismissed.

Case Stated by the metropolitan magistrate sitting at the Marlborough Street Police Court.

On May 9, 1914, the respondent was brought by the appellant, a police constable, H before the magistrate on the charge that he, on May 8, 1914, in the city of Westminster, did unlawfully wander abroad in a public place there to beg. Evidence was given that at 11.25 p.m., on May 8, in St. James' Square, Westminster, and the immediate neighbourhood, the respondent went to two gentlemen and asked them to buy some tickets which he had in his possession and produced them to the gentlemen, who refused to purchase them. He then went to another gentle-
I man and offered the same tickets for sale, at the same time asking the gentleman to assist him, as he was out of work through a strike. The respondent, in the same way, solicited a lady and gentleman who were together, and subsequently a gentleman who was walking alone. In no case did any of the persons solicited buy any of the tickets or give the respondent any money. The appellant, who was then and there on duty, apprehended the appellant under the powers of s. 6 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and made the charge before the magistrate as already stated. When apprehended, the respondent had in his possession one book of tickets containing twenty-four tickets, and another complete book containing sixty tickets.

At the time of the alleged offence there was a dispute in the building trade, in consequence of which the respondent was out of work. The respondent was a member of the Shamrock branch of the United Order of General Labourers, this being an affiliated union under the Federation of Building Trade Unions. The Shamrock branch had organised a collection of funds to relieve their members who were out of work and their families. In order to have a check upon the collectors this system of tickets was instituted, the expectation being that when a donation was received the donor would accept a ticket or tickets corresponding in value to the amount given. The respondent had possession of the tickets in pursuance of this scheme, and was fully authorised by the branch to collect subscriptions.

The Shamrock branch had at the time of the alleged offence 517 members, of whom 140 were then out of work in consequence of the dispute. The money collected was divided equally among these 140 men, including the respondent, quite irrespective of the fact that some collected and some did not. The amount which each man had received during the week next preceding the week in which the alleged offence was committed was 7s.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that upon the authority of Pointon v. Hill (1), the respondent was not guilty of the offence charged, upon the following grounds: (i) That the respondent was not of the class of persons against whom the Act was directed—namely, those who made it their mode and habit of life to wander about and put themselves in streets and highways, and there beg or ask for alms: (ii) that the respondent was going about in an orderly way when soliciting alms and for an object which was not unlawful; (iii) that the respondent's action was in the same category as the Hospital Saturday street collections, mentioned in the Pointon Case (1) and, therefore, not unlawful. The contention on the part of the appellant was: (i) That it is not necessary to constitute the offence that there should be any questionable mode and habit of life extraneous to the specific acts charged; (ii) that the degrees of "idle and disorderly person, rogue and vagabond" and "incorrigible rogue" conferred by the Act upon certain convictions were mere expressions of art used in order that when new offences were created the procedure of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, might be made applicable; (iii) that otherwise it would be necessary to prove in such cases as exposure of the person with intent to insult a female, being found on enclosed premises for an unlawful purpose, male person importuning for an immoral purpose, or keeping a lottery, that the person charged, irrespective of the offence charged, bore a bad character as a rogue and vagabond, and that this has never been required; (iv) that where an independent status was necessary under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, it was always stated in the Act, for example, a prostitute behaving in a riotous or indecent manner in the street, or "a suspected person or reputed thief" frequenting a place with intent to commit a felony; (v) that the facts in this case were not within the same category as a Hospital Saturday collection, or the cow case, which was given as an illustration in the judgment in Pointon v. Hill (1), as, in the former case, none of the collectors received personal benefit from the collection, and in the latter case, the application for assistance was made to private friends and not in a public place to the public generally; (vi) that the offence of begging might be committed notwithstanding it might be part of an organised and co-operative scheme.

The magistrate held that, whatever his opinion might have been, had the affair been res integra, the facts of this case fell within the principle of Pointon v. Hill (1), so that he felt bound to discharge the respondent, but thought it right to grant the appellant's application for a Case in order that it might be considered whether the above case should not be reviewed.

By s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824:

". . . every person wandering abroad, or placing himself or herself in any public place, street, highway, court, or passage to beg or gather alms . . . shall

A be deemed an idle and disorderly person within the true intent and meaning of this Act; and it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace to commit such offender (being thereof convicted before him . . .) to the house of correction, there to be kept . . . for any time not exceeding one calendar month."

Travers Humphreys for the appellant.—The question raised is as to the meaning B of the words in s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, a person wandering about or placing himself in any public place to beg or gather alms. The statute describes three classes of persons—those who come within s. 3 are to be deemed to be idle and disorderly persons, those who come within s. 4 are rogues and vagabonds, and those who come within s. 5 are to be deemed to be incorrigible rogues. The magistrate decided the case on the authority of Pointon v. Hill (1), considering that he C was bound by that decision to dismiss the information. That case is distinguishable on the facts, but it cannot be contended that it is distinguishable on the grounds that were given for the judgment. The decision in Pointon v. Hill (1) proceeded on a wrong basis, that to bring a case within this section the act must be done habitually, and that unless it can be proved that the person has been doing this thing habitually, as his habit and mode of life, there would be no offence within D s. 3. Persons are to be deemed idle and disorderly persons within the meaning of this Act if they do the thing prohibited by s. 3—namely, to place themselves in the streets to beg. The difficulty felt by CAVE, J., as to those persons who placed themselves in the streets to gather alms for the hospitals of London has been got over by subsequent legislation. Section 1 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1903, gave power to make regulations as to street collections in the metropolis,

E "with respect to the places where and the conditions under which persons may collect money in any street for charitable or other purposes."

Regulations have been made under that section, and that would meet the difficulty put by CAVE, J., as to the Hospital Saturday collections in the streets. It cannot assist the respondent in this case that he was collecting for himself and others as F well. In s. 1 of the Act of 1903 the words "other purposes" must read as ejusdem generis with charitable purposes, and collecting funds for persons out on strike would not be collecting money for charitable purposes or any purposes of a similar kind. The decision in Pointon v. Hill (1) proceeds on a wrong assumption that no person can be guilty of this offence under s. 3 unless he is in the habit of begging as his mode of life, or is a bad character. If it were necessary to prove that in G each case, it would be practically impossible to administer this Act. The question whether the Divisional Court ought to overrule a previous decision of the same court if they disagree with it was considered in Logsdon v. Booth, and the court there, in a considered judgment delivered by LORD RUSSELL, C.J., thought that they ought to overrule, and did overrule, the previous decision in Booth v. Ferrett, as they disagreed with it. In this case the magistrate based his decision on Pointon H v. Hill (1), and as this is a criminal case and there is no appeal the court can and ought to overrule that case.

Langdon, K.C. (Slesser with him), for the respondent.—Pointon v. Hill (1) was rightly decided and ought to be followed. In MURRAY'S DICTIONARY "begging" is defined as the action or habit of asking earnestly, specially of asking alms. A person cannot be convicted under this section unless he is a beggar, that is, unless I he is doing it habitually. There must be the implication that that is his habit of life and that he is living by it; and he must be of that class of life that is in ordinary language described as a beggar and must be asking for alms as his means of living. The test is whether a man is trying to make his living by begging instead of by working; but if he merely asks for contributions in the way the respondent did, it would be an abuse of language to say that he is "an idle and disorderly person." It would be sufficient to say that the broad principle laid down in Pointon v. Hill (1) would cover most of the cases that arise, and the test is there put that to bring a case within the section the act must be done as a habit or mode of life, and that the persons who are idle and disorderly persons within s. 3 are those who place themselves in the streets to beg as their habit and mode of getting their living. The title and preamble of the Act and the construction of this section all show that a charitable collection for special objects does not come within the Act. The various Acts dealing with vagrancy from the earliest times are summarised in STEPHEN'S HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW OF ENGLAND, vol. 3, pp. 266 et seq., and that shows that the history of begging has given to the word the meaning of the habitual asking of alms, and that the word has no application to collections which are for charitable or largely beneficial objects. The facts of the present case fall well within Pointon v. Hill (1), and even if that case seems doubtful the court ought not to overrule it. It was decided thirty years ago; it is an old case and it has been accepted as good law and has never been challenged, but on the contrary, collections of this kind have been going on all the time and proceedings have not been taken. There was an implied recognition of the principle of Pointon v. Hill (1) in the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1903, as to collections for "charitable or other purposes." That brings the case within the dictum of LORD RUSSELL, C.J., in Logsdon v. Booth ([1900] 1 Q.B. at pp. 413–4), that if it could be shown that the legislature had subsequently legislated in a way which demonstrated that it was accepting and adopting the law as so laid down in a previous case, then the court ought not to disturb the decision in question. That is applicable here, as the legislature in 1903 has recognised the law as to these street collections laid down in Pointon v. Hill (1), and the court, therefore, ought not to overrule that case. The collection in this case was a street collection for a charitable purpose within the Act of 1903. The magistrate was therefore right in following Pointon v. Hill (1) and dismissing the information.

DARLING, J.—In this case the respondent, who belonged to some association of persons who were out of work, solicited alms in the street, and he was charged under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, with being an idle and disorderly person. The magistrate declined to convict him, but stated this Case. The question comes to be determined upon the words in s. 3 of that Act, because it is said that the respondent was an idle and disorderly person within the meaning of that section. The respondent did undoubtedly place himself in a street, and he did solicit contributions to a fund for the relief of people who were out of work belonging to the society to which he himself belonged, and he would, or at all events might, himself benefit to some extent by any contributions that might be received.

I think the magistrate was right in refusing to convict him. In my opinion, this statute, which says that a person is to be deemed to be an idle and disorderly person, really is not aimed at people collecting for an object of a charitable nature in which possibly they themselves have an interest, but that it is aimed merely at people of a different type. It is not a statute which stands by itself. It is the result of a number of statutes which were passed to deal with people who were a danger to society—people wandering about the country without work. I am not in the least saying that when these statutes began to be passed they were aimed at people who were without work by their own fault, but they were without work, and being without work and being without means, no doubt they were dangerous people, and it was necessary to deal with them. How they came to be in such a state is a matter of history, and we need not go into it, but there they were, and there being these masses of people for many years, this statute was passed to deal with them, as other statutes have been passed.

The preamble of the statute is important. It says:

> "Whereas . . . it is expedient to make further provision for the suppression of vagrancy, and for the punishment of idle and disorderly persons, rogues and vagabonds, and incorrigible rogues . . ."

Then comes s. 3, which begins in this way:

A "Every person being able wholly or in part to maintain himself or herself, or his or her family, by work or by other means, and wilfully refusing or neglecting so to do, by which refusal or neglect he or she, or any of his or her family whom he or she may be legally bound to maintain, shall have become chargeable to any parish, township, or place . . ."

B [Those words have been repealed by the National Assistance Act, 1948: see Sched. 7, Part 1.] That is the sort of person, I think, among others, who is aimed at. I think that what the respondent was doing was not "begging" in the sense in which the statute uses the word. The word "beg" may be used in many senses, as, for instance, one may say: "I beg your pardon." This is a use which has very little similarity with the begging which is done by what the statutes call a C sturdy vagrant. It is, in fact, rather a humiliating thing to do, as most people would think, done by people of quite a different turn of mind—namely, by those sturdy and troublesome beggars. Then the Act says "or gather alms." The respondent can hardly say he was not gathering alms; I think he was gathering alms, but it is to be noticed that he was not doing it for the sort of purpose for which those people who were denominated by the statute idle and disorderly D persons would do it. To my mind, it is a misuse of language to say that the respondent, simply because he stood in the street and asked for contributions to a fund from which he and others were to profit because they were temporarily out of work, had become an idle and disorderly person. If we read the words of the statute I think they are obviously aimed at a different sort of person altogether, persons who are wandering abroad, who are placing themselves at the corners of E streets and begging or soliciting alms, or who are like the persons taken by the judges who decided Pointon v. Hill (1), to be persons who have given up work and have adopted begging as a habit or mode of life. Those persons are clearly, I think, within the statute.

I do not differ from Pointon v. Hill (1), and I must not for the moment be understood to do so; but I do not think that the definition which is given by CAVE, J., F in that case is an exhaustive one, because it puts the magistrate in the difficulty of having to ascertain whether a person has begged as a habit and mode of life, and obviously magistrates have felt a difficulty in this, that, if they find a person begging for the first time, they may say that he is not a beggar by habit or by mode of life. I do not agree that that is the right test. I think it can be said what a person's habit or mode of life is if he has just adopted it. If a person has been G in work, and if it were proved that he had definitely come to the conclusion that he did not wish to work for reasons satisfactory to himself, and that he meant to lead the life of a gypsy, to live on alms which he might gather, I should say a magistrate, being convinced by the evidence that that was so, might convict him under this statute, and hold that the fact that he was demanding alms made him an idle and disorderly person within the statute, although there was no proof that he H had ever done so before, because, to my mind the proof that he has done it before is only one way of proving what is his habit and mode of life, as CAVE, J., expressed it. It might be proved otherwise than that he had done it before, that that was his habit and mode of life, because a man might have a habit or mode of life although he has only just taken to it—for example, a barrister, who has been called to the Bar, on the first day that he was called to the Bar, although I he has not yet had a brief, could say that he has adopted the habit or mode of life of a barrister, and that he intends to get his living in that way although nobody has yet given him a brief. In the case of a beggar it might perfectly well be proved, if the evidence was satisfactory to the magistrate, that he was a beggar by mode of life although he had not yet received a contribution, and although this was the first time he asked for one, and although on that occasion in fact he did not get it. It might be difficult to prove it, but it gets rid of the notion that, like a vicious dog, he cannot be proved to be vicious until he has bitten somebody. It is not necessary to go so far as that in the case of a beggar. If one is satisfied that he has taken to this mode of collecting alms as a habit and mode of life, for his own benefit, he could be convicted although it was the first occasion on which he had done it. I think, however, that all that kind of evidence is rebutted when it is proved that although he may have solicited alms a hundred times, he was soliciting them for a charitable purpose for the sake of those who, like himself, were in misfortune, and that there was nothing disorderly about it, that it was a well arranged charitable collection, just as much as are the collections for many recognised charities. In that case, I think it would be an absolute misuse of language to say that he must be deemed to be an idle and disorderly person when he is not idle, and when he is not disorderly, simply because he has done that which other people who really are idle and really are disorderly are in the habit of doing. Upon these grounds, and not entirely because Pointon v. Hill (1) was so decided, I think the magistrate was right in dismissing this summons.

BANKES, J.—I agree. So far as the decision in this case is concerned, it will be sufficient to say that, in my opinion, a person who is found in the street making or assisting to make a bonâ fide collection for some charitable object is not within either the mischief or the language of the statute. But we are told that the object of bringing this case is to obtain the view of the court upon the decision of CAVE, J., in Pointon v. Hill (1). I do not know that the decision itself is complained of, but what is said is that CAVE, J., applied a test which, if it be the correct test, renders it extremely difficult to enforce the statute. The test that CAVE, J., laid down was this. He said it was necessary to establish that the act complained of was part of the habit and mode of life of the person charged, and if CAVE, J., meant by that anything in the nature of a permanent habit or mode of life, or if he meant that it was necessary that evidence of a man's past life must be produced before one could ascertain what his habit and mode of life was, I should not agree with him, but I do not think that that is what CAVE, J., intended. So far as I am concerned, while I think that a person's past life may be a very good test of what his habit and mode of life is, it is certainly not the only test as to whether a person has on any particular occasion brought himself within the statute. A person, in my opinion, may by his conduct on the particular occasion complained of so behave himself that either from the nature of his request, the persistence or importunity of his manner, the whining tone adopted, or the deceptive devices employed, afford evidence upon which a magistrate may be satisfied that the act is not a merely isolated act, but is such an act of begging within the meaning of the statute that the person's particular habit and mode of life at that time is one of begging.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I only add anything to the judgments already delivered in order, if I may, to assist those who have to administer this Act of Parliament. I quite appreciate the difficulty which the learned magistrate has felt in this case in consequence of the expressions which appear in the judgment of Pointon v. Hill (1). So far as that decision is concerned, I think it was right, and I think it covers this particular case, because I think that in this case the magistrate was right in dismissing the charge on the ground that the respondent was in fact collecting for a specific charitable purpose, and was not a person who was begging within the meaning of this statute. I agree also with what my brother BANKES, J., has said, that the expressions which were used by CAVE, J., if they are not calculated to mislead, are certainly calculated to create a difficulty in the administration of the Act. I agree that it is not necessary to prove that a man has before the particular occasion been in the habit of begging, nor is it necessary to prove that he intends in the future to follow the habit of begging. I think that counsel for the appellant was right when he said that a person who places himself in the street to beg, that is to say, to gather alms as a means of livelihood, is primâ facie guilty of the offence under this statute, but it is for the magistrate, when such a primâ facie case is made, to satisfy himself that the accused has in fact adopted the calling of a beggar. He may adopt that calling for one day only, and it is not necessary to prove that he has followed that calling previously or that he intends to follow it in future. With these additions to the judgment, I agree with everything that has been said.

LUSH, J. It is, I think, impossible to read the preamble of this Act or to observe the context in which this passage with regard to begging occurs without seeing fairly clearly what the class of persons is against whom this legislation was directed. It seems to me clear that it was directed against that idle class of persons who, instead of endeavouring to earn their livelihood by work, prefer to wander idly about or wander abroad, as the section says, or place themselves in a public street and to beg and gather alms. That is the class of persons against whom this part of the section was directed, who are not improperly called "idle and disorderly persons." It seems to me quite impossible to say that a man who, like the respondent in this case, was engaged in collecting funds on behalf of the trade union to which he belonged, is within this class of idle and disorderly persons against whom this part of the section is directed. Counsel for the appellant has criticised the test which CAVE, J., and SMITH, J., laid down in Pointon v. Hill (1). For myself, it seems to me that that test was a perfectly accurate and proper one, if I may say so. CAVE, J., used this language which has been criticised —namely, that the act was not done as a habit or mode of life, in order thereby to distinguish the case then before the court from a mere isolated case of begging, and also to distinguish a case of habitual begging by an idle person from a case in which, although the person convicted was no doubt gathering alms, he was doing so, not because he either had in the past lived or was intending in the future to live an idle and disorderly life, making his livelihood by begging, but because he wished to aid persons in the collection of funds for a charitable purpose, or quasi-charitable purpose, in which he was interested. It seems to me that that is all that CAVE, J., meant. The habit may be in the past; it may be an indication of a habit intended to be formed in the future; but, unless the habit is one of begging as a mode of obtaining a livelihood, CAVE, J., said, and I entirely agree, that the case would not come within the Vagrancy Act. I agree, therefore, that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

ATKIN, J.—The offence created by the statute is created for every person wandering abroad or placing himself or herself in any public place to beg or gather alms. I think no offence is committed if, in fact, the person is collecting money bonâ fide for a specific charitable purpose. I think, in that case, he cannot be said to be begging or gathering alms within the meaning of the statute; the offence is wandering abroad or placing himself in a public place to beg, and I think that, inasmuch as that purpose has got to be shown, the case would be excluded of a person who is merely found casually begging. It would exclude any casual or desultory act of begging. But if a person has, in fact, placed himself in a public street for the purpose of collecting alms in order to obtain wholly or in part his daily subsistence, I think that he has committed an offence within the meaning of the Act, and I see nothing at all in the Act which uses the words or contains the words or implies the words "mode or habit of life." To my mind, the offence is committed under the circumstances which I have stated. In this case it appears to me plain that the person who was charged was not, in fact, in any sense begging, and, therefore, that the acquittal of the person accused was perfectly correct.

Appeal dismissed.

Re CONSOLIDATED DIESEL ENGINE MANUFACTURERS, LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Neville, J.), December 1, 1914]

Company—Winding-up—Liquidator—Appointment of solicitor—Appointment against wishes of committee of inspection.

In a winding-up by the court, the liquidator, knowing that the committee of inspection disapproved of the appointment of a certain firm of solicitors, nevertheless applied to the court ex parte and obtained an order from the registrar sanctioning their appointment in particular matters connected with the winding-up. The committee applied to the court to discharge this order.

Held: in appointing a solicitor the liquidator is bound to have regard to the express wishes of the committee of inspection, and, if he thinks they are acting unwisely, his course is to take the opinion of the contributories and creditors; in the present case, as the liquidator did not have regard to the wishes of the committee, the order must be discharged.

Notes. The Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, has been replaced by the Companies Act, 1948.

Considered: Re Salmon, Ex parte Official Receiver, [1916] 2 K.B. 510.

As to the employment of a solicitor by a liquidator, see 6 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 589–590; and for cases, see 10 DIGEST (Repl.) 921–922. For the Companies Act, 1948, see 3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 452.

Motion to discharge an order of the registrar sanctioning the employment by the liquidator of Messrs. Goldberg, Barrett, Newall and Braune as solicitors to the liquidator in certain matters arising in the liquidation. The company had been promoted by another company known as the Diesel Engine Co., Ltd. (in liquidation), and was, in fact, in some respects a reconstruction company. On June 25, 1914, a meeting of shareholders was held, when a special resolution for voluntary liquidation was proposed, but was not carried. A resolution was then passed to the effect that, if the company went into liquidation, the liquidator should be requested to employ a firm of solicitors not previously connected with the company. On July 7 an order was made that the company be wound-up by the court, and, at the statutory meetings of creditors and contributories held on Oct. 8, 1914, Sir W. B. Peat was appointed liquidator with a committee of inspection. On Nov. 18 the liquidator made an application to the court ex parte for an order sanctioning his appointment of Messrs. Goldberg, Barrett, Newall, and Braune as solicitors to the company in connection with the disposal of the company's works at Ipswich, and in the matter of an action which was pending against the company; this sanction was granted, and on the same day the order was drawn up and completed. Later in the day, at a meeting of the committee, the liquidator informed them of the order, and the committee requested him to reconsider the matter; he refused to do so, and they then passed a resolution disapproving of the appointment of Messrs. Goldberg, Barrett, Newall and Braune as solicitors to the company. The objections to this appointment, as stated in an affidavit sworn by members of the committee, were that the firm in question had previously acted as solicitors for the company and its directors, and also for the Diesel Engine Co., and that there were questions in dispute between the two companies. Sir W. B. Peat was also liquidator of the Diesel Engine Co., and the committee were of opinion that independent solicitors should be appointed in order to secure a complete and impartial investigation of the company's affairs. No application had been made by the liquidator to the committee of inspection under s. 151 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [now s. 245 (1) of the Companies Act, 1948], for the sanction of the committee to the employment of solicitors, and the application to the court on Nov. 18 was made without affording them an opportunity of appearing. The committee by notice of motion dated Nov. 26, 1914, moved to discharge the order of the registrar.

R. H. Hodge for the committee of inspection.

Gore-Brown, K.C., and E. W. Hansell for the liquidator.

NEVILLE, J.—I think in the present case the order of the registrar must be discharged. The liquidator, with the knowledge that the committee of inspection, which had been properly appointed, disapproved of the appointment of the present solicitors, without notice to them, and, as I understand, without even having formally asked their sanction (although this would make no difference), proceeded to the court, and upon an ex parte application obtained a direction that these solicitors should be employed in particular matters. It seems to me that under s. 158 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [now s. 246 of the Companies Act, 1948], the liquidator is bound to have regard to the express wishes of the committee of inspection in this matter, and if in his discretion he thinks they are acting unwisely, his course is to do what he was entitled to do, to take the opinion of the contributories and creditors, which s. 158 [now s. 246 of the Companies Act, 1948], gives him the power to do, and, if there is any conflict between them, the directions given by the creditors and contributories shall be deemed to override any directions given by the committee of inspection. I do not think the liquidator was acting properly when he proceeded behind the backs of the committee of inspection to obtain an order ex parte. I am bound to say he was quite candid with regard to the matter, and in the affidavit that he filed he advised the registrar of the fact that the committee of inspection differed from him. I think that order must be discharged. I say nothing about whether or not there is any serious objection to the employment of those solicitors in question in the matters specified. The applicants must have their costs, and the liquidator must pay them.

Arbitration—Submission—Article of company—Application for membership of company and acceptance—Rule for all disputes between company and members to be referred.

Company—Articles—Effect—Contract between members and company and between members inter se.

In 1905 the plaintiff was elected a member of the defendant association, and he then agreed to conform to its rules and regulations. By art. 49 of the articles of association differences between the association and any of its members relating to any of the affairs of the association must be referred to the decision of an arbitrator. In 1914 the plaintiff issued a writ against the association and its secretary claiming injunctions and declarations in respect of matters which related to the affairs of the association and for certain other relief, which in substance was to enforce his rights under the articles. On an application by the defendants for a stay of the action pursuant to s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and to refer the matters in dispute to arbitration in accordance with the terms of art. 49, C D

Held: (i) art. 49 must be treated as a statutory agreement between the members and the association as well as between themselves inter se, and it constituted a submission to arbitration within the Arbitration Act, 1889; (ii) the application for membership by the plaintiff and its acceptance by the association constituted a contract between the plaintiff and the association by which the plaintiff agreed in writing to conform to the regulations of the association, one of which regulations was that all differences between the association and a member should be submitted to arbitration, and that contract also constituted a submission to arbitration; therefore, on both those grounds a stay of the action would be granted. Chapman, applied for an order staying all proceedings in the action pursuant to s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and referring the matters in dispute in the action to arbitration under art. 49 of the articles of association of the association.

The Kent or Romney Marsh Sheep Breeders' Association was incorporated under the Companies Acts in the year 1895 as an association not for profit, the defendant

W. W. Chapman having been the secretary since the incorporation of the association. On Nov. 8, 1905, the plaintiff, Alfred John Hickman, wrote to Chapman as such secretary stating he wished to become a member of the association, and in reply on Nov. 10, 1905, Chapman wrote to the plaintiff inclosing a form of application for membership. This form, completed and signed by the plaintiff, was received by Chapman on or about Nov. 12, 1905, and was as follows:

"Kent or Romney Marsh Sheep Breeders' Association (Incorporated).—Application form for membership.- I, Alfred J. Hickman, of Court Lodge, Egerton, in the county of Kent, am desirous of becoming a member of the Kent or Romney Marsh Sheep Breeders' Association (Incorporated) as a flock owner, and I engage when elected to pay the entrance fees, annual subscriptions, and such fees for entry of ewe flocks and individual sheep as may then be in force or subsequently adopted, together with all such costs for inspection and tattooing as may be sanctioned by the council for the time being, and to conform to the rules and regulations of the association until I by notice in writing to the secretary cease to be a member of the association.—Signature ALFRED J. HICKMAN.—Dated Nov. 11, 1905."

The plaintiff was elected a member of the association on Dec. 12, 1905, and he was informed of such election by letter on Dec. 14, 1905. By art. 49 of the articles of association of the defendant company:

"Whenever any difference arises between the association and any of the members touching the true intent or construction or the incidents or consequences of these presents or of the statutes, or touching anything then or thereafter done, executed, omitted, or suffered in pursuance of these presents or of the statutes, or touching any breach or alleged breach of these presents, or any claim on account of any such breach or alleged breach, or otherwise relating to the premises or to these presents, or to any statute affecting the association, or to any of the affairs of the association, every such difference shall be referred to the decision of an arbitrator to be appointed by the parties in difference or if they cannot agree upon a single arbitrator, to the decision of two arbitrators, of whom one shall be appointed by each of the parties in difference, or an umpire to be appointed by the two arbitrators."

On Dec. 18, 1914, the plaintiff issued the writ in the present action claiming, inter alia, an injunction to restrain the defendants from taking any steps to expel him from the association or doing any act or acts in derogation of his rights as a member of the association, and damages for refusing to register his sheep, and a declaration that he was entitled to have his sheep registered. A summons for directions was issued, but before it was heard or any further step taken in the action, the defendant association and Chapman issued this summons for the hearing of an application by them that all further proceedings be stayed, pursuant to s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and that the matters in question in the action should be referred to arbitration in accordance with art. 49 of the articles of the association.

By s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889 [see now Arbitration Act, 1950, s. 4]:

"If any party to a submission, or any person claiming through or under him, commences any legal proceedings in any court against any other party to the submission, or any person claiming through or under him, in respect of any matter agreed to be referred, any party to such legal proceedings may at any time after appearance, and before delivering any pleadings or taking any other steps in the proceedings, apply to that court to stay the proceedings, and that court, or a judge thereof, if satisfied that there is no sufficient reason why the matter should not be referred in accordance with the submission, and that the applicant was, at the time when the proceedings were commenced, and still remains, ready and willing to do all things necessary to the proper conduct of the arbitration, may make an order staying the proceedings."

By s. 27 [see s. 32 of Act of 1950] :

By s. 14 (1) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [see now s. 20 of Companies Act, 1948] :

"The memorandum and articles shall, when registered, bind the company and the members thereof to the same extent as if they respectively had been signed and sealed by each member, and contained covenants on the part of each member, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to observe all the provisions of the memorandum and of the articles, subject to the provisions of this Act."

Micklem, K.C., and F. Hinde for the defendants.

Frank Russell, K.C., and H. S. Simmons for the plaintiff in the action.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 31, 1915. ASTBURY, J., read the following judgment.—This is a summons by the defendants to stay proceedings in the action under s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889 [see now s. 4 of Arbitration Act, 1950]. The plaintiff, by his writ in the action, which is brought against the defendant association and their secretary, claims injunctions, a declaration, and certain other relief in respect of matters which arise out of and relate solely to the affairs of the association, which relief is, in substance, to enforce the plaintiff's rights under the articles of association of the defendant company. It is admitted by the plaintiff that the action is against the association and the second defendant as its officer, and no point is made by the plaintiff of there being two defendants.

The association is a limited company registered under the Companies' Acts, and by its memorandum of association it is provided (inter alia) that the objects of the association are "the encouragement of the breeding of Kent or Romney Marsh sheep at home and abroad and the maintenance of the purity of the breed."

Further :

"The establishment and publication of a flock book of recognised and pure-bred sires which have been used, or ewes which have been bred from, and of such other flock books (if any) which the council may think fit and the annual registration of the pedigrees of such sheep as are proved to the satisfaction of the council to be eligible for entry. . . . The undertaking of the arbitration upon and settlement of disputes and questions relating to or connected with Kent or Romney Marsh sheep and the breeding thereof, and for other subsidiary purposes."

By art. 49 disputes between the association and any of its members are to be referred to arbitration. This is a common form of article in private companies, and, the objects of the association being what they are, it and its members might be seriously prejudiced by a public trial of their disputes. If this summons fails, as the plaintiff contends that it should, these arbitration clauses in articles are of very little, if any, value.

The plaintiff became a member of the association in 1905. It is clear on the authorities that if there is a submission to arbitration within the meaning of the Arbitration Act there is a primâ facie duty cast upon the court to act upon such an agreement : per LORD SELBORNE in Willesford v. Watson (1), 8 Ch. App. at p. 480. In the present case the defendants contend, first, that art. 49, dealing as it does with the members of the company in their capacity of members only, constitutes a submission within the meaning of the Arbitration Act, or, alternatively, that the contract contained in the plaintiff's application for membership and the company's acceptance of it amounts to such a submission. The plaintiff contests both these propositions. Independently of the particular dispute in this case, the arguments, especially upon the first of these contentions, have raised questions of far-reaching importance and of great difficulty.

I will deal with the question as to the effect of art. 49 first. Section 14 (1) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [see now s. 20 (1) of Companies Act, 1948], says:

> "The memorandum and articles shall, when registered, bind the company and members thereof to the same extent as if they respectively had been signed and sealed by each member, and contained covenants on the part of each member, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to observe all the provisions of the memorandum and of the articles, subject to the provisions of this Act."

It is laid down in text-books of the highest authority that the articles are not a contract between the members and the company, but a contract with the other members. The articles are a contract only as between the members inter se in respect of their rights as shareholders. The exact nature of this covenant—that is, the covenant referred to in s. 14—has given rise to considerable discussion and is even now very difficult to define; but it is now settled that it is not equivalent to a contract between the company, on the one part, and the members, on the other, on which either a member can sue the company or the company can sue a member.

The principal authorities in support of these propositions are Re Tavarone Mining Co., Pritchard's Case (2); Melhado v. Porto Alegre Rail. Co. (3); Eley v. Positive Government Security Life Assurance Co. (4); and Browne v. La Trinidad (5). In Pritchard's Case (2), by the articles of association of a mining company it was provided that the company should immediately after incorporation enter into an agreement with the vendor of the mine for the purchase of the mine, and the price was fixed. The articles were signed by the vendor and six other persons, and the directors allotted shares to the vendor, but no further agreement was made with him. It was held, affirming the decision of WICKENS, V.-C., that the articles of association did not constitute a contract in writing between the vendor and the company within s. 27 of the Companies Act, 1867, and that certain shares should not, therefore, be considered as fully paid up. MELLISH, L.J., in giving judgment, said (8 Ch. App. at p. 960):

> "But I am of opinion that the articles of association cannot be considered as a contract in writing between De Thierry and the company for the sale of the mine to them. It may no doubt be the case if no other contract was entered into, and if De Thierry signed these articles and they were acted upon, that a court of equity would hold that as between him and the company—from their acting upon it—there was a binding contract; but in themselves the articles of association are simply a contract as between the shareholders inter se in respect of their rights as shareholders. They are the deed of partnership by which the shareholders agree inter se."

In Melhado v. Porto Alegre Rail. Co. (3) the articles of association of a joint stock company provided that the company should defray such expenses incurred in its establishment as the directors should consider might be deemed and treated as preliminary expenses to an amount not exceeding a sum named. The plaintiffs, who were promoters of the company, had incurred preliminary expenses in its establishment, and it was held that no action would lie at the suit of the plaintiffs against the company under the articles. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., said (L.R. 9 C.P. at p. 505):

> "The action is brought on a clause in the articles of association, by which the directors are authorised to pay certain expenses if they should consider them to be properly deemed preliminary expenses. The declaration avers that all conditions were performed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to be paid their expenses; and therefore I think we must take it that they were expenses which, if the directors had thought proper to pay them, the articles would have justified them in paying. The question therefore is whether an action will lie for the payment of these expenses, in pursuance of the articles of association, to which the plaintiffs were not parties. I have come to the conclusion that no such action will lie—I must say somewhat reluctantly, because though I wish to express no opinion on the merits of this particular case, having no materials for forming such an opinion, it does seem just, in general, if a company takes the benefit of the work and expenditure by which its existence has been rendered possible, and voluntarily comes into existence on the terms that it shall be liable to pay for such work and expenditure, that a cause of action should be given. I can find, however, no legal principle upon which such an action can be maintained. It appears to me that there is no contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants. The doctrine of ratification is inapplicable, for the reasons given in the judgments in Kelner v. Baxter (6)."

MELLOR, J., said (ibid. at p. 506):

"The plaintiffs were not in any way parties to the articles of association, and there was not, therefore, any express contract to pay them."

BRETT, J., said (ibid. at p. 507):

"There is no contract, in my judgment, of any sort upon which they can sue, and unless there be a contract of some sort between them and the company I do not see that they can have any cause of action. No contract made with them before the existence of the company can be ratified by the company for the reasons pointed out in the case of Kelner v. Baxter (6), with which I fully agree."

In Eley v. Positive Government Security Life Assurance Co. (4) the articles of association contained a clause in which it was stated that the plaintiff, a solicitor, should be the solicitor to the company and transact its legal business. The articles were registered and the company incorporated. The plaintiff was not appointed solicitor by any resolution of the directors, nor by any instrument bearing the seal of the company, but he acted as such for a time. Subsequently the company ceased to employ him, and he brought an action for breach of contract against the company for not employing him as its solicitor. The first count of the declaration stated that it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and the defendants that the plaintiff should be employed by the defendants as, and appointed by them to the office of, solicitor of the company. During the argument it was contended that the contract declared for was not the contract purported to be contained in the articles. AMPHLETT, B., in his judgment, said (1 Ex.D. at pp. 26, 28):

"The articles, taken by themselves, are simply a contract between the shareholders inter se, and cannot, in my opinion, give a right of action to a person like the plaintiff, not a party to the articles, although named therein. If authority were wanted for this proposition, the cases cited in the argument, Pritchard's Case (2), and Melhado v. Porto Alegre Rail. Co. (3) are, in my opinion, quite conclusive on the subject. . . . For these reasons, I think that there was no contract at all between the plaintiff and the company to the effect stated in the declaration."

CLEASBY, B., confined his judgment to the last points raised in the case and said (ibid. at p. 30):

"I am of opinion that cl. 118 of the articles cannot by itself be taken to operate as a contract between the solicitor and the company."

KELLY, C.B., said (ibid. at pp. 31, 32): A

"I forbear to pronounce any opinion as to whether these articles, with the fact of the subsequent employment, constitute a contract on the terms contained in them, because, were I to so hold, there would be a difficult question behind, whether it was not ultra vires for the directors to attempt to bind the company to employ a solicitor to transact, for all his life, all the legal business of the company. Passing by this, I come to consider the objection raised under s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds. I do not see how anyone can doubt that this agreement was not to be performed within a year. It was for the life of the plaintiff, subject to a defeasance on the possibility of his being guilty of some misconduct. But, assuming, as I think we must, that this was not to be performed in a year, the question arises whether there is any memorandum or note in writing of it signed by the defendants. The signatures affixed to the articles were alio intuitu and it can hardly be suggested that the directors had any idea that in signing the articles they were signing a note of this contract." B C

This case went to the Court of Appeal, and LORD CAIRNS, L.C., said (1 Ex.D. at pp. 89, 90): D

"I wish to say, in the first place, that in my opinion a contract of the kind suggested to exist in this case ought not to receive any particular favour from the court. The statement is that Baylis was endeavouring to form a joint stock insurance company upon a new principle, and applied to the plaintiff to make advances to meet the expenses of getting up the company, and it was arranged between them that in the event of the company being formed the plaintiff should be appointed permanent solicitor to the company. That is to say, a bargain is made between a professional man and Baylis, which, so far as the case is concerned, does not appear to have been communicated to those who were invited to join the company, that if the former will advance money for the formation of the company he shall be appointed permanent solicitor, and the company shall be obliged to employ him as their professional adviser. When the articles are prepared, they are so by the plaintiff, and in them he inserts a clause which no doubt informs those who signed the articles of the arrangement, but does not appear to have been brought to the notice of those who joined from receiving circulars. This, I repeat, is not a proceeding which the court would encourage in any way. I also wish to reserve my judgment as to whether a clause of this kind is obnoxious to the principles by which the courts are governed in deciding on questions of public policy. . . . This case was first rested on the 118th article. Articles of association, as is well known, follow the memorandum, which states the object of the company, while the articles state the arrangement between the members. They are an agreement inter socios, and in that view, if the introductory words are applied to art. 118, it becomes a covenant between the parties to it that they will employ the plaintiff. Now, so far as that is concerned, it is res inter alios acta, the plaintiff is no party to it. No doubt he thought that by inserting it he was making his employment safe as against the company, but his relying on that view of the law does not alter the legal effect of the articles. This article is either a stipulation which would bind the members or else a mandate to the directors. In either case it is a matter between the directors and shareholders, and not between them and the plaintiff." E F G H I

In Browne v. La Trinidad (5), before the formation of the company an agreement was entered into between B. and a person as trustee for the intended company by which it was stipulated (inter alia) that B. should be a director and should not be removable till after 1888. The sixth clause of the articles provided that the directors should adopt and carry into effect the agreement with or without modification, and that subject to such modification (if any) the provisions of the agreement

A should be construed as part of the articles. The agreement was acted upon, but no contract adopting it was entered into between the plaintiff and the company. Held, that treating the agreement as embodied in the articles, still there was no contract between B. and the company that he should not be removed from being a director, the articles being only a contract between the members inter se, and not between the company and B. COTTON, L.J., towards the end of his judgment, B said (37 Ch.D. at pp. 13, 14):

"Assuming that an unlimited power is given to the meeting by art. 91, ought we, having regard to the contract entered into by the memorandum of Nov. 24, 1884, and art. 6, to interfere by injunction to restrain the company in general meeting from acting under that power? I do not give any opinion upon the C question how far the court would have interfered by injunction in order specifically to enforce an agreement between the company and the plaintiff that he should be an irremovable director. That point raises questions upon which I should not like to give any opinion without having them fully discussed. In my opinion we ought not to interfere in the present case, because there is no such contract between the plaintiff and the company. The memorandum of D agreement of Nov. 24, 1884, is in no way a contract between the plaintiff and the company. It is said that it was adopted and incorporated into the articles, but I cannot accede to that. The company by its directors acted upon the agreement, but that does not make it binding on the company. Then is it incorporated into the articles in such a way as to entitle the plaintiff to say, 'I have such a contract between me and the company as can be enforced by E a court of law, and as I might enforce in equity by way of specific performance'? That point is clearly settled, I think, by Eley v. Positive Government Security Life Assurance Co. (4). There two of the members of the court of first instance held, and the other member did not express dissent, that the articles are merely a contract between the shareholders inter se, and that though a person in whose favour a stipulation is made in the articles may afterwards F have shares allotted to him, he does not by that means become in the same position as if he had entered into a contract with the company."

LINDLEY, L.J., said:

"Having regard to the construction put upon s. 16 of the Companies Act of 1862 in the case of Eley v. Positive Government Security Life Assurance Co. G (4) and subsequent cases, it must be taken as settled that the contract upon which he relies is not a contract upon which he can maintain any action, either on the common law side or the equity side. There might have been some difficulty in arriving at that conclusion if it had not been for the authorities, because it happens that this gentleman has had shares allotted to him, and is therefore a member of the company. Having regard to the terms H of s. 16, there would be some force, or, at all events, some plausibility, in the argument that, being a member, the contract which is referred to in the articles has become binding between the company and him. Of course, that argument is open to this difficulty, that there could be no contract between him and the company until the shares were allotted to him, and it would be remarkable that upon the shares being allotted to him a contract between him I and the company, as to a matter not connected with the holding of shares, should arise."

In these four cases the article relied upon purported to give specific contractual rights to persons in some capacity other than that of shareholder, and in none of them were members seeking to enforce or protect rights given to them as members in common with the other corporators. The actual decisions amount to this, that an outsider to whom rights purport to be given by the articles in his capacity as such outsider, whether he subsequently becomes a member or not, cannot sue on such articles treating them as contracts between himself and the company to enforce such rights. Such rights are not part of the general regulations of the company applicable alike to all shareholders and can only exist by virtue of some contract between such non-member and the company, and the subsequent allotment of shares to an outsider in whose favour such an article is inserted does not enable him to sue the company on such an article to enforce rights which are res inter alios acta and not part of the general rights of the corporators as such. The language of some of the judgments appears, however, to go further, as recognised, for instance, by SARGANT, J., in Re Famatina Development Corpn. (7) ([1914] 2 Ch. at p. 279).

The wording of s. 14 (1) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, which is in the same terms as s. 16 of the Act of 1862 [see now s. 20 (1) of Companies Act, 1948], is difficult to construe or understand. The company cannot in the ordinary course be bound otherwise than by statute or contract, and it is in this section that its obligation must be found, so far as the members are concerned. The section does not say with whom they are to be deemed to have covenanted, but the section cannot mean that the company is not to be bound when it says it is to be bound, as if, &c., nor can the section mean that the members are to be under no obligation to the company under the articles in which their rights and duties as corporators are to be found. Much of the difficulty is removed if the company be regarded, as the framers of the section may very well have so regarded it, as being treated in law as a party to its own articles. It seems clear from other authorities that a company is entitled as against its members to enforce and restrain breaches of its regulations: see, for example, MacDougall v. Gardiner (8), Pender v. Lushington (9), and Imperial Hydropathic Hotel Co., Blackpool v. Hampson (10). In the last case BOWEN, L.J., said (23 Ch.D. at p. 13):

> "The articles by s. 16 are to bind the company and all the shareholders as much as if they had all put their seals to them."

It is also clear from many authorities that shareholders as against their company can enforce and restrain breaches of its regulations, and in many of these cases judicial expressions of opinion appear which, in my judgment, it is impossible to disregard.

In Johnson v. Lyttle's Iron Agency (11), in an action by a shareholder against the company, JAMES, L.J., said (5 Ch.D. at p. 693):

> "The notice did not comply strictly with the provisions of the contract between the company and the shareholders which is contained in the regulation of Table A."

In Bradford Banking Co., Ltd. v. Briggs & Co., Ltd. (12) the articles gave the company a lien on its members' shares, and, in an action by the company to enforce such lien, LORD BLACKBURN said (12 App. Cas. at p. 33):

> "The only one of the articles of association which I think it material to notice is the 103rd article, which is as follows:
> 'The company shall have a first and permanent lien and charge, available at law and in equity, upon every share of every person who is the holder or one of several joint owners thereof for all debts due from him, either alone or jointly with any other person, whether a shareholder or not in the company.'
> John Faint Easby, a coal merchant, became a proprietor of a number of shares in the respondent company, and obtained certificates for them. This property in the shares was, by virtue of s. 16 of the Companies Act, 1862, already quoted, I think, bound to the company as much as if he had (at the time he became holder of these shares) executed a covenant to the company in the same terms as art. 103, but I do not think it was bound any further."

In Wood v. Odessa Waterworks Co. (13), which was an action by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other shareholders against the company, STIRLING, J., said (42 Ch.D. at p. 642):

"The articles of association constitute a contract not merely between the shareholders and the company, but between each individual shareholder and every other."

In Salmon v. Quin and Axtens, Ltd. (14), FARWELL, L.J., referring to this last statement, said ([1909] 1 Ch. at p. 318):

"I think that that is accurate subject to this observation, that it may well be that the court would not enforce the covenant as between individual shareholders in most cases."

In Welton v. Saffery (15) LORD HERSCHELL, who dissented on the main question from the rest of the House, made the following general observation ([1897] A.C. at p. 315):

"Section 16 of the Act of 1862 provides that the articles of association, when registered, shall bind the company and the members thereof to the same extent as if each member had signed his name and affixed his seal thereto, and there were in such articles contained a covenant on the part of himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to conform to all the regulations contained in such articles, subject to the provisions of this Act. The articles thus become in effect a contract under seal by each member of the company, and regulate his rights. They cannot, of course, diminish or affect any liability created by the express terms of the statute; but, as I have said, the statute does not purport to settle the rights of the members inter se; it leaves these to be determined by the articles (or the articles and memorandum together), which are the social contract regulating those rights. I think it was intended to permit perfect freedom in this respect. It is quite true that the articles constitute a contract between each member and the company, and that there is no contract in terms between the individual members of the company; but the articles do not any the less, in my opinion, regulate their rights inter se. Such rights can only be enforced by or against a member through the company, or through the liquidator representing the company; but I think that no member has, as between himself and another member, any right beyond that which the contract with the company gives."

In all these last-mentioned cases the respective articles sought to be enforced related to the rights and obligations of the members generally as such, and not to rights of the character dealt with in the four authorities first above referred to. It is difficult to reconcile these two classes of decisions and the judicial opinions therein expressed, but I think this much is clear—first, that no article can constitute a contract between the company and a third person; secondly, that no right merely purported to be given by an article to a person, whether a member or not, in a capacity other than that of a member, as, for instance, as solicitor, promoter, or director, can be enforced against the company; and, thirdly, articles regulating the rights and obligations of the members generally as such do create rights and obligations between them and the company respectively.

In Bisgood v. Henderson's Transvaal Estates, Ltd. (16), BUCKLEY, L.J., said ([1908] 1 Ch. at p. 759):

"The purpose of the memorandum and articles is to define the position of the shareholder as shareholder, not to bind him in his capacity as individual."

By s. 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1889 [see now s. 32 of Arbitration Act, 1950]:

"'Submission' means a written agreement to submit present or future differences to arbitration, whether an arbitrator is named therein or not."

The defendant's first contention is that art. 19 is, on the authorities, a written agreement within the meaning of this section. A

In Re Lewis, Ex parte Munro (17), which was an action on the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, it was held that:

"A document containing the terms of an agreement as to the amount of costs payable by a client to his solicitor, assented to by the client, but signed by the solicitor only, is not 'an agreement in writing' within the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870." B

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., said:

"It is quite clear that there was no agreement in writing within s. 4 of the Act. . . . An 'agreement in writing' within s. 4 must be an agreement by both parties, and both parties must sign their names upon the agreement." C

In Caerleon Tinplate Co. v. Hughes (18), in an action for the price of goods sold, the bought note signed by the defendants contained a provision for arbitration in case of dispute, while the sold note signed by the plaintiff contained no such provision. It was held that there was no submission within the meaning of the Act, for an agreement to submit to arbitration must be in writing and signed by both parties. Re Lewis (17) was referred to, and DENMAN, J., referring to s. 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, said (60 L.J.Q.B. at p. 641): D

"In my judgment, there can be no written agreement unless in writing signed by the parties as their agreement, and that 'written agreement' means one in which the terms on both sides are reduced into writing. It is useless to discuss the doctrines here, for the bought and sold notes differ in the essential particular that the former contains a provision which is wholly absent in the latter." E

WILLS, J., said (ibid.):

"Supposing there were a contract and the parties were ad idem [which in fact they were not in this case] yet there was no submission under the Act unless there was an agreement in writing by both parties. Re Lewis, Ex parte Munro (17) is conclusive on this point. In the present case the agreement is to be in writing under s. 27, and we must hold that both parties must sign their names to it; otherwise there might be a conflict of evidence, and a discussion as to what was understood by either party." F

In Baker v. Yorkshire Fire and Life Assurance Co. (19) an action was brought on a fire policy which was executed in the usual way by the company, but not by the assured, and it was held that the policy, though not signed by the plaintiff, amounted to a submission to arbitration within the meaning of the Act. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., who had been a party to Re Lewis (17), said ([1892] 1 Q.B. at pp. 145, 146): G

"The plaintiff sues on the policy, and by so suing affirms it to be his contract; he cannot disaffirm a part of the very contract on which he is suing. He contends that in order to bring into operation the arbitration clause contained in the policy, the policy must be signed by both parties; but the Act of Parliament says nothing of the kind, and the only apparent justification for the contention is to be found in Caerleon Tinplate Co. v. Hughes (18). That decision must be interpreted, however, with regard to the particular facts of that case. There was there no complete contract; the two documents constituting the contract differed materially in their terms, and the court said it was plain that the parties were never ad idem." H I

A. L. SMITH, L.J., said (ibid. at pp. 146, 147):

"It is said, however, that by the interpretation clause a submission must be a written agreement to refer disputes to arbitration. This, however, is not a higher interpretation than was necessarily put on the language of the old Act, under which it was the universal practice to refer these cases, and does not mean that in all cases the written agreement to refer must be signed by both parties. It is quite unnecessary to say more as to the decision in Caerleon Tinplate Co. v. Hughes (18) than that it turned entirely upon the peculiar facts of the case."

The result of these decisions is, I think, that if the submission is in writing and is binding on both parties as their agreement, or as the equivalent in law to an agreement between them, the statute is satisfied. In the present case the plaintiff's action is, in substance, to enforce rights as a member under the articles against the company. The 49th article is a general article applying to all the members as such, and, apart from technicalities, it would seem reasonable that the plaintiff ought not to be allowed, in the absence of any evidence filed by him, to proceed with an action to enforce his rights under the articles which in itself is a breach of his obligation contained therein to submit his disputes with the company to arbitration, and, if the case falls within the Act, I see no reason for exercising my discretion under s. 4 in his favour. In my judgment, art. 49, for the reasons above referred to, creates rights and obligations enforceable as between the plaintiff and the company respectively, and such rights and obligations are contained in a written document, but whether such document is a contract or agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants within s. 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, depends upon whether the decision in Eley v. Positive Government Security Life Assurance Co. (4) and the other cases of a similar character above referred to ought to be regarded as only dealing with and applying to articles purporting, first, to contain an agreement with the company and a third person, or, secondly, to define the rights of a shareholder in some capacity other than that of a member of the company. To reconcile the decisions and expressions of judicial opinion above mentioned, some such view should, I think, be adopted, and general articles dealing with the rights of members "as such" treated as a statutory agreement between them and the company as well as between themselves inter se, and in my judgment, art. 49 in the present case does constitute a submission to arbitration within the true meaning and intent of the Arbitration Act.

Having regard, however, to the conclusion to which I have come on the second contention raised by the defendants, it is not necessary for me to base my decision upon this ground alone and upon the opinion I have so expressed. The defendants' second contention is that the contract contained in the plaintiff's application for membership, and the defendants' acceptance of it, amounts to a submission within the Act. On Nov. 8, 1905, the plaintiff wrote to the company, through its secretary:

"I wish to become a member of the Kent Sheep Breeders' Association. Will you kindly take the necessary steps?"

That was answered by a letter from the secretary, in which he said:

"If you will fill in the inclosed form . . . I shall have great pleasure in submitting it to the next council meeting."

The form inclosed was signed by the plaintiff. It stated that the plaintiff wished to become a member of the association and agreed to pay an entrance fee, subscriptions, and fees for entry of sheep, and to conform to the rules and regulations of the association. At a meeting of the council of the association held on Dec. 12 the plaintiff's offer was accepted and he was elected a member of the defendant company. Notice of such acceptance was given to the plaintiff in a letter of Dec. 14 by the secretary, which informed him he was elected a member of the association at the council meeting held on the 12th. In consideration of being elected a member and of his offer to join the association being accepted, the plaintiff contracted in writing with the association to conform to its rules and regulations. One of such regulations was a general submission to arbitration of all differences between the association and any of its members as such, amply wide enough to cover the matter in dispute in this action. The association at the date of the contract was already bound to each and all its corporators to act in conformity with such regulations, and was at the date of the writ in this action, and has been since, ready, and willing to so act. It is submitted on behalf of the plaintiff that at the date of this contract he may have known nothing about art. 49, and that as the council of the association have power under its articles to make further by-laws and regulations as to certain matters therein referred to, the plaintiff's offer may have referred to these. The plaintiff has, however, filed no evidence in support of this, and the articles not only constitute the rules and regulations of the company, but refer to the rules and regulations of the association as contained in them, and I am unable to accept this contention. In my judgment, the contract so made between the plaintiff and the association is also a submission in writing within the true meaning and intent of the Arbitration Act, and I make an order to stay under s. 4 and direct that the matters in dispute in this action be referred to arbitration accordingly.

Shipping — Charterparty — "Safe port."

By a charterparty dated April 18, 1913, the plaintiffs hired a steamship to the defendants for five years for service between safe ports. On Feb. 11, 1915, during the war of 1914-18 between Great Britain and Germany, the German government threatened the destruction of all merchant ships in the waters round Great Britain and Ireland. On Feb. 13, 1915, the defendants ordered the vessel, then at Cardiff, to the Tyne. The plaintiffs contended that Newcastle was no longer a safe port.

Held: the term "safe port" in a charterparty implied that the port was both physically and politically safe: it was a question of fact whether nature or war had rendered a port unsafe; and, on the facts, Newcastle was a safe port.

Action tried by Sankey, J., for a declaration that Newcastle-upon-Tyne was not in February, 1915, a safe port within the meaning of a charterparty dated April 18, 1913.

SANKEY, J.—In this case the plaintiffs claim a declaration that Newcastle-upon-Tyne was not in February, 1915, a safe port within the meaning of cl. 3 of a charterparty dated April 18, 1913, and made between them and the defendants; and, further, that the defendants by ordering the plaintiff's steamship Frankby to proceed to Newcastle during that month to load a cargo for Barcelona committed a breach of the charterparty which entitled them to withdraw the ship from the defendants' service.

By a charterparty of the above date the plaintiffs agreed to let and the defendants agreed to hire the British steamship Frankby for a term of five years at the rate of £1,440 per calendar month for employment between a safe port or safe ports between 50 degrees N. and 50 degrees S., subject to certain exceptions which are not material to the present case. The northern limit was afterwards extended to 60 degrees N. There was a stipulation in the charterparty that upon any breach thereof the plaintiffs should be at liberty to withdraw the vessel from the service of the defendants. In the first week of February, 1915, the vessel was at Havre, and had been provisionally ordered to proceed to Cardiff to load. The owners thereupon arranged to fit her up with stores and a new donkey boiler at that port. On Feb. 11 the German government promulgated the following announcement:

> "The waters round Great Britain and Ireland, including the entire English Channel, are hereby declared a military area. From Feb. 18 every hostile merchant ship within these waters will be destroyed even if it is not always possible to avoid dangers which thereby threaten the crews and passengers."

On Feb. 13 the defendants, by their agents, cancelled their provisional instructions for the vessel to go Cardiff and ordered her to the Tyne. This order was a serious inconvenience to the plaintiffs, who had already got their stores and donkey boiler at Cardiff, and they wrote protesting against it, not only on this ground, but also upon the ground that Newcastle was not a safe port within the meaning of the charterparty. They did not, however, withdraw the vessel from the service of the defendants, but allowed her to leave Havre upon Feb. 19, the day after that upon which, according to the German declaration, every hostile ship in the waters round Great Britain and Ireland was to be destroyed.

In spite of the German threat, the vessel appears to have had a safe and not very speedy voyage to Newcastle. She there loaded a cargo of coals for Barcelona, left, and had a similar voyage down the North Sea and English Channel. Judging from her log-book she was from first to last in no real danger or apprehension of danger. The plaintiffs contend that the order for the steamer to proceed to Newcastle was a breach of the charterparty because Newcastle was not a safe port. The defendants contend that Newcastle was perfectly safe, and, secondly, that, at any rate, the plaintiffs have waived their rights and are not entitled to withdraw the vessel because, after their protest, they allowed her to continue in the defendants' service.

The first point I have to decide is whether Newcastle was a safe port in February. It is admitted by both parties that Newcastle itself was safe, but the plaintiffs say that the dangers of the voyage there were such as to make the port unsafe within the meaning of the charterparty. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the dangers of the voyage are not material to the question whether the port was a safe one, and, further, that such dangers as either existed or might be apprehended on the voyage were not of a character to make the port unsafe. Two cases were cited to me—namely, Ogden v. Graham (1), and Nobel's Explosives Co. v. Jenkins & Co. (2)—but neither seems to be conclusive. In my view, the word "safe," when used in connection with the word "port," implies that the port must be both physically and politically safe, and I think that the action either of nature or war may render a port unsafe. I have only to deal with the agency of war in the present case. At the moment no English port would be a safe port for a German vessel. Neither is a place which a vessel can only go to at a certain risk of confiscation a safe port: see the observations of BLACKBURN, J., in Ogden v. Graham (1). There does not appear to be any sound distinction between a port to which a vessel is proceeding with a liability to be sunk or confiscated by enemy vessels lying thereat or in the approaches thereto and a port to which a vessel is proceeding with a liability to be sunk or confiscated by enemy vessels at a greater distance. Modern inventions like wireless telegraphy and submarines have quite altered old rules and old conceptions, and I am of opinion that dangers likely to be incurred on a voyage to a port may be taken into account in considering the question whether such port is safe to go to or not. In each case it is a question of fact and a question of degree.

I now consider whether the port of Newcastle had become unsafe. The German threat was that as from Feb. 18 every hostile merchant ship in English waters would be destroyed. The performance, however, fell short of the promise. The number of arrivals in and sailings from the time of overseas nationalities was 752 for February, 1915; the number lost or damaged from enemy causes in the North Sea was three; for the whole of the United Kingdom the numbers were 5,645 and twelve respectively. Such circumstances cannot have made the port of Newcastle unsafe in February last, since it is impossible to regard the results achieved by the German Navy as other than insignificant. Finding, therefore, that Newcastle was a safe port within the meaning of the charterparty, it is unnecessary to consider whether the plaintiffs have waived their rights, and the result is that I dismiss the action with costs.

Criminal Law—Trial—Summing-up—Duty of judge to direct jury on all points arising on evidence.

It is the duty of a judge to direct the jury on any point properly arising on the evidence at a trial, although counsel may not have relied, in his defence of the prisoner, on one or more of those matters.

At the trial of the appellant on a charge of murder the defence was that the killing was accidental, but counsel also relied on provocation as an alternative verdict. The judge, however, directed the jury that, unless they considered the killing accidental, there must be a verdict of murder.

Held: as there was no direction by the judge on the question of provocation and a possible verdict of manslaughter, the verdict of murder would be quashed and one of manslaughter substituted.

Appeal on a point of law against a conviction, before Atkin, J., at Cardiff Assizes, of murder.

On Christmas Day, 1914, the appellant, a sergeant in the 6th Welsh (Territorial) Regiment, had charge of twelve men on guard at Swansea Docks. There had been much drinking during the day, and at eight o'clock in the evening the appellant was quite intoxicated. Later he accused a private named Dudley of having stolen a bottle of whisky, which was missing. Dudley called the appellant a liar, and a fight then ensued between the two men. Another private named Gates came up to assist Dudley, who made threats to use his bayonet. The two men got the appellant down on the ground and knocked him about severely. An officer then arrived on the scene and ordered that the two privates should be disarmed and put under arrest. The appellant, as a non-commissioned officer, was ordered to take them to the guard room under an escort. On the way there Dudley refused to obey an order by the appellant to give up his bayonet, and put his hand upon the hilt of it. He refused again when ordered by the appellant to disarm, put his hand on the bayonet and threatened to use it. A struggle took place, and during this the appellant levelled his rifle and fired. Dudley fell back dead. The rifle used by the appellant was of the Lee-Metford pattern, with a light pull and no safety catch. The bayonet on the rifle was fixed, and the appellant was acting under orders in carrying a loaded rifle. At the trial counsel for the defence mainly relied on the question of an accidental killing, but he did not abandon an alternative defence of manslaughter based upon provocation. In giving evidence the accused said he was not angry at the time of the occurrence. In summing-up to the jury, Atkin, J., told them that they could not upon the evidence find a verdict of manslaughter, and directed them that if they did not consider the whole affair was accidental, they must find the accused guilty of murder. The jury found the accused guilty of murder with a strong recommendation to mercy.

The judgment of the court was delivered by LORD READING, C.J.—The appellant was a sergeant in the reserve battalion of the 6th Welsh (Territorial) Regiment. He was tried on a charge of murdering Private Dudley, in the same regiment, and at the time of the occurrence under the command of the appellant. The jury found the appellant guilty of murder, with a strong recommendation to mercy. The appeal is based upon the fact that the judge at the trial told the jury that they must either find the appellant guilty of murder or acquit him—that if they did not accept the theory of accidental killing put forward on his behalf, they could only find a verdict of murder. Counsel for the appellant has rightly argued the case on the ground that the killing was not accidental; the question which remains for our decision is whether upon the evidence the judge ought to have left to the jury the option of finding a verdict of manslaughter.

At the trial the cross-examination of the witnesses showed that the defence raised was that the killing was accidental. Counsel for the defence, however, before the judge summed up, indicated quite clearly that he did not intend to abandon the defence of manslaughter, and that he meant to ask the jury to return a verdict of manslaughter if they did not acquit the appellant altogether. In his summing-up the judge took the view that on the facts as given in evidence it was impossible for the jury to return a verdict of manslaughter, and directed the jury that they must either acquit the appellant on the ground that the killing was accidental, or convict him of murder. The question as to the crime being one of manslaughter only ought to have been left to the jury so as to enable them, if they thought fit, to return a verdict of manslaughter. It was not right to say that the jury had no alternative except to find a verdict of acquittal on the ground of accident, or one of murder. The jury had enough evidence before them to justify them in returning a verdict of manslaughter. It is not for this court to say whether they would have found that verdict, but the real question is whether it should not have been left open to them to find such a verdict if they thought fit. Provocation existed because of the fight and the "hammering" of the appellant by the two men; further, there is the important fact that directly before the shot was fired the deceased man said, not for the first time, that he would stick the appellant with his bayonet, and that he placed his hand on it; and it must be taken into account that all this amounted to grave insubordination towards a superior officer, while that it occurred in the presence of the other men would be an additional aggravation. Further, a great deal of drinking had taken place, and the circumstances of the fight all tended to make the appellant lose control of himself at a critical time.

Under these circumstances we think that the matter should have been so left to the jury that they could find a verdict either of manslaughter or murder. We do not agree that, as the line of defence adopted by counsel at the trial was based upon the supposition of accident, the judge was justified in omitting to direct the jury on the question of manslaughter. Whatever the line of defence adopted the judge should put before the jury such questions as seem to him to properly arise upon the evidence, even though these questions may not have been raised by counsel. In the present case counsel for the appellant did not rely only upon the defence of accident; he indicated clearly that if that view failed he should ask the jury to return a verdict of manslaughter and not murder, though the difficulty of putting forward the alternative defences may have accounted for counsel saying very little about manslaughter. Also, we cannot accept the argument that the statement by the appellant that he was not angry at the time negatived the idea of manslaughter. The appellant when he made that statement was trying to shelter himself on the plea of accident; the jury could well take the view that what he said was not true. It is not right to exclude other views of the facts which may not agree with the view put forward by the appellant in his evidence. The court, with the assistance of the jury, must arrive at the true view of the facts, and not pay too much attention to the views put forward by one side or the other. As the court considers that the question whether his crime was manslaughter and not murder should have been put before the jury, we have power, under s. 5 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, to substitute the verdict which we think should have been found by the jury, under a proper direction. We cannot say that the jury would have found a verdict of manslaughter, but as the question was not left to them the appellant is entitled to a verdict for the lesser offence. The order of the court will be that the verdict of murder be quashed and a verdict of manslaughter entered, and under all the circumstances the sentence will be one of four years' penal servitude.

Sentence reduced.

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Reading, C.J., Bray and Avory, JJ.), July 12, 1915]

Criminal Law—Manslaughter—Deliberate killing—Provocation—Killing of child by father—Child and home neglected by wife—Child ill and in great pain—Anger by father against wife.

Provocation by one person leading to the homicide of another person by the person provoked is not sufficient to reduce the crime of murder to that of manslaughter.

The appellant, a soldier, returned home on leave and found his home and children in a very neglected condition and that his wife had been unfaithful to him. Their infant son, aged two years, was suffering from a painful malady, but on the day of the crime the wife left the house, and, although repeatedly sent for, refused to return to the child, who was visibly in intense pain. The appellant, provoked by the continued neglect of his wife, killed the child.

Held: the wife's neglect of the child was not sufficient to reduce the killing of the child to manslaughter.

Notes. Section 3 of the Homicide Act, 1957, does not alter the rule that it is for the judge to decide whether there is any evidence of provocation to go to the jury, and for the jury to decide whether the provocation is sufficient to justify a verdict of manslaughter, nor the rule that the provocation must be sufficient to lead to loss of self-control by a normal reasonable man.

As to provocation in cases of homicide, see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 710–713; for the Homicide Act, 1957, see 37 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 172; and for cases, see 15 DIGEST (Repl.) 938 et seq.

Appeal on a point of law against a conviction for murder before ROWLATT, J., at Newcastle-upon-Tyne Assizes.

Paley Scott for the appellant.

Waugh, K.C., and Rowan Hamilton for the Crown.

July 12, 1915. LORD READING, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—In this case, which is a very sad one, the appellant had returned home from the front on leave. He found his home in a shocking condition and his children neglected, and his wife admitted that she had been unfaithful to him. The wife had ample funds with which to keep the house properly and provide for the children. A boy of two years old was suffering from water on the brain, causing great pain and distress. On the morning of the occurrence the appellant went out and had some drink, but not any great quantity. He returned home at mid-day and found the child in great suffering. He sent for his wife twice, but she did not come. He sat and watched the child and was evidently brooding over his wrongs. He then formed the intention of killing the child and took a razor out of his pocket, with which he cut the child's throat, causing death almost immediately. At the trial the appellant was ably defended, and it is clear that everything possible was urged to induce the jury to return a verdict of manslaughter if such verdict could be legally sustained. The judge, after hearing the evidence and calling the attention of the jury to it, said that he felt bound to direct them to bring in a verdict of murder.

The proposition put forward by the defence is that provocation by one person, leading to the homicide of another person by the person provoked, is sufficient to reduce the crime of murder to that of manslaughter. There is no authority for that proposition. Numerous authorities show the degree of provocation which may reduce the crime of murder to that of manslaughter, but there is no similarity between those cases and the one we are now dealing with. We think that in law no exception can be taken to the direction given by the judge to the jury. There was a definite intention to kill, and the justifiable anger of the appellant towards his wife would not warrant the jury in returning a verdict of manslaughter. They did very strongly recommend the appellant to mercy, and we do not wish to detract in any way from that recommendation. That, however, is a matter for the Home Secretary, and this court can do nothing but dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Alien—Enemy—"Alien enemy" defined—Right to sue in English courts—Alien under protection of Crown—Right to defend action—Right to appeal against adverse decision—Effect of Hague Convention, 1907, s. 2, c. 1, art. 23 (h).

The test whether or not in time of war a person is an alien enemy is not his nationality, but the place where he resides or carries on his business, and, therefore, the term "alien enemy" includes, not only the subject of a State at war with Great Britain, but also any British subject or subject of a neutral State voluntarily residing and carrying on business in hostile territory. An alien enemy, as above defined, cannot during the war enforce his civil rights and cannot sue or proceed in the civil courts of this country.

Conversely, a person is treated as a subject of the Crown, notwithstanding that he is the subject of an enemy State, if he is in Great Britain under the protection and by permission of the Crown, and such a person is no longer under the disability attaching to an alien enemy and can maintain an action in our courts.

Article 23 (h) of c. 1 of s. 2 of the Annex to the Hague Convention, 1907, entitled Regulations respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, which provided that it was forbidden "to declare abolished, suspended, or inadmissible the rights of the subjects of the hostile party to institute legal proceedings," held not to abrogate the rule that an alien enemy's rights of action in this country are suspended during the war, for the paragraph has no concern with municipal law, but is directed to forbidding any declaration by the military commander of a belligerent force in the occupation of the enemy's territory which would prevent the inhabitants of that territory from using their courts of law to assert or to protect their civil rights.

An alien enemy may be sued or proceeded against during war. He can appear and be heard in his defence, and may take all such steps as may be deemed necessary for the proper presentment of his defence. If judgment proceed against him, the appellate courts are as much open to him as to any other defendant. But in the case of an enemy plaintiff, that is, a person who before the outbreak of war was a plaintiff in a suit and then by virtue of his residence or place of business became an alien enemy, he cannot appeal when once hostilities have commenced, and if he has given notice of appeal before the war, the hearing of his appeal must be suspended until after the restoration of peace, for, when appealing, he is seeking to enforce his right by invoking the assistance of the Sovereign in his courts just as much as if he sought the assistance of the Sovereign to enforce a civil right in a court of first instance.

Practice—Service—Substituted service—Need to prove impossibility of personal service—Method of service asked for in all reasonable probability bringing knowledge of writ to defendant.

Alien—Enemy—Action against—Service of writ—Substituted service—Service on agent managing branch business in England.

In order that substituted service of a writ may be permitted, it must be clearly shown that the plaintiff is unable to effect personal service and that the writ is likely to reach the defendant or come to his knowledge if the method of substituted service asked for by the plaintiff is adopted. The terms of R.S.C., Ord. 9, r. 2, which provides that the court may make such order as may seem just when the plaintiff is unable to effect prompt personal service, are of very wide application and give a very wide discretion. On an application for substituted service of a writ for service out of the jurisdiction the court must be satisfied that there exists a practical impossibility of actual service and that the method of substituted service asked for by the plaintiff is one which will in all reasonable probability, if not certainly, bring knowledge of the writ to the defendant. So also in the case of a notice of a writ to be served on a foreigner out of the jurisdiction.

Where an action is brought against an alien enemy carrying on business and resident out of the jurisdiction, but who carries on a branch business in this country through an agent, leave may be given to the plaintiff to issue a concurrent writ and serve notice of it by effecting substituted service upon the agent in this country subject to such further terms as may be imposed in chambers upon the plaintiff as to advertisement or other means of communication, and as to the period to be given to the defendant for appearance.

Bendelack v. Morier (1794), 2 Hy. Bl. 338.

Appeals in the first and second cases by the plaintiffs ex parte from orders of SCRUTTON, J., at chambers, giving leave to issue concurrent writs against the defendants and to serve notice of the writs upon the defendants in the first case at Berlin, and, in the second, at Hamburg, or, in both cases, elsewhere within the German Empire. In both cases the plaintiffs applied for leave for substituted service of notice of the writ on agents of the defendants in Great Britain. The third case was a notice of motion for an order to set aside a notice of appeal by the Deutsche Mertens Gesellschaft, a German company, the registered owners of a patent for "improvements in printing" taken out by Edward Mertens on Aug. 5, 1904, on the ground that the appellants were, at the date of the notice, alien enemies of His Majesty and not competent to take any step in the proceedings.

War broke out between Great Britain and Germany on Aug. 4, 1914.

In Porter v. Freudenberg the plaintiff issued a writ against one Philip Freudenberg (trading as Hermann Gerson), to recover a quarter's rent due on Sept. 29, 1914, under a lease made in 1903 at a rental of £625 of certain premises situate at Nos. 24 and 25, Prince's Street, Hanover Square, London. The defendant, who was a German subject, resided and carried on business as a mantle manufacturer in Berlin, and had for some time before the outbreak of war carried on a branch establishment at the above premises by means of an agent named Arthur Barnes. According to the affidavit of the plaintiff a quantity of stock was usually kept on the premises, but immediately before Sept. 29 the whole of the stock, fixtures, and fittings were removed from the premises. On Sept. 28 the keys of the premises were sent to the plaintiff by Arthur Barnes which the plaintiff intimated would be held at the disposal of Arthur Barnes as the agent of the defendant. The plaintiff having issued his writ applied to SCRUTTON, J., for directions as to the manner of serving the writ in Berlin, the learned judge made the order appealed against. The plaintiff now applied for leave for substituted service of notice of the writ upon Barnes, the defendant's agent in England, or otherwise as the court might direct.

Cecil Fitch for the plaintiff.

The defendant was not represented.

In Kreglinger v. S. Samuel and Rosenfeld the plaintiffs, a firm of skin and hide merchants carrying on business in London and Antwerp, made two contracts before the outbreak of the war in 1914 with the defendants to sell cargoes of hides from Australia, payment to be made by cash against documents on arrival of the goods at Dunkirk and Antwerp respectively. In August the defendants repudiated the contracts. The plaintiffs in September issued a writ and served it on one Bonome, as the person in charge of the business of the defendants in London. Bonome entered a conditional appearance and took out a summons to set aside the writ, or service thereof, on the ground that the sole proprietor of the defendants' business was one Alfred Cohen, a German subject, residing at Hamburg. Bonome had full authority to act in all matters in England in respect of the business. An order was made setting aside service of the writ. The plaintiffs then asked for leave to issue a concurrent writ against Alfred Cohen for service out of the jurisdiction and for leave to serve notice of such writ out of the jurisdiction, and also for leave to make substituted service of the notice of such writ upon Bonome. SCRUTTON, J., gave leave to issue the concurrent writ and serve notice thereof out of the jurisdiction, but refused leave to effect substituted service on Bonome. The plaintiffs appealed.

Storry Deans for the plaintiffs.

The defendants were not represented.

In Re Merten's Patent, Soldau & Co., Ltd., an English company, presented a petition for revocation of the patent. WARRINGTON, J., held that the patent was void for want of subject-matter, and made an order for revocation, but, if notice of appeal were given on or before Aug. 28, 1914, the operation of the order was to be suspended until the hearing of the appeal. The Deutsche Mertens Gesellschaft, of Freiburg in Breisgau, Germany, gave notice of appeal from that decision on Aug. 28, and the present application was to set aside that notice of appeal.

Walter, K.C. (Courtney Terrell with him), in support of the motion.

H. Fletcher Moulton for the Mertens company.

The Attorney-General (Sir John Simon, K.C.), Branson and Nesbitt as amici curiæ.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 19, 1915. LORD READING, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. -Before determining the respective merits of these three appeals it would be to serve the public interest to examine the law relating to proceedings in the King's courts by or against alien enemies during a state of war, so that conclusions might be drawn which would be a guide to the solution of some of the present-day problems. In the first and second appeals the respondents had not been served and were not represented. Having regard, however, to the importance of the propositions of law to be discussed, the Attorney-General, acting as amicus curiæ upon the invitation of the court, undertook the burden of representing the law in all its aspects. We are much indebted to him for his valuable assistance.

The main questions to be considered are, first, the capacity of alien enemies to sue in the King's courts; secondly, their liability to be sued, their capacity to appeal to the appellate courts, and, generally, their right to appear and be heard in the King's courts. There is much learning to be found in the books in reference to the enforcement of civil rights of alien enemies. Pronouncements on the subject were delivered by great judicial authorities during the Napoleonic wars and again during the Crimean war, and in reference to incidents arising out of those wars. Happily, with the exception of the South African war, there has been hitherto no occasion in recent times for the courts to examine this branch of legal knowledge. It may, therefore, be useful to refer to some of the early authorities, although the main propositions of law have long been well settled.

It is necessary at the outset to keep clearly in mind the meaning of the term "alien enemy" when used in reference to civil rights and liabilities. Its natural meaning indicates a subject of enemy nationality—that is, of a State at war with the King—and would not in any circumstances include a subject of a neutral State or of the British Crown, but that is not the sense in which the term is used in reference to civil rights. Ever since the great case of The Hoop (1) the law has been firmly established as pronounced in the judgment of LORD STOWELL (then SIR WILLIAM SCOTT) that one of the consequences of war was the absolute interdiction of all commercial intercourse or correspondence by a British subject with the inhabitants of the hostile country except by permission of the Sovereign: see also Potts v. Bell (2). This branch of law was again considered as a result of the Crimean war, and WILLES, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Esposito v. Bowden (3), said (7 E. & B. at p. 779):

> "It is now fully established that, the presumed object of war being as much to cripple the enemy's commerce as to capture his property, a declaration of war imports a prohibition of commercial intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants of the enemy's country, and that such intercourse, except with the licence of the Crown, is illegal."

This law was founded in earlier days upon the conception that all subjects owing allegiance to the Crown were at war with subjects of the State at war with the Crown, and later it was grounded upon public policy which forbids the doing of acts that will be or may be to the advantage of the enemy State by increasing its capacity for prolonging hostilities in adding to the credit, money or goods, or other resources available to individuals in the enemy State. Trading with a British subject or the subject of a neutral State carrying on business in the hostile territory is as much assistance to the alien enemy as if it were with a subject of enemy nationality carrying on business in the enemy State, and, therefore, for the purpose of the enforcement of civil rights, they are equally treated as alien enemies. It is clear law that the test for this purpose is not nationality, but the place of carrying on the business: Wells v. Williams (4); McConnell v. Hector (5); Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines (6). When considering the enforcement of civil rights a person may be treated as the subject of an enemy State, notwithstanding that he is in fact a subject of the British Crown or of a neutral State. Conversely, a person may be treated as a subject of the Crown notwithstanding that he is in fact the subject of an enemy State. As LORD LINDLEY said in Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines (6) ([1902] A.C. at pp. 505, 506):

> "When considering questions arising with an alien enemy, it is not the nationality of a person but his place of business during war that is important. An Englishman carrying on business in an enemy's country is treated as an alien enemy in considering the validity or invalidity of his commercial contracts. . . . Again, the subject of a State at war with this country but who is carrying on business here or in a foreign neutral country is not treated as an alien enemy; the validity of his contracts does not depend on his nationality, nor even on what is his real domicil, but on the place or places in which he carries on his business or businesses."

LORD LINDLEY'S statement is not intended to be, and is not, exhaustive. His Lordship, for the purposes of the appeal then before the House of Lords, was considering the character of a trading corporation, and did not purport to deal with persons residing, but not carrying on business, in the enemy territory. Such a person is equally treated as an alien enemy provided he is voluntarily resident there, having elected to live under the protection of the enemy State. For the purpose of determining civil rights a British subject or the subject of a neutral State, who is voluntarily resident or who is carrying on business in hostile territory, is to be regarded and treated as an alien enemy and is in the same position as a subject of hostile nationality resident in hostile territory. PROFESSOR DICEY, in his treatise on PARTIES TO AN ACTION, at p. 3, states the law accurately in the following proposition:

"Under the term 'alien enemy' are included not only the subjects of any State at war with us, but also any British subjects or the subjects of any neutral State voluntarily residing in a hostile country."

In ascertaining the rights of aliens the first point for consideration is whether they are alien friends or alien enemies. Alien friends have long since been, and are at the present day, treated in reference to civil rights as if they were British subjects, and are entitled to the enjoyment of all personal rights of a citizen, including the right to sue in the King's courts. Alien enemies have no civil rights or privileges unless they are here under the protection and by permission of the Crown: BLACKSTONE (21st Edn.), vol. 1, c. 10, at p. 373. Indeed, under the ancient common law, "debts and goods found in this realm belonging to alien enemies belong to the King and may be seized by him": see HALE'S PLEAS OF THE CROWN, vol. 1, at p. 95. That the enemy's property was liable to confiscation is also shown by the privilege granted under c. 30 of Magna Charta to merchant strangers coming into this realm, whereby the privilege was conceded to merchants of a land making war against the Sovereign and found in this realm that they should be attached without harm of body or goods until it became known how English merchants were treated in the hostile State. If well treated, the enemy merchants were to be well treated here, so that confiscation of the enemy merchants' property would only occur by way of reprisal or retaliation. Whether the right of the Sovereign to confiscate any of the alien enemies' goods or debts in this realm was ever exercised or not: see Wolff v. Oxholm (7), 6 M. & S. at p. 102, per LORD ELLENBOROUGH, there can be no doubt about the existence of the right: see A.-G. v. Weeden and Shales (8). GIBBS, C.J., in Antoine v. Morshead (9) affirmed the principle that the Crown during the war may lay hands on debts due to the alien enemy, but if it do not, then on the return of peace the rights of the contracting alien are restored and he may himself sue to recover the debts: see also WALFORD'S PARTIES TO ACTIONS at p. 653, and the authorities there cited from 19 Edw. 4 to Antoine v. Morshead (9). The right of confiscation is only of importance to trace the history and foundation of our common law, since there is manifestly no question of exercising this right. The severity of the common law rule was, however, in early days relaxed in favour of those who had the King's permission to come here. So long ago as the year 1454 it would follow, from the reported observations of ASHTON, J. (YEAR BOOK, 32 Hen. 6, 23 (b) 5), that, if an alien enemy came here under the King's licence or a safe conduct, he could maintain an action for trespass if any person took his goods from his house. Later, in 1697, in Wells v. Williams (4), it was held that although an alien enemy came here in time of war and without a safe conduct, yet, if he has continued to reside here by the King's leave and protection, he may be allowed to sue in the King's court, for such a right is consequent to the protection offered him. In COKE ON LITTLETON

(19th Edn., vol. 1, at p. 129 (a)), it is stated that an alien enemy cannot maintain a real or personal action until both nations are at peace. An editorial note (A.D. 1832) adds that

> "On declaring war the King usually in a proclamation of war qualifies it by permitting the subjects of the enemy resident here to continue so long as they peaceably demean themselves; and without doubt such persons are deemed to be alien friends in effect."

The passage in BACON'S ABRIDGEMENT (7th Edn.), vol. 1, at p. 183, dealing with enemy aliens, is of similar effect:

> "If an alien enemy comes here sub salvo conducto he may maintain an action; so if an alien enemy comes here in times of peace per licentiam domini regis, as the French Protestants did, and lives here sub protectione and a war afterwards happens between the two nations, he may maintain an action, for suing is but a consequential right of protection; and therefore an alien enemy who is here in peace under protection may sue a bond; aliter of one commorant in his own country."

This passage is mainly based upon Wells v. Williams (4) and Sylvester's Case (10). The decision in this last-mentioned case threw no doubt upon the principle of law, but held that in an action by an alien enemy, and when there was a plea in abatement of "alien enemy," it was incumbent on him to plead a replication that he was here under the protection of the Crown. Towards the end of the eighteenth century LORD KENYON, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of King's Bench in Brandon v. Nesbitt (11), said that (6 Term Rep. at p. 28):

> "An action will not lie either by or in favour of an alien enemy . . . [and that the court] had not found a single case, in which the action had been supported in favour of an alien enemy. For though it was held in Ricord v. Bettenham (12) that the action by an enemy on a ransom bill might be maintained, the action was not brought until peace was restored, which gets rid of the objection."

So clear a statement of the law was made by LORD ALVANLEY, C.J., in McConnell v. Hector (5) (3 Bos. & P. at p. 114) that we quote it in extenso:

> "Most certainly every natural-born subject of England has a right to the King's protection so long as he entitles himself to it by his conduct; but if he live in an enemy country he forfeits that right. Though these persons may not have done that which amounted to treason, yet there is an hostile adherence and a commercial adherence; and I do not wish to hear it argued that a person who lives and carries on trade under the protection and for the benefit of a hostile State and who is so far a merchant settled in that State that his goods would be liable to confiscation in a court of prize is as yet to be considered as entitled to sue as an English subject in an English court of justice. The question is whether a man who resides under the allegiance and protection of a hostile State for all commercial purposes, is not to be considered for all civil purposes as much an alien enemy as if he were born there? If we were to hold that he was not, we must contradict all the modern authorities upon this subject. That an Englishman from whom France derives all the benefit which can be derived from a natural-born subject of France should be entitled to more right than a native Frenchman would be a monstrous proposition. While the Englishman resides in the hostile country, he is a subject of that country, and it has been held that he is entitled to all the privileges of a neutral country while resident in a neutral country."

The later cases of Boulton v. Dobree (13) and Alciator v. Smith (14), while affirming the principle already stated, decided that the burden was upon the alien enemy to establish that he was within this realm by the licence of the King, and, as the evidence was not sufficient in either case to discharge this burden, there was a non-suit in both cases. A

During the Napoleonic wars it was thus firmly established that an alien enemy, unless here by permission of the King, could not sue in the King's court. In a case arising out of the Crimean war, Alcinous v. Nigreu (15), the principle was again affirmed. The point arose on demurrer to the plea that the plaintiff was residing in this kingdom without the licence, safe conduct, or permission of the Sovereign. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., held that the court must take judicial notice that our Sovereign was at war with the empire of Russia and was of opinion that, as the contract was entered into before the war, the plaintiff could enforce it when peace was restored, but that by the law of England, so long as hostilities prevailed, a Russian subject who was here without the permission, express or implied, of the Sovereign could not sue here. B C

In WALFORD'S treatise of the LAW RESPECTING PARTIES TO ACTIONS, published 1842, there is a chapter in vol. 1, at p. 647, dealing with disabilities of civil origin which well repays close and diligent study. When treating of alien enemies the learned author at p. 650 thus states the law:

> "Alien enemies are distinguishable according as they are under the King's special protection or not. If an alien enemy came here under a safe conduct or is commorant here by the King's licence and under his protection he seems to stand in the same position as to the right of maintaining actions in our courts as an alien friend, a right of suing being an incidental right to protection" D

—that is, he is no longer under the disability attaching to an alien enemy. E

Whenever the capacity of an alien enemy to sue or proceed in our courts has come for consideration, the authorities agree that he cannot enforce his civil rights and cannot sue or proceed in the civil courts of the realm. Ex parte Boussmaker (16), however, requires examination. In that case LORD ERSKINE, L.C., allowed alien enemies to enter a claim as creditors in a petition under a commission for bankruptcy on the ground that upon a return to peace the right to prove would survive, inasmuch as the debt arose from a contract made when the two nations were at peace. He came to the conclusion that it would be contrary to justice to confiscate the dividend, and as the right to recover was only suspended, that was not a reason why the fund available for the creditors should be divided among the other creditors without regard to the alien enemies' suspended rights. He, therefore, ordered that a claim be entered and the dividend of the alien enemy be reserved. The contention to which the Lord Chancellor there gave effect was that, in the administration of the fund in bankruptcy, the other creditors should not be permitted to take a larger dividend by the exclusion of the alien enemy. If the alien enemy could not take the dividend the Crown would be entitled to it. Under these circumstances the Lord Chancellor admitted, not a proof, but a claim. The result would be that there would be divided among the other creditors the differential sum remaining after reserving the dividend on the claim, and that, as his Lordship said (13 Ves. at pp. 71, 72) F G H

> "upon the return of peace the right would survive. It would be contrary to justice to confiscate the dividend."

This differs from a case in which the alien enemy comes into court to prove the existence of the debt and claim judgment for the amount. It must not, however, be regarded as an authority for the proposition that an alien enemy can present a petition to the court and be heard upon it. There was no argument before the Lord Chancellor as to whether such a petition could be presented by an alien enemy, and the point does not appear to have been considered. According to the report of the case, no interest was represented before his Lordship except that of the petitioner, but from the record, which we have had the opportunity of examining, it appears that the assignees in bankruptcy were also represented. The petitioner's I

A argument was that there was a valid debt, and that, therefore, a sufficient amount should be reserved from the fund to be distributed. The Lord Chancellor, having expressed the opinion that the contract was valid and the debt due, had nevertheless become aware that the alien enemy would be entitled on restoration of peace to payment of a dividend upon his debt, and his Lordship thought the right and convenient course was to enter the claim and reserve the amount until after B the war. It is as if a trustee in bankruptcy, about to distribute funds arising from the debtor's estate to the creditors, received notice of a claim by an alien enemy and, having satisfied himself as to its validity, kept in his hands sufficient to pay a dividend on the debt after the conclusion of the war.

The latest adjudication upon the alien enemy's right to sue is Princess Thurn and Taxis v. Moffitt (17), where Sargant, J., held that the subject of an enemy C State who was registered under the Aliens Restriction Act, 1914, as an alien and the subject of an enemy State is entitled to sue in the King's courts. This decision is, in our opinion, clearly right. Such an alien is resident here by tacit permission of the Crown. He has by registration informed the Executive of his presence in this country, and has been allowed thereafter to remain here. He is sub protectione domini regis.

D Having stated the common law of England in regard to the question of the alien enemy's right to sue in our courts of law, we have now to consider whether the Hague Convention of 1907 upon the Laws and Customs of War on Land, art. 23 (h) of c. 1 of s. 2 of the Annex entitled "Regulations respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land," has any bearing upon the questions we have to determine. The heading of that section is "Of Hostilities." Section 3 is headed E "Military Authority over the Territory of a Hostile State. Chapter 1 of s. 2 is entitled "The Means of injuring the Enemy; Sieges and Bombardments." The articles in it are numbered from 22 to 28. Articles 22 and 23 are as follows:

Article 22: "Belligerents have not got an unlimited right as to the choice of means of injuring the enemy."

F Article 23: "In addition to the prohibitions provided by special Conventions it is particularly forbidden: (a) To employ poison or poisoned weapons; (b) To kill or wound by treachery individuals belonging to the hostile nation or army; (c) To kill or wound an enemy who, having laid down his arms or no longer having means of defence, has surrendered at discretion; (d) To declare that no quarter will be given; (e) To employ arms, projectiles or materials G calculated to cause unnecessary suffering; (f) To make improper use of a flag of truce, of the national flag or of the military insignia and uniform of the enemy as well as of the distinctive signs of the Geneva Convention; (g) To destroy or seize enemy property unless such destruction or seizure be imperatively demanded by the necessities of war; (h) To declare abolished, suspended, or inadmissible the rights of the subjects of the hostile party to institute legal I proceedings. A belligerent is likewise forbidden to compel the subjects of the hostile party to take part in the operation of war directed against their own country even if they were in the service of the belligerent before the commencement of the war."

The remaining articles refer to ruses of war, bombardments, sieges, and assaults. The important paragraph is 23 (h). It is desirable to give it also in French:

I "De déclarer éteints, suspendus ou non recevables en justice les droits et actions des nationaux de la partie adverse."

This para. (h), in a form which was not substantially different, was originally introduced in one of the committees of the Hague Conference by General von Gundell, a German delegate, and Herr Göppert, another German delegate, undoubtedly stated in reference to it that the intention of the proposed clause was to prohibit all legislative measures which in time of war would place the subject of an enemy State in the position of inability to enforce the execution of a contract by recourse to the tribunals of the State in regard to which he was an alien enemy. The text of the paragraph must, of course, be interpreted by us as it now stands in the ratified Convention, and the intention of its proposer is immaterial, but it is only fair to add that the paragraph as originally proposed did not contain the words "en justice" and instead of the words "les droits et actions des nationaux" the words were "les réclamations privées des ressortissants." These changes of language appear, so far as they go, rather to be in accord with Herr Göppert's statement of the object of the proposal. They were, as we understand, made in the course of the drafting of the Annex without discussion or debates taking place in regard to them, and the paragraph as it now stands was submitted for the final approval of the conference without any suggestion of this being in any way material.

The meaning and force of the paragraph have been subjected to a considerable discussion by learned writers upon international law in this country, in America, and on the Continent, and the Attorney-General in the course of his argument in this case both by reference and by citation placed us in possession of the most valuable of the opinions of those writers. It would, in our view, serve no useful purpose to attempt here any elaborate examination of these opinions. Suffice it to say that the substantial question being whether the operation of this paragraph is or is not to abrogate the old rule (not peculiar to English law, though it has been more prominent in England than elsewhere) that an alien enemy's rights of action are suspended during the war, jurists of eminence have expressed widely divergent views upon the point, and this court has given to those views its very careful consideration. We are all clearly of the opinion that the paragraph in question cannot be treated as effecting any such abrogation. If we look in the first place at the terms of the paragraph itself and apart from its collocation and context, we find that what it forbids is, as also in para. (d), a "declaration"—"it is forbidden to declare." This has no application to a country in which, as in England, there is no room for a declaration. By the existing law of the country the mere fact of war operates ipso facto to suspend any right of action which at the time of the outbreak of war any alien enemy may possess. It is interesting to observe that Dr. Sieveking, an eminent German jurist, while holding that the paragraph was intended to have all the effect foreshadowed by Herr Göppert, is of opinion that, as to England at any rate, it is ineffectual because it only prevents some executive authority from declaring that rights of action are suspended, extinguished, or inadmissible. He rightly points out that no such declaration is required in English law for the reasons already given. Extending our view from the paragraph itself to the immediate context, we find that it is included in a group of paragraphs forming art. 23, every other of which relates solely to the conduct of a military force and its commanders in a campaign and not at all to the administration of the law respecting alien enemies at home; that the chapter of which the article forms part is entitled "Means of injuring the Enemy; Sieges and Bombardments," and that the section of the Annex to which the chapter belongs bears the general heading "Of Hostilities." Extending our view still further to the Convention itself, we find the declaration which governs the whole Annex and controls its application in art. 1:

> "The contracting Powers shall issue instructions to their armed land forces which shall be in conformity with the regulations respecting the laws and customs of war on land annexed to the present Convention."

It is impossible to suppose that this means (as it must do if the effect of para. (b) is to abrogate the law existing hitherto in England and to give an alien enemy the position of a persona standi in judicio in English courts of law) that the War Office of Great Britain shall in the present war for this purpose issue instructions to Sir John French, commanding our land forces in the field, forbiding him to "declare" that the rights of alien enemies—Germans, Austrians, or Turks—to institute legal proceedings in the High Court of Justice in London are suspended or inadmissible. Yet this absurdity seems necessarily to follow from the scheme of the Convention as applied to para. (h) if the interpretation of this paragraph is that which is contended for by those who find in it an abrogation of our law, which hitherto has not given to an alien enemy the position of a persona standi in judicio.

Our view is that art. 23 (h), read with the governing art. 1 of the Convention, has a very different and a very important effect, and that the paragraph, if so understood, is quite properly placed as it is placed in a group of prohibitions relating to the conduct of an army and its commander in the field. It is to be read, in our judgment, as forbidding any declaration by the military commander of a belligerent force in the occupation of the enemy's territory which will prevent the inhabitants of that territory from using their courts of law in order to assert or to protect their civil rights. For example, if the commander-in-chief of the German forces which are at the present moment in military occupation of part of Belgium were to declare that Belgian subjects should not have a right to sue in the courts of Belgium, he would be acting in contravention of the terms of this paragraph of the article. If such a declaration were made, it would be doing that which this paragraph was intended to make particularly forbidden by the solemn compact between all the States which ratified the Hague Convention of 1907. According to eminent jurists the occupying military power is forbidden as a general rule to vary or suspend laws affecting property and private personal relations: see Hall's International Law (6th Edn.), at p. 465. This art. 23 (h) has now enacted that, whatever else the occupying military power may order in the territory of the enemy which it dominates, it shall not henceforth declare that the right of the subjects of the enemy to institute legal proceedings in the courts of that territory is abolished, suspended, or inadmissible. If this be its true force, the enactment as an international compact is not only of high value, but it has been inserted quite naturally and appositively in the position in the section and the chapter of the Annex to the Convention which it occupies.

There are two matters brought before us by the learned Attorney-General in connection with the interpretation of art. 23 (h) which, in our opinion, ought not to be left unnoticed. The first of these is the letter addressed on Mar. 27, 1911, by our Foreign Office to Professor Oppenheim, of Cambridge, in answer to an inquiry made by him on the preceding Feb. 28 in reference to the views which had been expressed in regard to the paragraph by some foreign jurists. The reply of the Foreign Office was published. It contains a powerfully reasoned exposition of the view that this paragraph has no concern with the municipal law, but relates to the conduct of those who are in command of an army in occupation of the territory of an enemy. The second matter is an incident of a diplomatic character. On the eve of the outbreak of the present war the German ambassador in London addressed a communication to our Foreign Office to this effect:

> "In view of the rule of English law the German government will suspend the enforcement of any British demands against Germans unless the Imperial government receives within twenty-four hours an undertaking as to the continued enforceability of German demands against Englishmen."

No arrangement was arrived at. We refer to these two incidents, not because either of them can affect our judgment on the question of the interpretation of art. 23 (h), but because it is right that it should be made quite clear to everyone that as early as the spring of 1911 the view of the British government as to its true interpretation was made public to the world and that the situation was perfectly well understood by the German government. It is to be regretted that the paragraph should be so drawn as to give rise to controversy as to its proper interpretation, but, for the reasons given, we think the paragraph has not the extended meaning claimed for it and does not affect the ancient rule of the English common law, that an alien enemy, unless with special licence or authorisation of the Crown, has no right to sue in our courts during the war.

Having now explained the meaning of "alien enemy" for civil purposes, and having decided that such alien enemy's right to sue or proceed either by himself or by any person on his behalf in the King's courts is suspended during the progress of hostilities and until after peace is restored (see also Flindt v. Waters (18)), the next point to consider is whether he is liable to be sued in the King's courts during the war. To allow an alien enemy to sue or proceed during war in the civil courts of the King would be, as we have seen, to give to the enemy the advantage of enforcing his rights by the assistance of the King with whom he is at war. But to allow the alien enemy to be sued or proceeded against during war is to permit subjects of the King or alien friends to enforce their rights with the assistance of the King against the enemy. Primâ facie there seems no possible reason why our law should decree an immunity during hostilities to the alien enemy against the payment of just debts or demands due to British or neutral subjects. The rule of law suspending the alien enemy's right of action is based upon public policy, but no considerations of public policy are apparent which would justify preventing the enforcement by a British or neutral subject of a right against the enemy. As was said by BAILHACHE, J., in Robinson & Co. v. Continental Insurance Co. of Mannheim (19) ([1915] 1 K.B. at p. 159):

> "To hold that a subject's right of suit is suspended against an alien enemy is to injure a British subject and to favour an alien enemy and to defeat the object and reason of the suspensory rule."

In our judgment, the effect would be to convert that which during war is a disability, imposed upon the alien enemy because of his hostile character, into a relief to him during war from the discharge of his liabilities to British subjects. It is very noteworthy that when dealing with the rights of alien enemies there is no shadow of doubt suggested in the books as to the right to sue alien enemies. More often there is no mention of it, but sometimes it is the subject of express reference, and then always to the same effect, that the alien enemy can be sued during the progress of hostilities. BACON'S ABRIDGMENT (7th Edn.), vol. 1, at p. 183, asserts this liability of the alien enemy without doubt or hesitation.

> "The plea of 'alien enemy' is a bar to a bill for relief in equity as well as to an action at law, but it would seem not sustainable to a mere bill for discovery, for as an alien enemy may be sued at law and may have process to compel the appearance of his witnesses so he may have the benefit of a discovery."

This is an important passage in other respects also, and, in our judgment, it is a correct statement of the law. WALFORD, in his valuable work above mentioned on PARTIES TO ACTIONS, at p. 656, says:

> "With respect to the liabilities of aliens, whatever be their description, whether friends or enemies, whether with or without protection, they seem to be open to be sued just the same as native subjects, there being nothing in their character either originally to incapacitate them from contracting an obligation, or committing a civil injury, or to shelter them in any action brought against them in consequence."

Section 53 of STORY'S COMMENTARIES ON EQUITY PLEADINGS is of similar effect:

> "An exception might perhaps be allowed where the alien enemy is the defendant in a suit at law in the country where he brings the bill for discovery, since it may be the only essential means on his part to establish a perfect defence to the suit at law."

This passage shows that in the opinion of the learned author an alien enemy might be defendant in a suit. In LUSH'S PRACTICE (3rd Edn.), vol. 1, at p. 6, it is stated that outlaws, aliens, enemies, felons, &c., are all liable to be sued. PROFESSOR DICEY in his work on PARTIES TO ACTIONS has a passage to the same effect. WALFORD, at p. 666 of the treaties on the LAW RESPECTING PARTIES TO ACTIONS, also expresses the opinion that a person attainted, outlawed, or excommunicated

A is open to be sued like an ordinary person, as he has already observed, like an alien friend or enemy.

The Supreme Court of the United States had to consider the position of an alien enemy defendant in McVeigh v. United States (20). The United States under a statute then in force filed a libel of information in the District Court of Virginia for the forfeiture of certain real and personal property of McVeigh on the ground B that he was "a resident of the city of Richmond within the Confederate lines and a rebel." McVeigh appeared by counsel and filed a claim to the property and an answer. The Attorney of the United States moved that the claim and answer and appearance be stricken from the files, and the court granted the motion and the decree was made for forfeiture of the property. The case eventually was brought to the Supreme Court on writ of error. SWAYNE, J., in delivering the C judgment of the court, said:

> "The order in effect denied the respondent a hearing. It is alleged he was in the position of an alien enemy and hence could have no locus standi in that forum. If assailed there he could defend there. The liability and the right are inseparable. A different result would be a blot upon our jurisprudence and D civilisation. . . . Whether the legal status of the plaintiff in error was or was not that of an alien enemy is a point not necessary to consider because, apart from the views we have expressed, conceding the fact to be so, the consequences assumed would by no means follow. Whatever may be the extent of the disability of an alien enemy to sue in the courts of a hostile country, it is clear that he is liable to be sued, and this carries with it the E right to use all the means and appliances of defence."

The learned judge relied upon the above-mentioned passage in BACON'S ABRIDGMENT as an authority for this proposition, and the Supreme Court acted upon it by reversing the judgment of the District Court and of the Circuit Court.

Although there is no case in English law which has directly decided that an alien enemy can be sued in our courts until the recent decision of BAILHACHE, J., F it is instructive to glance at cases dealing with forfeiture of civil rights resulting from some act of misconduct. The traitor, the felon, the outlaw, and the excommunicated person were under civil disabilities. They were held by their misconduct to have wiped out and obliterated the original traces of their character as citizens: see WALFORD'S PARTIES TO ACTIONS at p. 647. Such misconduct generally speaking carried the same denial of the rights to sue in the courts as attached to an alien G enemy. In NOY'S REPORTS (NOY was Attorney-General to Charles I) this judicial observation occurs in Hastings v. Blake (21):

> "Men attaint or outlawed shall be put to answer in any action against them because it is to their prejudice; but in an action brought by them they shall not be answered because it is to their benefit."

H In Ramsden v. Macdonald (22), LEE, C.J., said: "There is no doubt that a person attainted may be sued." These are not direct authorities to support the proposition now under discussion with reference to alien enemies, but they are instances to show that there is no reason in principle why a person attainted or outlawed should not be sued. These are cases arising, it is true, out of misconduct, but they involved the parties in the same disability to sue as attached to an alien enemy, I and we are at a loss to conceive why the same liability to be sued should not equally apply to him. The real difficulty that arises in seeking to enforce a right against an alien enemy is that of fixing him with proper notice of the suit and the proceedings in the action, with which we will deal later.

Once the conclusion is reached that the alien enemy can be sued, it follows that he can appear and be heard in his defence and may take all such steps as may be deemed necessary for the proper presentment of his defence. If he is brought at the suit of a party before a court of justice he must have the right of submitting his answer to the court. To deny him that right would be to deny him justice and would be quite contrary to the basic principles guiding the King's courts in the administration of justice. Equally it seems to result that, when sued, if judgment proceed against him, the appellate courts are as much open to him as to any other defendant. It is true that he is the person who may be said in one sense to initiate the proceedings in the appellate court by giving the notice of appeal, which is the first necessary step to bring the case before that court; but he is entitled to have his case decided according to law, and if the judge in one of the King's courts has erroneously adjudicated upon it he is entitled to have recourse to another and an appellate court to have the error rectified. Once he is cited to appear he is entitled to the same opportunities of challenging the correctness of the decision of the judge of first instance or other tribunal as any other defendant. The decision in McVeigh v. United States (20) in the Supreme Court of the United States is to the same effect. In that case the defendant, who was appellant in the circumstances already stated, brought writ of error in respect of the judgment of the District and Circuit Courts and succeeded in reversing the judgments of those courts.

We must now consider whether the same conclusion is reached in reference to appeals by an alien enemy plaintiff, that is, a person who before the outbreak of war was a plaintiff in a suit, and then by virtue of his residence or place of business became an alien enemy. As we have seen, he could not proceed with his action during the war. If judgment had been pronounced against him before the war in an action in which he was plaintiff, can he present an appeal to the appellate courts of the King? We cannot see any distinction in principle between the case of an alien enemy seeking the assistance of the King to enforce a civil right in a court of first instance and an alien enemy seeking to enforce such right by recourse to the appellate courts. He is in either case seeking to enforce his right by invoking the assistance of the King in his courts. He is the "actor" throughout. He is not brought to the courts at the suit of another: it is he who invokes their assistance; and it matters not for this purpose that a judgment has been pronounced against him before the war. When once hostilities have commenced he cannot, so long as they continue, be heard in any suit or proceeding in which he is the person first setting the courts in motion. If he had given notice of appeal before the war, the hearing of his appeal must be suspended until after the restoration of peace.

Having now dealt with general principles, we proceed to consider their application to the three appeals before us. The plaintiff in the first appeal issued a writ against one Philip Freudenberg (trading as Hermann Gerson) to recover a quarter's rent due on Sept. 29, 1914, under a lease made in 1903 of certain premises situate in Hanover Square, London. The defendant resides and carries on business as a mantle manufacturer in Berlin in the empire of Germany, and had for some time before the outbreak of war carried on a branch establishment at the above premises by means of an agent named Arthur Barnes. According to the affidavit of the plaintiff, a quantity of stock was usually kept on the premises, but immediately before Sept. 29 the whole of the stock, fixtures, and fittings was removed from the premises. On Sept. 28 the keys of the premises were sent to the plaintiff by Barnes, which the plaintiff intimated would be held at the disposal of Barnes as the agent of the defendant. The plaintiff having issued his writ applied to SCRUTTON, J., for directions as to the manner of serving it upon the defendant in Berlin. The learned judge gave liberty to the plaintiff to issue a concurrent writ against the defendant and to serve notice of the writ in Berlin. In view of the difficulty of serving the notice of writ on the defendant, counsel for the plaintiff asked this court to make an order for substituted service of the notice of writ by allowing service of it upon Barnes or otherwise as the court might direct.

In the second appeal the plaintiffs Kreglinger are skin and hide merchants carrying on business in London and at Antwerp. Before the outbreak of war they had entered into contracts for the sale of cargoes of hides from Australia to the firm of S. Samuel and Rosenfeld, carrying on business in London. Before the outbreak of war the firm of S. Samuel and Rosenfeld intimated that they did not intend to carry out the contracts. After the outbreak of war a writ was issued and the plaintiffs claimed to have effected proper service of it upon the firm by leaving it upon one Bonome, a person who appeared to be in control or management of the business here: see R.S.C. Ord. 48A, r. 3. Bonome entered a conditional appearance and applied to set aside the service. SCRUTTON, J., set it aside on the ground that one Alfred Cohen, who resided at Hamburg, was the sole proprietor of the business of S. Samuel and Rosenfeld, and, therefore, Ord. 48A, r. 3, did not apply, as there were not two or more partners carrying on business within the jurisdiction. An unsuccessful attempt was made to establish that Bonome was a partner in the firm. Evidence was taken before the master, and it appeared that Bonome was not a partner, but was the manager of the business in London for Alfred Cohen with full authority to act in all matters in respect of the said business. The plaintiffs only knew Bonome and transacted all their business with the firm with him. SCRUTTON, J., on the plaintiffs' application, gave leave to issue a concurrent writ against Alfred Cohen with liberty to serve notice of the writ at Hamburg in Germany, but refused leave to make substituted service of the notice of writ by serving it on Bonome, thinking himself bound to refuse by reason of the decision in Wilding v. Bean (23). The plaintiffs appeal from this refusal and ask this court, in view of the circumstances and of the difficulty, if not impossibility as they suggest, of effecting service upon Alfred Cohen during the war, to permit them to make the service upon Bonome, inasmuch as he appears to be the person in charge of the defendants' interests in this country. We are at this moment engaged only in determining questions as to the proper mode of service, and are expressing no opinion, except in this connection, as to the position of Bonome.

The courts having decided that the alien enemy can be sued, have to consider how effective notice of the proceedings in the courts of this country can be served on the alien enemy in the enemy country. Diplomatic relations between the two nations have been broken off, and a serious question might have arisen whether in these circumstances Ord. 11, r. 8, of the Rules of the Supreme Court was applicable. Before the outbreak of war Germany was, by order of the Lord Chancellor, a country to which this rule applied, and, so long as that order stood, the procedure to be adopted for service in Germany was regulated by that rule. That order has, however, been revoked by the Lord Chancellor, and it, therefore, becomes unnecessary further to consider whether the rule that this procedure therein described "shall be adopted" could be held applicable during a war between us and the country in which the service was to be effected. Unless an order for substituted service in this country of a notice of writ for service out of the jurisdiction can be made in a proper case, great hardship may be inflicted upon persons who are subjects of and resident in this country who have given credit to or entered into contractual relations with or have claims against persons who are now alien enemies, to the manifest advantage of the alien enemies and disadvantage of British subjects and subjects of other States who wish to sue in this country. This court whilst bearing this consideration in mind, must also take into account the position of the defendant, the alien enemy, who is, according to the fundamental principles of English law, entitled to effective notice of the proceedings against him. It is obvious that in all cases against the alien enemy the plaintiff will seek, if possible, an order to make substituted service in this country.

It is desirable, therefore, to consider in some detail (i) in what circumstances substituted service can be ordered; and (ii) whether substituted service within the jurisdiction can be ordered of a notice of writ for service without the jurisdiction. The general rule is that an order for substituted service of a writ of summons within the jurisdiction cannot be made in any case in which, at the time of the issue of the writ, there could not be at law a good personal service of the writ because the defendant is not within the jurisdiction.

"If the writ had not been issued until the defendant had left the country, the only way in which the defendant could have been properly served would have been by proceeding under the practice as to writs for service out of the jurisdiction":

per COLLINS, L.J., in Jay v. Budd (24) ([1898] 1 Q.B. at p. 19).

"There cannot be a good substituted service where personal service would not be legally possible":

per LORD ESHER, M.R., and LOPES, L.J., in Worcester City and County Banking Co. v. Firbank, Pauling & Co. (25).

"There cannot be substituted service on a person on whom personal service could not be validly effected":

per DAVEY, L.J. ([1894] 1 Q.B. at p. 792). See also Fry v. Moore (26); Re Urquhart (27); Wilding v. Bean (23), especially per LORD ESHER, M.R. The rule was also acted upon by FARWELL, J., in Western Suburban and Notting Hill Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Rucklidge (28). This general rule is not applied where the court is satisfied that the defendant went outside the jurisdiction before the issue of the writ in order to evade the service of the writ within it: see Re Urquhart (27); Watt v. Barnett (29). If the defendant went out of the jurisdiction after the issue of the writ, although not for the purpose of evading service, substituted service may be allowed if the court is satisfied that the issue of the writ came to his knowledge before he went outside the jurisdiction, and special circumstances show that such substituted service would be just within Ord. 9, r. 2: see Jay v. Budd (24), per LORD HALSBURY, L.C., and COLLINS, L.J., RIGBY, L.J., dissenting.

In order that substituted service may be permitted, it must be clearly shown that the plaintiff is in fact unable to effect personal service and that the writ is likely to reach the defendant or to come to his knowledge if the method of substituted service which is asked for by the plaintiff is adopted. The court may then make such order as may seem just: Ord. 9, r. 2. The terms of this rule are of very wide application and give a very wide discretion, which we are not inclined to limit. In the case of a writ properly issued under one of the heads of Ord. 11, r. 1, for service out of the jurisdiction, substituted service either within or without the jurisdiction may be permitted in special circumstances, as, e.g., that the defendant is evading personal service of such writ, and that the proposed form of substituted service will be effectual in bringing the writ to the defendant's knowledge: Ford v. Shephard (30); Western Suburban and Notting Hill Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Rucklidge (28). In the case of a notice in lieu of writ to be served on a foreigner out of the jurisdiction on an order properly obtained under Ord. 11, r. 1, there is no reason why substituted service of that notice should not be permitted in similar circumstances to those in which it is permitted in the case of a writ for service out of the jurisdiction. As to substituted service of such a notice, Ord. 9, r. 7, and Ord. 11, r. 2, give power to order it. Certainly under Ord. 11, rr. 8 (4) and 8 (5), it is contemplated that this may be done, for it prescribes the method of doing it and Ditton v. Bornemann (31) (a decision on the practice before the introduction of rr. 8 and 8 (a)) favours the view that the substituted service of a notice of a writ may be allowed. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and BOWEN, L.J., sitting as a Divisional Court, made the order, which had been refused by the judge in chambers, that service of the notice of the writ should be made by registered letter to Germany to the trustee of the estate of the defendant, whose affairs were in compulsory liquidation in Germany, and also to the defendant's wife, and that the defendant should have a month to appear after the letter would arrive. The judge in chambers before whom the application is made for substituted service of a writ for service out of the jurisdiction or of a notice of such a writ ought to be careful before acceding to the application (a) to satisfy himself that there exists a practical impossibility of actual service, as otherwise, inasmuch as there is always a certain amount of difficulty and delay in effecting service out of the jurisdiction under Ord. 11, a plaintiff will always seek to obtain an order for substituted service, with the serious risk that the defendant may never have notice of the proceedings and judgment in default of appearance may be given against him unjustly; (b) to satisfy himself for the same reason that the method of substituted service asked for by the plaintiff is one which will in all reasonable probability, if not certainty, be effective to bring knowledge of the writ or the notice of the writ (as the case may be) to the defendant.

Our English procedure has hitherto been laudably superior to the Continental in not permitting that which may be called "constructive service," such as, e.g., by public notices or advertisements, whereby a defendant may be condemned unheard because he has had no knowledge of the proceedings against him. In Porter v. Freudenburg the writ was issued for service within the jurisdiction, the defendant being abroad at the time of the issue of the writ. There could, therefore, be no order for substituted service of that writ. Leave having now been given to issue a concurrent writ and to serve notice out of the jurisdiction, that difficulty is removed. The proper order to make in the circumstances in this case and also in Kreglinger v. S. Samuel and Rosenfeld is to give the leave to make substituted service and to refer both cases back to chambers for directions as to the mode of effecting it. Upon the materials now before us we think service of the notice should be effected in the one case by substituted service upon Barnes and in the other upon Bonome, and such further terms should be imposed in chambers upon the plaintiff as to advertisement or other means of communication and as to the period to be given to the defendant for appearance as may seem proper. The Rules Committee may think it necessary now to consider whether further rules should be made to meet some of the present difficulties of service of notice of proceedings in our courts against an alien enemy. It should, however, be borne in mind that there is little, if any, value in obtaining judgment in our courts in default of appearance of the defendant resident in an enemy State, unless there is property in this country which can be reached in execution of the judgment. Where there is property in this country there is frequently some person upon whom an order for substituted service could be made supplemented by other provisions as to giving notice to the defendant of the proceedings to which we have already called attention. In each of these appeals the order of Scrutton, J., will be varied in accordance with the views we have expressed, and the matters will be referred back to chambers to be there dealt with.

In the third appeal the matter came before us on a motion to set aside the appeal on the ground that the appellants were alien enemies. Soldau & Co., Ltd., an English company, presented a petition for revocation of a patent granted to a German subject resident in Germany, of which patent a German company were the owners. The petition was heard by Warrington, J., who made an order on July 28, 1914, for revocation of the patent, but, if notice of appeal was given on or before Aug. 28, 1914, the operation of the order was to be suspended until the hearing of the appeal. Notice of appeal was given on Aug. 28. War had been declared between His Majesty the King and the Emperor of Germany on Aug. 4. Therefore, at the date of giving the notice of appeal the appellants were alien enemies, and the notice of the motion now before the court was launched to set aside the notice of appeal upon that ground. At the hearing before us counsel for the petitioners admitted that he could not succeed on the motion, and did not now apply to set aside the appeal, but he did ask the court to express its opinion that the hearing of the appeal was not suspended, and that it could be heard during the war. The position was peculiar, inasmuch as counsel for the appellants did not dispute that his clients were alien enemies, but insisted, in the interest of his clients, not upon their right to be heard, but that their appeal could not be heard until after the restoration of peace. If we acceded to that view, and the order for suspension of the revocation of the patent stood as made by WARRINGTON, J., alien enemies who are the owners of the patent would be in a distinctly advantageous position so long as the war lasted. It is not surprising, therefore, that counsel for the petitioners insisted that the appeal of the alien enemy could be heard, and asked this court to give an intimation to that effect. The appellants were the respondents to a petition. They were brought to the court at the instance of another because they were the owners of the patent rights. The alien enemy appellants were not the "actors" in the proceedings; these were initiated by the petitioners, and notice was served upon the appellants for revocation of the patent rights they had acquired. The appellants must be regarded for this purpose as being in the same position as a defendant in a suit who appeals from a judgment given against him. In accordance with the opinion we have already expressed, the appellants were, therefore, entitled not only to appear and be heard on this motion, but to have their appeal heard in the ordinary course notwithstanding the war. We cannot accede to their contention that the hearing of the appeal must be suspended during the war. We take a more favourable view of the appellants' rights in this respect than the appellants, and we agree with the contention of counsel for the petitioners that the appeal must take and keep its place in the ordinary way in the list. It should be distinctly understood that nothing that we have said is intended in any degree to interfere with or limit the discretion of the court before which the appeal will come for hearing to make any such order for postponement or otherwise of this appeal as it may think fit. The appellants can make any such application based upon the difficulties arising from the war as they may deem right and necessary, and the court will deal with it upon the facts then presented in the usual way. The motion must be dismissed, but, in view of the peculiar circumstances, without costs. The late KENNEDY, L.J., had approved this judgment before his death.

Partnership—Borrowing—Right of partners to borrow on credit of firm—"Trading firm"—Purchase and sale of goods—Position of theatre proprietors.

For a firm to come within the rule by which the members of a trading firm have an implied authority to borrow money on the credit of the firm for business purposes, the business carried on must depend on the buying and selling of goods. A business of cinematograph theatre proprietors is not a trading business within the meaning of the rule.

Appeal from Bath County Court.

The defendant entered into partnership with one Sydney Milles and another person > "in the business of proprietors and managers of picture palaces, cinematograph theatres and exhibitions, variety entertainments, concerts, theatrical performances, and all other forms of entertainment."

One of the terms of the deed of partnership provided that no partner should, without the consent of the other partners, contract any debt on account of the partnership or in any manner pledge its credit except in the usual and regular course of business. The defendant was a sleeping partner in the business which was carried on entirely by Milles. Milles borrowed from the plaintiff sums of £50 and £34, stating that it was wanted for the purposes of the partnership business. In fact he never had the intention of using the money in the business, and appropriated it. The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover the sums advanced by him as being money lent to the firm. The learned county court judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the money, and gave judgment in his favour. The defendant appealed.

Rawlinson, K.C., and F. E. Weatherley for the defendant.

Foote, K.C., and E. H. C. Wethered for the plaintiff.

HORRIDGE, J.—The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant to recover two sums of money amounting to £84 which had been borrowed from him by a man named Milles, who was managing a cinematograph entertainment at Midsomer Norton. The money in question, as found by the learned judge, was borrowed from the plaintiff on the representation that it was required for the purposes of the firm of which the defendant was a member and of which Milles was also a member, as well as being the manager. The partnership deed which we have before us expressly negatives any power on the part of any one partner, without the consent of the others, to borrow money so as to bind the partnership, and, therefore, the question is whether Milles, from the nature of the business he was managing, had ostensible authority to borrow money for the purposes of the firm so as to render the firm liable to the person who lent it.

It is quite clear from several cases, and particularly from Brown v. Kidger (1), that, in the case of a real trading partnership, a partner who borrows money can bind the other partners who are not parties to the transaction even if he afterwards applies the money to wrongful purposes. On the threshold of this inquiry, therefore, in order to render the defendant liable as a partner, I think the fact must be found that this was a trading company as dealt with and described in the cases which show that there is such an implied authority in the case of a trading company. I look at the deed of partnership to ascertain whether or not this was such a trading company. The purpose of the partnership is defined in cl. 1, which says that the business of the firm shall be that > "of proprietors and managers of picture palaces, cinematograph theatres and exhibitions, variety entertainments, concerts, theatrical performances and all other forms of entertainment."

I do not think that the managing of these places of entertainment is carrying on a trading concern of a character which is one from which could be implied either a power to borrow money or a power to accept bills. There was no other evidence before the learned judge except the bare fact that this was a cinematograph entertainment which was being carried on at this place. I do not think the learned judge ever applied his mind to the question whether or not this was such a trading company as I have indicated. In his judgment he laid down the following proposition:

> "He [the defendant] allows Mr. Milles to hold himself out as the manager of this company. If he does that and allows a man so to act, and that man borrows money by false pretences, the law is that he is liable for the acts of that person unless it is shown that there has been negligence on the part of the borrower."

As a proposition of law that clearly cannot be sustained. To say that because you put a manager into a business you are responsible for everything he does is to make a statement of the wildest description. As I have said, the learned judge did not apply his mind to the question whether this particular trading concern was of such a nature that Milles had an implied authority to borrow money. The only evidence before him was that this was a partnership entered into for the purpose of conducting a cinematograph entertainment. That being so, I think there was no evidence on which he could find that Milles had ostensible authority to borrow money. It lay on the plaintiff to prove his case, and, no evidence having been given in support of it, in my opinion, judgment should have been given for the defendant, and this appeal must be allowed.

LUSH, J. —I agree. As between Milles and his partners he had no actual authority to contract these loans. The plaintiff, therefore, in order to succeed, must show that he was entitled to assume that Milles had authority to borrow and that he acted reasonably on that assumption. He could show that in one of two ways: First by proving that the defendant had so acted towards him as to lead him to infer that Milles had authority, which was not suggested because the defendant had done nothing as between himself and the plaintiff to entitle the latter to assume against the defendant that Milles had authority to bind him; second, by showing that there was an implied authority on Milles's part to borrow money on behalf of the firm having regard to the particular business which was being carried on. This it was which the plaintiff endeavoured to prove. The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on a ground which was not correct in law because he did not hold that this business was one of the class I have mentioned, but held generally that the manager, having been authorised to act for the firm, had authority to bind it.

We were pressed to say, however, that this was a trading business, and, that being so, it was within the apparent authority of a partner to borrow money for the partnership business; and, if that had been so, the plaintiff, knowing that this was a business of that class, would have been entitled to lend money on the credit of the firm. But, in my opinion, this was not a trading business. The learned judge has not found that it was, and there was no evidence that it was. In Wheatley v. Smithers (2), the question was whether an auctioneer was a trader, and the court held that he was not, RIDLEY, J., saying that buying and selling were essential features of trading and that an auctioneer does not buy. When that case was in the Court of Appeal, the same expression occurs—namely, that the business was not a business for the buying or selling of goods. In my opinion, it would be wrong to say that every business which necessarily involves the expenditure of money for the purpose of buying goods which the business requires is a trading business. It seems to me that a trading business is one which involves the purchase of goods and the selling of goods. At all events, I am not prepared to say that a business of the kind we are concerned with here is a trading business. In my view, it is not one of those trading businesses in which a partner who, as between himself and his co-partners, is prohibited from borrowing money has apparent authority so as to entitle a third person to lend it to him on the credit of the firm. That being so, in my opinion this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Re SAFFORD'S SETTLEMENT. DAVIES v. BURGESS

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Joyce, J.), June 10, 24, 1915]

Power of Appointment—Exercise—Marriage settlement—Power to be exercised by wife by will during coverture—Will made during husband's lifetime Death of wife after expiration of coverture—Validity of appointment.

Under a marriage settlement the settled funds, after the death of the survivor of the husband and the wife and in the event of there being no issue of the marriage, were directed to be held on trust for such persons as the wife should "by will during the continuance of the said intended coverture direct or appoint," and in default of appointment on trust as therein mentioned. There was no issue of the marriage. During the coverture, the wife made a will disposing of all her property which she had power to appoint or dispose of by will, either under the marriage settlement or otherwise. She survived her husband.

Held: although the appointment did not become effective during the continuance of the coverture through the death of the wife, what the wife had done satisfied the requirements of the deed in reference to the manner in which the power was to be executed, and, accordingly, there had been a good and valid execution of the power of appointment.

June 24, 1915. JOYCE, J.—In 1854 a marriage settlement was executed under which, after the death of the survivor of the husband and wife, the settled trust funds, in the event of there being no issue of the marriage, were directed to be held on trust for such persons as the wife should "by will during the continuance of the said intended coverture direct or appoint," and in default of appointment on the trust therein mentioned. The form of the limitation is unusual, and is the result of extensive erasures and alterations in the deed after it was engrossed, but we must take the words as we find them. There was no issue of the marriage, and, in 1896, Mrs. Safford, the wife, made a will purporting to dispose of all her property which she had power to appoint or dispose of by will, either under the marriage settlement or otherwise. Her husband died in 1897, leaving Mrs. Safford his widow, who survived until 1914.

The question is now raised whether the settlement funds pass under the appointment made by the will, or as in default of appointment, it being contended that Mrs. Safford's will, although duly made, is ineffectual as an appointment of the funds subject to the trusts of the marriage settlement, because it did not, it is said, come into operation during the continuance of the coverture by the death of the testatrix while she was covert. I do not see how the will of any testatrix could possibly come into operation during the continuance of her coverture. Her coverture would determine by her death, and her will does not come into operation until after her death when the coverture has determined.

But really the words of the limitation creating the power are perfectly plain, simple and unambiguous, and, to my mind, there can be no doubt or question about their meaning, and it is not necessary to supply or understand a single word that is not there. The testatrix has directed and appointed by will how the fund is to be disposed of, and she has done this while covert "during the continuance of the intended coverture." What she has done satisfies the requirements of the deed in reference to the manner in which the power is to be executed. There is no more to be said. There is no authority requiring me to supply or understand at all the additional condition that the testatrix shall not only make her will, but shall also die during the coverture. In Cooper v. Martin (1), a testator directed the proceeds of sale of real estate to be held on trusts for his children and issue in such manner

A and in such shares as his wife before each and every of his said children should have attained the age of twenty-five years or have died under that age by any deed or instrument in writing to be sealed and delivered by his said wife should, either absolutely or with power of revocation and new appointment, direct, limit, or appoint, and in default in trust for the younger children equally. On April 5, 1841, the widow, before the youngest child attained twenty-five, duly executed an B appointment by deed poll reserving a power of revocation and new appointment by deed. Then, later in the same month of April, 1841, she made a will giving and appointing Pain's Hill Estate, a specific part of the real estate, to the eldest son. This also was before the youngest child attained twenty-five, which did not happen until 1851, and the testatrix lived until 1863. In the circumstances, CAIRNS, L.J., declined to treat the will as being in equity a valid execution of the testatrix's C power to appoint by deed before the youngest child attained twenty-five, which he considered an essential requisite to the exercise of the power. ROLT, L.J., agreed and, as I understand, considered that the power could not be exercised by will at all, even in equity, but only by deed. If in the present case, Mrs. Safford's power had been a power to appoint, not by will, but by deed, the decision in Cooper v. Martin (1) might have been relevant to the question I have to determine, D but, in the circumstances, inasmuch as her power to appoint was by will, and only by will, not by deed, I think that Cooper v. Martin (1) has no application. In Re Illingworth (2), where the power to appoint was "during the coverture by will or deed," EVE, J., held that the execution by the wife of her will in the lifetime of her husband, whom she survived, operated as a good exercise of the power of testamentary appointment contained in the settlement, notwithstanding E that she died discovert. I agree with that decision, but, in the present case, I prefer to base my judgment on the reasons I have given rather than on any of the authorities cited in Re Illingworth (2) and having very little to do with the question. I shall, therefore, make a declaration that there has been a good and valid execution of the power of appointment by the testatrix.

Motion for an injunction restraining the defendants from soliciting the customers of a firm, of which they had been members, the goodwill of which had been assigned to the plaintiffs by the trustee under a deed of assignment by the firm for the benefit of their creditors.

G. T. Simonds (Gore-Browne, K.C., with him) for the defendants.

WARRINGTON, J. This is a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant Morris from soliciting, and the defendant Stevens from instigating him to solicit, the customers of his late firm. The question is whether the defendant Morris is or is not in the same position as a vendor of a goodwill who has received the purchase money, in which case, according to the principle affirmed by the House of Lords in Trego v. Hunt (1), he would be committing a breach of the obligation imposed on him by the receipt of the purchase money if he solicits the customers of his late firm. I

The facts in the case are, shortly, that Morris was a member of a firm which, until August of last year, was carrying on the business of boot and shoe manufacturers. On Aug. 15, 1913, the firm executed a deed of assignment of all

A their property to a trustee for the benefit of their creditors. The deed of assignment did not in terms include the goodwill of the business, but, as it comprised the whole of the property of the assignors except some specified things, the goodwill must be taken to have been included. On Oct. 20, 1913, the trustee under the deed sold the goodwill of the business and other things connected with it to the plaintiffs, and the defendant Morris entered the employment of the defendant B W. B. Stevens, and with his concurrence Morris solicited customers of his late firm.

There is no question about the general principle that, if a man sells the goodwill of his business to a purchaser and receives the purchase money, he cannot afterwards destroy that which he has sold by soliciting his old customers. But that principle has never been extended to anything except a sale or some contract C equivalent to a sale; and, in particular, in Walker v. Mottram (2), it was decided that the rule to which I have referred, and which was there referred to as the rule in Labouchere v. Dawson (3), did not apply to the case of a sale not made by the man who was carrying on the business, but by his trustee in bankruptcy. It was further held in that case that it made no difference in principle whether the bankruptcy was brought about by the bankrupt filing his own petition or by D the hostility of his creditors, and in the course of the argument, when the motion was before him, SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., put the position of a bankrupt and a liquidating debtor under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, on exactly the same footing for the purposes of the case. I think that the short answer to the present motion is that it is impossible to find any rational distinction between the case of a man who becomes bankrupt on his own petition and has lost his property, which has E become vested in his trustee in bankruptcy, and that of a man who brings about the same result by executing a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors. The liquidating debtor is a person who is compelled by circumstances to take steps so that his property may be distributed among his creditors in exactly the same way as a bankrupt who presents a petition under the present Bankruptcy Act. F I can see no rational distinction between Walker v. Mottram (2) and the present case. In one sense, what the debtors have done is voluntary; in another sense it is not voluntary at all, as they may have taken the steps they did take to avoid other proceedings being taken by the creditors. In such a case as this, a man does not establish the relation of vendor and purchaser simply by divesting himself of his property. The motion against the defendant Morris fails.

G The notice of motion also asks that the defendant Stevens may be restrained from instigating the defendant Morris to solicit the customers, but it is clear that Stevens cannot be restrained from instigating Morris to do what it is not illegal for him to do, and the motion against Stevens must fail also.

Bankruptcy—Deed of arrangement—Application by debtor to set aside Deed "not complying with provisions of Act"—No question raised of enforcement of trust or determination of question under deed—Jurisdiction of Court of Bankruptcy—Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 47), s. 23.

An application by a debtor for a declaration that a deed of arrangement is void under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914, s. 23, on the ground that it does not comply with the provisions of that Act is not an application for "the enforcement of the trusts" or "the determination of questions under it" within s. 23, and, therefore, a county court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy has no jurisdiction to entertain such an application.

Appeal from the Divisional Court.

The debtor was a farmer and maltster, and was at the outbreak of war on the reserve of officers. He received an order to proceed to France on Nov. 1, 1914. While on active service he executed a power of attorney authorising his sister to execute a deed of arrangement with his creditors. The deed of arrangement was executed by his sister on Mar. 17, 1915. The debtor returned to England in September, 1915, and in October, 1915, applied to the county court to declare the deed of arrangement void on the following grounds: (i) That by the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914, ss. 1, 2, 4, the deed must be executed by the debtor personally; (ii) That the affidavit in support of registration must be sworn by the debtor personally; (iii) That the power of attorney was in itself a deed of arrangement under s. 1 (2) (e), and, not being registered, was void; (iv) That the assent of the statutory majority of creditors under s. 3 of the Act had not been obtained.

G

The county court judge dismissed the application. The debtor appealed to the Divisional Court (HORRIDGE and ROWLATT, JJ.), who held that there was jurisdiction to entertain the appeal on its merits. But their Lordships dismissed the appeal on the ground that the debtor was estopped by his conduct from setting up the case that the deed was void.

H

From that decision the debtor now appealed to the Court of Appeal, when the preliminary objection was again taken on behalf of the trustee of the deed of arrangement that the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914, s. 23, which gave the Bankruptcy Court jurisdiction under the Act to deal with applications "for the enforcement of the trusts or the determination of questions under" a deed of arrangement did not confer jurisdiction to declare a deed void.

I

McCall, K.C. (with him Tindale Davis), for the appellant debtor.

E. W. Hansell (with him Graham Milward) for the respondent trustee.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—The appeal on this preliminary point raises an extremely important question—namely, whether the Court of Bankruptcy has any jurisdiction conferred on it by the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914, to declare that a deed of arrangement is void on an application made for that purpose. The point was raised before the Divisional Court, though not before the county court.

Horridge, J., really did not deal with it much. He said that there was jurisdiction in his opinion, but he did not reason it out at all. Rowlatt, J., in his very—if I may be allowed to say so—careful judgment assigns reasons which to my mind are extremely strong to show that no jurisdiction is given in a case of this kind. It all depends upon the language of s. 23. Certain applications, and only certain applications, can be made under that section. In the first place, the section defines who are the persons who may make the application. The trustee is one person; the debtor is another; and any trust creditor entitled to the benefit of such an arrangement is another.

In the present case, the application was made by the debtor. There was a trust deed, the trustee of which was the respondent to the motion. What sort of application can be made under this new jurisdiction conferred by s. 23? Any one of this class of applicants may apply for the enforcement of the trusts. Clearly this case does not come within that. It is not an application for the enforcement of the trusts. It is an application that there are no trusts to be enforced. Then is it a determination of the questions under it? In my opinion it is not. The application has to say there is no "it"—if I may say so—under which any application can be made. I feel that I am only repeating inadequately the observations of Rowlatt, J., who, according to his reasoning, decided that there was no jurisdiction. But finally he thought it would be inconvenient and not in consonance with the present policy of legislation, or a thing which he thought the Legislature intended, and, therefore, against his own opinion, he held that there was jurisdiction, and so decided. Statutory jurisdiction was for the first time given by s. 23. But we ought not, in my opinion, to be influenced by that. We are limited to the language used, and, in my opinion, we ought to hold that the Court of Bankruptcy had no jurisdiction to declare this deed void.

BANKES, L.J.—I agree with some hesitation, because I think the language of the section is possibly capable of two constructions. But, on the whole, I think that probably the view expressed by the Master of the Rolls is the better view. The section gives a right to three persons or classes of person to make an application. The persons entitled are the trustee, the debtor, or any creditor entitled to the benefit of the deed of arrangement. Those are the three classes of persons who are entitled to go to the court. What they are entitled to go to the court for is to ask for the enforcement of the trusts or the determination of questions under the deed. The expression "determination of questions under the deed" is a very vague and loose expression, and I must say that I think it is capable of either construction. But, taking the section as a whole, I prefer the hitherto accepted view that what the section contemplates is a class of applications which are made on the assumption that the deed is a valid and operative deed.

For these reasons I think that in this case I ought to hold that there was no jurisdiction in the county court ab initio to entertain this application, and that the order of the county court was an inoperative order, and that it is open to the debtor to make a proper application to the Court of Chancery which would have the same effect as his original application to the county court.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The jurisdiction is given by s. 23 of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914, in these terms:

> "Any application by the trustee or by the debtor or by any creditor entitled to the benefit of such a deed of arrangement, for the enforcement of the trusts or the determination of questions under it, shall be made to the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy."

I cannot bring myself to think that an application the object of which is to have it decided that there is no deed can come under the definition of an application for the "determination of questions under it." It seems to me that the section appears to contemplate the existence of a deed of which there is a trustee, and under which there are creditors entitled to the benefit of it, and that that assumption runs through and governs the construction of the entire section.

The question here is somewhat analogous to questions which are sometimes raised under the originating summons part of the Rules of the Supreme Court governing the High Court. Jurisdiction was given to the judge in chambers to determine certain questions under a deed of settlement for example. It has always been held, so far as my experience goes, that any application seeking to avoid a deed must be brought by an action commenced by writ and not by originating summons, and that the judge in chambers would have no jurisdiction on an originating summons to entertain such an application. I think that this case is analogous to that class of case, and I think, therefore, that, on the true construction of this section, the present application is one which the county court had no jurisdiction and which the Divisional Court had no jurisdiction to entertain.

Appeal allowed.

Rule Nisi to the Bishop of Salisbury to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding him to admit Frank Oliver Kent to make his declaration under s. 9 of the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835, and to be a churchwarden of the parish of Melcombe Bingham, in the county of Dorset.

The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

By s. 9 of the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835, it is provided:

"And whereas persons serving the office of churchwarden and sidesman are at present required to take an oath of office before entering upon the execution thereof, and also an oath on quitting such office, and it is expedient that a declaration shall be substituted for such oath of office, and that the oath on quitting the same shall be abolished; be it enacted that in future every person entering upon the office of churchwarden or sidesman, before beginning to discharge the duties thereof, shall, in lieu of such oath of office, make and subscribe, in the presence of the ordinary or other person before whom he would but for the passing of this Act be required to take such oath, a declaration that he will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of his office, and such ordinary or other person is hereby empowered and required to administer the same accordingly; provided always, that no churchwarden or sidesman shall in future be required to take any oath on quitting office, as has heretofore been practised."

Hansell showed cause.

Barrington-Ward in support of the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 15, 1915. RIDLEY, J., read the following judgment of the court.—In this case, a rule nisi was obtained to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding the Bishop of Salisbury to admit one Frank Oliver Kent to make his declaration as a churchwarden under the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835, s. 9. It appears that Kent was elected as people's warden for the parish of Melcombe Bingham in 1914. During his year of office—namely, on Mar. 7, 1915—at the close of one of the church services and near to the chancel steps, he made use of filthy and indecent language to the rector in the presence of the rector's wife. At the Easter vestry meeting for 1915, Kent was again elected people's warden for the ensuing year. On April 27, 1915, he was summoned before the magistrates for violent and indecent conduct in church, and was convicted and bound over to keep the peace for six months. The year 1915 was the year of the visitation of the bishop, and not of the archdeacon, and the bishop appointed June 17 at Dorchester for taking the declaration required of the churchwardens. When Kent attended, the bishop refused to admit him to make his declaration.

If the bishop has a discretion to examine into character before admitting or refusing to admit a churchwarden, it can hardly be questioned that he made a reasonable use of that discretion in the present instance. But if the bishop in so doing has a merely ministerial duty to perform, then, it has been argued, a mandamus should go to order him to perform it. It was, however, contended in showing cause against the rule that this court has in all cases a discretion in issuing such a writ, and that, in all the circumstances of this case, they ought to decline to do so. On this point R. v. Garland (1) was quoted. In that case, there had been a devise of copyhold estate to trustees in trust for an heir. The trustees had not been admitted, but they applied on behalf of the heir for a mandamus to compel his admittance. They had the right to admittance, being the beneficiaries, as it is a mere form: see SCRIVEN ON COPYHOLD, p. 349. But the court discharged the rule on the ground that the application was not a bonâ fide one, but was made in order to avoid paying double fees for admittance, and on the ground that the court had no information as to the age of the heir or of the other circumstances relating to the estate. This decision appears to us not to be an authority for the argument in the present case. The trustees and the heir could have had admittance on paying the fees due, whereas here the applicant cannot do so by any means except that of making the declaration required. In other words, the right which the applicant there sought to enforce by mandamus was a private right, which could be in substance secured by another process. In the present case, the right to perform the duties, which are of a public character, cannot be secured at all if a mandamus is refused. We do not think that, in such a case as this, the issue of the writ is discretionary, assuming that the bishop's duties are only ministerial.

The main question in the case is not devoid of authority. In R. v. Rice (2), a mandamus was directed to the Archdeacon of St. Asaph to admit a churchwarden duly elected by the parish. On the return to the writ, it was set out that the churchwarden was not a fit and proper person, being a dairyman in poor circumstances. But it was held that the archdeacon could not refuse for such cause the churchwarden, who is an officer of the parish, and holds an office merely temporal, having the custody of and the property in the goods belonging to the church. To the same effect is R. v. Simpson (3). The archdeacon in effect was held to be in that case a ministerial officer. In R. v. Williams (4), it was held, on the other hand, that, where there was a mandamus to admit a churchwarden, a return that he had not been duly elected was a good one; and it was said by PARKE, J. (8 B. & C. at p. 683):

> "The commissary may deny any material allegation in the court. He cannot exercise any judicial authority, but he may inquire whether the party has been duly elected."

In R. v. Sowter (5), a question arose whether the bishop or the archdeacon could properly admit a churchwarden, the bishop having inhibited him during his triennial visitation from exercising any spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction concerning the visitation of the clergy, the admission of churchwardens, and so forth. LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., in making the rule absolute, gave judgment approving of the decision in R. v. Simpson (3), and said that a churchwarden had long been regarded as substantially a temporal officer, and that, as the act of the archdeacon in admitting him was merely ministerial, the bishop could not inhibit him from performing it. KENNEDY, J., agreed with this judgment. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision and held that, while the archdeacon was inhibited by the bishop, he could not exercise any jurisdiction at all, but they did not in any way differ from what had been said in the court below as to the character of the office of churchwarden or the duty of the archdeacon in admitting him.

It would not be correct to conclude from these authorities that there are no duties in the performance of which a churchwarden acts for the Ordinary and subject to his control. Thus, in Fuller v. Lane (6) (2 Add. at p. 425), SIR JOHN NICHOLL, in the Arches Court of Canterbury, in dealing with pews in a parish church, said:

> "The distribution of seats rests with the churchwardens, as the officers, and subject to the control, of the Ordinary."

See also Halliday v. Phillips (7). There may be other such duties in the performance of which the churchwarden is not independent of the Ordinary, but we do not think that such a relationship in respect of one particular duty or of several particular duties can affect the general rule laid down in the authorities quoted above.

Reliance was, however, placed on words used by SIR WILLIAM SCOTT in Anthony v. Seger (8). That was a case decided in 1789 on a question relating to an election of churchwardens for the parish of Ealing. Three persons were nominated, and of these Le Corsa received thirty-eight votes on a poll, Wincuffe received thirty-five, and Anthony received none. On it being objected that Le Corsa was an alien, he admitted it and was declared ineligible, and the question was whether Anthony could be declared elected, although he had received no votes at the poll. The court ordered a re-election, but, in giving his judgment, SIR WILLIAM SCOTT said (1 Hag. Con. at p. 10):

> "An alien born has no right. . . . The fact therefore being admitted, that person was properly rejected. A contrary position has indeed been intimated, and it has been said that there would be ground for a mandamus,—but inaccurately, for offices the most ministerial leave a discretion not to join in an illegal act, and if a parish had returned a Papist, or a Jew, or a child of ten years of age, or a person convicted of felony, I conceive the Ordinary would be bound to reject."

It seems to be quite clear that the learned judge was dealing in this passage with statutory or common law disabilities only. He says that there is still discretion not to join in an illegal act, and quotes as instances of such an act only cases where the persons would be actually disqualified for the office. That is a very different thing from the contention raised in the present case that the Ordinary may reject a churchwarden because (however reasonably) he arrives at the conclusion that, from his known character or from his acts, words, or conduct, he is not a fit and proper person. We think that this is the proper meaning of the case itself. It may be further noted that it was decided in 1789 by a very great authority, and that it does not appear from later decisions ever to have been construed in the sense which it is now suggested it might bear. We think for these reasons that the rule should be made absolute. We think, however, that it should be made absolute without costs.

In considering whether articles are "goods" within the meaning of s. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the mere fact of some annexation of the articles to the freehold is not in itself sufficient to convert the articles into realty. The question is purely one of fact and the nature of the article must be looked at.

Cross v. Barnes (1877), 46 L.J.Q.B. 479; 36 L.T. 693; 35 Digest 305, 539.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of ATKIN, J., in an action tried by him without a jury.

Walter Stuart Mitchell, who carried on business as a chemist in premises at Liscard and at Egremont, on Nov. 28, 1912, in consideration of money lent, granted a bill of sale to the plaintiff, a registered moneylender, under which the grantor separately assigned, together with certain furniture, the articles that were the subject-matter of this suit. The bill of sale was duly registered. On Feb. 10, 1913, Mitchell was in default under the bill of sale, and the plaintiff then took possession of the scheduled goods. On Feb. 18, a receiving order was made against Mitchell in respect of an act of bankruptcy prior to Feb. 1, and on Feb. 20 he was adjudicated bankrupt. The defendant was the official receiver and trustee in bankruptcy of Mitchell, and he claimed the articles in question under s. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as being goods in the reputed ownership of Mitchell in his trade or business. Mitchell was tenant of the two premises in question and had placed the articles in his respective shops for the purpose of his business. It was not disputed by the defendant that the articles passed to the plaintiff under the bill of sale, and it was not disputed by the plaintiff that, if they were not fixtures, they were within the apparent order and disposition of Mitchell so as to vest in the defendant on the bankruptcy. The goods had admittedly been disposed of by the defendant in the bankruptcy. The plaintiff sued the defendant for damages for conversion of the articles. ATKIN, J., divided the articles into three classes, and gave judgment for the plaintiff in respect of the third class which he found not to be chattels. There was no dispute as regards the goods in the first class.

but the plaintiff appealed against the judge's findings about the second class, which he held to be chattels.

BUCKLEY, L.J. This is a contest between the grantee of a bill of sale and the official receiver and trustee in bankruptcy of the grantor. The bill of sale was an assignment by way of security of certain things more particularly described in the schedule. ATKIN, J., at the trial divided the disputed articles into three classes, the first being things which, not being annexed at all to the premises, were clearly chattels and passed as such to the trustee in bankruptcy under the order and disposition clause. As to these, there is no appeal. The third class comprised articles which the learned judge held must be deemed not to be chattels, but to be fixtures. As to these, the grantee of the bill of sale is entitled, and in respect of these there is no appeal. But he appeals in respect of the second class, which the learned judge held to be chattels so that they would pass to the trustee in bankruptcy under s. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The items which constitute that class are four in number. The question to be ascertained is whether they were chattels at the relevant date—i.e., at the commencement of the bankruptcy—or fixtures capable of being converted into chattels. If they were the former, the trustee in bankruptcy would be entitled to them: if the latter, they would pass to the holder of the bill of sale.

The items in question are described by the learned judge as follows:

"No. 4, 13 ft. chemist fittings, &c. This was similarly a separate chattel; it was secured to the wall by two wire nails to keep it in position, and the nails could be withdrawn without any injury to the freehold."

If that is right, s. 44 applies. The question, however, is purely one of fact. This chattel stood on the floor, and two nails were used to keep it in position, so that there was only the slightest attachment. ATKIN, J., found that the degree of annexation was the slightest possible, and was only adopted for the more efficient use of the chattel as a chattel. Take the next following item, which the learned judge describes as follows:

"No. 6, counter and show case. This was a separate chattel, resting by its own weight on the ground, except that at the far end from the shop door two 1½ in. wire nails had been driven into the corner in order to secure it. Those nails came out as easily as carpet nails."

This chattel, therefore, stood on the floor, and, in order to keep it in position, two wire nails were used, so that there was only the slightest attachment. The learned judge found that the degree of annexation was only adopted for the more efficient use of the chattels as chattels. With regard to the third item, it is described as "Egremont, No. 3, 10 ft. bottle rack, and so on." The learned judge says:

"This was a separate chattel, but to put it in place it was fastened by a screw to two wall hooks which were fastened into the wall. On unscrewing the chattel from the wall hooks it came away completely, and, in my opinion, the wall hooks themselves could be withdrawn without any injury to the freehold."

It was only necessary to turn the screw to remove the article. The only remaining item was: "No. 9, cupboard hung on the wall, secured by a wall hook as above described." The learned judge says: "This was a separate chattel removable as in No. 3"; so that it was similar to the last described article, inasmuch as it did not rest on the floor, but depended on the attachment to the wall. As I have already said, this seems to me to be purely a question of fact—namely, were these articles so fixed that they were capable of being treated as annexed to the freehold, or were they merely chattels? I think it is plain that the mere fact of some annexation to the freehold is not in itself sufficient to convert a chattel into realty. Carpets are a good instance of this; they cannot be said to be fixtures. So also shop counters resting on the floor which are affixed by nails to the floor; they are not there as fixtures, but as chattels with a certain amount of fixing in order to keep them steady. In my opinion, this is not a case in which we can interfere with the learned judge's findings of fact, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

PICKFORD, L.J. I agree. I think there is no question of principle involved: it is purely a question of fact. I am inclined to think that the three propositions enunciated by counsel for the plaintiff are quite correct, and that the learned judge applied them in the court below. He found that these particular articles in respect of which the appeal is brought never ceased to be chattels. There may be things with only a very slight method of attachment, but the mere slightness or strength of the attachment is not sufficient of itself to decide the question. The nature of the article must be looked at. I am not sure that I should have come to the same conclusion myself if I had been trying the case. It is difficult to see a distinction between a shop counter standing on the floor without nails and a shop counter standing on the floor and affixed with two nails. It was for the learned judge to consider the distinction, and he was in a better position to decide them than we are, and I am not inclined to differ from him as to the facts which he found.

BANKES, L.J.—I agree. The question is whether four articles which were in their nature chattels had for the time being changed their character and become fixtures. That seems to me to be a mixed question of law and fact. I think that if it could have been shown that the learned judge had misdirected himself or had gone wrong in law we might have interfered; but, in my opinion, the learned judge took the correct view and applied the proper test. He considered the character of the articles and the mode and circumstances of the attachment, and came to the conclusion that they were not fixtures. Whether I should on these facts have come to the same conclusion myself is quite immaterial. It must be shown that the learned judge arrived at a wrong conclusion of fact, and I am not satisfied that he did. That being so, in my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Agent—Del credere agent—Sale of goods through agent—Obligation to litigate question arising out of contract—Debt due from buyer—Impossibility of recovery by seller—Liability of agent.

The obligation of a del credere agent on the sale of goods to an unknown buyer does not extend to constitute him a person whom the seller can call on to litigate any question that may arise out of the contract and determine what is due as between the buyer and seller. The obligation does not extend further than that, where there is an ascertained debt due from the buyer to the seller and the buyer fails to pay that amount, either through insolvency or some cause that makes it impossible for the seller to recover, the del credere agent has to answer for that default by reason of his del credere commission, and the obligation which the terms of the commission impose on him.

Appeal from a decision of Pickford, J.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover from the defendants, as del credere brokers, a sum of money reduced by subsequent payments to £170 odd. The matter arose out of a sale by the plaintiffs, who were timber merchants, through the defendants, who were wood brokers, to a firm not at that time disclosed, but who eventually turned out to be Millars' Karri and Jarrah Co., Ltd., a company of considerable importance and unimpeachable solvency, but who were not known to the plaintiffs at the time the contract was made. The defendants gave to the plaintiffs the following sold note:

"Sold for account of Messrs. Thomas Gabriel & Sons to our principals about 380 loads Blackbutt scantlings as per specification at foot at 2s. 9d. per foot cube hundredweight and insurance to London. The scantlings to be of prime quality, straight in the grain, well and truly cut to allow sufficient for possible shrinking in seasoning according to width and thickness, free from least sap wood, reasonably free from gum, veins, stakes, knots, and other defects. Delivery as soon as possible, and to follow on after delivery of 2,000 sets contract of the 7th Feb. 1907. To be paid for by net cash on arrival of each shipment. Any question arising under this contract which cannot be settled by the brokers hereto shall then be submitted to arbitration in the usual manner, Churchill and Sims, brokers. The goods to be at buyers' risk in respect of fire directly they leave the ship's deck. Brokerage and guarantee, 2½ per cent."

The bought note was in these words: "Sold to Messrs. Millars' Karri and Jarrah Company (1902), Ltd., for account of our principals," and then followed the same description of the goods and the same terms, except that it said "Brokerage ½." The notes did not disclose to the plaintiffs the name of the buyers, nor did they disclose to Messrs. Millars' Karri and Jarrah Co. the name of the sellers. The defendants took the brokerage and guaranteed the del credere commission from the plaintiffs in respect of the transaction. The plaintiffs were in default in delivering under the contract, and it was arranged that they should pay a sum of £200 in respect of claims arising out of that delay, and it was also arranged that the plaintiffs would deliver, and the buyers would accept, the balance of the contract under a penalty to be paid by the plaintiffs if they did not deliver the balance on Mar. 1, 1911, the contract having been made in 1908. The contract was varied to that extent, and became a contract by which the plaintiffs agreed to deliver the balance of the goods and agreed to pay a penalty if they were not delivered by Mar. 1, 1911. All the goods were not delivered by Mar. 1, 1911, and the buyers declined to pay to the extent of £250 because, they said, they were entitled, as against the price that might be due for the goods, to set off £250 which was owing on the altered contract by the plaintiffs to them. That dispute having arisen, the names of the buyers were given to the plaintiffs or their solicitors, and the buyers were willing to have the matter settled either by arbitration, according to the contract, or by an agreement to submit a case for the opinion of counsel or some person of standing in the trade. The plaintiffs declined to have that done unless the brokers, the defendants, were made parties to the arbitration or the case. The defendants took up the position that they were not liable personally to the plaintiffs in respect of the performance of the contract.

PICKFORD, J., gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Schiller, K.C., and D. M. Hogg for the plaintiffs.
George Wallace, K.C., and A. H. Chaytor for the defendants.

BUCKLEY, L.J. I think that this appeal fails. For the determination of the case it is not necessary to decide what is the obligation of a del credere agent. It is only necessary to decide negatively that his obligation does not so exist as to constitute him a person with whom a seller may litigate any dispute that arises out of a contract, and determine what is the sum which is due in respect of the contract which is the subject of the del credere agency. The plaintiffs' contention, on the contrary, is raised on Grove v. Dubois (1), on which I will say a word in a moment. The facts are simple. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] It will be noticed from the facts which I have stated that no ascertained sum has been arrived at as between the vendors and vendees what was the amount due. There was a dispute pending as to what was the sum.

The contention before us really is that the vendor is entitled to sue the del credere agent, and to ascertain for the first time in that proceeding what is due, and settle in that proceeding matters in dispute between the vendor and vendee what the amount is. The contention to that effect is raised on what LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., said in Grove v. Dubois (1) (1 Term Rep. at p. 115). His language as to the nature of a del credere contract was:

> "It is an absolute engagement to the principal from the broker and makes him liable in the first instance. There is no occasion for the principal to communicate with the underwriter, though the law allows the principal for his benefit to resort to him as a collateral security. But the broker is liable at all events."

That was language that affirmed that the del credere agent was under an absolute engagement in respect of which he was liable in the first instance; that he was liable, I suppose, for the "performance" of the contract, a word which is found in some of the later cases; that his liability was not confined to a liability to make good the event of insolvency of the buyer or the impossibility of suing the buyer by reason of his being abroad or anything of that kind, but that he was liable as a principal in the matter. From that it would result, I suppose, that, if he were so liable, he would be a sub-seller to the ultimate buyer, and that he would be entitled to retain any profit made on the sub-sale. That, of course, it is inconsistent with the general idea as regards the engagements subsisting as between seller and del credere agent and buyer. LORD MANSFIELD'S language in Grove v. Dubois (1) has been criticised in Morris v. Cleasby (2), Hornby v. Lacy (3), and Couturier v. Hastie (4).

In the first case, Morris v. Cleasby (2), LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., said this (4 M. & S. at p. 575), after reading what I have read from Grove v. Dubois (1):

> "With all the respect which is due to LORD MANSFIELD and those judges, we cannot accede to these propositions thus generally laid down without restriction or qualification. The doctrine contained in them, as so laid down, appears to us to reverse the relative situations of principal and factor and to have a tendency to introduce uncertainty and confusion into the law on this subject."

LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Hornby v. Lacy (3) says (6 M. & S. at p. 171):

> "I own I cannot think that a commission del credere is to have an effect attributed to it beyond that which regards the benefit of the principal who gives the commission. The commission imports, that if the vendee does not pay, the factor will: it is a guarantee from the factor to the principal against any mischief to arise from the vendee's insolvency. But it varies not an iota the rights subsisting between vendor and vendee. A somewhat different doctrine seems to have originated with Grove v. Dubois (1). A kind of magic effect was there given to a commission del credere, changing the relative position of the owner and buyer; and what is reported to have fallen from CHAMBRE, J., in a later case, is referable to the same authority; but this was set right, I think, in the judgment in Morris v. Cleasby (2), which was given after much consideration, and, I may add, with the concurrence of two of our learned brethren on this bench now, unhappily, no more."

I will not refer with particularity to the case of Couturier v. Hastie (4). The decision in Grove v. Dubois (1) is criticised in STORY ON AGENCY, in a note to s. 33, where the learned author says this:

> "It was laid down in Grove v. Dubois (1) that a commission del credere amounts to an absolute engagement to the principal from the factor, and makes him liable in the first instance. But the doctrine of that case on this point seems incorrect. A factor with a del credere commission is liable to the principal, if the buyer fails to pay or is incapable of paying. But he is not primarily the debtor. On the contrary, the principal may sue the buyer in his own name notwithstanding the del credere commission; so that the latter amounts to no more than a guaranty."

I do not propose to travel through any more of the authorities. They have all been most carefully reviewed by PICKFORD, J., in the judgment from which this appeal is brought. The proposition which the learned judge affirms at the end of his judgment seems to me absolutely correct. After pointing out that it is not necessary for him to determine whether the obligation of a del credere agent extends beyond the case of insolvency to a case of inability, by reason of a debtor being beyond the seas or something of that kind, to obtain immediate payment, and that it is not necessary to decide what his obligations are as regards making payment in default of payment by the buyer, he goes on to say this ([1914] 1 K.B. at p. 461):

"I think it is quite clear that it [that is, the obligation of the del credere agent] does not extend to make him the person with whom the seller is entitled, if he wishes, to litigate any disputes that arise out of the contract and ascertain what is due upon it. I think that, according to the authorities, it cannot extend further than that where there is an ascertained amount or certain sum due as a debt from the buyer to the seller, and the buyer fails to pay that amount either through insolvency or something that makes it impossible to recover as in the case of insolvency, the broker has to answer for that default by reason of his having received a del credere commission."

To that I assent. The liability of the del credere agent is a contingent pecuniary liability, not a liability to perform the contract; it is a pecuniary liability to make good the default of the buyer in respect of a pecuniary liability. It does not extend to other obligations of the contract, and it does not expose the del credere agent to an action to ascertain the sum due. On these grounds I think the judgment under appeal is right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

KENNEDY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think, myself, that this is a novel effort, very gallantly made and supported with much care and learning, to put the position of a del credere agent where it has never been before. I think it has always been understood, both by men of commerce and men of law, to have been a liability to be called on to pay the sum when due under a contract to the other contracting party. The case that has been put here is summarised really in his judgment by PICKFORD, J., where he says ([1914] 1 K.B. at p. 454):

"The question which I have to decide is one of principle whether the seller is entitled to call upon the del credere broker to litigate any disputes that may have arisen between the seller and the buyer, and not only to pay an ascertained sum which the buyer has refused to pay, but also to ascertain by setting up the buyers' defences how much is to be paid."

That was what he had to decide, and, in my judgment, he decided it rightly on principle, and rightly on authority.

I cannot help thinking that it would not generally be correct to say that the del credere undertaking or guarantee relates to the solvency of the other contracting party, but I am not going, any more than PICKFORD, J., did, to tie the undertaking down, because I can conceive of a case in which it would be impossible to say that a man, though he was embarrassed, was not able to pay, and though in fact he did not pay a liquidated sum on a particular day, I think it could quite conceivably be right to say that recourse to the agent is within the intention and meaning of the term del credere agency. The seller may say, "You, who have taken the del credere commission, have given me a buyer who does not produce the cash which is unquestionably due to me on a certain day. You say, if I press it he can pay, but the process of squeezing is a difficult one and a troublesome one.

you have agreed that he shall pay that liquidated sum." I am prepared to hold my mind open whether that would not be a perfectly proper case to call on the del credere agent, and I think that that was what was perhaps in the minds of those judges who have not absolutely confined themselves to solvency as the question to be considered, but have also considered performance. At the same time, from such inference as I can draw from one's knowledge and experience of the legal world, I cannot help thinking that the popular view is not far wrong; certainly, if you asked nine people out of ten who were in a position to express an opinion, they would say that it was a guarantee of the solvency of the buyer. LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in Hornby v. Lacy (3), which has been much quoted, says this (6 M. & S. at p. 171):

> "I own I cannot think that a commission del credere is to have an effect attributed to it beyond that which regards the benefit of the principal who gives the commission. The commission imports, that if the vendee does not pay, the factor will."

That, putting it in general terms, would include simply nonpayment, but what he goes on to say in the same sentence, and what I think is the general idea is, "It is a guarantee from the factor to the principal against any mischief to arise from the vendee's insolvency." I do not think that so great a judge—who was then actually discussing a different theory from that from which he was differing, a theory which had the countenance of so great a judge as LORD MANSFIELD, C.J.—would have put that phrase, as he did, in that passage in the commencement of his judgment, if he had not thought as I, following him, think, that the central idea is that "I guarantee to give you a client who can pay when the time comes." But I am not prepared to say that the liability will not go a little further and be, when the sum is ascertained, an undertaking. "If he will not pay, then I am not called upon on my guarantee to pay."

The question that we have heard argued with so much care is a totally different one: Is the agent to be treated as the person who says, "I turn my face to the smiter when the other side, the contracting party, has a number of disputes with you about what is due and what are the terms of the contract; sue me; I take upon myself all the burden of these vexed questions, though I may not even know of the correspondence between you and him. I do not know even the rights of the parties. I cannot say whether he has a good answer to your claim by reason of prior contracts and dealings by set-off or counter-claim." It is impossible, I think, that a business man ordinarily would take such a view, and I do not think that is the view of the law. I am far from saying that you might not have in any given trade or market a custom by which a del credere agent may be made to take on himself a larger liability, and that you might not prove a custom under which the person who says "I am going to do business as the del credere agent" may be holding himself out as a person who undertakes a larger liability; but if I am to construe the term "del credere agent" apart from special custom, apart from usage in a particular market, I do not think that it includes anything like that which it must include in order to justify the success of the plaintiffs in this case.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I agree. It has been said that this point which the learned judge has decided, on which we have heard a good deal of argument, was not the point really raised on the pleadings, and that counsel for the plaintiffs only entered into it in the course of the trial. I am not quite sure how far the point was raised by the pleadings, but, looking to the course of the trial, looking to the correspondence which was put in without objection, I am sure that the point was open to PICKFORD, J., to decide, as he has now decided, namely, whether, on the particular facts of this case—and that is all I am going on—the del credere agent was liable to pay.

If the decision in Grove v. Dubois (1) really established what the position of a del credere agent was, the plaintiffs would be right. A great many people have thought that Grove v. Dubois (1) was right—apparently the current of American decisions is that way. I think, as far as we are concerned in this country, it is pretty well established that Grove v. Dubois (1) went too far. Morris v. Cleasby (2) and Hornby v. Lacy (3) were cited, as PICKFORD, J., said, without disapproval in Couturier v. Hastie (4). No case later in England has been brought to our notice in which any suggestion has been made that the doctrine in Grove v. Dubois (1) was the right view. When you come to consider the matter, if the doctrine of Grove v. Dubois (1) was right, the vendor can sue the del credere agent not merely for the price of the goods but for the refusal of the ultimate vendee to accept, and I find no case in which that view has been accepted. If Grove v. Dubois (1) was put out of the way, then the del credere agent is not responsible as a principal to his vendee; he is responsible only in virtue of the relation which arises between them, namely, that he is an agent for making a contract with some unknown vendor, and also that he guarantees something. What exactly he guarantees I do not propose to say. I think it is quite likely that he does more than guarantee solvency, but I do think that he does not guarantee the performance in such a case as this. He does not guarantee performance where, for instance, the vendee refuses to take delivery, or accept the goods. He does not guarantee performance where the vendee and the vendor have, no doubt through him (because the correspondence all passed through him, and not between the principals direct), made a fresh arrangement. Here the arrangement made was that the vendors were willing to pay a sum of money and that they should enter into a contract with regard to the promptitude of future delivery. The question of construction of that contract may be wrongly raised by the vendee, but from that moment forward the only thing which the vendors could possibly look to the del credere agent for was the assurance that the vendee, when the contract was ultimately fought out with him and these points on the subsequent contract had been raised and determined, would prove solvent. On these grounds, I think this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor—Costs—Agreement—Agreement "respecting the amount and manner of payment"—Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict., c. 28), s. 4.

In June, 1912, C. retained a solicitor to defend him on a charge of embezzlement from his employers. By the retainer C. agreed that the solicitor should receive the proceeds of sale of his furniture to "cover" the charges of his defence. These proceeds were received by the solicitor. After the commencement of the criminal proceedings, a civil action was started against C. by his employers. In July, 1912, C. retained the solicitor to act for him in the civil action and, by this retainer, the solicitor was to receive an inclusive fee of 100 guineas. Some time previously, the solicitor had, with C.'s consent, collected £100 from a debtor of C. C. was convicted in the criminal proceedings and judgment was recovered against him in the civil proceedings. In October, 1912, C. assigned all his real and personal estate to the liquidator of his employers, who, in April, 1914, assigned the estate to the administrator of C.'s property who had been appointed in October, 1913, under the Forfeiture Act, 1870. The administrator sought to have the two retainers set aside under s. 8 of the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870. The master made an order setting them aside and ordering the delivery of a bill of costs for taxation. This order was reversed by the judge at chambers. On appeal to the Divisional Court, the solicitor took a preliminary point that that court had no jurisdiction.

Held: (i) the appeal did not relate to "a matter of practice and procedure" within the Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Act, 1894, s. 1 (4), and, therefore, the Divisional Court had jurisdiction; (ii) the retainer in the criminal proceedings was not an agreement "respecting the amount and manner of payment" of a solicitor's charges within the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870, s. 4, and, therefore, the solicitor must deliver a bill of costs; (iii) the retainer in the civil action must be sent back to the master for inquiry whether there had been "payment"; (iv) although the administrator might not have had a good title to C.'s estates when the summons was issued, at the date of the master's order he had a good title by reason of the assignment to him by the liquidator, and, therefore, he was entitled to maintain the application.

Notes. The Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870, s. 4, has been repealed. See now the Solicitors Act, 1957, s. 59 (37 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1101). The Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Act, 1894, was repealed by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. Appeal from an order made by ATKIN, J., at chambers, reversing an order made by MASTER ARCHIBALD.

In 1912, John Clark, who had been treasurer and cashier of Messrs. Procter & Co., Ltd., corn brokers, Liverpool, was heavily involved owing to speculating in futures on his own account with Messrs. Procter's money. On June 6, 1912, he was arrested and charged with the defalcation of Messrs. Procter's moneys, and at the Liverpool Police Court he instructed Thomas Henry Jackson, the respondent solicitor, to defend him before the Liverpool stipendiary. On June 14, 1912, Clark signed the following retainer to the respondent:

> "I retain and request you to defend me in the criminal proceedings instituted against me by Procter & Co., Ltd., and I agree that you shall receive the net proceeds of sale of my furniture to cover the law charges and disbursements of my defence."

On July 1, 1912, Procter & Co., Ltd., issued a writ against Clark for the recovery of over £89,000 for money had and received to their use; and thereupon Clark, on July 9, signed the following retainer to the respondent.

> "Procters, Ltd. v. Myself.—I request and retain you to act for me as my solicitor in the above action at the inclusive fee of one hundred guineas, such fee to cover all disbursements until final judgment."

At the foot of the retainer of July 9 the respondent signed the following statement: "I accept your retainer and undertake the above defence at the figure stated, which figure I acknowledge to have received." The respondent had, on June 21, collected a sum of £100, which was paid to him by a debtor of Clark's on Clark's authority. Messrs. Procter, after issue of the writ, went into liquidation, and William Harrison Alexander was appointed the liquidator. On Oct. 1, 1912, Clark, in pursuance of an order of BRAY, J., made in the civil proceedings, conveyed to the liquidator his real and personal estate. On Oct. 28, 1912, Clark was put on his trial on the criminal charge at Liverpool Assizes. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to three years' penal servitude. The Secretary of State, by an order dated Oct. 1, 1913, and made under s. 9 of the Forfeiture Act, 1870, appointed the appellant, Thomas Robertson Derham, to be an administrator of the property of Clark. On Oct. 10, 1913, the appellant informed the respondent of his appointment as administrator of Clark's property, and requested him to deliver his bills of costs and statements of account in respect of the matters in which he was concerned in the civil and criminal proceedings. By an indenture made April 1, 1914, between Alexander of the one part and the appellant of the other part Alexander, in consideration of £10 then paid by the appellant to Alexander, assigned to the appellant all the interest (if any) of Alexander in the sums of money in the hands of the respondent and received or collected by him. On April 4, 1914, MASTER ARCHIBALD, on a summons issued by the appellant, ordered that the two agreements of June 14, 1912, and July 9, 1912, should be set aside and cancelled under s. 8 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, and that the respondent should deliver to the appellant a bill of costs in respect of which such agreements were made. Against this order the respondent appealed to the judge in chambers, and, on April 23, 1914, ATKIN, J., ordered that the order made by MASTER ARCHIBALD should be reversed. The appellant appealed.

J. B. Matthews, K.C., and F. Walter Frampton for the administrator, the appellant.

J. H. Layton for the respondent solicitor.

HORRIDGE, J.—In this case, a summons was taken out to set aside two agreements entered into between a client and a solicitor under s. 8 of the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870. An order setting aside the agreements was made by MASTER ARCHIBALD, which was reversed on appeal by the judge in chambers, ATKIN, J. There is now an appeal from the order of the learned judge. A preliminary objection has been taken before us that we have no jurisdiction to hear this appeal as this was a matter of practice and procedure under s. 1 (4) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Act, 1894. It seems to me that the appeal is properly brought here. In Re Marchant (1), the Court of Appeal held that, where an order had been made by a judge in chambers on an originating summons directing a solicitor to pay a sum of money specified in the summons on an undertaking given by him, the matter not being one of practice and procedure in the meaning of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Act, 1894, an appeal lay to the Divisional Court and not directly to the Court of Appeal. Such an order, the court held, is a final and not an interlocutory order. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said ([1908] 1 K.B. at p. 1000):

> "The present proceeding was an originating summons, which raised the question whether an order ought to be made upon a solicitor to pay a sum of money. It is quite plain that the judgment on the originating summons is final, for it is a decision which puts an end to the whole question between the parties whichever way the decision may be; under those circumstances it is primâ facie not a matter of practice and procedure."

If you apply to the present case this judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., and the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Herbert Reeves & Co. (2), the order now before us was a final order. In the latter case, it was held that the order made on a summons taken out by a client, asking for the common order for the delivery and taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs, is a final order. It does not prevent its being final, in VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.'s opinion, that there might be inquiries to be made after the judgment had been delivered, or that there would be taxation and a certificate and, possibly, a review of taxation. Therefore, returning to Re Marchant (1), I find that the order in the present case, being a final order, is not made on a matter of practice and procedure. The order now appealed from is made not in an action, but in virtue of the special jurisdiction of the court under the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870. I think it is covered by the decision in Re Marchant (1) and also by Harby v. Wood Advertising Agency, Ltd. (3). In the latter case, a writ having been issued by a firm of solicitors without authority, one of the partners in the firm was ordered to pay the costs, and an order was made against him for a writ of attachment to issue for nonpayment. The court held, on the authority of Re Marchant (1), that the appeal was not on a matter of practice and procedure, but on a matter arising out of the jurisdiction of the court over solicitors.

My only difficulty has been Re Oddy (4), but that case arose in this way: There was a summons for a review of taxation taken out before a judge in chambers by way of appeal from the taxing master, and this summons was held to be a "matter of practice and procedure," and the appeal, therefore, was to the Court of Appeal. But I think the later cases are so clear that we must follow them, and we have jurisdiction to hear this appeal.

ROWLATT, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the words "matter of practice and procedure" are now understood to refer to interlocutory matters which arise in a cause or matter in the High Court. It is a broad and sensible line of distinction, and most of the cases are consistent with it. Re Marchant (1) was an application to make a solicitor pay a sum of money on his undertaking, and the order of a judge at chambers on such application was held to be a final and not an interlocutory order, and, therefore, not a matter of practice and procedure. In Watson v. Petts (5), the application made to the judge in chambers was not in a cause or matter in the High Court to which it would relate, but had reference to a claim raised in an inferior court; and the decision was that the appeal, therefore, was not in a "matter of practice and procedure" and lay to a Divisional Court and not to the Court of Appeal. Re Oddy (4), looking at it closely, does not seem really inconsistent with the other cases. There was a discussion proceeding in the High Court as to the taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs, and a summons was taken out for a review of the taxation. It seems to me this may quite well be a matter of practice and procedure without in the least going back on the general principle which I think is the right one.

Preliminary objection overruled.

The court proceeded to hear the appeal.

HORRIDGE, J.—This is an appeal from an order of ATKIN, J., reversing a decision of MASTER ARCHIBALD by which he ordered that a bill of costs should be delivered by the solicitor for taxation in the ordinary way, and that the two agreements of June 14, 1912, and July 9, 1912, should be cancelled as if there had been no agreement in writing. The question arises with regard to these two agreements.

Before dealing with the actual facts I wish to refer to the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870. Section 4 enables a solicitor to make an agreement with a client as to any costs for past or future services, but such an agreement must be in writing. Section 8 provides that no action shall be brought on such an agreement, but that every question respecting its effect or validity shall be determined and the agreement enforced or set aside by a court on motion or petition; and by s. 9, if it is set aside, the court or judge has power to order it to be cancelled, and to direct that the costs in respect of the matter included therein be taxed in the same manner as if the agreement had not been made.

In this case, a man named Clark embezzled his employers' money, and the respondent solicitor saw him and obtained from him the retainer dated June 14, 1912. [HIS LORDSHIP read the document and continued:] Is that "an agreement in writing . . . respecting the amount and manner of payment for the whole or any part of any past or future services," within s. 4 of the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870? I do not think it is. It does not refer to the sum of £436 as the amount at which the respondent's charges were to be fixed. If they were more, he would have to pay more; and the £436 is really "cover," to use a well-known expression, and, therefore, no question arises at all under the Act. The result is that the respondent has to deliver a bill of costs. He stands in the position of a solicitor ordered under s. 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, to deliver a bill of costs, and, although the proceedings are not under that Act, strictly speaking, we can order the master's decision to stand as to that too. There is no ground whatever for saying that the bill has been delivered or, therefore, that it has been paid. I think this portion of the master's order directed to the bill of costs must stand.

Proceedings were also taken against Clark in a civil action, and, before those proceedings were taken, a sum of money had been received by the respondent on June 21, 1912, from a Mr. Mathers, who had had dealings with Clark and who owed him £100, and this sum the respondent had collected on behalf of Clark. On July 9, after receiving this money, he got from Clark this document: [HIS LORDSHIP read the document of July 9, 1912]. Counsel for the appellant administrator has not contended that this is not an agreement under the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870, and I think it is such an agreement. At the foot, there is this statement signed by the respondent: "I accept your retainer and undertake the above work at the figure stated, which figure I acknowledge to have received." In his affidavit, he says: "This money was given to me by the said John Clark under the terms of an agreement dated July 9, 1912. . . . I agreed to defend these proceedings, as appears from the said agreement, for the sum of £105, and as a matter of fact I received and accepted the said sum of £100." That allegation is not specifically denied in the affidavit filed by Clark and his wife in reply, but Clark says: "I did not pay the £100 to [the respondent] as he states. I had told him that a Mr. Mathers owed me over £100. Without my knowledge [the respondent] saw Mr. Mathers and got the money from him direct. [The respondent] afterwards told me he had received it." Clark was cross-examined on his affidavit before the master, and he said: "I did not agree to pay £105; it was only to protect him. Tuback, [the respondent's] managing clerk, said they would take the cost of the court proceedings out of the £100 (Mathers')." It may be said that he denied that he agreed to pay £100 for the costs in the civil proceedings, and that the respondent took £100 in settlement; but we think it well to give the respondent an opportunity of going before the master to say whether this is so. The master must inquire what this agreement means. The object is to show that it is relied on as proving that the man who made it brought to mind his prior agreement to pay a lump sum, and so he ratified this agreement by paying £100 in discharge of £105. I do not think it would do if he paid £100 on £105, which leaves a balance of £5, and does not say what portion of the bill was to be a matter of taxation. If there has been no payment in regard to the civil proceedings, the agreement of July 9 must be declared void, and a bill must be delivered for taxation.

A further point was taken on behalf of the respondent. After Clark had been arrested and before his trial, when these proceedings were commenced, the right in respect of s. 8 of the Act of 1870 had vested in Mr. Alexander, the liquidator of Messrs. Procters. Counsel for the appellant contended that the right of reviewing an agreement and obtaining a bill of costs for taxation is not a chose in action. I am not going to trouble about this, because, before the summons was heard—namely, on April 18, 1914—a re-assignment was made; and, therefore, whatever had been the case at the commencement of the action, the rights transferred by the original assignment had been re-transferred.

The order of the master must be restored as regards the criminal retainer of June 14, 1912, and the respondent must deliver a bill of costs for taxation. With regard to the civil retainer of July 9, 1912, it must be referred back to the master to find if there has been payment, and, if not, his order must be restored.

ROWLATT, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first answer made to this application by the respondent was that the rights of Clark were assigned to the liquidator between the commission of the offence and the conviction. If the right passed to the liquidator, it was assigned back before the date of the master's order. It seems to me that, if the court at the time it makes the order for taxation and repayment has before it the proper party to receive the fund, it can and ought to make the order. If counsel for the appellant is correct in suggesting that the right to take out the summons did not pass to the liquidator—and I do not think this is absolutely clear—I am not prepared to say that it did not pass to the appellant under the Forfeiture Act, 1870. I am prepared to say that he is a "person chargeable" within the Solicitors Act, 1843, because he really has all the property of the client out of which the payment or charge has to be made, and in respect of which he has been charged.

As to the effect of the criminal retainer, it is no agreement at all. The civil retainer is not so clear, and it should go back to the master to find whether there was a "payment" in fact. The question then arises what "payment" means. It means that the transaction is closed, and that both parties agreed that £100 was to be the actual sum the respondent was to be paid under the retainer. If one of the parties "pays himself" with money in his hands, it must be by mutual agreement, and he must not, if he has money in his hands, simply perform a unilateral operation by deducting a sum of money without any such agreement. The master must find whether or not the £100 was paid and accepted with the intention of satisfying that sum of 100 guineas under the retainer.

Appeal allowed.

Highway—Access—Premises abutting on highway—Advertisements on wall—Right of owner to access to repair wall and exhibit advertisements on it.

The plaintiff and the defendant occupied adjoining premises abutting on a public highway. The side wall of the defendant's premises protruded beyond the frontage of the plaintiff's premises, and the defendant used this wall for displaying advertisements. The plaintiff affixed advertisement boards to his premises in such a way as to conceal from the public view the defendant's advertisements and to obstruct his access to the wall from the highway for the purpose of repairing it. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendant for a trespass the plaintiff's claim was admitted, but the defendant counter claimed, inter alia, for an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from continuing the board, or otherwise obstructing his (the defendant's) access to his property.

Held: the owner of premises abutting on the highway had a private right of access to the wall of the premises and to display advertisements on the wall; the plaintiff had obstructed these rights of the defendant; and, therefore, the defendant was entitled to the injunction asked for.

Action tried by ROWLATT, J., without a jury.

The plaintiff was the freehold owner in occupation of No. 33, King Street, Margate. The defendant was the leasehold tenant of No. 35, the premises being adjoining. There was a space of some inches between the adjacent side walls. The frontage line of No. 35 was set forward on the footway 18 in. in advance of the frontage line of No. 33. In consequence, the side wall of No. 35 adjacent to No. 33 protruded beyond the frontage line of No. 33 and at right angles to it for a like distance of 18 in. In 1897, the defendant entered into the employ of the then tenant of No. 35, one Philpott, who was in the habit of pasting bills advertising his goods on this portion of the side wall. In 1900, the defendant bought from Philpott the business and the lease of the premises. The defendant thereupon removed the bills and exhibited his own name which was painted up. In 1910, strained relations between the plaintiff and the defendant, which had been in existence for some time, culminated in a quarrel, and shortly afterwards the plaintiff caused to be fixed on the front of his premises an advertisement board which, standing out at right angles to his front, completely obscured from view the defendant's name on the protruding side wall. The defendant pasted bills higher up on the wall so as to be above the advertisement board, but within a few weeks the plaintiff had a second board affixed directly above the first, which had the effect of totally concealing these bills. In October, 1913, the plaintiff removed the boards for the purpose of repainting his premises, and the defendant immediately made use of the protruding side wall for advertising some goods, namely, fireworks, of which, owing to the time of year, he was making a special feature in his business. Some of the plaintiff's employees washed these bills off, but the plaintiff said that the men were acting without his authority and made some apology. The plaintiff replaced the boards in the same position as before, and the defendant pasted on the lower one bills similar to those which had been washed off the wall by the plaintiff's employees. The plaintiff commenced an action claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant from committing any trespass on the lower board and an order for the removal of the defendant's advertisements thereon. The defendant apologised for the trespass on the board, undertook not to repeat it, and paid a sum of money into court. This was accepted by the plaintiff who was given leave to sign judgment on the terms of the undertaking with costs, but the defendant was given time to deliver a counterclaim. By his counterclaim, the defendant claimed damages for trespass for the removal of his bills from the wall by the plaintiff's employees, a declaration that the boards constituted a nuisance, an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from continuing the boards or otherwise obstructing the defendant's access to his property, and an order for the removal of the boards.

ROWLATT, J.—This case raises an interesting point on which I have heard very excellent argument. I do not feel any difficulty about it any longer. The facts are these: [His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:] I shall assume for the purposes of my judgment that No. 33 carries the title to the sub-soil of the piece of pavement which runs into that corner, for, on the view of the locality, it looks as though the piece of pavement was substantially the frontage of No. 33 and not of No. 35. The plaintiff says that he is entitled to maintain the boards there, at any rate, subject to some qualifications. What is the right that he claimed at the time that the counter-claim was launched on Feb. 10? About that time his solicitor was writing to the defendant's solicitor in reference to a suggestion made by them that the defendant was about to alter his premises and make an entrance at the corner of his premises adjoining No. 33, and, therefore, would require the removal of the boards. The plaintiff's solicitor wrote on Feb. 9:

> "If the boards have to be removed, they cannot be down indefinitely unless, of course, their reinstatement would constitute a breach of some legal right of your client which at present they do not."

Therefore, on that occasion, the plaintiff was not saying: "If you do put the door there I will still prevent your going out of it"; but he was saying: "The boards will be reinstated if they do not constitute an infringement of your legal right which they do not at present. They will have to go back there unless they obstruct an entrance." Therefore, I do not deal with this action on the evidence that the plaintiff was threatening to obstruct egress from any door on these premises. It would be much easier if I could, because it is quite clear that he could not obstruct the defendant in that way. But what does he claim? He claims in the first place to maintain these boards there so that the defendant cannot display anything he likes on the wall. And, secondly, that he will only take the boards down at reasonable times and on reasonable notice that the defendant wants to come there to repair his wall or for any other purpose.

That raises the question what is the right of the plaintiff in respect of this wall adjacent to the highway. I am of opinion that counsel for the defendant has made out his case as regards this. He says that there is an invasion here of a right which belongs to the defendant, a private right in respect of his contiguity to the public road. It is well settled by many cases that the owner of land bordering on a highway has a private right of passing from his premises on to the highway, and that, if he sues for obstruction of that right, he is not in the position of a member of the public suing for an obstruction of the highway which specially affects him, but is simply suing for an obstruction of his private right. No authority has been produced to say so precisely, but I am of the opinion that the owner of premises abutting on the highway has precisely the same right in respect of a wall as he has of a door. Whether he wants to come to the wall to do anything to it, or whether he wants to display anything on the wall for the purpose of advertisement, I certainly hold he has a right to do both these things, and that, if either of these rights is invaded, an action by him lies. Take the case of a man who has a shop window in which his wares are displayed for sale or, what is practically the same thing, of a man who, instead of a window, has a wall on which pictures or advertisements of his wares which are for sale are displayed. In either case it is to his interest that the public on the road should be able to look into his window or on his wall, as the case may be. It seems to me that he has a right which is invaded if the public are prevented from so doing. To my mind it would be quite unthinkable to suppose that a person could come and hold up a screen in front of a man's shop window or advertisement hoarding so that the public could not look on it, and then say: "I have invaded no right of yours because I have not prevented you coming out of your house or anyone going into it." It seems to me that it is quite impossible that that could be the law, and I think that the defendant is entitled to succeed on the counterclaim. I shall, therefore, enter judgment for the defendant on the counterclaim.

Judgment for defendant on counterclaim.

WIFFEN v. BAILEY AND OTHERS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Buckley, Phillimore and Pickford, L.JJ.), November 17, 18, 1914]

Malicious Prosecution—"Prosecution"—Complaint before justices—Public health —Nuisance—Failure to comply with abatement notice—Complaint by local authority against plaintiff—Dismissal by justices—Matters to be proved by plaintiff in action for malicious prosecution.

The plaintiff, occupier of a house, having made default in complying with a notice to abate a nuisance, was brought before justices on a complaint made by the sanitary inspector on the instructions of the local authority. The justices dismissed the complaint, and awarded the plaintiff 5 guineas costs. In fact the plaintiff had incurred further costs in connection with his defence as between solicitor and client. In an action for malicious prosecution brought by the plaintiff against the inspector and the local authority,

Held: the action would not lie because the plaintiff had not proved (i) that, owing to the nature of the proceedings taken against him, damage to his fame, as if the matter of which he had been accused was scandalous, had resulted, nor (ii) that his life, limb or liberty had been endangered, although, if he had been fined and failed to pay the fine, he might have been imprisoned, nor (iii) pecuniary damage, for the difference between solicitor and client costs and party and party costs was not legal damage.

Appeal by defendants from a decision of HORRIDGE, J., on further consideration of an action tried by him with a jury, reported [1914] 2 K.B. 5.

An action for malicious prosecution was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants, who were respectively the sanitary inspector for the Romford Urban District Council, and the council. Some of the rooms of the house occupied by the plaintiff at Romford were in a dirty condition, and the plaintiff's wife wrote to the sanitary inspector inviting him to inspect the premises, and requesting his assistance in compelling the landlord to clean and repair them. The sanitary inspector accordingly came and viewed the premises, and, having done so, served on the plaintiff a notice under s. 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875 [see now s. 93 of Public Health Act, 1936], to the effect that the condition of the premises amounted to a nuisance, and requiring him to abate it. The plaintiff failed to comply with the notice, alleging that, if a nuisance existed, it was the duty of his landlord to abate it, and the sanitary inspector, upon the instructions of the Romford Urban District Council, preferred a complaint against the plaintiff, under s. 95 of the Public Health Act, 1875 [s. 94 of the Act of 1936], to compel him to abate the nuisance. The justices dismissed the complaint and awarded the plaintiff £5 5s. costs. In addition to this sum, the plaintiff had incurred further costs to the extent of £5 15s. as between solicitor and client in defending himself. The plaintiff brought the present action against the defendants, alleging that he had suffered damage by being injured in his reputation, and by having been put to expense in defending himself against the proceedings taken against him. The jury found (i) that the defendants did not take reasonable care to inform themselves of the true facts of the case; (ii) they did not believe the case as laid before the justices; (iii) they were induced by indirect motive in preferring the charge; (iv) the defendant Bailey was not acting bonâ fide under the directions of the defendant council for the purpose of executing the Act of Parliament; (v) the necessary and natural consequence of the prosecution was to damage the plaintiff's fair fame. They awarded the plaintiff £250 damages as against the defendant council only. HORRIDGE, J., ruled that the defendants had no reasonable and probable cause for taking the proceedings, and gave judgment for the plaintiff against both defendants as joint tortfeasors. The defendants appealed.

By s. 95 of the Public Health Act, 1875:

"If the person on whom a notice to abate a nuisance has been served makes default in complying with any of the requisitions thereof within the time specified . . . the local authority shall cause a complaint relating to such nuisance to be made before a justice, and such justice shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the person on whom the notice was served to appear before a court of summary jurisdiction."

By s. 96:

"If the court is satisfied that the alleged nuisance exists . . . the court shall make an order on such person requiring him to comply with all or any of the requisitions of the notice, or otherwise to abate the nuisance within a time specified in the order, and to do any works necessary for that purpose. The court may by their order impose a penalty not exceeding £5 on the person on whom the order is made. . . ."

Compston, K.C., and H. Maddocks for the defendants.—The action was not maintainable as the plaintiff has not suffered such damage as will support an action for malicious prosecution under the three heads laid down by HOLT, C.J., in Savile v. Roberts (2), for there is no damage to the plaintiff's reputation, or his liberty, or his property. It is true that an indictment will often, though not always, involve damages of this nature—but the charge must be such as is prejudicial to the reputation of the person charged. An action, it is submitted, would not be maintainable in respect of a false indictment for non-repair of a highway, or for an offence punishable, as here, only by fine, unless it involved some serious imputation on the plaintiff's fair fame. In Rayson v. South London Tramways Co. (1) it was held that proceedings taken under s. 51 of the Tramways Act, 1870, were proceedings in respect of a criminal offence, so that an action for malicious prosecution would lie against the persons taking them; but there, although the punishment was limited to a fine, the offence charged imputed grave dishonesty to the plaintiff. In Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre (3) it was held that an action would lie for falsely and maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause, presenting a petition under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, to wind-up a trading company, even though no pecuniary loss or special damage resulted to the company, but there the presentation of the petition was specially calculated to injure the credit of the company. In the present case the prosecution threw no discredit on the fair fame of the plaintiff, for he was liable to be served with the notice merely as occupier, and the condition of the premises, if they had been insanitary, might well have been no fault of his. Secondly, the plaintiff's liberty was not endangered; it is true that he might eventually have been fined, and, in default of distress, been imprisoned, but the imprisonment would have been merely the consequence of the default of distress, and the danger to liberty was not of the nature contemplated by HOLT, C.J., in Savile v. Roberts (2). There was no evidence of malice or of an absence of reasonable and probable cause. Further, the finding of the jury was against the weight of the evidence, and the damages were excessive.

G. W. H. Jones and A. Crew for the plaintiff.—The offence charged was criminal in its nature. The charge also involved damage to the plaintiff's fair fame and liberty. An action for malicious prosecution lies for any charge that involves damage. Here the charge was criminal and involved damage, and that is all the plaintiff had to prove. It is immaterial that the damage to reputation might be insufficient to support an action for slander; it is sufficient that the charge was such as to hold the plaintiff up to hatred, contempt, or ridicule, and to say that a man is living in a house no decent man would live in, and that he is responsible for that state of things, is an imputation on his fair name. Secondly, the plaintiff's liberty was endangered, for he might have been fined, and, in default of distress, have been imprisoned, and the imprisonment would have resulted from the charge. The offence charged here is criminal in its nature, and, although it is liable to be punished only by fine in the first place and not by imprisonment, yet the charge will support an action for malicious prosecution. There was evidence of malice, and of an absence of reasonable and probable cause, and the damages in the circumstances were reasonable.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—In this action the plaintiff sues for damages for malicious prosecution. The defendants in the action are two—George Randall Bailey, who was the inspector of nuisances of the Romford Urban District Council, and the Romford Urban District Council, who are his co-defendants. The origin of the action was this. The plaintiff and his wife—being occupiers of a house, No. 48, Western Road, Romford—the wife, on April 1, 1913, wrote a letter addressed to the sanitary inspector complaining that the sewerage had been through the larder of their house five times, that the larder was never repaired and was in a terrible state, and that one of the ceilings was going. She asked the inspector to come to their assistance. The result was that Mr. Bailey went within a couple of hours of the receipt of the letter, and examined the house. On April 3 he wrote a letter, and at the same time served a notice. The notice was under the Public Health Act, 1875, addressed to Ashby Wiffen, that is, the husband, the occupier of No. 48, Western Road, Romford, and stated that the council, being satisfied of the existence of a nuisance at the house, arising from the want of cleansing of the two front rooms, ground floor, the kitchen, passage, pantry, and bathroom, required that within twenty-one days from the service of the notice the same be abated. The works required are described as

> "to strip paper off walls of front rooms, kitchen, passage, and bathroom, and cleanse and distemper ceilings and walls of front rooms, kitchen, pantry, passages, and bathroom, and cleanse and distemper ceilings of front bedrooms."

I need only particularly refer to the one item of the pantry on which some question has arisen. When Mr. Bailey, the inspector of nuisances, gave that notice, he had not received from the council authority to give it. As a result of it certain repairs were done. The landlord instructed a Mr. Dowsing, who was a member of the council, and who was in the chair at the meeting I am going to mention presently, to do the repairs with regard to the pantry, and the pantry repairs were done some time before, I think, April 24 or 25.

In that state of facts on April 25 Mr. Bailey reported to the general purposes committee of the defendant council in these terms:

> "48, Western Road. In consequence of complaint I visited the above premises on the 1st inst., and on the 3rd inst. notice was served on the occupier requiring him within a period of twenty-one days to strip the paper off the walls of the two front rooms, kitchen, passage, and bathroom, and to cleanse and distemper the ceilings and walls of the said rooms, passage and kitchen, these being in a very dirty condition. The notice has not yet been complied with, and I ask you to confirm the notice and give instructions for the necessary proceedings to compel compliance."

This was the first moment at which the matter had come before the council, or the committee of the council, as distinguished from Bailey, the sanitary inspector. That being before them on April 25, this recommendation was made by the general purposes committee:

> "That the notice served upon the occupier of 48, Western Road to cleanse the premises in his occupation be confirmed, and that the necessary proceedings be taken to enforce such notice unless the same is duly complied with."

A On May 21 a summons was issued. It recited the notice at length, including the pantry, and then it says:

> "These are further to command you to appear at the police court before the justices to answer to the said information and to be further dealt with according to law."

B So that the summons set out the notice, including the pantry, and called upon the party to attend before the justices and answer to the information which said that he had not done the works which were required in the notice. On May 29 that summons was heard before the justices, and they dismissed it and ordered the payment of 5 guineas costs to the plaintiff.

C On June 18 the writ was issued in the present action for damages for malicious prosecution. The action was tried on Dec. 19 and resulted in certain findings of the jury, to which I will refer presently, and judgment for a sum of £250 damages given against both the council and Bailey. The questions which have been argued before us are three. First, was this action under the circumstances maintainable at all? That is the question which I propose first to discuss. An action for malicious prosecution will lie under circumstances which were stated by

D LORD HOLT in Savile v. Roberts (2). HOLT, C.J., there says (12 Mod. Rep. 208):

> "There are three sorts of damages, any one of which is sufficient to support this action. First, damage to his fame, as if the matter whereof he be accused be scandalous. Secondly, to his person, whereby he is imprisoned. Thirdly, to his property, whereby he is put to charges and expenses."

E The principle upon which the action is maintainable is that it falls within some one of those three heads. An action for malicious prosecution is not confined to the case of criminal proceedings. It may extend to civil proceedings, but, as was pointed out by BOWEN, L.J., in Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre (3), it is in very few cases that an action for malicious prosecution will lie where the matter be one in civil proceedings, and the lord justice gave this reason for it (11 Q.B.D.

F at pp. 689–690):

> "It is clear that HOLT, C.J., considered one of those three heads of damage necessary to support an action for malicious prosecution. To apply this test to any action that can be conceived under our present mode of procedure and under our present law, it seems to me that no mere bringing of an action,

G although it is brought maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, will give rise to an action for malicious prosecution. In no action, at all events in none of the ordinary kind, not even in those based upon fraud where there are scandalous allegations in the pleadings, is damage to a man's fair fame the necessary and natural consequence of bringing the action. Incidentally matters connected with the action, such as the publication of the proceedings

H in the action, may do a man an injury; but the bringing of the action is of itself no injury to him. When the action is tried in public, his fair fame will be cleared, if it deserves to be cleared; if the action is not tried, his fair fame cannot be assailed in any way by the bringing of the action."

So the reason of the exception of civil proceedings is that in civil proceedings the

I poison and the antidote are presented simultaneously—the man is never injured because the publicity of the proceedings is accompanied by the refutation of the charge which is made against him. If there be no scandal, if there be no danger of imprisonment, if there be no damage, the action will not lie. I think MANSFIELD, C.J., said as much as that in Byne v. Moore (4), for he says this (5 Taunt. at p. 191):

> "I feel a difficulty to understand how the plaintiff could recover in the present action, wherein he could recover no damages, because he clearly has not proved that he has sustained any [damage]. I can understand the ground upon which an action shall be maintained for an indictment which contains scandal, but this contains none, nor does any danger of imprisonment result from it; this bill was a piece of mere waste paper."

So that what one has to examine for the purpose of seeing whether the action will lie is this: Is there, within the first head, scandal—damage to fame? Is there, within the second head, danger of imprisonment? Or is there, within the third head, damage? Now damage here is out of the question; there is no pecuniary damage whatever. There is no damage to the plaintiff; I need not say that although he only recovered 5 guineas for his costs, and his costs, no doubt, were larger, the difference between solicitor and client costs and party and party costs is not legal damage, so that there is no damage at all, and the action must fail under that head.

Does it fall under the second, damage to his person whereby he is imprisoned? Upon that the matter stands thus. The proceeding was under the Public Health Act, 1875. The result, if the summons had succeeded, would have been that a fine would have been imposed; if that fine had not been paid Jervis' Act would apply, a warrant of distress would be issued, and in default of assets found under the distress for satisfaction of the fine the man could be imprisoned, and in that sense the summons might have resulted in imprisonment; in no other sense could it result in imprisonment. It seems to me that that certainly does not satisfy the second head. Imprisonment is not any test of whether a matter is criminal or not. Almost any proceeding may result in imprisonment. A common action of debt resulting in a judgment or order for payment by instalments resulting in imprisonment under the Debtors Act does not. Because a proceeding may ultimately result in imprisonment, it does not mean that it is one to satisfy LORD HOLT'S second head of injury to the person whereby he is imprisoned, for he is not imprisoned by virtue of the proceedings. Imprisonment is only an ultimate result which may result from his not complying with the obligations upon him to pay the money. For these reasons it does not fall under LORD HOLT'S second head.

It remains for consideration whether it falls under the first head. Did the summons result in injury to the plaintiff's fame, as if the matter whereof he be accused be scandalous? It seems to me, referring to what BOWEN, L.J., says, that it is necessary to show that damage to his fair fame is the necessary and natural consequence of bringing the action. You must show that injury to his reputation necessarily and naturally results from the proceeding which has been taken. How does the matter stand with regard to that? It is said that this is a criminal proceeding. I agree in a sense it is a criminal proceeding. It is a proceeding to impose a fine for failure to comply with a statutory obligation; it might have been a common law obligation resulting in a common law liability, or it might be a statutory obligation resulting in a statutory liability. Whether it be either the one or the other, it is, in a sense, I agree, criminal, for instance, as was held in R. v. Whitchurch (5), it may be in a criminal cause or matter so as not to be appealable, but that does not determine it at all. In Rayson v. South London Tramway Co. (1) it was held that an action for malicious prosecution would lie. That case, in my opinion, is entirely distinguishable. What was imputed there by the prosecution was that the man was a cheat, that he had got into a tramcar with intent to avoid payment of his fare. That was a breach of a statutory obligation, but the imputation upon him there was that he was a common cheat, that his intention was to escape a liability, and ride in a tramcar without paying his fare. It appears to me that that is no authority in the present case. The matter, therefore, I agree, is, in a sense a criminal one.

That, however, does not conclude the question. I have to see whether the imputation which was conveyed by these proceedings was one which naturally and

A necessarily affected the plaintiff's fair fame. Of course, there are many proceedings, e.g., for obstructing a highway, or, as was put in one of the cases, for keeping a pig in an improper place, which may be made the subject of proceedings, and which, in the sense in which I have used the word, are criminal, but no one could say a man's fair fame is affected because he was summoned for keeping a pig in an improper place, or because he allowed his dog to leave his house after nightfall B without a muzzle. There is no imputation against fair fame at all in such a case; you have to look at the reason of the proceedings to see whether they necessarily or naturally impute misconduct, and affect the defendant's fair fame, and causes damage to his fair fame. What was it that was said here? It was said that these people were occupiers of a house, and that the house was, in certain respects, not in such repair as was necessary for the purpose of health under the Public Health C Act, and that notice was served on the occupier. Let us look at s. 94 of the Act, and see what it is:

> "On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance the local authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or con- D tinues, or if such person cannot be found, on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises."

So a notice of this sort may be served upon a person who is not responsible in the smallest degree for the state of repairs in which the premises are found. He may have gone into occupation the day before, or the week before, and the circumstances may be such that he is properly served because the person by whose act, default, E or sufferance the nuisance arises, or continues, cannot be found. How can the serving of a notice in such circumstances affect his fair fame? There is no evidence to show that these proceedings, originating in the act of the plaintiffs themselves writing the letter of April 1 affected their fair fame in any respect. It seems to me that under these circumstances the plaintiffs have not succeeded in showing that the circumstances were such as that any one of LORD HOLT'S three heads F under which the action is maintainable is satisfied. For these reasons I think this action fails, and cannot be maintained.

At this point I might stop, because that disposes of the case, but I want to say that the jury have arrived at certain findings as to which, I think, there is very good reason to say they were against the weight of evidence, and, beyond that, it appears to me that they were quite inconsistent findings. What they found G was that neither of the defendants took reasonable care to inform themselves of the true state of the case. All that can be said about that is that when the general purposes committee met they acted upon the report of their sanitary inspector, Mr. Bailey, without any notice that his report was not a proper one, and that they did not ask for the notice and find that there had been this pantry included in the notice, and that the report did not go to show that H the pantry still wanted to be attended to. To my mind, there is nothing at all in that. The pantry had been done in the interval, and, therefore, the requirement to comply with the notice would have been met by showing that the pantry had already been done, and the obligation was to do what remained. Then the jury went on to find that the defendants did not, nor did either of them, honestly believe the case they laid before the magistrate. With very great respect I do not I find any evidence in support of that. There is nothing to impeach the honesty of the defendants in the matter. Bailey went and reported. He may have made a mistake, and, having regard to the result of the summons, I suppose I must say he did make a mistake, but there is nothing to attack his honesty, and the council themselves, acting upon Bailey's report, so far as it appears, were acting perfectly honestly. All that is said to the contrary of that is that Dowsing, who had done the repairs to the pantry, was in the chair on April 25. He was one of a very much larger body; a body who, with or without the assistance of Dowsing, had a right to act in the matter. The jury then found that the defendants were, both of them, actuated by an indirect motive in preferring the charge. They found that Bailey, under the direction of the council, was not acting bonâ fide for the purpose of executing the Act, and then they went on to find that it was a necessary and natural consequence of the prosecution to damage the plaintiff's fair fame. Upon that I have said what I have to say, so that, even if I were not of opinion that the action was not maintainable, I should have thought that the verdict could not stand as it was against the weight of evidence.

The third point is in regard to the damages. The damages were assessed at £250, and I do not see anything to justify such a figure as that. Not only so, but the jury found damages against the defendant council, and not against Bailey—that is to say, they must, I suppose, have absolved Bailey from having taken any part in a proceeding wrongful towards the plaintiff which exposed him to damages, and yet they had found that Bailey was not acting bonâ fide for the purpose of executing the Act. How those answers can be reconciled I do not know. The result of the argument upon further consideration was that a judgment was given both against the council, against whom the jury had found a verdict, and against Bailey, against whom they said they did not find a verdict. That, again, I should have thought it was impossible to sustain. However, I rest my judgment on that on which I first expressed my opinion—the action is not maintainable at all. In the circumstances in my judgment the appeal must be allowed, and the action be dismissed with costs.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I agree. I take it that this was a criminal prosecution, or a prosecution in a criminal matter, but that is not sufficient to support an action for malicious prosecution. The three canons laid down by LORD HOLT in Savile v. Roberts (2) have been accepted. They were especially referred to by BOWEN, L.J., in Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre (3), and the three canons, or conditions, of such an action are that there must be damage to the plaintiff's fame as if the matter whereof he is accused be scandalous; damage to his person as where a man is put in danger to lose his life or limb or liberty; and damage to his property as when he is forced to expend his money in necessary charges to acquit himself of the crime of which he is accused. That was held to be the case in Savile v. Roberts (2) and, therefore, in that case the action was held to lie. Dealing with the last point, the only charges here are the difference between the costs allowed the plaintiff by the magistrate and his possible additional costs in defending this action, and, at any rate, as far as this court is concerned, we are bound to hold, and I see no reason to differ from it, that those are not legal damages.

Then was this a case where the plaintiff was put in danger to lose his life or limb or liberty? In my view, it was not. It is quite true that if, upon the hearing of the summons, an order had been made against him, and if he had been fined and ordered to pay costs, or ordered to pay costs, and did not pay, in the absence of sufficient distress found upon his premises he might have been sent to prison, but that very remote consequence of prison is not the kind of danger to life or limb or liberty to which LORD HOLT was referring in Savile v. Roberts (2). Many civil actions even now, and most civil actions before the Act for the abolition of imprisonment for debt, might end in restraint of a man's liberty if he either could not, or would not, pay damages, or the amount of the debt and the costs awarded against him. That has never been considered as sufficient to support a suggestion that the man's liberty is put in peril. Every case where an injunction is obtained against an individual might lead to a motion for committal for contempt, and to the defendant being sent to prison. The analogy of actions for slander is, BOWEN, L.J., says in the case I have referred to, very close. I do not say that Ogden v. Turner (6) and Hellwig v. Mitchell (7) show that, though an action for slander will lie where the words are such as to impute a crime, that word "crime" must be specially defined and restricted, and mean the kind of crime which will end in

A imprisonment, and not the kind of crime which will only end in a fine, though that fine can, like every debt to the King, be enforced by restraint of the person. Therefore I think that condition is not satisfied. Then comes the remaining cause, damage to a man's fame as if the matter whereof he is accused is scandalous. In the report of Savile v. Roberts (2) at 1 LORD RAYMOND 374 the same, in substance, appears. LORD HOLT says there is no scandal in the crime for which the B plaintiff in the original action was indicted. He was indicted on two indictments for having, on two separate days, with a number of other persons, riotously assembled and stopped with posts, fences, and bars a road which belonged to the prosecutor Savile, and which he used for carrying his tithes of grain and hay. I do not know exactly what facts were proved under that case, but LORD HOLT says, very summarily, that there was no scandal in the crime for which he was C indicted. It seems to me that what one must look at is not what might be proved in the course of a prosecution, but what is enough to support a conviction upon the information or indictment laid, and if it will be enough to support a conviction upon the information and indictment that the defendant has done something which does not injure his fair fame, no scandal is involved in the prosecution.

In this case the only complaint is, that being the occupier of premises, and D having had a notice served upon him to strip off paper, and cleanse in other ways those premises, he has not, within twenty-one days complied. It does not follow that he is responsible for the condition of dirt in the premises; nor that he has been responsible for any appreciable time. It is merely that, in the absence of any other person obviously responsible, he has, under s. 94 of the Public Health Act, been served, as being the occupier. It seems to me it would be going far too far to E say that that kind of prosecution involves a scandal. In this connection I would refer to two cases which have been cited, Byne v. Moore (4) and Freeman v. Arkell (8). I am aware that probably in both those cases the matter on which the case was finally tried was the presentment of a bill of indictment which the grand jury ignored, so that it never ripened into an indictment. I do not think that makes any difference. In some way it operates more favourably for the person com- F plaining of malicious prosecution, because the antidote which BOWEN, L.J., speaks of can never be applied because the defendant to the indictment is never put upon his defence, his bill having been thrown out by the grand jury. Be that as it may, in those cases, though the procedure had reached a much earlier stage, and never gone further, the courts treated the rule about scandal as equally apply- G ing, and they said that the charges in those cases, one of which was a charge of assault, were not such as necessarily to involve scandal.

No doubt in this connection one has to consider Rayson v. South London Tramway Co. (1). I quite agree that there is a general language in the course of the judgment delivered on behalf of the court by the Master of the Rolls which seems to eliminate the question of scandal altogether, but one must remember what was H the point to which the court was addressing itself, and what was the only point to which the argument of the unsuccessful appellants was addressed. It was not contended, and, of course, could not be contended, that the prosecution did not involve the fair fame of the defendant, because it was a charge of cheating. The only successful point that could be taken was that it was not a criminal prosecution, and it is to that to which the argument addressed itself, and it is to that to I which the judgment applied. It may be unfortunate that it did not occur to some member of the court that a cautela should be inserted with regard to the special circumstances of the case. When one reads the report one sees that the point of scandal was not present to the mind of the court, because it was a point of no importance in that case. If it was a criminal prosecution, then it was a scandalous criminal prosecution. I think it is extremely likely that the word "scandal," at any rate at the time of LORD HOLT, had a very technical meaning. It was during the days of the action or proceeding which appears to be criminal as well as civil, called scandalum magnatum, and during the time when I have the authority of LORD ELDON for saying (it is as old as TYTHERIDGE's reports) that exceptions for scandal in an answer was a known proceeding in the Court of Chancery. Be that as it may, either the word "scandal" meant a technical scandal which was then known to the law, in which case this Case does not come within it, or it meant, as, I think, the later cases show, something derogatory to the fair fame of the person prosecuting, as to which, guided by the decisions and applying one's own common sense, I should say that there was no imputation in this case.

I do not think it necessary to refer at greater length to the decision in Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre (3). That, no doubt, shows that there are not only criminal prosecutions, but also forms of civil procedure—very narrow ones, in which, as the court says, the bane comes before the antidote, and mischief may be done which will be too late to overtake afterwards—to which the principles of malicious prosecution will apply. I think that SIR HERBERT STEPHEN is right when in his book on malicious prosecution he treats that class of case, with actions for improperly making a person bankrupt, and some other similar ones, as not cases of malicious prosecution, but as being analogous to cases of malicious prosecution.

Upon the whole I come to the conclusion that this was not the kind of case to which the law with respect to malicious prosecution applied. I cannot help thinking that the element of costs bulked very largely in the action of malicious prosecution. If the subject when prosecuted by the Crown could have recovered his costs for defending himself—as he can now, at any rate, in certain cases—I doubt very much whether the action for malicious prosecution would ever have been allowed to flourish. Be that as it may, the element of cost not coming in here, and the element of imprisonment not coming in here in any direct way, I think there is not that element of scandal which is sufficient to support an action in this case, and, therefore, I agree that there should be judgment for the defendants.

I want to add something as to the other part of the case. After the argument of counsel for the plaintiff I am not prepared to say that there was no evidence to go to the jury of an absence of reasonable and probable cause, but I cannot say that I think the trial and its result are satisfactory. I think it is quite possible that a much undue prominence was given to the double position of Mr. Dowsing. I think there was a misconception as to which Act of Parliament was referred to by the wife of the plaintiff and Bailey in their conversation, and to my mind it is clear that the surveyor was explaining that he could not treat that house as he did another one, because the Housing and Town Planning Act did not apply, as the rent was too large, and that, unfortunately, it got into the head, I think, of the judge—and, at any rate, it was presented in such a way as to get into the head of the jury—that the surveyor was saying that he could not use the Public Health Act because the premises were not dirty, while all the time he was using it to compel the premises being cleaned. I do not say that that would be enough to make me say that the trial was unsatisfactory, but the jury by their verdict show that they did not understand, and pains were not taken to make them understand the real nature of the case; that they should at one moment say that Bailey had been guilty of want of bonâ fides and had taken a part in this prosecution, and at another moment say that he was to pay no damages because they thought the real truth was that he had not been properly supervised, or because they thought that his masters were really responsible, is enough to show that they were prepared to find a verdict against the public body at the suit of a private individual, and not allow any private individual to suffer. I think that is sufficient indication that this verdict could not stand. Another reason is, and I quite agree with what has been said, that the damages were obviously excessive.

Lastly, the judgment could not stand, and possibly the verdict could not stand by reason of the fact that separate damages were assessed by the jury in respect of the urban district council and in respect of Bailey. As to that I think the plaintiff was in a dilemma. Either it is a joint tort, and then the ruling which his counsel quoted in the decision of Greenlands, Ltd. v. Wilmshurst (9) applied, and the damages ought to be the same, and there must be a new trial because the damages are not the same, or it is a separate tort in each case, and then they ought not to have been the subject of one action; and, at any rate, Bailey having done no damage, and the gist of this action being damage, he ought to have had a verdict entered for him and judgment given for him. It was suggested that the jury might make a distinction between the damages against Bailey and the damages against the urban district council in this manner. They might say: "The damages that the plaintiff is entitled to are £250, and we say that one particular defendant ought to pay them." If that could be said, it seems to me that that would fall within the decision of Greenlands v. Wilmshurst (9) and would be wrong, but you cannot say that in an action of this kind. Full damages of the plaintiff in an action for malicious prosecution are not necessarily his out-of-pocket expenses, or things which can be measured by a figure. They are compounded of his loss, and the defendants' conduct and either all the defendants are equally tortious, in which case the damages must be paid equally by all of them, or they are not equally tortious, and then one of them ought to be dismissed from the action. Therefore for all these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The only ground for the maintenance of this action which I think it is necessary to consider, is that the prosecution, as a necessary and natural consequence, would impair the fair fame of the plaintiff in this case. The learned judge has decided that it would, and I must say that, looking at the authorities, I think it would have been very difficult for him to have decided anything else. I do not say that he might not perhaps technically have escaped from the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls in Rayson v. South London Tramway Co. (1), because the decision did not go anything like so far as the reasoning, but I doubt whether the learned judge, sitting in a court of first instance, could very well disregard the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls in that case. That reasoning does in fact amount to this, that if there be a prosecution for something that is a breach of a statutory obligation, and, therefore, if it were not for a special penalty, a misdemeanour at common law, then in spite of there being a special penalty imposed by the particular Act that prosecution does reflect on the fair fame of the person who is prosecuted. That seems to me to have been LORD ESHER'S reasoning. As I say, I doubt very much if it were possible, or at any rate reasonably and practically possible, to escape following it, but I think that in this court we are entitled to look to see whether we approve of the reasoning as well as of the decision in that case.

The decision in that case may be quite right, that the prosecution of a man for attempting to evade payment of his fare in a tramcar is a prosecution for a thing which does reflect upon his character, and is a prosecution for an act of dishonesty. The decision, therefore, is perfectly correct, but the statement that wherever there has been a breach of a statutory duty a prosecution for that necessarily reflects upon the fair fame of the person prosecuted is a proposition which, in my opinion, cannot be maintained although, as I have said, the learned judge was probably bound to follow the decision.

Considering the matter apart from that state of things it seems to me that what you have to look at is this—not the facts that might be proved in order to support the prosecution, but at the charge itself that is made by the prosecution, and see whether that charge of itself as a necessary and natural consequence impairs the fair fame of the person against whom it is made. It has been pointed out and admitted that everything which is punishable by a fine does not necessarily reflect upon the fair fame of the person prosecuted. There are prosecutions for not carrying a light on a bicycle, for keeping a pig in the wrong place, and for many things of that kind which would not be said by anybody of common sense to reflect upon the fair fame of the person prosecuted. It is possible in every one of those cases that there might be evidence given which would raise some imputation against the person charged, but that is not what you have to look at. You have to look at the charge itself. In this case the charge is that the plaintiffs were duly served with a notice by the urban sanitary authority as occupiers of certain premises within twenty-one days of service of the notice

Does that necessarily impute anything against the fair fame of the plaintiff? It seems to me that it does not. As has been already pointed out, if a man is served as occupier it does not necessarily mean that the state of the house was due to his act or default at all. He may have only just come into possession. There may have been, I think it was suggested, a strike of workmen, and there may have been a number of things which would cause him to fail to comply with the notice, but which would not impute anything against his fair fame. That is what we have to look at. Perhaps it was intended—I do not know that it was—but perhaps it was intended by the prosecution to prove it at the trial that it was the plaintiff's fault, and that he had allowed this to remain in an insanitary condition for years. They may have intended to prove that, or they may not. We have to look at the summons, and the summons does not seem to me as a necessary and natural consequences to impute anything against his fair fame. Therefore I think that this action cannot be maintained.

With regard to the question of a new trial, if it were necessary to consider it, I should be of opinion that there should be a new trial, not because I think there was any misdirection of any sort in law to the jury, and not because I think the confusion about which Act the sanitary inspector was referring to really had any substantial effect upon the verdict of the jury, but because I think the jury went so wrong. The jury found that both these defendants, the sanitary inspector and the urban district council, were responsible. When I say the jury went so wrong, I am not saying that as meaning necessarily that their verdict was so perverse that it must be set aside as being against the weight of evidence, but I mean they went so wrong in their inconsistent and almost unintelligible findings. They found that, as I have said, both the defendants were responsible. They found that the defendant Bailey had not acted bonâ fide in the matter. They then proceeded to award £250 damages against the defendant council and nothing at all against Bailey. If the defendants were engaged in a joint tort the jury could not do that, and it looks, if there were nothing more, inconsistent with their finding that he did not act bonâ fide, because if he had been acting mala fide he ought to pay the £250 just as much as anybody else, but they put it beyond a shadow of doubt when they were asked very naturally by the judge to explain what they meant by such a verdict. They said: "We think the council were negligent and that Bailey had not sufficient supervision." That is wholly inconsistent with any finding of mala fides upon Bailey's part. If they found no damages against him because it was the other people's fault in being negligent, and that Bailey was not properly supervised, they cannot have understood what they were saying when they said he was not acting bonâ fide. They seemed to have arrived at such inconsistent findings, although, as I say, I do not offer any opinion whether I should say their verdict was so much against the weight of evidence as to upset it on that ground, that I think their verdict cannot stand. I also think the damages were excessive. A sum of £250 for a statement of this kind: "I thought that your house was dirty, and that you have not complied with a notice to cleanse it and paper," seems to me to be too much altogether, and on that ground I should have thought that the verdict was wrong, but as I am of opinion that the action will not lie at all, it is unnecessary to consider the question of the new trial. I agree that judgment should be entered for the defendants.

Appeal allowed.

NEVILLE v. DOMINION OF CANADA NEWS CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Pickford and Warrington, L.JJ.) July 6, 7, 1915]

[Reported [1915] 3 K.B. 556; 84 L.J.K.B. 2105; 113 L.T. 979; 31 T.L.R. 542]

Contract—Illegality—Public policy—Restraint of trade—Newspaper—Agreement to abstain from publishing comments—Release of portion of debt in consideration of abstention.

The plaintiff, who was a director of a land company engaged in selling land in Canada, agreed to accept a certain sum of money in satisfaction of a larger sum which was owing to him by the defendants, who were the proprietors of a newspaper, in consideration, inter alia, of the defendants agreeing not to publish any comment in the newspaper on the plaintiff's land company, its directors, or business, or on any company with which the defendants had notice that the plaintiff's land company was connected or concerned.

Held: the agreement was unenforceable, the consideration in question being void as against public policy, and as being in restraint of trade and wider than was reasonably necessary for the plaintiff's protection.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of ATKIN, J.

The plaintiff, a director of Canadian Capital Investments, Ltd., which was engaged in the sale of land in Canada, brought an action against the defendant company seeking to recover the sum of £940, balance of money advanced by him to the defendant company and another. The defendant company were the proprietors of a weekly magazine, the "Canadian News." The plaintiff had at various times advanced £1,490 to the defendant company, but on Jan. 24, 1913, an agreement was entered into between the parties whereby the defendant company agreed not to publish in the "Canadian News" any comment on Canadian Capital Investments, Ltd., in which company the plaintiff was interested as director, or in regard to land owned by that company, nor upon any company in which the defendant company should have notice that the Canadian Capital Investments, Ltd., was interested. Of the sum of £1,490, £750 was to be paid back by the defendant company by instalments and was to be accepted by the plaintiff in full discharge of the loans if there was no breach of the agreement by the defendant company. The defendant company had paid back £550 out of the £750. But it was alleged that they had committed breaches of the agreement by publishing comments on two companies in which the plaintiff was interested. The plaintiff thereupon claimed that by the terms of the agreement, as a breach had been committed by the defendant company, the whole of the original debt of £1,490 was payable, less £550, the sum paid on account, leaving £940, the sum sued for. On Nov. 27, 1914, the action came on for trial before ATKIN, J., when his Lordship decided (112 L.T. 309) that the stipulation contained in the agreement was invalid as being contrary to public policy and could not be enforced in a court of law; and, that being so, there had been no breach of contract by the defendants, and the event had not happened upon which the £940 sued for was repayable. The plaintiff appealed.

Disturnal, K.C., and Harry Dobb for the plaintiff.
Schiller, K.C., and H. A. McCardie for the defendants.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of ATKIN, J., who has given judgment for the defendants, without costs, in an action in which the plaintiff sued for a sum of £1,490, on the footing of an agreement of Jan. 24, 1913. The point raised is that the agreement itself is one which, in the particular clause in question, is tainted in the sense that no action can be brought upon the agreement. Who is the plaintiff here? The plaintiff is interested in, and a director of, Canadian Capital Investments, Ltd.—what is called a land company—that company being interested in land in Canada. Who are the defendants? The defendants are, as their title plainly indicates, a Canadian newspaper company. Their title is "The Dominion of Canada News Co., Ltd." The defendants publish a weekly magazine called the "Canadian News." It appears from what has been said in opening, and from what the learned judge said in his judgment—I have no doubt it was proved in evidence—that the defendants, in publishing the "Canadian News," profess to give—and I dare say they do give—information to members of the public who want to invest in Canadian land as to the places where, and conditions under which, favourable purchases can be made. If they profess to do that, they are bound to do it honestly. The plaintiff's land company had been issuing certain advertisements which had been adversely criticised by some reputable newspapers which had gone so far as to refuse those advertisements. It is not for me to say whether the attacks on the plaintiff's land company were well founded or not. For the present purposes, I will assume that they were not well founded.

The agreement which was executed on Jan. 24, 1913, was made between the defendants of the first part, the plaintiff of the second part, and Alexis Maria de Beck of the third part, and it contained a recital that the plaintiff had advanced to the defendants a sum of £1,490. The agreement contained various clauses, one of which was that the terms of the agreement put an end to all other contracts between the parties. It provided that the defendants should pay £750 by instalments of not less than £10 a week, and then came this clause: That the defendants should not publish in the "Canadian News"—that is, their own newspaper—or in any other newspaper or periodical published by the defendants, "any comment upon the land company, or its directors, or its business, or in regard to the land owned by Canadian Capital Investments, Ltd. in or near Regina, or any comment upon any company with which the defendants should have notice that the land company was connected or concerned." What is the effect of that? The defendants were carrying on the business of newspaper proprietors. It is the business of newspaper proprietors dealing specially with Canada, and dealing plainly with land purchase in Canada, to comment upon Canadian matters. But this clause provides that this trading company is not to publish

> "in 'Canadian News' or in any other newspaper or periodical published by the company, any comment upon Canadian Capital Investments, Ltd., or its directors, or its business, or in regard to the land owned by Canadian Capital Investments, Ltd., in or near Regina, Saskatchewan, or any comment upon any company with which the company gave notice that Canadian Capital Investments, Ltd. are connected or concerned."

That seems to my mind to be a covenant in restraint of trade. But that alone is not enough to enable us to say whether it is contrary to public policy. I have not heard a word to suggest that it is a "reasonable restraint of trade" in the manner in which those words are used in the authorities. It is surely wider than is reasonably necessary for any protection to which the plaintiff could possibly be entitled. It is not limited to any attacks on the plaintiff. But it is limited to any comments on any land company with which the plaintiff might have anything to do. It seems to me to be plainly a covenant in restraint of trade in this sense: that it is far wider than was reasonably necessary for the protection of the plaintiff. Needless to say, it is perfectly settled that it is for the court, and not for a jury, to decide as to the reasonableness of such a covenant. It is for the court, and the court alone—we are the persons who have to say whether it is reasonable, in the sense in which I have used the word, and I have no hesitation in saying that it was not reasonable. That being so, it is, perhaps, not strictly necessary for me to consider the point, but, if it were necessary for me to consider it, I should hesitate a good deal before I came to the conclusion that what I regard as a bribe paid by the plaintiff to secure complete absence of comment on any land near Regina with which the land company was concerned was a transaction which could be regarded as otherwise than against public policy. But, as I said, I base my judgment, as the learned judge, I think, did, on the ground of restraint of trade. Whichever way you look at it, in my opinion, the learned judge was right in saying that no action could be maintained on this agreement, one of the considerations for which was this illegal clause. That being so, I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I agree. The action is brought on the agreement, and on the agreement alone. I cannot assent to counsel for the plaintiff's proposition that it is also an action brought on what would have been an ordinary account for money lent. It is based on the agreement, and on the agreement only. It is on the question whether there is a right to recover on the agreement, and only on that, that I intend to give judgment. There might have been possible reasons for saying that, if any amendment were necessary in the court below, it might have been made, and the parties might have been left to settle their disputes on the basis of whether the defendants owed anything apart from the agreement; I think that is not a matter with which we have anything to do. The learned judge—no doubt for good reasons—I will not say refused, because he was not asked, but said he would not allow any amendment, and he said he should not allow any action to be supported on anything except the agreement, if it could be supported on that. Therefore, it seems to me that the judgment does not interfere with any rights that the parties may have apart from the agreement.

First of all, was this agreement a valid one? In my opinion, it was not. The defendants carried on a newspaper. It was not, I think, what is ordinarily called a financial newspaper, but it was a newspaper relating to companies which dealt with Canadian affairs generally, and which advised people as to investments in the Dominion. The plaintiff was concerned with a company which was dealing with land in the Dominion of Canada, and certain not very favourable comments had been made on that company and its dealings. Whether they were justified or not I do not know; I will assume they were not. But they had been made, and some newspapers had refused to publish any more advertisements of that company. The defendants owed the plaintiff somewhere about £1,500, and this agreement was come to in consideration of the defendants only paying about one-half of that sum, and paying it by instalments. Therefore, there was a large money consideration to them. I do not think it is necessary to read at length the clause of the agreement which is in question. In my opinion, it is a clause by which they undertake not to make any comments at all under any circumstances so long as the business is being carried on honestly and fairly in their opinion. They agreed not to make any comments. Whether they contemplated it or not is not for me to say, but their agreement was such that, if it was sound, it prevented them from making any comments on any dealings of this company, although those dealings might seem to be dishonest and fraudulent and prejudicial to the interests of the readers of the newspaper. It seems to me to be a very strong thing to say that such an agreement as that was a proper one.

I suppose that one of the defendants was the editor or the proprietor of the paper. But he stated what his intention was in carrying on the paper so far as advice with regard to investments went. In effect he said this: "I am not going to be deterred from my duty by jealous critics, and by unfair and unjust remarks. I am not going to be deterred from doing my duty. I intend to walk straight along that path which I laid down for myself when I started this paper. I intend to expose fearlessly, without favour, every fraudulent concern, every doubtful reality, and to protect and assist all those firms that deal fairly and honestly with real estate and first-class investments. I have an ideal before me, and I intend to follow that ideal." The ideal set out there is a very proper one, I should think, and a very good one for all persons who write in financial newspapers to follow. But he was going to carry out that ideal by commenting on all other companies except those with which the plaintiff was connected, and refrain from commenting on the plaintiff's companies, even although they ought to be recommended to the public as good, or, which is more important, although they seemed to be dishonestly and fraudulently carried on, and the public ought to be warned against them.

How that is consistent with his ideal is a matter which it is very difficult to reconcile. However, the question for us is whether such an agreement is consistent with the proper conduct of the paper in the public interest. I agree with all that has been said as to a newspaper having no more right to comment than any other member of the public. I think that it is a principle which it is very essential to maintain that a newspaper has no more right to say anything about a concern than an ordinary individual has. The contrary is very often contended, and I think it is very essential that it should be kept quite clear that a newspaper has no such right. But it is not quite the same thing as saying that you must apply the same considerations to a paper which is carrying on the business of advising the public as you must to the conscience of a private individual who is not doing that. I cannot put this matter in any better words than are used by ATKIN, J., in his judgment:

> "To my mind, for a newspaper to stipulate for a consideration that it will refrain from exercising its right of commenting upon fraudulent schemes when it is the ordinary business of the company [that means the newspaper company] to comment upon fraudulent schemes is in itself a stipulation which is quite contrary to public policy, and it cannot be enforced in a court of law."

I do not think I could express it better than ATKIN, J., has expressed it in that sentence. I entirely agree with it, and I rather prefer to put my judgment on this footing, although I do not in the least disagree—in fact, I agree—with what the Master of the Rolls has said with regard to restraint of trade.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I agree. The defendants are the proprietors of a newspaper. They have taken on themselves to advise the public on certain land and financial schemes. They have a particular column in their paper which is called the "Gold and Glitter" column, and their editor has made a great parade of this column and of the mode in which in that respect he proposes to conduct the affairs of his newspaper. They have taken on themselves, therefore, the position of advising people, and advising people honestly, as to the merits of certain schemes, and, in particular, schemes referring to land in Canada. The plaintiff was a person who was interested in a company engaged in land speculations in Regina, Saskatchewan. I infer from the agreement which is the subject of the present proceedings that up to the time of the agreement, the plaintiff and the persons acting with him had more or less controlled the defendants' newspaper. One object of the agreement appears to have been a change in the directorate which would have eliminated the element of the plaintiff's control of the paper. That being so, and the plaintiff severing his connection with the paper, and being a creditor to a large amount of the defendants, the plaintiff gave up something like half his debt in consideration, among other things, of a stipulation that the newspaper would make no comment whatever on the conduct of the land company in which the plaintiff was interested, or its directors, or its business, or in regard to the land owned in Regina, Saskatchewan, or any comment on any company with which the company was concerned and connected, and with which the newspaper had notice that it was so concerned or connected.

That was the nature of the stipulation. But just see what that might land this newspaper in. The newspaper has assumed a position of giving honest advice to persons concerned in such matters. Let us assume that the land company in which the plaintiff is concerned, or some company with which that company is connected, propounds some fraudulent scheme, and the editor of the paper knows it. By the stipulation he is bound to refrain from making any comment on that fraudulent scheme, and it seems to me that, by so abstaining, he may actually and actively mislead his public into supposing that there is nothing in the suggestion that the particular scheme is a fraudulent scheme. In other words, he has, I think, accepted a bribe, the tendency of which is to prevent him from doing that which, under certain circumstances and having regard to his own conduct, it may be his duty to do.

I prefer to put my judgment on that ground. But, like PICKFORD, L.J., I agree also that the contract into which the defendants have entered is a contract in restraint of trade. It is their business to make comments on these companies. They have undertaken that they will not carry out a certain part of that business by commenting on this particular company or group of companies. That seems to me to be a contract which is in restraint of the trade which they are carrying on, and it is not suggested that the covenant does not go farther than is reasonably required for the proper protection of the plaintiff, because it goes so far that it might prevent—as, if obeyed, it would prevent—the defendants from commenting on the fraudulent conduct of the plaintiff in the conduct of his business. It cannot be reasonably necessary to prevent that, and, therefore, in my judgment, on both grounds this agreement would be invalid.

Appeal dismissed.

Master and Servant—Misconduct—Right of master to suspend servant—Contract of service treated as continuing—Right of servant to damages for preventing him from working.

The appellant, a workman in the employ of the respondents, absented himself from work on a certain day without the leave of his employers. On the following day his employers suspended him from working on that day, but did not dismiss him, and thereby prevented him from earning the wages which he would have earned if he had been allowed to work. The appellant thereupon took out a summons under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, claiming damages for wrongful dismissal, the amount of damages claimed being the sum which he would have earned if he had worked.

Held: although technically the claim should have been for damages for breach of contract for refusing to allow him to perform his contract of service, the justices had jurisdiction under the Act to adjudicate upon the real claim of the appellant against the respondents without any amendment, and to award him such damages as he would have been entitled to upon a claim properly put forward in the first instance or upon a claim properly amended; although the respondents might have had a right to dismiss the respondent for misconduct, and so to terminate the contract of service, they had no right, when they elected to treat the contract of service as a continuing one, to suspend the appellant for one day and so prevent him from earning his wages for that period.

Case Stated by justices for the county of Durham.

The appellant, Thomas Hanley, was a workman in the employ of the respondents, Messrs. Pease and Partners Limited, and on June 23, 1914, a summons was preferred by him against the respondents under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, for that he, being a servant to the respondents, and having entered into a contract of service determinable by fourteen days' notice on either side, was wrongfully dismissed by his employers on June 15, 1914, without having given or received such notice, and he claimed the sum of 6s. 2d. as damages in respect thereof.

On the hearing of the summons the following facts were proved or admitted: The appellant was a cokeman in the employment of the respondents as a quencherman at the by-product works in the coke-yard of the respondents at Bowden Close Colliery, in the county of Durham. The appellant worked under certain rules or customs agreed upon between the associations representing the owners and workmen respectively with regard to by-product and other similar works, which formed part of the contract of service and employment between the parties. The appellant had been employed at these works for some years, and had previously never objected to work his Sunday "shift." The appellant did not present himself for work on Sunday, June 14, 1914. The cokemen at the respondents' coke-yard had been told by their foreman (acting under the manager's instructions) that if they were ten minutes late on coming to work they would not be allowed to start work. The appellant gave as his reason for absenting himself from work on the Sunday that he had overslept, and he believed that the order forbidding him to work if he was ten minutes late would be enforced. The appellant was not dismissed by the respondents, but only suspended for the Monday, June 15. The work which was required to be performed by the workmen on the Sunday was, under the special circumstances, a work of necessity, having regard to the danger attached to the working of the works in question, and the workmen were paid a higher rate of wages for the same.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended: (a) That the appellant was wrongfully dismissed or suspended. (b) That the order of the respondents as to their workmen not being allowed to start work if they arrived ten minutes late was a wrongful order. (c) That the condition thereby imposed formed no part of, and was in contravention of, the actual contract of service under which the appellant and his fellow-workmen were employed. (d) That it was in consequence of such order that the appellant did not go to work on the Sunday. (e) That being dismissed or refused work on the Monday, without notice, appellant suffered damages to the extent of 6s. 2d., the amount of wages which he would otherwise have earned on that day. On behalf of the respondents it was contended (inter alia): (a) That they had the right to dismiss or to suspend a workman who failed, without any valid excuse, to come to work. (b) That if the by-product oven plant at which the appellant only worked for six days a week was allowed to cool down on the seventh day, the restarting would be attended with great danger to life and property. (c) That the appellant had not made out his case.

The justices were of opinion that this was a dispute between the employers and the workman arising out of or incidental to their relations as such, and found as a fact (i) that the work was one of necessity, the stoppage of which for a day would be attended with great danger to the lives of the workmen employed; (ii) that the appellant had agreed to work on the Sunday and had failed to do so; (iii) that the respondents were justified in suspending the appellant; and (iv) that the appellant had made out no claim for damages.

Lowenthal for the appellant.
McCardie for the respondents.

LUSH, J.—When the present case came before the justices, the dispute took the form of a claim on the part of the appellant for damages for wrongful dismissal, and it was so considered by them. Other questions arose on the hearing; but counsel for the appellant confined the question to the decision of the justices, who dismissed the claim for damages for wrongful dismissal. Counsel for the respondents has taken the point—that the real claim of the appellant was one for damages for breach of contract, since the appellant never was dismissed. It was a claim for damages by the appellant because the employers had no right to refuse to pay him wages for that one day's work without dismissing him. The justices found that the respondents did not dismiss him, and it is therefore contended on their behalf that the justices were right in dismissing his claim because it was not properly a claim for wrongful dismissal. It is said that as there was no power on the part of the justices to amend the claim, as originally put forward, the justices could not deal with it at all. The clear intention of the legislature, as appears by ss. 3 and 4 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, was to give the widest powers to a court of summary jurisdiction, when a dispute between workmen and employers comes before it, to deal with all claims which in the course of the hearing it may turn out have been made by both sides. One has only got to read s. 4 of the Act to be convinced of this. The Legislature intended that the justices should deal with all disputes which might appear in the course of the hearing to have arisen. There was no necessity to amend, and as regards that point I think that the justices had full power to adjudicate upon this claim, treating it as a claim for damages for breach of contract and not as one for damages for wrongful dismissal.

The really substantial question is whether the appellant had any claim in law for damages for breach of contract. Whether you treat the right of the master to dismiss the servant as a right to put an end to the contract, where there has been a repudiation of that contract on the part of the servant, or as a right to consider the misconduct of the servant as a breach of a condition of the contract is immaterial, because in either view the right of the master is merely the exercise of an option. The contract has become a voidable one. The master may determine it, if he pleases, if there has been such misconduct on the part of the servant as entitles him to do so. But he is not bound to do so. And if he chooses not to exercise his strictly legal right, but to treat the contract as continuing, notwithstanding the misconduct or the breach of duty on the part of the servant, then the contract is for all purposes a continuing one, subject, of course, to the master's right in that case to claim damages against the servant for his breach of contract. In the present case, however, the employers, after declining to dismiss the workman and after electing to treat the contract as a continuing one, took it upon themselves to suspend him for one day. In other words, they deprived him of his wages for one day, and by so doing they assessed their own damages for the servant's misconduct at the sum which he would have earned on that day if he had been working. There was no possible right for the employers to act in such a manner. They elected to treat the contract of service as a continuing one, and, having so elected, the contract remained a continuing one. They might have had a right to claim damages against the appellant, but they could not justify their action in suspending him as they did, and so depriving him of his power to work and to earn his wages. That being so, the justices were, in my opinion, clearly wrong in saying that the appellant had failed to substantiate his claim, whether the claim was for wages or for damages represented by wages. It is immaterial which way one puts it. In my view the appellant did most clearly substantiate his claim. This case must, therefore, be remitted to the justices with a direction to award to the appellant, whether as wages or as damages, the sum of 6s. 2d. which he claimed.

ROWLATT, J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the first point, which is certainly one of the highest technicality, the claim of the appellant was really one for unliquidated damages on the ground that the respondents had refused to allow him to earn his day's wages by doing his day's work. If a workman brings a claim for wrongful dismissal after he has returned to work, and has only failed to work for a day and makes a claim for one day's wages, the court has full power to entertain such a claim as one for damages for the employer's refusal to allow him to earn the one day's wages. As regards the point of substance, it is obvious that the respondents, as employers, had no implied power to punish the appellant, their workman, by suspending him for a certain period, since the contract was subsisting the whole time. They had the power to dismiss him, if the facts justified them in doing so, and then to propose a fresh employment to commence on any subsequent date which the appellant might or might not have accepted. In the present case, however, there is no finding on the part of the justices that the facts justified the respondents in dismissing the appellant, and the question of dismissal and reinstatement does not arise upon the case stated. For the reasons which I have given I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

ATKIN, J.—I agree. As to the technical point which has been raised, I think that by s. 4 of the Act of 1875, coupled with the rules, the justices had ample power to deal with what was in fact the real dispute between the parties, whatever it was styled in the claim as originally put forward. As to the other part of the case, I quite agree that, upon the facts as put before us, the respondents had no power to suspend the appellant in the sense which really means the fining of the workman by his employers in the sum of one day's wages on the ground of his default. If the employers had such a power by the contract of service or otherwise, I think that it would have to be very carefully considered in the light of the more recent Truck Acts. The appeal must be allowed.

Company—Director—Duty of director—Director shareholder in or in fiduciary position towards another company—Contract between companies—Director precluded from dealing with other company—Rescission of contract.

Where a director of a company has an interest as a shareholder—whether beneficially or as trustee for others—in another company, or is in a fiduciary position towards and owes a duty to another company which is proposing to enter into engagements with the company of which he is a director, he is precluded, independently of the extent of his holding, from dealing on behalf of the company of which he is a director with the other company, unless and so far only as he is authorised so to do by articles of association. So strictly is this principle adhered to that no question is allowed to be raised as to the fairness or unfairness of a contract so entered into. If the other company has notice of the irregularity, rescission of the contract so entered into may be obtained even after completion, if rescission is still possible.

Appeal by the defendants from the decision of ASTBURY, J.

Frank Russell, K.C., and Ashton Cross for the defendants.
Gore-Browne, K.C., and Maurice Beachcroft for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31, 1914. SWINFEN EADY, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. —The first question raised by this appeal is whether the purchase by the plaintiffs from the defendants of a block of 3,333 ordinary shares of the Lydenberg (Transvaal) Gold Exploration Co., Ltd., for £999 18s., was voidable at the plaintiffs' option.

On Feb. 1, 1911, there was a board meeting of the plaintiff company, at which there were present Sir Frederick Young, in the chair (a gentleman upwards of ninety years of age and since deceased), Mr. William James Harvey, since deceased, and Mr. Henry Samuel. At this board meeting a suggestion was made by Samuel that the company should buy shares in the Lydenberg company, and the matter was adjourned to a special board meeting on Feb. 8. Harvey appears to have known very little, if anything, about this company, as the next day he wrote to Crake, the secretary of the plaintiff company, asking for particulars about it and referring to Samuel's proposal that the company should purchase £1,000 worth of shares. Crake, in reply, sent certain particulars taken from the Stock Exchange Official Intelligence, from which it appeared that the company was registered in October, 1894, but had never yet paid any dividend. On Feb. 6 Harvey wrote again to Crake, the secretary, saying that he did not understand why Samuel proposed the purchase of the Lydenberg shares. It afterwards, however, transpired that Samuel was pecuniarily interested in the transaction, and that one-half of the shares which he proposed that the plaintiff company should purchase really belonged to himself. On Feb. 8 the board meeting was held, at which the purchase was resolved upon. Sir Frederick Young was in the chair, and there were also present Messrs. Harvey and Samuel. At this time the plaintiffs' cash resources were small, and the plaintiffs had to mortgage their uncalled capital to their bankers to raise the funds required to pay for these Lydenberg shares—£1,000. It appears from the evidence that Samuel did not disclose on Feb. 8 that he had any interest in the proposed purchase by the plaintiffs of these Lydenberg shares. He merely abstained from voting, on the ground that he was a director of the selling company, and the two directors forming the quorum who voted were Sir Frederick Young and Harvey. Harvey, however, held 1,000 shares in the selling company, and was thus also interested in the sale of the Lydenberg shares, which, as confidential agent to the plaintiffs, he was instrumental in buying for them. We should mention that Harvey held the 1,000 shares of the defendant company as trustee under his father-in-law's will, and that Harvey's wife was beneficially interested in one-tenth of the shares, subject to her mother's life interest therein.

A The question thus arises: Can a director of a company, on behalf of the company, buy shares or other property from himself, or from a company in which he is pecuniarily interested? In our opinion, it is not material whether the interest which Harvey had in the 1,000 shares was as trustee or whether the shares belonged to him beneficially. As trustee it was his duty to do his best and make the most of the trust estate for his cestuis que trust, and as beneficiary his interest was to B do the best he could for himself. But in either case his duty or interest, as the case might be, would conflict with the duty which he owed to the company of which he was director. The law was thus stated by SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY in the Privy Council, in North-West Transportation Co. v. Beatty (1) (12 App. Cas. at p. 593):

> "A director of a company is precluded from dealing, on behalf of the company, C with himself, and from entering into engagements in which he has a personal interest conflicting, or which possibly may conflict, with the interests of those whom he is bound by fiduciary duty to protect; and this rule is as applicable to the case of one of several directors as to a managing or sole director."

This was, in substance, the language of LORD CRANWORTH in the House of Lords in Aberdeen Rail. Co. v. Blaikie Bros. (2). It was there decided that directors of D a company have duties to discharge of a fiduciary nature towards their principal, and that it is a rule of universal application that no one, having such duties to discharge, shall be allowed to enter into engagements in which he has, or can have, a personal interest conflicting, or which possibly may conflict, with the interests of those whom he is bound to protect; and that so strictly is this principle adhered to E that no question is allowed to be raised as to the fairness or unfairness of a contract so entered into. It was accordingly held that a director of a railway company was precluded from dealing on behalf of the company with himself, or with a firm of which he was a partner, and that it made no difference whether the contract related to real estate, or personalty, or mercantile transactions, the disability arising, not from the subject-matter of the contract, but from the fiduciary character F of the contracting party. That was a Scottish case, but it was held that there was no difference between the law of Scotland and the law of England in this respect, both coming from the Roman law, and that the doctrine rested on such obvious principles of good sense that it was difficult to suppose there could be any system of law in which it would not be found. It was further contended in that case that, whatever might be the general principle applicable to contracts of G that nature, the legislature had in the case of corporate companies, like the railway company, modified the rule by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, ss. 88 and 89 of the Scottish statute being the same as ss. 85 and 86 of the English Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. But LORD CRANWORTH pointed out that those sections merely vacated the office of a director, and did not validate a contract otherwise invalid. He added that the decision of the Common Pleas in Foster v. H Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Rail. Co. (3) merely decided that a contract good at law was not affected at law by an enactment that its effect should be to deprive one of the contracting parties of an office; but that the decision would not help the respondents—Messrs. Blaikie—unless they could go further and show that the statute had had the effect of making valid a contract which was bad on general principles—that is to say, principles enforceable only in equity, being not I then recognised by courts of common law. He added that he could discover no grounds whatever for attributing to the statute any such effect; but that its provisions would still be applicable to the case of directors who became interested in contracts as representatives or otherwise, and not by virtue of contracts made by themselves.

Where a director of a company has an interest as a shareholder in another company, or is in a fiduciary position towards and owes a duty to another company, which is proposing to enter into engagements with the company of which he is a director, he is, in our opinion, within this rule. He has a personal interest within this rule, or owes a duty, which conflicts with his duty to the company of which he is a director. It is immaterial whether this conflicting interest belongs to him beneficially or as trustee for others. He is bound to do as well for his cestuis que trust as he would do for himself. Again, the validity or invalidity of a transaction cannot depend upon the extent of the adverse interest of the fiduciary agent, any more than upon how far in any particular case the terms of a contract have been the best obtainable for the interest of the cestuis que trust, upon which subject no inquiry is permitted. Todd v. Robinson (4) is an instance of a very small interest as shareholder of a company being held to make a person "interested" in a contract. By s. 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875, it was enacted that officers or servants employed under the Act by the local authority should not in anywise be concerned or interested in any bargain or contract made with such authority for any of the purposes of the Act under a penalty of £50. The defendant Robinson was clerk to the local board at a time when a contract was made with the local gas company in which he was a shareholder increasing the price for street lamps from 45s. to 46s. per lamp. The benefit accruing to the defendant as shareholder from the contract for the supply of gas was merely nominal; but he was held liable for the penalty by the Court of Appeal.

It is in consequence of the general law being as we have stated that from time to time provision is made by statute, or by the articles of association or other instruments regulating the organisation, management, and control of particular companies, modifying what would otherwise be the rule applicable. Thus, with regard to statutory companies, the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 87, provides that a director of a statutory company being a member of a joint stock company shall not thereby be disqualified from acting as such director, but he shall not vote on any question as to any contract with the joint stock company. So cl. 77 of Table A of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [see reg. 84 of Table A of Companies Act, 1948] provides that the office of a director shall be vacated if he is concerned with or participates in the profits of any contract with the company, with a proviso that no director shall vacate his office by reason only of being a member of a contracting company, but he is not to vote in respect of any such contract, and, if he does so, his vote is not to be counted. Costa Rica Rail. Co. v. Forwood (5) shows the extent to which a director may be protected by articles of this kind, but the same case emphasised the general rule. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to the stringency of the rule which does not allow directors, trustees, agents, or others standing in a fiduciary relation to enter into engagements conflicting, or which may possibly conflict, with the interests of those whom they are bound to protect: see also Benson v. Heathorn (6) and Imperial Mercantile Credit Association v. Coleman (7) (6 Ch. App. at p. 567).

With regard to the plaintiff company, this matter is regulated by art. 98. This is the only provision in the plaintiff company's articles modifying what would otherwise be the rule of law applicable, and enabling a director of the plaintiff company to be interested as a member of a company with which the plaintiff company is contracting. But it requires that the director shall disclose the nature of his interest, and shall not vote in respect of any contract in which he is concerned. The provisions of this article were not observed when the resolution to purchase the Lydenberg shares was carried, as Harvey voted in favour of it, and without his vote being counted there was no quorum, whereof the defendants, the other contracting party, had full notice. The result is that the contract was voidable, and has been duly avoided, and the plaintiffs are accordingly entitled to have the purchase money repaid, but they must return the Lydenberg shares. It was not disputed by the defendants that if the first transaction in Lydenberg shares is voidable, by reason of Harvey's vote having carried it, the second transaction in the partly paid shares of the plaintiff company stands in no better position and is voidable also, and the like result must follow. In our opinion, the judgment appealed from was right, and the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

GRESHAM LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY v. CROWTHER

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Kennedy and Swinfen Eady, L.JJ.), November 23, 1914]

[Reported [1915] 1 Ch. 214; 84 L.J.Ch. 312; 111 L.T. 887; 59 Sol. Jo. 103]

Equity—Real property—Theoretical conversion into money—Land settled on trust for sale—Power of postponement—Assignment of interest in proceeds of sale in Yorkshire—Assignment of personalty—Registration of assignment—Effect on prior unregistered assignment of same property with notice to trustees—Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict., c. 54), ss. 4, 14.

Where real estate is settled subject to what amounts to an imperative trust for the sale of the same, although there may be power to postpone the sale in the widest terms, and although the consent thereto of someone may be required, the real estate is to be regarded as converted notionally into personalty.

Wheldale v. Partridge (1), 5 Ves. 388; on appeal, 8 Ves. 227, considered and distinguished.

An assignment of a share or interest of or in the proceeds of sale of real estate in Yorkshire which is subject to an imperative trust for sale is an assignment of personalty only, and does not affect the real estate within the meaning of the Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884. The registration of such an assignment, therefore, does not postpone a prior unregistered assignment of the same property of which notice has been given to the trustees.

Appeal from a decision of ASTBURY, J., in an action brought by the plaintiff society against four defendants which raised a question of priority of security, and a further question of construction as to whether a clause in a settlement amounted to a trust for sale so as to cause or effect a conversion of land into personalty.

The plaintiff society claimed an account of what was due to them under a mortgage dated Jan. 11, 1892, made between the defendant E. Crowther of the one part and the plaintiff society of the other part, being a mortgage of the defendants' reversionary interest under a settlement, dated Sept. 9, 1885, made between Martha Baxandall of the first part, the defendant E. Crowther of the second part, and T. H. Crowther and S. Lund of the third part, and that the mortgage might be enforced by foreclosure or sale. They also claimed a declaration that their security took priority over a mortgage dated Mar. 13, 1913, of certain premises, No. 122, City Road, Bradford, claimed to be held by the defendants A. B. Fox and J. R. Bradley. Further, a declaration that their security upon No. 2, Plevna Terrace, Bingley, in the county of York (being part of the property comprised in the settlement of 1885) or the proceeds of sale thereof had priority over the claim of the defendant Sarah Lister to the messuage or the proceeds of sale thereof. And, finally, a declaration that a transfer of 150 shares in Threlfill's Brewery, Ltd. (being part of the property comprised in the settlement of 1885) taken by the defendants A. B. Fox and J. R. Bradley was taken with notice that such shares were subject to the plaintiffs society's security.

The sections of the Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884, which are material, are as follows:

"Section 4. From and after the commencement of this Act, and subject to the provisions of this Act, and any rules under this Act, all assurances executed or made after the commencement of this Act, and all wills of any testators dying after the commencement of this Act, by which any lands within any of the three Ridings are affected, may be registered under this Act. . . . Section 14. Subject to the provisions of this Act, all assurances entitled to be registered under this Act shall have priority according to the date of registration thereof, and not according to the date of such assurances or of the execution thereof, and every will registered under this Act shall have priority according to the date of the death of the testator if the date of registration thereof be within a period of six months after the death of the testator, or according to the date of registration thereof, if such date of registration be not within or under this Act to be deemed to be within such period of six months. Provided that nothing in this Act shall interfere with the priorities as between themselves of any assurances or wills the dates or registration of which may be identical. All priorities given by the Act shall have full effect in all courts, except in cases of actual fraud, and all persons claiming thereunder any legal or equitable interests shall be entitled to corresponding priorities, and no such person shall lose any such priority merely in consequence of his having been affected with actual or constructive notice, except in cases of actual fraud; but nothing in this section contained shall operate to confer upon any person claiming without valuable consideration under any person any further priority or protection than would belong to the person under whom he claims; and any disposition of land or charge on land, which if unregistered would be fraudulent and void, shall, notwithstanding registration, be fraudulent and void in like manner."

Under the Middlesex Registry Act (7 Anne, c. 20), s. 1, the words were:

"All deeds and conveyances whereby any hereditaments in the said county may be any way affected in law or equity."

John Baxandall died on April 23, 1885, intestate, leaving him surviving Martha Baxandall, his widow, and the defendant Emily Crowther his only child. By a settlement made Sept. 9, 1855, between Martha Baxandall, the defendant, Emily Crowther, and T. H. Crowther and S. Lund (thereinafter called the trustees), they conveyed and assigned all the real and personal estate to which J. Baxandall was seised or entitled at the time of his death to the trustees, to hold as to real estate free from the widow's rights of dower, and as to so much as consisted of personal estate to the trustees, their executors, administrators, and assigns upon trust that they should absolutely sell so much of the premises as consisted of real estate, and it was thereby declared, that on the sale thereof by any person who should not be seised of the legal estate in the property sold the person in whom such legal estate should be for the time vested should do and execute all such acts and assurances for effectuating such sale as the persons by whom such sale should be made should direct, and upon trust after making certain payment to hold the residue of the moneys to arise by such sale and conversion upon trust to pay the income thereof to M. Baxandall for her life, and after her death as to the capital and income upon trust for the defendant E. Crowther absolutely. And it was declared that the trustees should have power to postpone the sale, and that whilst any such real estate should continue unsold the same should be held upon such trusts as would, as nearly as the nature of the property admitted, correspond with the trusts thereinbefore declared concerning the trust funds. On Oct. 24, 1885, a memorial of this settlement was registered at Wakefield under the Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884. J. Baxandall on his death was seised in fee of freehold premises No. 2, Plevna Terrace, Bingley, but had no interest in No. 122, City Road, Bradford. The plaintiff society, having made inquiries in writing of the trustees of the settlement of 1885 who stated the property settled consisted of No. 122, City Road, Bradford, No. 2, Plevna Terrace, Bingley, and £600 lent to Sarah Lister. On Jan. 11, 1892, a mortgage was executed by the defendant E. Crowther in favour of the plaintiff society on all her reversionary interest under the settlement of 1885. The plaintiff society, relying on the representation of the defendant E. Crowther as to what was the property included in the settlement of 1885, lent her the sum of £300 on such security. The defendant E. Crowther at the same time made a statutory declaration that she had not incumbered. The plaintiff society gave notice of this mortgage to the trustees of the settlement of 1885 immediately after the same was executed. S. Lund, one of the trustees, died in 1895. The interest on the mortgage of Jan. 11, 1892, was paid until January, 1893. On Oct. 21, 1912, M. Baxandall died intestate, and T. H. Crowther, the surviving trustee of the settlement of 1885 died on Dec. 21, 1912. On Jan. 1, 1895, the defendant E. Crowther conveyed No. 2, Plevna Terrace, Bingley, to one Bradley by way of mortgage, who transferred the same in 1897 to David Lister, who in turn in 1903, under the power of sale contained in the mortgage deed, conveyed the premises as mortgagee to Sarah Lister, one of the defendants. This mortgage, transfer, and conveyance of the freehold premises No. 2, Plevna Terrace, Bingley, were all three registered in the Yorkshire Registry under the Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884, and notices of such indentures were at the same time given to the trustees of the settlement of 1885. The mortgage of the plaintiff society of Jan. 11, 1892, was not registered by them under the Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884, and the question arose whether the plaintiff society under their unregistered mortgage, which included the reversionary interest of the defendant E. Crowther in No. 2, Plevna Terrace, and of which mortgage the plaintiff society had given notice to the trustees of the settlement of 1885, had priority over the conveyance to the defendant Sarah Lister, whose title was registered under the Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884. On Feb. 20, 1913, with notice of plaintiff's mortgage of Jan. 11, 1892, new trustees were appointed of the settlement of 1885.

On learning of the death of Mr. Baxandall, the plaintiff society made inquiries as to the then state of the property subject to the trusts of the settlement of 1885, and in the course of such inquiries came into communication with the defendant E. Crowther, and with the defendants A. B. Fox and J. R. Bradley, who were solicitors practising at Liverpool, and were acting as solicitors for the defendant E. Crowther. As a result of the inquiries by the plaintiff society they alleged they were informed by the defendants E. Crowther, A. B. Fox, and J. R. Bradley that the house and shop, No. 122, City Road, Bradford, never formed part of the property subject to the trusts of the settlement of 1885, but was the private property of Mr. Baxandall, to whom it was conveyed on Nov. 1, 1887, and on whose death intestate the premises devolved upon the defendant E. Crowther as her administratrix and heir-at-law. The plaintiff society further discovered the existence of the mortgage transfer and conveyance to the defendant S. Lister, of No. 2, Plevna Terrace, Bingley. On Mar. 13, 1913, the defendant E. Crowther conveyed the house and shop, No. 122, City Road, Bradford, by way of mortgage to A. B. Fox and J. R. Bradley to secure a pre-existing debt of £100 due to them for professional services. The sum of £600 lent to Sarah Lister of Keighley on mortgage, which formed part of the property subject to the trusts of the settlement of 1885, was repaid to the trustees of that settlement, and was invested by them in the purchase of 150 shares of £1 each in Threlfall's Brewery, Ltd., which shares stood partly in the name of Mr. Baxandall and partly in the name of the defendant E. Crowther. The defendants A. B. Fox and J. R. Bradley on Mar. 5, 1913, procured a transfer to themselves of the 150 shares in Threlfall's Brewery, Ltd. In their defence the defendants A. B. Fox and J. R. Bradley admitted they knew that these shares were subject to the trusts of the settlement of 1885, and that they did not claim that such shares were not subject to the trusts of such settlement, but held the shares to the order of the trustees of the settlement, whose claim had priority to the mortgage to them of Mar. 5, 1913. There was owing to the plaintiff society under the mortgage to them of Jan. 11, 1892, the sum of £287 10s., being the balance due of the principal sum of £300 together with interest at five per cent. per annum as from Jan. 11, 1893.

In May, 1914, the action came on for trial before ASTBURY, J., who held (a) the contention that the plaintiffs ought to have searched the register and not relied solely on the representation was unfounded; (b) the settlement contained a trust to sell the real estate and, therefore, converted the latter into personalty; (c) the mortgage to the plaintiff society was a charge on the proceeds of sale of the real estate and not registrable under the Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884; and (d) by their prior notice to the trustees the mortgage of the plaintiffs was entitled to priority against the defendant, Sarah Lister. From this decision the defendant, Sarah Lister, appealed.

The first question argued was whether there was an imperative trust for the sale of the real estate.

Percy Wheeler for the appellant.

Frank Russell, K.C., and O. R. A. Simpkin for the plaintiff society.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—The general principle applicable to the present case is not open to doubt. You must look at the whole instrument in question, not at one clause only, and see whether there is that which amounts to an imperative direction to sell although there may be power to postpone the sale in the widest terms and although it may require the consent of someone. Counsel for the appellant in his argument very fairly concedes that but for the final clause in this deed he could not resist the contention that there was an imperative trust for sale.

The deed is a deed between a widow and her only child, the widow being entitled to dower and the child being entitled as heiress-at-law. Between them they are entitled to the personal estate, and they convey all the real estate of the intestate and the personalty, too, upon trust to two trustees to sell and dispose of it by public sale or auction. Then there is an unintelligible direction followed by a clear declaration of trust as to what is to be done with the proceeds of sale. It is to be invested to pay the debts and funeral expenses and expenses of administration and to invest the residue in certain securities which are there mentioned, and the trustees are to hold the residue of the money to arise by such a sale upon trust to pay the interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof to the widow for life, and after her decease as to the capital and income of the trust fund upon trust for the daughter absolutely. It is quite plain that thus far there was an imperative direction for sale. Then comes a common form to authorise postponement of the sale. It was also declared that the trustees might postpone the sale of so much of the premises as consisted of real estate for so long a period as they should think fit. That postponement clause would not prevent the trust for sale being absolute. Then the settlement goes on to provide that whilst the real estate should continue unsold it should be held by the trustees upon such trusts as should, as nearly as the nature of the property would admit, correspond with the trusts thereinbefore declared concerning the trust fund. There is power to manage the unsold real estate.

The argument for the appellant really turns upon the words

> "upon such trusts as should, as nearly as the nature of the property would admit, correspond with the trusts thereinbefore declared concerning the trust fund."

He says that that contemplates that there may be unsold real estate at the death of two beneficiaries—certainly at the death of the widow and possibly of the daughter also—and that that is in effect a declaration that it shall be held as real estate upon trusts corresponding with the personal estate. I think that that is a very slender scaffold upon which to build such an argument. No authority which counsel for the appellant has cited seems to me to bear that out. The case of Wheldale v. Partridge (1), which is a decision of LORD ELDON, is very far from bearing out any such contention. In the event of the property being held under the trust for sale, the proceeds were to go in a different direction. It was therefore very difficult to say that that could be an imperative trust for sale, because the deed contemplated in one way if there was a trust for sale and in another way if there was not. That being so, it seems to follow that there was not an imperative trust for sale. Taking the scope of the whole instrument, I think that the learned judge in the court below was right in saying that there was an imperative trust for sale in the present case.

KENNEDY, L.J.—I agree.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole question is whether there is an imperative trust for sale. A direction to convert money into land, or land into money, must be express and imperative to work a conversion. If the conversion be merely optional, then the property will be considered as real or personal according to the actual condition in which it is found. So that the whole question here is, Is the direction to convert imperative? It is conceded that but for the last clause in the settlement there would be nothing to argue. The trustees are to absolutely sell, with a power to postpone. If that were all, it would be unarguable. In my opinion the subsequent direction as to what is to happen whilst the estate shall continue unsold, which is directory, does not in any way cut down the imperative nature of the trust. For these reasons I am of opinion that, according to the true construction of this settlement, it must be treated as an absolute trust for sale, an imperative direction to convert.

The second question, whether the plaintiffs' mortgage had obtained priority over the defendant's mortgage by their notice to the trustees of the settlement, was then argued.

Percy Wheeler for the appellant.
Frank Russell, K.C., and O. R. A. Simpkin for the society.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—We have held that under the settlement in question there was an imperative trust for sale, and that the property was converted notionally into personalty. The beneficiaries were the widow, who was tenant for life, and the daughter, who was absolutely entitled on her mother's death. During the lifetime of the widow a mortgage was executed by the daughter in favour of the plaintiffs. What had the lady to mortgage? All she had to mortgage was her interest in the proceeds of sale. What is the method approved by the law of the land for protecting the interests of a mortgage with such a person? To give notice to the trustees. That was done by the plaintiffs here, and a good title was undoubtedly acquired by the plaintiffs, unless it be true that a mortgage of that character requires to be put upon the registry. The present appellant is subsequent in time to the plaintiffs. She took a mortgage. Notice thereof was not given to the trustees of the settlement, but the deed was entered upon the registry. The question under those circumstances is, Who is entitled to priority?

Looking at the matter apart from authority the daughter could not in any way interfere with the positive trust for sale vested in the trustees. The transaction in question took place in the lifetime of the mother, the tenant for life. It seems to me, an ingenious argument, that the deed ought to have been registered because at some future time, after the mother's death, the daughter might have elected to take the land as land. She could not do it alone. I think that it would be contrary to the policy of the Act to say that trustees who have an absolute trust for sale have anything to do as to dealings with the beneficial interest of persons under the trust for sale. It is not within the mischief of the Act, and, apart from authority, I should have come to the same conclusion, but I cannot approach the matter in that view.

Nearly eighty years ago, LORD LANGDALE, M.R., in the case of Malcolm v. Charlesworth (2) laid down a principle which seems to me possibly to go further than the present case. He says (1 Keen at pp. 72, 73):

> "The only question is whether the land situate in the county of York—for the argument cannot possibly be extended to the land in Leicestershire—is to be considered as affected by an assignment of a legacy charged upon the land. It appears to me that the deed under which the plaintiff claims is not a deed which affects the land; it is an assignment of the money charged upon the land, and of the money only; and if I were to hold that an instrument assigning money charged upon land situate in a register county required registration, I should lay down a rule which certainly has not hitherto been adopted."

It may be said that that was a bold decision. I am disposed to think that it is not quite clear that the concurrence of the plaintiff there might have been required to make a title. In the present case it is quite clear that the concurrence of the plaintiffs, the mortgagees, was not required to make a title and would not be required to make a title. They would not have been properly inserted on the abstract of title. That authority came before KAY, J., in 1885 in Arden v. Arden (3)—that is to say, thirty years ago. He discussed the matter fully. He expressed his approval of Malcolm v. Charlesworth (2) in dealing with that case, the facts of the which are identical with the present one—namely, an interest in a share of the proceeds of sale of the property directed to be sold—and he held that that was not within the terms of the Act or within the mischief of the Act. It is true that that was the Middlesex Registry, but I do not think that anything turns upon the language of one statute rather than upon that of another. Therefore in substance I am asked

A to overrule the decision of LORD LANGDALE, which is eighty years old, and the decision of KAY, J., which is thirty years old, decisions which, though some slight doubt was expressed by very cautious conveyancers, have never been impugned by any judge, I think that we ought to hesitate long before we give a decision which might have the effect of destroying the titles and the securities which have been accepted and dealt with on the footing of the registration of deeds of this kind, B unless it was absolutely necessary to do so. In my opinion, the decision of the learned judge in the court below on this point was right, and the appeal must be dismissed with the usual consequences.

KENNEDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the cases cited, in Arden v. Arden (3) KAY, J. followed the decision in Malcolm v. Charlesworth (2), C a decision which was an authority for him in deciding as he did. In Malcolm v. Charlesworth (2) the legacy was charged upon land being in Yorkshire. KAY, J. in Arden v. Arden (3) is dealing with the case of an interest in a share of the proceeds of sale of real estate in Middlesex. He there was of opinion that there was not a difference between the Acts, although the forms are not identical, which in any way prevented his treating the decision on the Yorkshire Registry Act at that time as a D good authority in construing the language of the Act relating to the Middlesex Registry. The words of the Act are:

> "All deeds and conveyances whereby any hereditaments in the said county 'may be in any way affected in law or equity'."

E It seems to me that both these two decisions, as to the meaning of the terms used in those two cases, are right, and that the learned judge here, not only was entitled, but as it seems to me, was practically bound, to hold as he did, that this case on the Yorkshire Registry Act was applicable.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—The question is whether a dealing with a share or F interest in the proceeds of sale of land in Yorkshire, conveyed upon an absolute trust for sale, requires registration under the Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884. Under that Act, by s. 4, all assurances by which any lands within any of the three Ridings of the county are affected may be registered under this Act, and then by s. 14 all assurances entitled to be registered are to have priority according to the date of registration. It is clear from the rest of s. 14 that assurances of equitable, as well G as legal, interests are within the Act. The question is whether an assurance of a share of the proceeds of sale of the land is within the Act. Land is defined thus:

> "The expression 'land' includes land and tenements and hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, and houses and other buildings, and also an undivided share in land [and] the expression 'conveyance' includes any assignment [and so on, by which] any interest in such land is thereby conveyed."

H The question is whether a share or interest in the proceeds of sale of land is an interest in land within the meaning of the Act. It is quite clear that it may be and is for many statutes and for many purposes an interest in land. For instance, money to arise from the sale of real estate so far partakes of the nature of realty—that is to say, it is so far an interest in land—that under the old I law it would not be the subject of a bequest to a charity which was within the Mortmain Acts. So, again, it might be an interest in land within the Dower Acts or within the Statute of Limitations. The question is whether it is an interest in land within the meaning of the Yorkshire Registry Act, 1884. In my opinion that Act is intended to apply to dealings both at law and in equity with the land itself, those which affect the land itself. In the present case the trustees for sale could make a good title quite independently of and without the concurrence of the persons interested in the proceeds or entitled to any share in the proceeds or their mortgagees, and the person entitled to a share in the proceeds of the land had, in my opinion, no interest in the land itself within the meaning of this statute. Counsel for the appellant urged that it was within the mischief of the statute. I do not think it is; it is not within the mischief of the statute. Where persons are entitled to an interest in the proceeds of sale of land, the land is vested in trustees for sale and the trustees for sale hold the proceeds after the sale in trust for the cestuis que trust, and if any cestui que trust chooses to assign or mortgage or incumber the interest there is a well-known method—that is, by giving notice to the trustees—by which priority is secured, by which the position is secured, and by which, if due inquiry is made of the trustees before the sale or mortgage, the position is ascertained, and information can be gained as to whether the vendor or incumbrancer has previously sold or dealt with the interest which the trustees hold in trust. To guard against the mischief of fraudulent dealings where money is held by trustees, there always may be inquiry of the trustees. Where you are dealing with simple interests in land the same observations do not apply, and, in the case of the first mortgage, the first mortgagee would take the deeds. After the first mortgage, when it is a question of affecting subsequent incumbrancers, in the absence of any registry there is a difficulty in ascertaining whether or not prior incumbrances exist, and opportunity for committing frauds arises in the absence of the registry. Those observations only apply to the dealings with the land itself and not to any proceeds which are held on trust by trustees. The interest in question in this proceeding is not an interest in land within the meaning of the Act, nor is it within the mischief of the Act, and no entry on the registry could secure for it any priority over a prior incumbrancer who has given notice to the trustees.

Appeal dismissed.

Re DEMPSTER. BORTHWICK v. LOVELL

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Sargant, J.), February 10, 1915]

Annuity—Power to set aside fund—Defeasible annuity—Duty of trustee to purchase defeasible annuity for annuitant—Right of annuitant to fund.

A testator gave pecuniary legacies and two annuities, and directed that her trustees should provide for the annuities by setting aside and appropriating a portion of her estate sufficient to answer the annuities by the income thereof and that until such appropriation the annuities should be paid out of the residuary estate, and that upon cesser of either of the annuities the proportion of the capital so set aside and appropriated should sink into and form part of her residuary estate. The testator also declared that neither of the annuitants should be allowed to have the value of the annuity in lieu thereof, and that, if the annuitant should do or suffer any act or thing whereby the annuity should be assigned, charged, or encumbered, the annuity should thenceforth cease to be payable. The testator gave his residuary estate in trust for other persons. The estate was sufficient to pay all the pecuniary legacies in full and to provide sums sufficient to purchase annuities of the amounts given by the will, but was not sufficient to pay the legacies in full and to provide a sum sufficient by the income thereof to pay the annuities in full.

Held: the declaration as to cesser of the annuities on assignment, charge, or encumbrance was a good gift over to the residuary legatees on such an event happening; sums sufficient to buy annuities of the amounts specified in the will must be set side; but the annuitants, having regard to the fact that their annuities were determinable, were not entitled to payment of the sums set aside which must be invested by the trustees in the purchase of annuities to be paid to the annuitants until they should assign, charge, or encumber.

Originating Summons by the trustees and executors of the will of Charlotte Louisa Hawkins Dempster asking (i) in what manner the trustees ought to apportion and deal with the estate in respect of and as between the legacies and annuities given by the will; and (ii) how they ought to deal with and apply the amounts to be set apart or paid out of the estate in respect of the annuities given to H. Lovell and G. Pittaluga.

Charlotte Louisa Hawkins Dempster by her will, dated June 11, 1912, appointed the plaintiffs, and another person who renounced probate, executors and trustees of her will and gave certain legacies (including a legacy of £6,000 to the defendant, the Hon. Eileen O'Brien). The will then contained the following clause:

"I bequeath the following annuities videlicet to my excellent cook-housekeeper Harriet Lovell an annuity of £40 whether she is in my service at the date of my death or not; to my old coachman Giovanni Pittaluga (called Lavona), of No. 3, Rue Cabris, Cannes, an annuity of £40, the said annuities to be paid quarterly, the first payment to be made three months after the date of my death. And I direct my trustees or trustee to make provision for the said annuities by setting apart and appropriating a portion of the investments comprised in my estate at the date of my death which shall be sufficient in their opinion to answer the said annuities by the income thereof, and that until such appropriation I declare that the said annuities shall be paid out of my residuary estate, and that upon the cesser of either of the said annuities the proportion of the capital so set apart and appropriated shall sink into and form part of my residuary estate. And I declare that the said Harriet Lovell and Giovanni Pittaluga shall not be allowed to have the value of the said annuity given to them in lieu thereof, and I further declare that in case either of the said annuitants shall do or suffer any act or thing whereby the said annuity or any part thereof shall be assigned, charged, or encumbered the said annuity shall cease to be payable to the said annuitant and shall thenceforth cease to be payable."

The testatrix gave, devised, and bequeathed her residuary estate and effects to her trustees upon trust to convert the same into money, and, after paying thereout her funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and the legacies and annuities bequeathed by the will to stand possessed of the residue upon trust for such of the unmarried daughters of the late Major the Honourable Charles James Keith-Falconer as should be living at the time of her death in equal shares. The testatrix died on May 8, 1913. There were then three unmarried daughters of Major Keith-Falconer, one of whom was the defendant Miss Ida Madeleine Keith-Falconer. After paying debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and duties, the estate was sufficient to pay the legacies in full and provide for the purchase of government or other annuities of the amounts of those given to the defendants Harriet Lovell and G. Pittaluga, but the estate was not sufficient to pay the legacies in full and also to allow of setting apart and appropriating sums sufficient to pay the annuities out of the income of the sums set apart. It was stated that the government would not grant an annuity to a foreigner who was permanently resident abroad.

A. L. Ellis (for P. M. Walters, serving with His Majesty's forces) for the defendant Keith-Falconer the residuary legatee.

Alfred F. Topham for the annuitants.

J. W. Manning for the defendant O'Brien, a legatee.

SARGANT, J. (after reading the will).—There is a clear gift to each of the annuitants until she or he does or suffers something whereby the annuity is assigned, charged, or encumbered. Then the annuity is to cease to be payable, and in that event there is a gift over in trust for the residuary legatees. In my opinion, that is a perfectly good gift in favour of the residuary legatees if either annuitant attempts to assign, charge, or encumber the annuity. The estate is sufficient to pay all the legacies in full and to provide sums sufficient to purchase annuities of the amounts given by the will; but it is not sufficient to pay the legacies in full and also to set aside two funds the income of which will be enough to pay the annuities in full. Then what ought to be done? It seems to me that Re Cottrell (3) precisely applies to the present case except for the fact that here the annuities are determinable annuities, and I propose to follow the principles laid down in Re Cottrell (3) as being applicable here, and I may add that they appear to me to be perfectly right.

Then comes the further question whether the annuitants, in view of the fact that the annuities are not absolute annuities to them but are determinable annuities, are entitled, in lieu of having the annuities purchased and held by the trustees upon trusts corresponding with or analagous to those declared by the will to have the amount required to purchase the annuities paid to them. It was clearly laid down in Carr v. Ingleby (1) that where the annuity was determinable by an event occurring in the lifetime of the annuitant, the annuitant was not entitled to have the value of the annuity paid to her, but that the amount was to be applied in the purchase of an annuity to be paid to her for life or until the occurrence of such event, and the same principle in effect was followed by NORTH, J., in Re Ross (2) in which he recognised that where an annuity was given to a married lady without power of anticipation for her separate use she was not entitled to receive the capital of the annuity but was only entitled to the income of it from time to time. However, it is said that those decisions have been qualified by or are inconsistent with a case, before KEKEWICH, J., Re Sinclair (4). When, however, I come to look at Re Sinclair (4), it appears to me that it is not analagous, because there the annuity in question was not given under the will at all, but was subsisting quite independently of the will and was an obligation binding on the testator's estate under some deed. There the annuitant, coming from outside, had, under the process familiar in bankruptcy, been admitted to prove for the value of his determinable annuity, and it was shown that the amount required to purchase a determinable annuity really was the same as the amount required to purchase an absolute annuity; it does not appear to me that Re Sinclair (4) really throws any light upon the case now before the court. It seems to me that, on principle, if an annuitant who has a determinable annuity or is restrained from anticipation is compelled to take a smaller annuity, that cannot alter the character of the annuity itself. The annuitant has, in common with other legatees, to take, say, 19s. in the pound instead of 20s. in the pound, but I can see no reason why the 19s. in the pound should not be paid on precisely the same conditions on which the 20s. in the pound has been directed to be paid. Here fortunately 20s. in the pound is going to be paid to each of the annuitants, and the only change which is made in the directions given by the testatrix is this, that, in lieu of a capital fund being set aside, the income of which would have been payable, pending assignment, charge, or encumbrance, to the annuitants, arrangements will be made either for a government annuity in one case, or for an annuity from a first-class insurance office in the other case. The mere substitution of that for a capital fund does not seem to me to involve any change in the destination or character of the annual payment itself. As to one of the annuitants there is a difficulty about purchasing a government annuity, because he is a foreigner residing permanently abroad, but with regard to him counsel for the annuitants was prepared, if I was against him on his contention as to this annuitant being entitled to receive the value of the annuity, to have an annuity purchased in the name of some first-class insurance office to be approved by the annuitant. That being so, I think I ought to direct that the trustees should purchase in their own names a government annuity for the first annuitant and an annuity from a first-class insurance office approved by the second annuitant for the second annuitant, and that they should pay the income of the annuities to the annuitants during their lives or until they should respectively assign, charge, or encumber them. In each case the amount of the annuity must be paid down to date, and the purchase must be made of an annuity to accrue henceforth.

Company—Shares—Allotment—Consideration—Transfer of property to company by allottee—Discrepancy between value of property and value of shares allotted.

By a contract in writing between the plaintiff company and one G., G. agreed to sell to the company a concession and the company agreed to allot to G. 400 of its shares forthwith and also, by cl. 8 of the contract, one-fifth of any future increase of capital, the company in every case providing G. with the money required to pay for the shares.

Held: a shareholder might discharge his obligation on his shares by the transfer of property or the rendering of services to the company, and it mattered not that the value of the property transferred or the services rendered did not amount to the full amount of the cash liability, but that rule did not apply where the contract showed on its face that the property or services were widely less in value than the shares allotted; in the present case the liability to be discharged on one-fifth of all future increases of capital obviously and necessarily had no connexion with or relation to the value of the concession; and, therefore, the agreement was bad in so far as it purported to relieve G. from his liability to pay up all or any part of the increased capital of the company from time to time allotted to him.

Action tried by SARGANT, J., brought by the plaintiff company against the executors of Thomas Glen, who died in 1900, claiming (i) a declaration that the provisions contained in cll. 8, 9, and 10 of an agreement made between the company, Thomas Glen and William Glen, and dated July 14, 1862, were ultra vires the plaintiff company and invalid and void; alternatively (ii) a declaration that, according to the true construction of the agreement, the provisions of cll. 8, 9, and 10 thereof ceased to operate after the issued capital of the company amounted to £50,000; and in the further alternative that any further shares to be allotted on any future increase of the company's capital to the defendants or their nominees in pursuance of the agreement would, notwithstanding anything therein contained, be held by the nominees subject to the liability to pay the full nominal amount thereof in cash to the company without any liability on the company to provide such cash or any part thereof.

The plaintiff company was incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856, as amended by the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1857, and the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1857, and the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1858, in the year 1862 with a capital of £35,000, divided into 3,500 shares of £10 each. The objects of the company were to manufacture, supply, and sell gas to cities in Hong Kong and elsewhere in China, and other like purposes. The articles of association of the company empowered the company to increase its capital, and there was a special clause dealing with and especially authorising the company to make and enter into the contract with William Glen and Thomas Glen, the subject-matter of the present action. By that agreement it was recited that William Glen had obtained a concession for supplying gas to Victoria City, Hong Kong, that this concession had been transferred to Thomas Glen, that the latter would sell it to the company, and, in the event of acquiring like concessions, would give the company ample opportunity of acquiring them on the same terms, and that the plaintiff company would within three months of the sale allot to Thomas Glen or his nominees 400 shares of £10 each of the company's capital (not exceeding £20,000), and would provide £4,000 to be immediately applied in paying up the 400 shares in full. By art. 8 of the contract the company agreed that if and whenever the amount of the company's paid-up capital should be increased above the sum of £20,000 the company would allot to Thomas Glen, his executors, administrators, or assigns, such further number of shares as should be equal to one-fifth part of the increased capital so from time to time actually paid up beyond the said sum of £20,000 and would pay to him or them, or to the nominees of him or them, a sum equal to the nominal amount of the shares so allotted to him or them, which sum or sums so paid should from time to time be immediately applied in paying up in full the shares so allotted. By art. 10, the company agreed to issue gratis proper certificates specifying that the shares had been fully paid up and would do all things necessary for vesting the shares legally and effectually in Thomas Glen, his executors, administrators, assigns, or nominees. Another article stipulated that the company were to provide such capital not exceeding £50,000 and were to do such things as should be necessary to carry out the concession in accordance with its terms. Shortly after the date of the agreement the concession was transferred to the plaintiff company, and further issues of shares were made in 1863 and 1873, when the claim of Thomas Glen to receive one-fifth of the increased capital was recognised. The company was very prosperous. In order to escape from the onerous provisions of the agreement as far as possible, the company had raised an unusual amount of the capital required for their undertaking in the form of debentures rather than as share capital. The shares of the company stood at a large premium, and the company came to the court to endeavour to get relief from this onerous contract, which they contended was ultra vires and void in forcing them for a fixed consideration to keep on issuing from time to time an indefinite amount of future share capital on the terms that all liability thereon should be discharged by the company without any payment being made by the allottees.

Feb. 20, 1914. SARGANT, J., read the following judgment.—In this action the plaintiffs contend first that cll. 8, 9, and 10 of an agreement dated July 14, 1862, are on their true construction no longer applicable; and, secondly, that, if and so far as they are applicable, they are bad and unenforceable either in whole or in part. The second contention is the only one of any general legal interest and in brief raises the question whether the company could, for a fixed present consideration, validly contract that an indefinite amount of future share capital should from time to time be issued upon the terms that all liability thereon for calls should be at once extinguished without any contemporaneous payment by the allottees.

The plaintiff company (hereinafter called the company) were incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856, 1857, and 1858, in June, 1862, with a capital of £35,000, divided into 3,500 shares of £10 each, and the contract is contained in certain articles of agreement which were dated July 14, 1862, and were made between William Glen, of the first part, Thomas Glen, of the second part, and the company, of the third part. By that agreement, after recitals which showed that William Glen had obtained a concession for supplying the city of Victoria, Hong Kong, with gas, that this concession had been transferred to Thomas Glen, and that the latter was prepared to sell it to the company, it was agreed (cll. 1, 2, 3, and 4) that the concession should be effectually sold and transferred to the company, who should be free from any competition by the vendors; (cll. 5 and 6), that in the event of either of the vendors acquiring any like concessions for any other place or places in China, they would not dispose thereof to any other party on any terms without first giving the company an ample opportunity of acquiring them upon the same terms; (cl. 7), that the company would, within three months, allot to Thomas Glen or his nominees 400 shares of £10 each of the company's capital (not exceeding £20,000) and would provide £4,000 to be immediately applied in paying up the 400 shares in full; and (cl. 8), which is the important article here, and which accordingly I quote in its exact terms, that:

"If and whenever the amount of the company's paid-up capital shall be increased above the sum of £20,000, the company will allot to the said Thomas

A Glen, his executors, administrators, or assigns, such further number of shares as shall be equal to one-fifth part of the increased capital so from time to time actually paid up beyond the said sum of £20,000, and will pay to him, or them, or to the said Henry Parkinson Sharp and William Matthew Mills Whitehouse, as the nominees of him or them, a sum equal to the nominal amount of the shares so allotted to him or them, which sum or sums so paid shall from time B to time be immediately applied in paying up in full the shares so allotted."

Clause 11 stipulated that the company were to provide a capital of at least £50,000 and were to carry out the concession in accordance with its terms. Soon after the date of the agreement the concession was duly transferred to the company, a first issue of 2,000 shares of £10 was made, and 400 of these shares (less 177 shares by which the price was reduced by agreement under particular circumstances) were C allotted to Thomas Glen or his nominees and were credited as fully paid up in accordance with cl. 7 of the agreement. Further issues of shares, up to 7,000 in all, were made in 1863 and 1873, the capital of the company being increased for the purpose on the two last occasions. On all these issues the claim of Thomas Glen to receive one-fifth of the increased capital was duly recognised, though it is said that on at least one occasion he waived or compromised his right to a full D fifth of the extra capital so as to enable the issue of the remainder to be effectually carried out. The operations of the company have been successful and it is common ground that at the present day their shares stand at a large premium.

I have mentioned all these facts by way of giving a short history of the matter, and also in view of certain suggestions that have been advanced on either side that some interpretation has been mutually put on the agreement or even some E estoppel created. But no serious argument has been or could, in my judgment, be founded on the conduct of the parties subsequent to the agreement. It is clear that continuing rights with regard to the subject-matter under discussion have not been modified, and remain the same as they were on the original completion of the transaction. Thomas Glen died in 1900, and the company have now brought this action against his executors to determine how far they are bound, as regards F future issues of share capital, by the obligation of cl. 8 of the agreement. They do not propose to disturb in any way any issue to Thomas Glen that has been made in the past.

I will deal first with the question of construction. It has been argued, on behalf of the company, that there are various indications in the agreement that the G parties were really only contracting with reference to the capital of the company as originally authorised, or at most with reference to the capital of £50,000 mentioned in cl. 11 of the agreement. And it may be that, if the terms of cl. 8 were at all ambiguous or doubtful, these arguments might be of some force and even prevail. But, in my judgment, the terms of cl. 8 are clear and unambiguous, and apply to any increase whatever of the company's capital, whether beyond the H originally authorised amount of £35,000 or the larger amount of £50,000 mentioned in cl. 11. This being so, I am bound to give effect to these clear and unambiguous terms, and cannot resort to any other part of the document. This construction renders it necessary to deal with the general question of law above mentioned.

Now, here I shall premise that though the incorporation of the company took place under the Act of 1856 and its amending Acts, and the language of the material I provisions of the Act of 1856 differs slightly from that of the corresponding provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, no material distinction for the present purpose has been pointed out between the meaning and effect of the two sets of provisions. It was practically conceded on both sides that Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper (1) and the other like decisions under the Act of 1862 apply equally to companies incorporated under the Act of 1856. Indeed, the point is to some extent at least governed by authority: see Re Weymouth and Channel Islands Steam Packet Co. (2).

Next, the precise meaning and effect of the language of cl. 8 should be examined. This does not in terms provide that the shares should be issued at a discount or as fully paid up, and counsel for the defendants uttered a warning against the use of catch words in deciding this case. When, however, the clause is carefully examined, I cannot think that it tends less to contravene the statutory provisions as to the capital of companies than if it were a clause providing in terms for the issue of fully paid shares. For, while the first part of the article contains an obligation to allot to Thomas Glen or his nominees one-fifth of all increased share capital, the second part of the article provides that, contemporaneously with such allotment, the company shall furnish cash equal to the full nominal value of the shares, and earmarks and dedicates that cash, so that it has immediately to return to the company's coffers for the purpose of paying up the very shares in full. It is impossible, in my view, to hold that the second part of cl. 8 does not amount to a contract for the contemporaneous absolution and discharge of the allottee from his primâ facie statutory liability to provide the nominal value of his shares in money. But it is, of course, clear that a shareholder may effectually contract to discharge his liability on his shares by (inter alia) the transfer of property in lieu of the payment of cash, and that it is not essential that for this purpose the real value of the property transferred should be ascertained as being, or should be in fact, the full equivalent of the cash liability: Re Wragg, Ltd. (3). Accordingly it is argued, and this is the real pinch of the case, that the transfer of the concession, though made once and for all in 1862, was a sufficient equivalent in kind, not only for the discharge of the liability on the first 400 shares to be issued to the concessionaire, but also for the discharge of the liability on a fifth of any increased capital that might at any future time be issued to the concessionaire by the company.

This argument, however, seems to me to go far beyond the decision in Re Wragg (3), and, indeed, to be in conflict with the views expressed both in that case and in the numerous cases there cited and examined, particularly Re Almada and Tirito Co. (4) and the Ooregum Case (1). These cases clearly show that although a value put on purchased property by the contract and not fixed dishonestly or colourably would be accepted as conclusive for this purpose while the contract still stands, yet the contrary would be the case where the contract shows on its face that the property is not an equivalent for the amount of the capital which it is proposed to exempt from liability. For instance, if shares were contracted to be issued as paid up to the extent of £20,000, as against property which might be shown outside the contract to be worth only £15,000, the arrangement would probably hold water as in Wragg's Case (3) itself, where the discrepancy was one between a total of £35,000 and a total of £46,000. But if the agreement were that the property to be purchased should be valued, and that against this property shares should be issued as fully paid to an extent exceeding the amount of the valuation by one-third, the arrangement would, in my judgment, be bad as to this excess of one-third. It would to this extent be apparent on the fact of the contract that the attempted discharge of a part of the liability was illusory.

In the present case the liability to be discharged on one-fifth of all future increases of capital obviously and necessarily has no connection with or relation to the value of the concession. The case is far stronger in this respect than if cl. 8 related only to share capital issued for the purpose of exploiting the concession in question, for it applies to the whole increased capital of the company whatever the purpose for which it may be required. Indeed, the absurdity becomes specially obvious if the event is considered of a gas concession for any other place in China being transferred by the Glens to the company. In that case the company would, on the face of the agreement, have to pay the Glens the full value of the new concession, for the company are only to have the first refusal and are not to be entitled to any better terms than any other purchaser, and yet after paying the full price they would still be bound, in respect of any share capital raised to complete the purchase, to issue a further twenty-five per cent. to the Glens, and pay up or credit as paid up the whole of this twenty-five per cent. in full. It is true that an individual may contract to pay for property on any terms, and may find it convenient and choose to pay a price which shall be little or almost nothing in any ordinary event, but shall be increased tenfold or a hundredfold in certain improbable events altogether unconnected with any increase in the value of the property purchased. But I do not see how a limited company can speculate in this way consistently with the principles laid down in the cases to which I have referred. As I understand the legislation in question, as interpreted by the cases, the liability of a shareholder may be discharged either by the meal of cash or by the malt of property, services or the like; but this discharge will not take place if it is apparent that the malt bears no relation to the meal, and cannot, therefore, be estimated as being an equivalent for it. Can it be held here that the definite quantity of malt represented once and for all by the transfer of the concession is to be taken as the equivalent for ever of the obligation to render at any future time or times a wholly indefinite and unlimited quantity of meal? It seems to me that this question must be answered in the negative, and, indeed, that such a clause as cl. 8 could hardly have been introduced into the agreement of 1862 had the law on the subject been as fully ascertained at that date as it has since been.

I may add that I altogether dissent from the general principle contended for by junior counsel for the defendants that the agreement of 1862 must either be given effect to in full or set aside altogether. In numerous cases where a continuing clause in an agreement has been found to be bad after the main part of the agreement has been carried out, the offending clause is struck out without the result of the agreement being affected. A familiar instance is a purchase agreement containing restrictions in restraint of trade which are ultimately held to be contrary to public policy, as going beyond the reasonable protection of the covenantee. So far I have come to the conclusion that the provisions of cl. 8 for crediting as fully paid up the fifth of any future share capital issued to the representatives of Mr. Thomas Glen is unenforceable and void as being contrary to the requirements of the Act of 1856 as to capital. Does it follow that the whole of cl. 8 is bad? I think not. It appears to me, as I have already indicated, that the article divides itself into two portions, and no argument has been put before me to show that there is any objection to the earlier portion consisting in the obligation to allot to the concessionnaire one-fifth of the share capital from time to time issued: see Hilder v. Dexter (5). I propose, therefore, to declare that cl. 8 of this agreement in question is good so far as it creates an obligation to allot to Thomas Glen, his executors, administrators, or assigns, one-fifth of the increased capital from time to time of the company, but bad so far as it purports to relieve the allottee or allottees from liability to pay up all or any part of the nominal amount of such share capital. The points involved are difficult points of law, and each party has partly succeeded and partly failed. In my judgment, no order should be made as to costs.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. ALLEN AND ANOTHER

[COURT OF APPEAL (Buckley, Kennedy, L.JJ., and Scrutton, J.), May 18, 19, 20, 28, 1914]

Sale of Land—Restrictive covenant—Covenantee holding no adjoining land—Sale of land to purchaser taking with notice of the covenant—Enforcement of covenant.

An owner of land in the county of London having obtained the sanction of the London County Council to lay out a new street under s. 7 of the London Building Act, 1894, entered into a covenant with them in reference to a plot of land at the end of the proposed street, whereby he covenanted for himself, his heirs or assigns, and other the persons claiming under him, and so far as practicable, to bind the land into whosoever hands the same might come, not to "erect, or cause or permit to be erected, any building, structure, or other erection on the land . . . without the previous consent in writing of the council." The council did not own any land adjoining that for the protection of which the covenant was imposed. The plot of land was subsequently sold to the defendant, who had notice of the restrictive covenant, and she built houses on the land without having previously obtained the council's consent.

Held: where the covenantee had no adjoining land nor land affected by the covenant, i.e., no land capable of enjoyment, as against the land of the covenantor, of the benefit of the covenant, the derivative owner claiming under the covenantor was not bound by the covenant, and, therefore, the council was not entitled to enforce the covenant against the defendant.

Appeal from a decision of AVORY, J., in an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants, M. J. Allen, Emily Allen, Willcocks and Norris upon an indenture made between M. J. Allen and the plaintiffs, claiming certain mandatory injunctions and damages for breach of a covenant contained in that indenture. The covenant provided:

> "The applicant doth hereby for himself, his heirs and assigns, and other the persons claiming under him and so far as practicable to bind the land and hereditaments herein mentioned into whosoever hands the same may come, covenant and agree with the council that he and they will not erect or place, or cause or permit to be erected or placed, any building, structure, or other erection upon the land shown by green colour on the said plan, without the previous consent in writing of the council so to do, and that on every conveyance, sale, charge, mortgage, lease, assignment, or other dealing with the land herein mentioned or any part thereof he will give notice of the aforesaid covenant in every conveyance, transfer, mortgage, charge, lease, assignment, or other document by which such dealing is effected."

The land shown in green consisted of plot 1 and plot 2. In the deed M. J. Allen was described as the owner in fee simple of the land, whereas at that time he only had an option to purchase. Plot 1 was conveyed to M. J. Allen on July 3, 1908, and on the same day he mortgaged it to Willcocks. The mortgage was redeemed on Aug. 1, 1911, and Willcocks conveyed the land discharged from the incumbrance to Emily Allen in fee. In July, 1911, Emily Allen built three houses. On Oct. 9, 1911, she then charged the land together with the three messuages to Norris by way of mortgage. M. J. Allen had erected a wall on plot 2 which he contended was not a "building, structure, or other erection" within the meaning of the covenant. The plaintiffs claimed as against M. J. Allen and Emily Allen (i) a declaration that neither of them was entitled to erect or place or cause to be erected or placed, any building, structure, or other erection upon either of the plots; (ii) an order directing M. J. Allen, or alternatively Emily Allen, to pull down and remove the houses erected on plot 1; (iii) an order directing M. J. Allen to pull down and remove the wall erected on plot 2; (iv) an injunction restraining M. J. Allen, or alternatively, Emily Allen from erecting or placing, or causing to be erected or placed, any building, structure, or other erection upon plot 1, and a similar injuction against M. J. Allen as to plot 2; and (v) damages. As against Norris the plaintiffs claimed (i) a declaration that he was not entitled to retain upon plot 1 the three houses or any other building, structure, or other erection; (ii) an order directing him to pull down and remove or to concur with M. J. Allen and Emily Allen in pulling down and removing the houses.

It was admitted that the plaintiffs were not owners of any adjoining land, and that the covenant did not run with the land at law. Avory, J., was not satisfied that Emily Allen had not notice of the restrictive covenant. He held that Norris and Willcocks had constructive notice of it. He refused to grant a mandatory injunction to pull down the three houses, and awarded the plaintiffs nominal damages against the defendants M. J. Allen and Emily Allen with costs, and he gave judgment in favour of the defendant Norris without costs. As to plot 2, he held that the wall was a "structure" or "erection" within the meaning of the covenant, and made an order against M. J. Allen to pull down and remove it. All the defendants appealed, the defendant Norris by leave on the question of costs.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 28, 1914. The following judgments were read.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—This action is brought by the London County Council upon an indenture dated Jan. 24, 1907 made between the defendant Morris Joseph Allen of the one part and the London County Council of the other part, claiming certain mandatory injunctions and damages for breach of a covenant contained in that indenture. Before the date of the execution of the deed the defendant M. J. Allen had applied to the London County Council for their permission under s. 7 of the London Building Act, 1894 to his laying out a certain new road, called Galloway Road, running from south to north, and a further small portion of road at the northern end of Galloway Road running from east to west in continuation of a road called Dunraven Street. The London County Council gave their permission upon the terms, amongst other things, that this defendant should enter into a certain deed of covenant, and that was the deed of Jan. 24, 1907. The covenant in question was as follows: [HIS LORDSHIP read it, and continued:] The deed recited (but contrary to the fact) that the applicant was the owner in fee simple of the land in question. He was not. He had at the date of this deed of covenant merely an option of purchase, which might or might not result in his becoming owner of the land. The portions coloured green were two, namely, plot No. 1, being the continuation of Dunraven Street to the west of Galloway Road, and plot No. 2, being the continuation of Galloway Road to the north of Dunraven Street. It is necessary to deal with these two plots separately.

First as regards plot No. 1. On July 3, 1908 this was conveyed to the defendant M. J. Allen in fee. On the same day he mortgaged it with other land to one Willcocks to secure a sum of £3,600. On Aug. 1, 1911 the mortgage was redeemed, and Willcocks, with the concurrence of Allen, conveyed the land discharged from the incumbrance to the defendant Emily Allen in fee. On Oct. 9, 1911 Mrs. Allen charged the land, together with the three messuages then recently erected thereon, to the defendant Norris in fee by way of mortgage. In the interval, namely, in July, 1911, Mrs. Allen built on plot No. 1 and completed by the end of that month three houses. The writ in this action was issued on Aug. 5, 1911.

By virtue of ss. 7 and 9 of the London Building Act, 1894, the London County Council have certain powers of control over land which the owner proposes to form or lay out in streets. But they have no estate or interest in such land. The plaintiffs at the date of the deed of covenant had no estate or interest in any land adjoining or in any manner affected by the observance or non-observance of the covenant contained in the deed. Under these circumstances the defendants Mrs. Allen and Norris, who were not covenanting parties, contend upon this appeal that as matter of law, assuming that there has been a breach of the covenant contained in the deed of Jan. 24, 1907, and assuming (although as matter of separate contention they deny it as a fact) that they had notice of that covenant, the plaintiffs cannot as against them maintain any action upon the covenant contained in the deed. The short proposition is that as matter of law a derivative owner of land, deriving title under a person who has entered into a restrictive covenant concerning the land, is not bound by the covenant, even if he took with notice of its existence, if the covenantee has no land adjoining that for the protection of which the covenant was imposed or any land affected by the observance or non-observance of the covenant. I proceed to examine how the law upon this point stands upon the authorities.

The defendants do not contend that the covenant here in question runs with the land. It is the better opinion, and in Austerberry v. Oldham Corpn. (1) the Court of Appeal, by way of opinion and not of decision, held that the burden of a covenant, not involving a grant, never runs with the land at law except as between landlord and tenant. COTTON, L.J., said (29 Ch.D. at p. 776):

> "In order that the benefit may run with the land, the covenant must be one which relates to or touches and concerns the land of the covenantee."

The relation of landlord and tenant did not in the present case subsist between the plaintiffs, the covenantees and M. J. Allen, the covenantor. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs admit that this covenant did not run with the land at law. As between the covenantee and the owner deriving title under the covenantor there is no privity of contract, and the law is that it is only where there is privity of estate between landlord and tenant that the burden of a covenant will run with the land. Ownership of land, both by covenantor and covenantee, must exist in order that Spencer's Case (2) shall apply, and that the covenant shall run with the land. But it does not follow that the covenantee is without remedy where the covenant does not run with the land. Tulk v. Moxhay (3) established that as between the grantor of a restrictive covenant affecting certain land and the owner of adjoining land the covenantee may in equity enforce the covenant against the derivative owner taking with notice. The reasoning of LORD COTTENHAM'S judgment in Tulk v. Moxhay (3) is that if an owner of land sells part of it, reserving the rest, and takes from his purchaser a covenant that the purchaser shall use or abstain from using the land purchased in a particular way, that covenant (being one for the protection of the land reserved) is enforceable against a sub-purchaser with notice. The reason given is that, if that were not so, it would be impossible for an owner of land to sell part of it without incurring the risk of rendering what he retains worthless. If the vendor has retained no land which can be protected by the restrictive covenant, the basis of the reasoning of the judgment is swept away. In Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Building Society (4) the Court of Appeal declined to extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3) to covenants other than restrictive covenants. They rejected the doctrine that, inasmuch as the defendants took the land with notice of the covenants, they were bound in equity to perform them. That, therefore, is not the principle upon which the equitable doctrine rests. In the present case we are asked to extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3), so as to affirm that a restrictive covenant can be enforced against a derivative owner taking with notice by a person who never has had or who does not retain any land to be protected by the restrictive covenant in question. In my opinion the doctrine does not extend to that case. The doctrine is that a covenant not running with the land, but being a negative covenant entered into by an owner of land with an adjoining owner, binds the land in equity and is enforceable against a derivative owner taking with notice. The doctrine ceases to be applicable when the person seeking to enforce the covenant against the derivative owner has no land to be protected by the negative covenant. The fact that he has notice is in that case irrelevant.

The particular equity recognised in Tulk v. Moxhay (3) has been said to be analogous to an equitable charge upon land subsisting in the owner of the adjoining land, or to a negative easement enjoyed, not in gross, but by the adjoining land over the land to which the covenant relates. It arises from the possession by the covenantee of land enjoying the benefit of the negative covenant coupled with notice of the existence of the covenant. In London and South Western Rail. Co. v. Gomm (5) SIR GEORGE JESSEL says (20 Ch.D. at p. 583):

> "The doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3), rightly considered, appears to me to be either an extension in equity of the doctrine of Spencer's Case (2) to another line of cases, or else an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements; such, for instance, as a right to the access of light, which prevents the owner of the servient tenement from building so as to obstruct the light. The covenant in Tulk v. Moxhay (3) was affirmative in its terms, but was held by the court to imply a negative. Where there is a negative covenant expressed or implied, as, for instance, not to build so as to obstruct a view, or not to use a piece of land otherwise than as a garden, the court interferes on one or other of the above grounds. This is an equitable doctrine, establishing an exception to the rules of common law which did not treat such a covenant as running with the land, and it does not matter whether it proceeds on analogy to a covenant running with the land or on analogy to an easement."

A LINDLEY, L.J., says (ibid. at p. 587):

> "The first thing, therefore, the plaintiffs must show is, upon what legal principle the defendant is bound by a contract into which he did not enter . . . Upon what principle is it that he is bound in equity? It is said that he is bound in equity because he bought the land knowing of the covenant into which his predecessor in title had entered. That proposition stated generally assumes that every purchaser of land with notice of covenants into which his vendor has entered with reference to the land is bound in equity by all those covenants. That is precisely the proposition which had to be considered in Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society (4), and, because it was sought there to extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3) to a degree which was thought dangerous, considerable pains were taken by the court to point out the limits of that doctrine."

In Re Nesbet and Potts' Contract (6) this view of the matter is, I think, accepted, and in Formby v. Barker (7) and Millbourne v. Lyons (8) that view was, I think, definitely accepted by the Court of Appeal. In Formby v. Barker (7) the question arose between the assign of the covenantee and the derivative owner deriving title under the covenantor. So much of the judgment as relates to derivative title in the plaintiff is not pertinent to the present case. The London County Council have never assigned. They are original not derivative owners of the benefit of the easement. But the case is directly in point as regards the right of a proper plaintiff to sue the owner deriving title under the covenantor. There are interlocutory observations made during the argument which are important; for instance, ROMER, L.J., referring to Spencer's Case (2) and to Stokes v. Russell (9), says: "In equity you could only sue on such a covenant in respect of some land," and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.: "The plaintiff has no estate for the benefit of which the covenant was entered into." VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in the course of his judgment, pointed out that the plaintiff's testator had conveyed his whole estate, and had no contiguous estate which would be benefited by the covenant, and, after pointing out that the vendor had sold all his land, he goes on to say ([1903] 2 Ch. at pp. 550, 551):

> "It becomes necessary, therefore, to ascertain whether the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay (3) applies to a case in which the vendor sells his whole estate. I have not been able to find any case in which, after the sale of the whole of an estate in land, the benefit of a restrictive covenant has been enforced by injunction against an assignee of the purchaser at the instance of a plaintiff having no land retained by the vendor, although there are cases in which restrictive covenants seem to have been enforced at the instance of plaintiffs, other than the vendor, for the benefit of whose land it appears from the terms of the covenant, or can be inferred from surrounding circumstances, that the covenant was intended to operate. In all other cases the restrictive covenant would seem to be a mere personal covenant collateral to the conveyance. It is a covenant which cannot run with the land either at law or in equity, and, therefore, the burden of the covenant cannot be enforced against an assignee of the purchaser."

He then goes on to negative the proposition that the doctrine is based upon obligations on the conscience of the purchaser taking with notice of the covenant, quoting COLLINS, L.J., in Rogers v. Hosegood (10) ([1900] 2 Ch. 388 at p. 407):

> "The covenant must be one that is capable of running with the land before the question of the purchaser's conscience and the equity affecting it can come into discussion."

There is a further passage, which I do not read at length ([1903] 2 Ch. at p. 552). ROMER, L.J., gave judgment principally upon the question of the effect of the fact that the plaintiff was administratrix of the covenantee but he says (ibid. at p. 554):

"If restrictive covenants are entered into with a covenantee, not in respect of or concerning any ascertainable property belonging to him, or in which he is interested, then the covenant must be regarded, so far as he is concerned, as a personal covenant—that is, as one obtained by him for some personal purpose or object."

STIRLING, L.J., agreed with the other members of the court and dwelt upon the fact that the covenantee was not entitled to any land for the protection or benefit of which the restrictive covenants were or could be intended. Upon these judgments, and particularly upon the principal judgment as delivered by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., it seems to me that the Court of Appeal affirmed the view taken by SIR GEORGE JESSEL that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3) was either an extension of Spencer's Case (2) or of the equitable doctrine of negative easements, regarding it as something arising from the relation of two estates, the one to the other. In Millbourne v. Lyons (8) the decision rests upon a similar view. Inasmuch as at the date when the covenant was taken the covenantee had no land to which the benefit of the covenant could be attached, it was held that the benefits of the restrictive covenant could not enure against a derivative owner even where he took with notice. I have had the advantage of reading an advance copy of the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal. They all adopt this view.

On the other hand the decisions of the Court of Appeal in Catt v. Tourle (11) and of FRY, J., in Luker v. Dennis (12) undoubtedly create a difficulty. In Catt v. Tourle (11) SELWYN, L.J., referred to Wilson v. Hart (13). But that is a case upon which the difficulty, as it seems to me, does not arise. The land there was part of a building estate, and it would seem that there were other lands of the covenantee in respect of which the benefit of the covenant might be enjoyed. I do not, it is true, find that that was the case in Catt v. Tourle (11). But on the other hand the Court do not seem to have considered and given judgment upon the exact point here raised, namely, whether the covenantee had any land in respect of which the benefit could be enjoyed. The question of fact, whether there was or not ownership of other land, is nowhere mentioned either affirmatively or negatively, and no decision was given upon the point now under consideration. The concluding words of SELWYN, L.J.'s, judgment are not consistent with later authorities. Upon the general abstract question, whether a person purchasing with such a covenant, as there mentioned, is to be bound by it, the answer must be in the negative. Notwithstanding what was said by KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., in De Mattos v. Gibson (14) (4 De G. & J. 276, at p. 282), it is not true as a general proposition that a purchaser of property with notice of a restrictive covenant affecting the property is bound by the covenant. This may be illustrated by the cases relating to the sale of chattels, such as Taddy & Co. v. Sterious & Co. (15) and McGruther v. Pitcher (16). The proposition is true only in certain cases, such as Spencer's Case (2) and Tulk v. Moxhay (3). The passage already quoted from LINDLEY, L.J., in London and South Western Rail. Co. v. Gomm (5) (20 Ch.D. at p. 587), and the decision in Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society (4) are enough to dispose of this point. In Luker v. Dennis (12) the covenant related as well to a public-house which was leased by the brewer to the covenanting publican, and also to another public-house which the publican held under a different landlord, and FRY, J., held that the covenant was binding in equity upon an assignee of the second public-house who had notice of the covenant. The point here in question certainly arose, but the point which the learned judge expressly decided was another, namely, that Keppell v. Bailey (17) had been displaced by Tulk v. Moxhay (3). The decision in Luker v. Dennis (12) was in 1877, and since that date this doctrine has been so examined and developed by London and South Western Rail. Co. v. Gomm (5) (20 Ch.D. at p. 587), Austerberry v. Oldham Corpn. (1), and quite recently by Formby v. Barker (7) and Milbourn v. Lyons (8) that it cannot, I think, be relied upon as now accurately stating the law. Further, as regards Catt v. Tourle (11), which was a

A decision of the Court of Appeal, we are of course bound by that decision, but again that was in 1869, and since that date the decisions to which I have referred seem to me to have recognised and established the principle to which we are bound to give effect, and, as I have already pointed out, the decision in Catt v. Tourle (11) does not deal with the exact point now in debate. As regards Clegg v. Hands (18) I do not feel any difficulty. The case was one as between lessor and B lessee.

Upon the authorities, therefore, as a whole I am of opinion that the doctrine in Tulk v. Moxhay (3) does not extend to the case in which the covenantee has no land capable of enjoying, as against the land of the covenantor, the benefit of the restrictive covenant. The doctrine is either an extension in equity of the doctrine in Spencer's Case (2) (in which ownership of land by both covenantor and C covenantee is essential) or an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements, a doctrine applicable not to the case of easements in gross, but to an easement enjoyed by one land upon another land. Where the covenantee has no land, the derivative owner claiming under the covenantor is bound neither in contract nor by the equitable doctrine which attaches in the case where there is land capable of enjoying the restrictive covenant. The appeal of Emily Allen and Norris D upon the point of law in my opinion succeeds.

Under these circumstances it is not necessary to determine whether they had notice or not. Upon that question we have not heard the appellants. But, if this case should go further, that point will be open to them in the House of Lords.

As regards the defendant M. J. Allen, he is not within the considerations above E dealt with. He was the covenanting party. The erection of the three houses was a breach of covenant. The learned judge has refused any injunction, but has given nominal damages for the technical breach. He has also given the plaintiffs, as against this defendant, the general costs of the action. The only matter which here requires observation is the question of costs. I will mention this presently. Secondly, as regards plot No. 2, the only defendant concerned in this matter is the defendant F M. J. Allen. He contends first that the wall which he erected on this plot was not a building, erection, or other structure within the covenant. The object of the covenant was to secure that plot No. 2 should remain unobstructed so as to be available for the extension of Galloway Road to the north. The wall is an erection which creates such an obstruction. It is, within the literal words of the deed, an erection or structure, and it is within the object of the deed. It is, to my mind, plain that its erection was G a breach of the covenant. But, further, this defendant says that there was at this place a sharp drop in the surface of the soil, and that a fence was necessary for the protection of the public; that the wall was only a 9 in. wall bonded into the walls on either side of the roadway to prevent it from falling, and was no more than a temporary fence. If this had been the case put forward at the trial there would have been no difficulty in the matter. This defendant might have offered an undertaking H to remove this, which he says is a mere temporary fence, if and when requested to do so. He did nothing of the sort. He maintained that it was no breach of the covenant, and that he was entitled to maintain it. In this, in my judgment, he was wrong. In the absence of such an undertaking or offer the order to pull down this wall was, I think, rightly made. As regards the order for costs as against the defendant M. J. Allen, I have felt some doubt whether the costs ought not to have I been divided as between the two plots. As regards plot No. 2 the defendant M. J. Allen was wrong, and would have to pay the plaintiffs' costs. As regards plot No. 1 the plaintiffs failed in obtaining the order to pull down for which they asked., and they recovered merely nominal damages. I have doubted whether in respect of this latter part of the action they ought to have costs against the defendant Allen, but I have arrived at the conclusion that the case is not one in which we ought to interfere. The learned judge in his discretion did not think proper to divide the costs as above suggested, and in giving the general costs as against the defendant M. J. Allen I think he was making an order which we ought not to review.

The result is that as against the defendants Emily Allen and Norris the action will be dismissed with costs, including their costs in this court, and as regards M. J. Allen his appeal will be dismissed with costs.

KENNEDY, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of reading and considering the judgments in this case which have been prepared by BUCKLEY, L.J., and SCRUTTON, J. I concur in the conclusions at which they have arrived. I only desire to add that, as regards plot 1 and the demurrer raised by Mrs. Allen and Mr. Norris to the plaintiffs' claim in regard to that property, I concur because, as the judgments of my colleagues point out, the most recent decisions of this court, and especially the decision in Formby v. Barker (7), bind us, I think, so to hold, whatever might be my own opinion, if I was not controlled by such recent decisions, but free, in accordance with judicial authority in earlier cases which SCRUTTON, J., has cited in order of date, from Tulk v. Moxhay (3) down to the year 1882, to treat a restrictive covenant in regard to the use of land as enforceable in equity at the suit of the covenantee, although he may retain no other land which can be affected by the covenant, against an assign of the covenantor who has acquired the land with notice of the restrictive covenant.

SCRUTTON, J.—In this case the London County Council on Jan. 24, 1907, entered into an indenture with one Morris Joseph Allen, a builder, describing himself as "the owner in fee simple of certain land," by which he covenanted: [HIS LORDSHIP read the covenant, and continued:] The plots coloured green were two plots intended to be reserved for the making of roads. On plot No. 1, in July, 1911 three houses were built by Mrs. Allen; on plot No. 2 a wall was built by Allen. The London County Council thereupon issued a writ claiming a mandatory injunction to pull down the houses and wall respectively. Thereupon it was alleged that as to plot No. 1 the legal estate was in one Norris as mortgagee, and the equity of redemption in Mrs. Allen, who had taken title from Mr. Allen and Willcocks, his mortgagee, who had no notice of the restrictive covenant; and it was contended (i) by way of demurrer that as the London County Council were not neighbouring landowners, or grantors of the plot in question, a covenant by Allen in their favour was only a personal covenant, and could not affect the land when in the hands of assigns of Allen, whether they had notice of the covenant or not. It was said that to affect them the right must be in the nature of a negative easement; that an easement required both a dominant and a servient tenement; and that as the council had no land to which the benefit of the covenant could attach, there could be no dominant tenement, and therefore no negative easement binding on a servient tenement, but only an easement in gross, which did not bind assigns of the land. (ii) It was alleged that the defendants Mrs. Allen and Norris could prove they were purchasers for value of the legal estate without notice of the covenant, and therefore not bound by it. AVORY, J., found on the second contention as a fact that Mrs. Allen and Norris had not satisfied him they had not notice, actual or constructive, of the covenant. On the first contention he said:

> "It was contended before me that this restrictive covenant being in the nature of a negative easement, the action would not lie except at the suit of a covenantee who was at the time of the covenant in possession of land which required protection, and that the plaintiffs were not at the time in possession of any such land. But having regard to the powers vested in the London County Council under ss. 7 and 9 of the London Building Act, 1894, and to the admission made in the argument before me that the conditions imposed in this case were not ultra vires, I think this contention fails."

He apparently treated the duty and interest of the county council in the matter of new streets as sufficient to make the covenant bind the land in the hands of assigns from Allen. This court determined to decide the first contention before hearing argument on the second, and we have now to decide on the first contention. Counsel on each side agreed that the burden of this covenant would not run with the land at law, so as to bind assigns, for the reason stated in the notes to Spencer's Case (2) (1 Smith, L.C. (11th Edn.) p. 88), that

> "there appears to be no authority which has decided, apart from the equitable doctrine of notice [by which is meant, as herinafter explained, the doctrine identified with the case of Tulk v. Moxhay (3)], that the burden of a covenant will run with land in any case except that of landlord and tenant."

This opinion appears to be justified by the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Austerberry v. Oldham Corpn. (1), specially that of LINDLEY, L.J., and FRY, L.J. The question, then, is whether it is essential to the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3) that the covenantee should have at the time of the creation of the covenant, and afterwards, land for the benefit of which the covenant is created, in order that the burden of the covenant may bind assigns of the land to which it relates. It is clear that the covenantee may sue the covenantor himself, though the former has parted with the land to which the covenant relates: Stokes v. Russell (9). To answer the question as to the assigns of the covenantor and the land in their hands requires the investigation of the historical growth of the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3). Though the covenantee in that case did hold adjacent land, there is no trace in the judgment of LORD COTTENHAM of the requirement that the covenantee should have and continue to hold land to be benefited by the covenant. I read LORD COTTENHAM'S judgment as proceeding entirely on the question of notice of the covenant, and on the equitable ground that a man purchasing land with notice that there was a covenant not to use it in a particular way would not be allowed to violate the covenant he knew of when he bought the land. LORD COTTENHAM states the question (2 Ph. at pp. 777, 778),

> "Whether a party shall be permitted to use the land in a manner inconsistent with the contract entered into by his vendor and with notice of which he purchased," and answers it:

> "If there was a mere agreement and no covenant, this court would enforce it against a party purchasing with notice of it; for if an equity is attached to the property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased."

Up to 1881, when counsel in Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society (4) stated that Tulk v. Moxhay (3) had been applied in fifteen cases, I cannot trace, nor could counsel before us discover, that Tulk v. Moxhay (3) had been based on anything but notice of the covenant by the assignee. In the case cited, in which the Court of Appeal refused to extend the doctrine to an affirmative covenant to repair, LINDLEY, L.J., said (8 Q.B.D. at p. 410):

> "The result of these cases is that only such a covenant as can be complied with without expenditure of money will be enforced against the assignee on the ground of notice."

BRETT, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 408):

> "That case [Tulk v. Moxhay (3)], decided that an assignee taking land subject to a certain class of covenants is bound by such covenants if he has notice of them, and that the class of covenants comprehended within the rule is that covenants restricting the mode of using the land only will be enforced."

COTTON, L.J., after citing LORD COTTENHAM that > "No one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased,"

said (ibid at p. 409):

"This lays down the real principle that an equity attaches to the owner of the land."

Meanwhile, in De Mattos v. Gibson (14), in 1858, KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., had put the principle as applying to all property thus (4 De G. & J. at p. 282):

"Reason and justice seem to prescribe that, at least as a general rule, where a man, by gift or purchase, acquires property from another, with knowledge of a previous contract, lawfully and for valuable consideration made by him with a third person, to use and employ the property for a particular purpose in a specified manner, the acquirer shall not, to the material damage of the third person, in opposition to the contract and inconsistently with it, use and employ the property in a manner not allowable to the giver or seller," resting the matter on knowledge of the previous contract, that is notice. In Catt v. Tourle (11) A., a brewer, had sold to B. with a covenant that he should have the exclusive right to supply all ale consumed in any public-house erected on the land. C., with knowledge of the covenant, bought part of the land from B., erected a public-house on it, but did not take his beer from A. The Court of Appeal, citing De Mattos v. Gibson (14), restrained C., treating the covenant as negative, and resting the judgment on the ground that C.

"clearly purchased with notice of the present covenant, and . . . cannot be heard to say that he is now entitled to disregard its provisions."

It is to be noted that A. is not stated to have owned any land, and as he might brew beer anywhere, the covenant could not relate to any particular land of his.

In Luker v. Dennis (12) in 1877, A., a brewer, granted a lease to B. of public-house X., with a covenant that B. should take from him all beer consumed not only in X., but also in public-house Y., which B. held of a different landlord. C. took public-house Y. from B. with notice of the covenant, and did not take his beer from A. It was argued before FRY, J., that notice was not enough unless the covenantee had some interest in the land bound by the covenant, either as vendor or lessor. That learned judge refused to accede to this argument, and, citing De Mattos v. Gibson (14) and Catt v. Tourle (11), granted the injunction, giving, as he said, effect to the equitable doctrine of notice. I think up to this point the doctrine had been rested on notice, and did not depend on the covenantee having land in favour of which the covenant was created.

The first departure from this position occurs in the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in London and South Western Rail. Co. v. Gomm (5) in the following year, March, 1882. The contract to be enforced was one to re-convey land on notice, and clearly, therefore, an affirmative covenant, and, as such, within the doctrine laid down in Haywood's Case (4) in December, 1881, excluding such contracts from the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3). The court also held that the sale was ultra vires the railway company, and void for remoteness. But SIR GEORGE JESSEL, holding that the covenant did, but for its being ultra vires and void, create an interest in the land, discussed the nature of the right. He said:

"The doctrine of that case [Tulk v. Moxhay (3)] rightly considered, appears to me to be either an extension in equity of the doctrine of Spencer's Case (2) to another line of cases, or else an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements; such, for instance, as a right to the access of light, which prevents the owner of the servient tenement from building so as to obstruct the light. The covenant in Tulk v. Moxhay (3) was affirmative in its terms, but was held by the court to imply a negative. Where there is a negative covenant expressed or implied, as, for instance, not to build so as to obstruct a view, or not to use a piece of land otherwise than as a garden, the court interferes on one or other of the above grounds. This is an equitable doctrine, establishing an exception

A to the rules of common law which did not treat such a covenant as running with the land, and it does not matter whether it proceeds on analogy to a covenant running with the land or on analogy to an easement. The purchaser took the estate subject to the equitable burden, with the qualification that if he acquired the legal estate for value without notice he was freed from the burden. That qualification, however, did not affect the nature of the burden; B the notice was required merely to avoid the effect of the legal estate, and did not create the right, and if the purchaser took only an equitable estate he took subject to the burden, whether he had notice or not."

It will be noticed that the equitable estate or burden was held to arise independent of notice, which I respectfully think was contrary to the previous authorities, and C that in SIR GEORGE JESSEL'S view it did not matter whether it was by analogy to covenants running with the land, or on analogy to an easement. Both, however, had this in common, that some land belonging to the covenantee was required, either for him to let, that the covenant might run with the land, or as a dominant tenement for the easement, an easement in gross being merely a personal right. Whether the "analogy" or "extension" spoken of by SIR GEORGE JESSEL involved D this condition as to land is not discussed. The other members of the court did not discuss the foundation of Tulk v. Moxhay (3), though LINDLEY, L.J., seems again to put it on notice. Catt v. Tourle (11)—a decision of the Court of Appeal—and Luker v. Dennis (12) were not cited to the court.

In 1890, in Clegg v. Hands (18), the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3) was applied by the Court of Appeal to a case somewhat similar to Catt v. Tourle (11) without any E discussion of SIR GEORGE JESSEL'S explanation of the doctrine. The case, however, being one of landlord and tenant. In Rogers v. Hosegood (10), in 1900, A., the mortgagor, and B., the mortgagee of some land, conveyed plot X., to C., who entered into a restrictive covenant with the mortgagor only, who had not the legal estate in the land. This plot X. was purchased by D. with notice of the restrictive covenant. A. also conveyed some of his adjoining land, plot Y., to E., who had F no notice of the restrictive covenant on plot X. D. then proceeded to erect buildings on plot X., said to contravene the restrictive covenant. E. then sued D. to enforce the covenant. FARWELL, J., treated D. as obviously bound by the covenant.

"He is obviously bound, by reason, of notice, whether the covenant as regards him runs with the land or not."

G (This expression of the reason why he is bound does not harmonise with the later decisions, but does, I think, with all the earlier ones.) And he held that the benefit of the covenant passes to E. at law running with his land. There was an appeal. In the course of the argument of Mr. Haldane, Q.C., that the covenant ran with the land in equity, RIGBY, L.J., said ([1900] 2 Ch. at p. 401):

"I do not think any covenant runs with the land in equity. The equitable H doctrine is that a person who takes with notice of a covenant is bound by it"; a remark again which seems to me to harmonise with the earlier authorities. The court held that the benefit of the covenant did not run with the land at law, as the covenantee, the mortgagor, had no legal interest in the land, but did run with the land at equity, as there was a clear intention to benefit that land, and equity would regard the mortgagor as the owner, and, citing SIR GEORGE JESSEL, I M.R., in London and South Western Rail. Co. v. Gomm (5) (20 Ch.D. at p. 583), continued ([1900] 2 Ch. at pp. 405, 406):

"These observations, which are just as applicable to the benefit reserved as to the burden imposed, show that in equity, just as at law, the first point to be determined is whether the covenant or contract in its inception binds the land. If it does, it is then capable of passing with the land to subsequent assignees; if it does not, it is incapable of passing by mere assignment of the land. The benefit may be annexed to one plot and the burden to another, and when this has been once clearly done the benefit and the burden pass to the respective assignees, subject, in the case of the burden, to proof that the legal estate, if acquired, has been acquired with notice of the covenant."

This makes land bound or benefited by the covenant essential to bind or benefit assigns. The judgment proceeds:

"These authorities [Renals v. Cowlishaw (19) (9 Ch.D. at p. 130), and Child v. Douglas (20) (Kay, at p. 571)] establish the proposition that, when the benefit has been once clearly annexed to one piece of land, it passes by assignment of that land, and may be said to run with it, in contemplation as well of equity as of law, without proof of special bargain or representation on the assignment. In such a case it runs, not because the conscience of either party is affected, but because the purchaser has bought something which inhered in or was annexed to the land bought. This is the reason why, in dealing with the burden, the purchaser's conscience is not affected by notice of covenants which were part of the original bargain on the first sale, but were merely personal and collateral, while it is affected by notice of those which touch and concern the land. The covenant must be one that is capable of running with the land before the question of the purchaser's conscience and the equity affecting it can come into discussion."

This again appears to me to treat land as essential, on both sides of the covenant, to affect assigns whether of the benefit or burden.

This view seems to me to be adopted also by the Court of Appeal in Formby v. Barker (7). A., the owner of land, conveyed all his land with a restrictive covenant against its being used in particular ways to B., who assigned it to C., who had notice of the covenant. A. died; C. began to use the land in a way forbidden by the covenant; the administratrix of A., who had no land, sued C. It was argued that the right to enforce such a covenant depended entirely on notice; members of the court suggested in argument that the benefit of the covenant, if not pursued by the covenantee, must follow some land; and this was the argument put forward for the defendant, that without the land the covenant was only one in gross. ROMER, L.J., asked ([1903] 2 Ch. at p. 546),

"Is there any case in which it has been held that such a covenant purporting to bind land for ever is valid except for the protection of an estate?"

and counsel for the plaintiff did not refer him, as they might have done, to Catt v. Tourle (11) and Luker v. Dennis (12), in neither of which cases had the plaintiffs an estate, but only a trade. In the judgments, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., points out that A. conveyed his whole estate and had no contiguous estate which would be benefited by the covenant in question. I refer to, but do not read, the lord justice's judgment, but it seems to me, adopting the language of COLLINS, L.J., in Rogers v. Hosegood (10) ([1900] 2 Ch. at p. 407), to negative the view that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3) depends on notice, and to make it depend, where there is no contractual privity, on a "relation of dominancy and serviency of lands," and to fail if the covenantee or his assign has no land to which the covenant relates. ROMER, L.J., thought that the assign of a covenantee could not sue unless the covenant related to or concerned some ascertainable property belonging to him or in which he was interested. STIRLING, L.J., while saying that different considerations would apply if the covenantee sued, a remark which leaves it doubtful whether he thought the covenantee could, though owning no land, have sued assigns of the land restricted, rested his judgment on the ground that damages, not injunction, would be the appropriate remedy.

The doctrine was again considered, and I think further developed in Re Nesbet and Potts' Contract (6) in 1905. The owner of certain land had entered into restrictive covenants with the vendor, who owned an adjoining estate. A squatter, without notice of these covenants, acquired a title by adverse possession, and

A sold to A., who did not require a forty years' title, which would have disclosed the restrictive covenants. A. sold to B., who, having reason to believe there were restrictive covenants, declined to complete. B. took out a summons for a declaration that the title was not one which he ought to be compelled to accept. FARWELL, J., treated the nature of the right of action created under the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3) as analogous to an equitable charge on real estate, not depending in B any way on notice for its validity, but only defeated by a legal estate acquired for value and without notice. He held, therefore, that the squatter, though he had notice and had the legal estate, was bound by the restrictive covenants, as apparently he only took the land subject to the equitable interest in it, and that as the purchaser from the squatter of the legal estate for value would, if he had required a forty years' title, have had notice of the covenants, he had constructive notice and C was bound by the covenants. In the Court of Appeal the appellant argued that notice was part of the course of action, the respondent that the doctrine rested on an interest in land, binding on the land itself, with a dominant and servient tenement. The Court of Appeal adopted the latter argument, and held that the restrictive covenant was an equitable interest in the land, whether the occupier of the land had notice of it or not, unless he had purchased the legal estate for value D without notice. They do not expressly refer to the necessity of there being a dominant tenement to enforce the interest, but there was in fact such a dominant tenement in the case. Lastly, in Millbourne v. Lyons (8), where a person who had agreed to sell with a restrictive covenant died, and his personal representatives, having sold all their land, conveyed with a similar restrictive covenant, NEVILLE, J., enforced the title against a purchaser who knew of the restrictive covenant, E and, therefore, objected to complete, on the ground that there was no restriction against him, as the vendors, at the date of the covenant, had no land to which the benefit of the covenant could be attached, and the Court of Appeal affirmed his judgment on similar grounds.

I think the result of this long chain of authorities is that, whereas to my view, at the time of Tulk v. Moxhay (3) (1848), and for at least twenty years afterwards, F the plaintiffs in this case would have succeeded against an assign on the ground that the assign had notice of the covenant, since Formby v. Barker (7), Re Nesbet and Potts' Contract (6), and Millbourne v. Lyons (8) three decisions of the Court of Appeal, the plaintiffs must fail on the ground that they have never had any land for the benefit of which this "equitable interest analogous to a negative easement" G could be created, and, therefore, cannot sue a person who bought the land with knowledge that there was a restrictive covenant as to its use, which he proceeds to disregard, because he is not privy to the contract. I think the learned editors of DART ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER (7th Edn.) vol. 2, p. 769, are justified by the present state of the authorities in saying that > "the question of notice to the purchaser has nothing whatever to do with the H question whether the covenant binds him, except in so far as the absence of notice may enable him to raise the plea of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice."

If the covenant does not run with the land in law, its benefit can only be asserted against an assign of the land burdened, if the covenant was made for the benefit I of certain land, all or some of which remains in the possession of the covenantee or his assign, suing to enforce the covenant. It may be, if the matter is considered by a higher tribunal, that tribunal may see its way to revert to what I think was the earlier doctrine of notice, or at any rate to treat it as co-existing with the later refinement of "an equitable interest analogous to a negative easement" binding on persons who are ignorant of it. The remarks of LORD SELBORNE in Earl of Zetland v. Hislop (21) (7 App. Cas. at pp. 446, 447), are not favourable to the too rigid development or enforcement of the latter alternative; and the observations of LORD MACNAGHTEN ([1902] A.C. at p. 32), LORD DAVEY (ibid. at p. 35), and LORD

LINDLEY (ibid. at p. 36) in Noakes & Co., Ltd. v. Rice (22) seem to suggest that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (3) may well be reconsidered and put on a proper footing. For I regard it as very regrettable that a public body should be prevented from enforcing a restriction on the use of property imposed for the public benefit against persons who bought the property knowing of the restriction, by the apparently immaterial circumstance that the public body does not own any land in the immediate neighbourhood. But, after careful consideration of the authorities, I am forced to the view that the later decisions of this court compel me so to hold. In my opinion, therefore, the demurrer of Mr. Norris and of Mrs. Allen succeeds. The action against Mr. Norris must be dismissed with costs. I regret that I do not see my way to depriving Mrs. Allen of her costs, as, whatever may be her equitable rights, I am not at all favourably impressed with her conduct as a good citizen. I see no reason for interfering with the judgment against Mr. Allen in respect of plots No. 1 or 2, and his appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal of Norris and Emily Allen allowed. Appeal of M. J. Allen dismissed.

Re BOALER. Re VEXATIOUS ACTIONS ACT, 1896

[COURT OF APPEAL (Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ., and Scrutton, J.), May 21, 29, 1914]

[Reported [1915] 1 K.B. 21; 83 L.J.K.B. 1629; 111 L.T. 497; 30 T.L.R. 580; 58 Sol. Jo. 634; 24 Cox, C.C. 335; 78 J.P. Jo. 280]

Vexatious Action—Order prohibiting institution of "legal proceedings"—Inclusion of criminal proceedings—Vexatious Actions Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict., c. 51), s. 1.

By s. 1 of the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896 [see now Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925 (18 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 472), s. 51], the High Court may, on the application of the Attorney-General, if satisfied "that any person has habitually and persistently instituted vexatious legal proceedings without any reasonable ground for instituting such proceedings . . . against the same person or against different persons," make an order that no "legal proceedings shall be instituted" by that person in the High Court or any other court, unless he obtains the leave of the High Court or some judge thereof, and satisfies the court or judge that such legal proceeding is not an abuse of the process of the court, and that there is a primâ facie ground for such proceedings."

Held: by KENNEDY, L.J., and SCRUTTON, J. (BUCKLEY, L.J., dissenting), that the words "legal proceedings" in the section do not include criminal as well as civil proceedings.

Appeal by the Attorney-General from a decision of the Divisional Court (DARLING and LUSH, JJ., BANKES, J., dissenting), reported [1914] 1 K.B. 122, on a motion by the applicant, Bernard Boaler, for an order discharging an order made against him by the Divisional Court on Dec. 17, 1910, under the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896.

It appeared that Mr. Boaler, believing himself to be entitled to some 800 shares in John Esson & Son, Ltd., about the year 1907 commenced a series of actions against that company, and, as stated in the affidavit of Mr. Howes, the liquidator appointed in the voluntary winding-up of the company, filed in November, 1910, up to that time some forty-six separate and distinct legal proceedings in connection with the company. In practically all of this large amount of litigation Mr. Boaler had been unsuccessful. Upon the application of the Attorney-General for an order against Mr. Boaler under the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896, the Divisional Court (RIDLEY, PICKFORD and HAMILTON, JJ.), after hearing the Attorney-General and Mr. Boaler, gave judgment granting the application, and on Dec. 17, 1910, made the following order against Mr. Boaler under s. 1 of the Act:

> "It is ordered that no legal proceedings shall be instituted by the said Bernard Boaler in the High Court or in any other court unless he obtains the leave of the High Court or some judge thereof and satisfies the court or judge that such legal proceeding is not an abuse of the process of the court and there is a primâ facie ground for such proceeding."

Leave to appeal from that order was refused by the Court of Appeal. In his affidavit, filed in support of the present motion, Mr. Boaler stated that on May 21, 1913, he gave the clerk of the Central Criminal Court notice that he proposed at the next ensuing sessions to be held on May 27 to present a bill of indictment against John Esson & Sons, Ltd., in respect of certain misdemeanours committed within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, of which the courts of summary jurisdiction had no jurisdiction to hear and determine or to commit for trial; that on May 28 he was requested by an official in the indictment office of that court to go to the recorder who was then sitting, who, on reading the order, said that in his opinion the order of Dec. 17, 1910, made against Mr. Boaler prohibited him from instituting any legal proceedings unless he had obtained the leave of the High Court or some judge thereof to present the bill of indictment to the grand jury, and said that he could not institute criminal proceedings without the leave of the High Court or some judge thereof. The applicant had also applied to a magistrate for a summons upon an information sworn by him, but he was then told that the order made against him was a bar to his so proceeding, though Mr. Boaler stated that the magistrate had not given any reason for his refusal. Thus, on these two occasions on which the applicant attempted to take criminal proceedings he was prevented from so doing by the order against him. In order to obtain the decision of the court upon the question whether the order of Dec. 17, 1910, prevented him from instituting criminal proceedings, the applicant on June 18, 1913, served upon the Attorney-General, John Esson & Son, Ltd., and Mr. Howes, as the liquidator of the company, a notice of motion that, by leave of the Divisional Court, the Divisional Court would be moved for an order declaring that the order made on Dec. 17, 1910, did not prevent him from instituting criminal proceedings; that the order might be discharged upon the grounds specified in the affidavit; and, in the alternative, for an order limiting the order of Dec. 17, 1910, to civil legal proceedings, and, in the further alternative, for an order declaring that upon the construction of the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896, the High Court had no jurisdiction to make an order to abrogate the applicant's common law rights as a citizen to prefer a bill of indictment to the grand jury of the Central Criminal Court.

Section 1 of the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896 [see now Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 51], which was entitled an "Act to prevent the abuse of the process of the High Court or other courts by the institution of vexatious legal proceedings," provides:

> "It shall be lawful for the Attorney-General to apply to the High Court for an order under this Act, and if he satisfies the High Court that any person has habitually and persistently instituted vexatious legal proceedings, without any reasonable ground for instituting such proceedings, whether in the High Court or in any inferior court, and whether against the same person or against different persons, the court may, after hearing such person or giving him an opportunity of being heard, after assigning counsel in case such person is unable on account of poverty to retain counsel, order that no legal proceedings shall be instituted by that person in the High Court or any other court unless he obtains the leave of the High Court or some judge thereof, and satisfies the court or judge that such legal proceeding is not an abuse of the process of the court, and that there is a primâ facie ground for such proceedings. . . ."

The Divisional Court made the following order:

> "Upon hearing Mr. Solicitor-General of counsel for the Crown, Mr. Sims of counsel for John Esson & Son, Ltd., and for the liquidator of such limited company, and Bernard Boaler in person on his notice of motion herein dated June 18, 1913, and mature deliberation thereupon had: This court doth declare that criminal offences are not within the meaning of the words "legal proceedings" mentioned in the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896."

The Attorney-General appealed.

May 29, 1914. The following judgments were read. Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—In point of form the application with which we have to deal is singular, and a short statement is necessary in order to make plain how the matter comes before the court. On Dec. 17, 1921, upon reading an affidavit of Edward Kennedy Howes, an order was made under the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896, in the terms of that Act prohibiting Mr. Boaler from instituting legal proceedings. The affidavit I have mentioned was one which stated that Mr. Boaler had brought, made, moved, taken out, lodged, supported, or caused forty-six separate and distinct legal proceedings in connection with a company called John Esson & Son, Ltd., of which short particulars were set out in a schedule to the affidavit. Nos. 2 to 7 in the schedule were informations by way of institution of criminal proceedings. On June 2, 1913, Mr. Boaler served a notice of motion in the Divisional Court, asking for an order declaring that the order of Dec. 17, 1910, did not prevent the applicant from instituting criminal proceedings. It appears that he had after Dec. 17, 1910, and before June 2, 1913, attempted to institute criminal proceedings in two cases. In the one he attempted to prefer a bill of indictment before a grand jury at the Central Criminal Court, and in the other he applied to a magistrate to grant him a summons upon an information sworn by him. Upon that motion of June 2 the Divisional Court made no order except that Mr. Boaler was to be at liberty to serve a fresh notice of motion praying that the order of Dec. 17, 1910, be discharged, or, in the alternative, that the same be limited to a prohibition in civil proceedings. Under the leave thus given Mr. Boaler on June 18, 1913, served a notice of motion for an order discharging the order of Dec. 17, 1910, upon grounds there assigned, or in the alternative for an order limiting the order to civil proceedings, or for a declaration that upon the construction of the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896, the High Court has no jurisdiction to make an order preventing him from preferring a bill of indictment to a grand jury. Upon that motion the order now under appeal was made. It would seem that by arrangement, in the presence of the Attorney-General and of Mr. Boaler, the court heard an argument and expressed an opinion upon the construction of the Act, and, without going into other grounds upon which Mr. Boaler wished to contend that the order of Dec. 17, 1910, was wrong, declared "that criminal offences are not within the meaning of the words 'legal proceedings' mentioned in the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896." The word "offences" must here be a mistake for "proceedings." It is from this order that the Attorney-General appeals to this court. It seems to me, and I think that was the view taken in the court below, that the Attorney-General might have objected to any order at all being made upon Mr. Boaler's motion of June 18, but he did not do so, and, by agreement, the question of the construction of the Act was argued and decided by the court.

Under these circumstances I think this court can properly review the decision of the Divisional Court, although, technically, it is difficult to say how in such a form of proceeding the jurisdiction to make, or the true construction of the order of Dec. 17, 1910, could be raised and decided. The only question before us, and the only question I propose to consider, is the true construction of the Act of Parliament. The Act is one which contains no preamble. In the words of Lord Macnaghten in Vacher & Sons, Ltd. v. London Society of Compositors (1) ([1913] A.C. at p. 118),

> "In the absence of a preamble there can, I think, be only two cases in which it is permissible to depart from the ordinary and natural sense of the words of an enactment. It must be shown either that the words taken in their natural sense lead to some absurdity, or that there is some other clause in the body of the Act inconsistent with, or repugnant to, the enactment in question construed in the ordinary sense of the language in which it is expressed."

His Lordship had immediately before quoted the language of Tindal, C.J., in the Sussex Peerage Case (2) (11 Cl. & Fin. at p. 143):

> "If the words of the statute are in themselves precise and unambiguous, then no more can be necessary than to expound those words in their natural and ordinary sense. The words themselves alone do, in such case, best declare the intention of the lawgiver."

It is upon this principle that I must proceed to construe this Act of Parliament. Section 2 of the Act gives it a short title—namely, "The Vexatious Actions Act, 1896." The marginal note to s. 1 runs: "Power of court to prohibit institution of action without leave." The word "action" is not elsewhere found in or about the statute. I set wholly out of consideration the fact that the word "action" is thus used. As to title, the matter is governed by the title placed at the head of the Act, and that is, "An Act to prevent abuse of the process of the High Court or other courts by the institution of vexatious legal proceedings." That is the governing title. The fact that for the purpose of identification only, and not of enactment also, authority is given to identify the statute by a particular name, in which the word "action" occurs, is, I think, immaterial. The words "This Act may be cited as the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896" effects nothing by way of enactment. They do no more than create a name and whether it is as matter of description accurate or not is immaterial. In support of this view I refer to that which LORD HALDANE, L.C., said in Vacher & Sons, Ltd. v. London Society of Compositors (1) as regards the title "Trade Disputes Act, 1906," and that which LORD MOULTON said in the same case, and to that which the latter said further in National Telephone Co. v. Postmaster-General (3). I may add that if any importance were attributed to the word "action" it is not a word from whose meaning are excluded proceedings in a criminal court. COMYN'S DIGEST under the title of "Action" says that:

"In life everyone has a property and right, and if they are violated the law gives an action to redress the wrong."

BACON'S ABRIDGMENT says that "actions are divided into criminal and civil." With this I leave the matter.

The language of the Act is that if a person has habitually and persistently instituted vexatious legal proceedings, &c., the court may order that no legal proceedings shall be instituted by that person. The words "legal proceedings" are, I think, applicable to and include both criminal and civil proceedings in a court. In the argument in the court below the Attorney-General referred to several Acts of Parliament in which the word "proceedings" is used to indicate criminal proceedings. I may add as relevant to the particular criminal proceedings which Mr. Boaler desired to take, that s. 65 of the Companies Act, 1862, was headed with the words "legal proceedings," and that s. 276 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, is headed "legal proceedings, offences, &c.," and in both cases the sections which follow deal (inter alia) with criminal proceedings [cf. Companies Act, 1948, ss. 438–446 ("Offences") and ss. 447–450 ("Legal Proceedings")]. In Re Briton Medical and General Life Assurance Association (4), it was held that criminal proceedings were capable of being restrained under s. 85 of the Act of 1862. Section 100 of the Judicature Act, 1873, in defining an action, speaks of a "civil proceeding" and of a "criminal proceeding [see no s. 225 of Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925]. This is enough, I think, to show that the words "legal proceedings" are words sufficient in themselves to include criminal proceedings. The words "legal proceedings" are no doubt general words, but generality is, to my mind, not ambiguity. The verb used in the Vexatious Actions Act is "institute." That is a word which is applicable to criminal proceedings. For instance, in s. 9 of the Costs in Criminal Cases Act, 1908, occur the words "a person at whose instance the prosecution has been instituted" [Costs in Criminal Cases Act, 1952, s. 17 (1)]. The expression "to institute a prosecution" is, I think, an accurate one. Colloquially, "to start or to launch a prosecution" might be used, but I should not expect to find those expressions in an Act of Parliament. The only other verbs which occur to me are "institute" or "initiate" or "begin." So far, therefore, the words of the Act seem to me to be sufficient to include criminal proceedings.

Next, the proceedings which may be restrained are spoken of as proceedings in "the High Court or any other court." By s. 16 (11) of the Judicature Act, 1873, there is vested in the High Court jurisdiction in criminal matters, and s. 29 speaks of "criminal jurisdiction capable of being exercised by the said High Court" [see now Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, ss. 18, 70]. Again, therefore, the words of the Act of Parliament are sufficient to include criminal proceedings in the High Court or any other court, even if the later words ought to be confined to other courts having jurisdiction similar to that of the High Court. The words "legal proceedings" are twice used in the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896. According to ordinary principles of construction they ought to receive the same interpretation in each case in which they are used. Ought the words when first used to be taken to mean legal proceedings other than criminal proceedings? Let me suppose a case in which a person has habitually and persistently instituted vexatious criminal proceedings, has repeatedly alleged fictitious criminal acts, and has habitually and persistently, whether against the same person or against different persons, instituted unfounded criminal proceedings, is there any reason in the language of the Act to doubt that it is intended to give power to order that no further criminal proceedings shall be instituted by him in the High Court or any other court? If that habitual and persistent institution of proceedings is proved, why am I to suppose that the plain words of the Act do not intend that a stop shall be put to it? If, then, the words when first used include criminal proceedings, the same words when next used must also include them, and the Act empowers the prohibition of criminal proceedings. If the case were one in which the persistent proceedings were civil proceedings only, it may be that the Act might reasonably have provided that a veto shall be imposed upon like proceedings only to the exclusion of criminal proceedings, and inasmuch as the words of the Act are that "no legal proceedings shall be instituted" it may be that if an order is made it must extend to both. This, I think, is not matter for me to consider in determining what is the plain meaning of the words. I find in them a provision depriving a subject under extraordinary circumstances of those which would, but for this Act of Parliament, be his rights as a free citizen, and I have no right to say that the legislature ought to have imposed a smaller right of veto than it has imposed. I have only to ascertain the ordinary and natural sense of the words. Construing the Act upon those principles, it seems to me that the Act extends to criminal proceedings, and I so hold.

Considerations have been urged before us based upon questions of public policy and the like. I do not think that these considerations are admissible when the question is only as to the meaning of the words of the Act, but I will say a word upon them as they have been raised. It seems to me that this is an Act giving extraordinary powers under extraordinary circumstances. On the one side, it is, no doubt, a grave matter that a subject should be debarred from remedy if a criminal offence be committed against him. On the other hand, it is a grave matter if a person has so conducted himself as to expose himself to an order under the extraordinary powers of this Act that he should be allowed to continue his litigious insistence undisturbed. As between those two matters the legislature, I conceive, was convinced that the latter was the more grave. The subject is not deprived of redress, but, being a person such as he is proved to be, he is not allowed to seek redress until he has satisfied the proper authority that the legal proceedings which he desires to take are not an abuse. I cannot think the Act intended that, if, say, a person has persistently made false accusations of criminal offences and instituted prosecutions, it should not be possible to make an order under the Act against him. It is said that, under such circumstances, a magistrate might refuse a summons irrespective of this Act. This seems to me to overlook two facts:

first, that the magistrate might well not have knowledge of, or, if he had knowledge, might have great difficulty in giving effect to, the known character of the intending prosecutor; and, secondly, that if the magistrate, having such knowledge, did on that ground refuse a summons, he would be shutting the doors of a criminal court against the intending prosecutor without giving him the benefit of the extraordinary precautions of the present Act, which allow an order to be made only if the Attorney-General upon his responsibility takes it upon himself to apply to the court for an order. At the date of this Act the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859 (repealed, Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Proceedings) Act, 1933) had long been in operation, and had been from time to time extended to other offences. It differs from the present Act in two respects: first, that it applies to every subject, and not to the particular class of person governed by the Act of 1896; and, secondly, that it applies only to certain offences. The Act of 1896 seems to me to cover a larger field in one respect, and a smaller field in another. No inference, I think, is to be drawn from the fact that the Act of 1859 already dealt with criminal proceedings to a certain extent. The construction which I place upon the Act of 1896 is that it extends to criminal proceedings. I think that the order under appeal ought to be discharged, and that there should be substituted a declaration that criminal proceedings are within the meaning of the words "legal proceedings" in the Act of 1896.

KENNEDY, L.J.—The result of this appeal depends wholly upon the interpretation of the expression "legal proceedings" in s. 1 of the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896. Do these words, or do they not, include criminal as well as civil proceedings? The Divisional Court by a majority (DARLING, and LUSH, JJ., BANKES, J., dissenting) has decided that they do not, and we, in the Court of Appeal, are invited by the appellant to hold that this decision was wrong.

There is no sort of doubt, in regard to the proper principle of interpreting a statutory enactment, that a judicial tribunal, which is called upon to interpret, is bound as a general rule, if the effect of the words of the enactment, read in their ordinary and natural sense, is clear and unambiguous, to give to those words that effect and no other. The legislature must be intended to mean what it has plainly expressed.

> "It matters not in such a case what the consequences may be. Where, by the use of clear and unequivocal language, capable of only one meaning, anything is enacted by the legislature, it must be enforced, even though it be absurd and mischievous. If the words go beyond what was probably the intention, effect must nevertheless be given to them":

MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES (5th Edn.), p. 5; and see per LORD ESHER, M.R., in R. v. City of London Court Judge (5) ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 290). LORD MACNAGHTEN in Vacher & Sons, Ltd. v. London Society of Compositors (1) ([1913] A.C. at p. 118), and LORD HALDANE, L.C., in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Herbert (6) ([1913] A.C. at p. 332) have recently stated the law in almost equally stringent terms. The present case is not that case. It is, in my view, impossible to say that the meaning of the expression "legal proceedings" is, in itself, and by itself, clear and unambiguous. The words, taken by themselves, have a sufficient and a natural meaning if they are read as referring either to civil proceedings or to criminal proceedings; or they may be inclusive, and signify both civil and criminal proceedings. In the present context no one contends that the words "legal proceedings" are to be read as applying only to criminal proceedings: the question is whether they ought to be read as including any but civil proceedings. It by no means follows, because the words are wide enough to do so, that they ought to be interpreted. Speaking of general words in a statute, MR. MAXWELL, at p. 47 of his INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES (5th Edn.), observes:

A "However wide in the abstract, they are more or less elastic and admit of restriction or expansion to suit the subject-matter. . . . It is, therefore, a canon of interpretation that all words, if they be general and not express or precise, are to be restricted to the fitness of the matter."

So "persons" may or may not include corporations; "inhabitants" may or may not include all actual dwellers in the locality.

B In Cox v. Hakes (7), LORD HALSBURY, L.C. (15 App. Cas. at pp. 515, 517), deals with, and justifies by quotation, the right to give in the interpretation of general words in a statute a narrower or limited meaning if the intention of the legislature appears to require it. I shall not quote the whole of the passage, but I will quote one sentence of it. The question there was as to the interpretation in regard to the right of appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division for discharging a C prisoner under habeas corpus. The Judicature Act, 1893, s. 19, gave the Court of Appeal power to hear appeals in all matters not criminal. The Lord Chancellor in reference to this s. 19 said (15 App. Cas. at p. 517):

"My Lords, I don't deny that the words of s. 19 literally construed are sufficient to comprehend the case of an order of discharge made upon an application for D discharge upon a writ of habeas corpus; but it is impossible to contend that the mere fact of a general word being used in a statute precludes all inquiry into the object of the statute or the mischief which it was intended to remedy."

In the present case this court has to consider the true meaning in this statute of the general words "legal proceedings." We are, therefore, at liberty, and, indeed, are bound, in ascertaining that which we have to ascertain, namely, the intention E of the legislature, to consider, in choosing between the possible interpretations, the context itself, the accord or the want of accord of one or other interpretation with well-recognised principles in regard to the interpretation of statutes, and, further, if other things are equal, the comparative reasonableness of the legislation as it is interpreted in one way or the other. This last consideration, which I hold must be very cautiously applied, is put by LORD ESHER in R. v. City of London Court F Judge (5) in the strongest form in the following words ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 290):

"If the words of an Act admit of two interpretations then they are not clear: and if one interpretation leads to some absurdity, and the other does not, the court will conclude that the legislature did not intend to lead to the absurdity and will adopt the other interpretation."

G I proceed first to consider the context. The title speaks of "the institution of vexatious legal proceedings": s. 1 speaks of a person's having habitually and persistently "instituted vexatious legal proceedings" and "no legal proceedings shall be instituted." I have no doubt that the word "institute" may be found in use in statutes, legal text-books, and legal parlance in reference to criminal as well as to civil proceedings. But when it is used in reference to criminal proceedings, what H does it denote? It denotes the commencement of the proceedings. How, in criminal proceedings, does that commencement take place? It is stated in ARCHBOLD'S CRIMINAL PLEADING EVIDENCE AND PRACTICE (24th Edn.) at p. 92:

"The commencement of the prosecution is the preferring of the indictment when it is sent up without a preliminary inquiry; or the laying of the information; or, it would seem, the arrest of the accused, or the application for I summons or warrant in respect of the offence."

Is it reasonable to suppose that the legislature, when by this Act it gave the High Court power by order to prevent a person who had habitually and persistently instituted civil proceedings in the High Court or any inferior court without any reasonable ground from instituting legal proceedings in the High Court or any other court, intended that such a vexatious litigant, man or woman, should not, if robbed or assaulted, be entitled to give the criminal wrongdoer in charge, or to apply to a magistrate for a summons, without first going to a judge in chambers in London, or to a Divisional Court, and satisfying the judge or the court that his proceeding is not an abuse of the process of the court? But for the divergence of opinion in the present case, both in the Divisional Court and in this court, I should have ventured to think that the refusal of the institution of proceedings seeking redress for a criminal wrong, however vexatiously litigious the applicant for that redress may have been, unless he first instituted an inquiry into the merits of his claim by civil proceedings in the High Court of London to get leave to institute the criminal proceedings—and this follows from the contentions of the learned Solicitor-General—was in itself sufficient to show that the construction which the appellant seeks to put upon "legal proceedings" in this statute was untenable. And in this connection it is not an unimportant consideration that in the case of indictable offences our law, in the preliminary stage before the magistrate, or, if the matter goes before the grand jury, in their inquiry, has already given ample safeguards against the further prosecution of anything like a frivolous charge. Passing from the use of the words "institute" and "institution" in the context, I think that on a well-known principle of construction the narrower meaning of the words "legal proceedings" is entitled to preference. The enactment is one which even in regard to civil proceedings seriously abridges the right of the subject to such redress in the courts of law. I do not presume for one moment to question the wisdom of the abridgment. But if it includes an abridgment of the rights of the subject in regard to redress for crimes committed in regard to his person or his property, one would, I venture to think, justly expect the legislature, instead of using words of general import, to make it quite clear that criminal proceedings were intended to be included in the enactment.

> "Statutes which encroach on the rights of the subject, whether as regards person or property, are similarly [the learned author has in the preceding chapter been dealing with the construction of penal Acts] subject to a strict construction. . . . It is a recognised rule that they should be interpreted, if possible, so as to respect such rights":

MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES (5th Edn.), p. 461.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Divisional Court was right, and ought to be affirmed. I lay no stress upon the language of s. 2 (2): "This Act may be cited as the Vexatious Actions Act." In the first place, although the use of the word "actions" except in reference to civil proceedings is now obsolete, it is just possible that the Parliamentary draughtsman may have had in his mind the fact that in a passage in BACON'S ABRIDGMENT, which was cited to us by counsel, is to be found the statement that "actions are divided into criminal and civil." In the second place, in two recent cases in the House of Lords there have been expressions of opinion on the part of the Lord Chancellor and LORD MOULTON against the use of its short title as an aid to the interpretation of the statute. Nor do I attach any value to the marginal note: "Power of court to prohibit institutions of actions without leave." The marginal note forms no part of the statute. I have come to my conclusion by giving to the statute that which, in my humble judgment, is not only a natural interpretation of the words which I find in it, but one which, if due regard is paid to its subject-matter and its working, is most in accord with recognised principles of interpretation.

SCRUTTON, J. (read by KENNEDY, L.J.).—One of the valuable rights of every subject of the King is to appeal to the King in his courts if he alleges that a civil wrong has been done to him, or if he alleges that a wrong punishable criminally has been done to him, or has been committed by another subject of the King. This right is sometimes abused, and it is of course quite competent to Parliament to deprive any subject of the King of it either absolutely or in part. But the language of any such statute should be jealously watched by the courts and should not be extended beyond its least onerous meaning unless clear words are used to justify such extension. It cannot be denied that, on the meaning put on the statute by the Solicitor-General, Mr. Boaler may be robbed or assaulted in a distant county, or a lady litigant, who frequently brings vexatious actions, and is restrained under the Act, may suffer the gravest wrong a woman can suffer; an unsympathetic policeman may say: "It's only Boaler or Mrs. So-and-So" and decline to take action, and the restrained litigant may be unable to obtain a warrant, or get any redress until he or she has satisfied a judge in London, either by affidavit or personal evidence that a wrong has been done to him or her. I approach the consideration of a statute which is said to have this meaning with the feeling that, unless its language clearly convinces me that this was the intention of the legislature, I shall be slow to give effect to what is most serious interference with the liberties of the subject.

Omitting for the moment the title or short title, the material enacting words are that if the Attorney-General satisfies the court that any person has habitually and persistently instituted vexatious legal proceedings without any reasonable ground for instituting such proceedings whether in the High Court or in any inferior court, the court may order that no legal proceedings shall be instituted by that person in the High Court or any other court, unless he obtains the leave of the High Court or some judge thereof. The words "legal proceedings" are, in my opinion, wide enough to cover criminal as well as civil process. "Instituting legal proceedings," however, seems to me a phrase much more appropriate to civil than to criminal process. A subject of the King by issuing a writ against a person within the jurisdiction institutes a proceeding which must proceed. He can serve the writ and obtain judgment by default or compel the defendant to take part in the proceedings. A person presenting a bill of indictment to a grand jury or applying for a summons to a magistrate sets on foot of his own motion no proceedings which injure the accused. Nothing will happen unless the grand jury find a true bill, or the magistrate gives leave to issue the summons and when the grand jury, or the magistrate, have allowed the proceedings to affect the accused, the proceeding is not the private prosecutor's. His name never, as far as I can trace, appears on the record; the title is, "The King v. the accused." The King can control the whole proceedings; he can deprive the private prosecutor of any voice in them, by taking over the prosecution, or he can stop the proceedings by entering a nolle prosequi. If the accused formally pleads, the replication, where there is a private prosecutor, runs: "The King's coroner or clerk of arraigns, or clerk of assize [as the case may be] before the King himself, who for our Lord the King in this behalf prosecutes, puts himself on the country as to the plea of the said A. B." The private prosecutor can do nothing to harm the accused unless a public body or officer allows the proceedings to go on, and they go on, not as the private prosecutor's proceedings, but as the King's proceedings. Under these circumstances the language instituting proceedings appears to me far more appropriate to civil than to criminal proceedings. Further, I find in an Act nothing about appeals as I should expect to do if it related to criminal proceedings. An order restraining the vexatious litigant from taking civil proceedings or allowing him to bring one civil proceeding may be appealed to the House of Lords. An order restraining him from taking criminal proceedings or allowing or refusing to allow him to initiate one criminal proceeding would, I think, be an order in a criminal matter, which by the Judicature Act is not subject to an appeal, and, if so, an order refusing to allow a man or woman to endeavour to initiate proceedings in the criminal courts in respect of a wrong alleged to be done to himself or herself would be made by a judge in the unreportable privacy of chambers without appeal. Parliament may enact this as they may enact anything else. But I should expect words showing a clear intention so seriously to interfere with the liberties of the subject.

The court has, then, general words which in one respect—"legal proceedings"—cover both civil and criminal proceedings, in another respect—"institute legal proceedings"—are words far more applicable to civil than criminal proceedings.

For what reasons may the court restrict these general words? The object of the courts is from the words used, construed in reference to the subject-matter in which they are used, to get at the intention of the legislature and give effect to it. When the legislature has used general words capable of a larger and a narrower meaning, those words may be restricted by innumerable presumptions all designed to give effect to the reasonable intent of the legislature. A presumption against any alteration of the law beyond the specific object of the Act; a presumption against intending an excess of jurisdiction or a violation of international law; a presumption against intending what is inconvenient or unreasonable, against intending injustice or absurdity; a strict construction of penal laws or statutes encroaching on rights, especially the liberties of the subject or imposing burdens; all are cases where general words have been cut down to a narrower meaning in endeavouring to seek the intention of the legislature, not from the widest meaning of the word used, but from the considerations that must have influenced Parliament in forming the enactment.

For instance, the Judicature Acts provide that the Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction to determine appeals from any judgment of the High Court of Justice, except certain specified exceptions which do not include appeals from orders discharging persons from custody under a writ of habeas corpus [see now Administration of Justice Act, 1960]. Yet the House of Lords in Cox v. Hakes (7) cut down those wide general words and refused an appeal from such an order on the ground, among others, of the great change that would be made in the liberties of the subject by giving the words their literal meaning, and the consequences that would follow such a change in the law. Where there were two possible constructions of general words, one of which took away the respondent's property without compensation, LORD DAVEY in Public Works Comr. (Cape Colony) v. Logan (8) said ([1903] A.C. at pp. 363, 364):

> "Such an intention should not be imputed to the legislature unless it be expressed in unequivocal terms. This principle has frequently been recognised by the courts of this country as a canon of construction."

I think one of the principles of limitation is correctly stated in MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES (5th Edn.), p. 461:

> "It is presumed where the objects of the Act do not obviously imply such an intention that the legislature does not desire to confiscate the property or to encroach on the rights of persons; and it is therefore expected that if such be its intention it will manifest it plainly, if not in express words, at least by clear implication and beyond reasonable doubt."

In the case of this statute the legislature clearly intends to interfere with some rights of persons, and uses words capable of extension to rights of litigation in criminal matters, but, in my opinion, more suitable to the subject-matter of rights of litigation in civil matters only. In my view, looking at the enacting part of the statute only, the presumption against interference with the vital rights and liberties of the subject entitles, even compels, one to limit the words to that meaning which effects the least interference with those rights.

Two other matters have also influenced me in coming to this conclusion. I am influenced by consideration of the difficulty and evil which was in existence at the time this Act was passed, and which I have no doubt it was intended to remedy. The first order made under the Act of 1896 was made in January, 1897 (see In re Chaffers, Ex parte A.-G. (9)), against one Chaffers, who had brought before the passing of the Act forty-seven civil actions against the Speaker, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and numerous other high functionaries, without success and without payment of costs. He had not extended his mischievous activity to criminal proceedings. I have no doubt that this was the grievance that Parliament was remedying. Secondly, s. 2 of the Act contains a sub-section

"This Act may be cited as the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896." This has certainly, in my mind, supported the conclusion to which I have come. I am aware that two members of the House of Lords have as dicta said that no attention should be paid to the short title of an Act. There are similar dicta with regard to the full title, but I think that the law is correctly stated by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Fenton v. Thorley & Co., Ltd. (10) ([1903] A.C. at p. 447):

> "It has been held that you cannot resort to the title of an Act for the purpose of construing its provisions. Still, as was said by a very sound and careful judge, 'The title of an Act of Parliament is no part of the law, but it may tend to show the object of the legislature.' Those were the words of WIGHTMAN, J. in Johnson v. Upham (11), and CHITTY, J., observed in East and West India Docks v. Shaw, Savill and Albion Co. (12) that the title of an Act may be referred to for the purpose of ascertaining generally the scope of the Act. Surely, if such a reference is ever permitted, it must be permissible in a case like this."

MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES (5th Edn.), p. 67, summarises the authority thus: "It is now settled law that the title of a statute may be referred to for the purpose of ascertaining its general scope." I agree that the court should give less importance to the title than to the enacting part, and less to the short title than to the full title, for, the short title, being a label, accuracy may be sacrificed to brevity, but I do not understand on what principle of construction I am not to look at the words of the Act itself to help me to understand its scope in order to interpret the words Parliament has used by the circumstances in respect of which they were legislating. It is by no means conclusive, but it is striking, if they were intending to deal with criminal proceedings, that they should call their Act the Vexatious Actions Act. I respectfully decline to believe that they did so, because they were aware that BACON'S ABRIDGMENT speaks of criminal actions, and I am fairly confident that for the last century the term has never been used of criminal proceedings until counsel suggested such a use in this case. The anonymous author of the marginal note thought the correct summary of s. 1 was "Power of court to prohibit institution of action without leave," but this is not part of the statute, and I pay no attention to it in forming my opinion. I refer also, in support of the conclusion to which I have come, to the judgment of LUSH, J., with which in general I concur.

But the broad, general ground on which I have formed my opinion is this. I find general words used in the Act capable of two meanings, a wider and a narrower one; on the whole, I think the language is more suited to the narrower than the wider meaning. The narrower meaning will affect the liberties of the subject to some extent, the wider meaning will most seriously affect the liberties of a subject, and, in a manner, his personal liberty and safety, which I see no reason in the Act to believe was in the contemplation of the legislature. I decline to make this more serious interference with the liberty of the subject unless the legislature uses language clear enough to convince me that that was their intention; and I think ample meaning is provided for their words, and ample remedy is provided for the grievance in respect of which Parliament was legislating, by putting the narrower construction on the general words they have used. In my opinion, the appeal fails, and should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ATTWOOD v. CHAPMAN

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Avory, J.), May 28, June 11, 1914]

Libel—Privilege—Absolute privilege—Licensing justices—Application for renewal of licence—Objections containing alleged libel—Objections sent to police superintendent and owner of premises in addition to licensee.

The plaintiff applied to the licensing justices sitting at general annual licensing sessions for the renewal of the old on-licence of his public house. The defendant gave written notice of objection to the renewal of the licence on grounds specified in the Licensing Act, 1910, Sched. 2, Part II, and served the notice on the clerk to the licensing justices, the superintendent of police, and the owners of the public-house, in addition to the plaintiff, the licensee, the only person required to be served by the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 16. In an action for damages for a libel alleged to be contained in the notice of objection, the defendant pleaded absolute privilege.

Held: the defence of absolute privilege was not open to the defendant, since (i) licensing justices sitting to determine applications for renewal of licences were not a court in law: Boulter v. Kent Justices (1), [1897] A.C. 556, applied; (ii) even if the licensing justices were a court in law, the defendant as a person objecting to the renewal of the licence was not one of the classes of person entitled to claim privilege; and (iii) in any event, the privilege did not extend to the service of copies of the notice of objection on the superintendent of police and the owners of the public house.

Notes. The Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, so far as unrepealed was repealed by the Licensing Act, 1953, and replaced by provisions in that Act, for which see the Comparative Table to the Act of 1953 set out in 33 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) p. 309.

Preliminary Issue on a point of law raised on the pleadings in an action for damages for alleged libel.

The plaintiff, who was the licensee of the Castle Inn, Cold Ash, Berkshire, brought an action against the defendant, a bookmaker, claiming damages for libel. Paragraph 2 of the plaintiff's statement of claim was as follows:

"The plaintiff has suffered damage from the defendant falsely and maliciously writing and publishing of the plaintiff in a document purporting to be a notice of objection to the renewal of the plaintiff's licence of the said inn the words following, that is to say: To A. Attwood (meaning the plaintiff), the Castle Inn, Cold Ash, Berks, licensed victualler, to John Gamble, chief superintendent of the police, Newbury, Berks, and to Francis Quekett Louch, clerk to the justices of Newbury Division of Berks: I, Charles Villiers Chapman, of Nos. 24 to 26, Maddox Street, London, do hereby give you notice that it is my intention to appear by myself, my counsel, or solicitor, at the general annual licensing meeting to be held for the Newbury Division of the county of Berks at the Municipal Buildings on Thursday, Feb. 5, next, at twelve noon, and to oppose the renewal of the justices' licence which you the said A. Attwood (the plaintiff), now hold for the sale of beer at the premises now occupied by you at Cold Ash in the said licensing district, on one or more of the following grounds—that is to say: (i) That you, the said A. Attwood (the plaintiff) have used the said inn and premises for the purpose of receiving bets upon races. (ii) That on behalf of the customers of the said inn, you, the said A. Attwood (the plaintiff), have made bets with the said Charles Villiers Chapman, and have received from the said Charles Villiers Chapman certain moneys upon the event of horse races, and have distributed the moneys so received to customers of the said inn. (iii) That you the said A. Attwood (the plaintiff) have retained the moneys paid to you by customers for the purpose of being remitted to the said Charles Villiers Chapman in your own hands, and have appropriated the sum to your own use, and when sued by the said Charles Villiers Chapman you have pleaded the illegality of the transaction taking place upon your said licensed premises. (iv) That you the said A. Attwood (the plaintiff) are not a fit and proper person to hold a licence. (v) That the said Castle Inn and premises have been ill-conducted and are of a disorderly character, and by reason thereof should not be licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Dated Jan. 23, 1914.

(Signed) CHARLES VILLIERS CHAPMAN

The plaintiff further alleged that the defendant published the notice by sending it to the said John Gamble, Francis Quekett Louch, and to Messrs. H. and G. Simonds, Ltd., Brewers, Reading, the owners of the premises in question.

He also alleged that the defendant did not appear at the annual general licensing meeting to support the allegations contained in his notice of objection, which were withdrawn by his solicitor.

By his defence, after denying the publication of the alleged defamatory words or that they bore the meaning alleged, or that the plaintiff had suffered any damage, the defendant pleaded in the alternative that the occasion was absolutely privileged, and delivered the following particulars:

"The Castle Inn, of which the plaintiff is the licensee, is situated in the licensing district known as the Newbury Division of Berks. The plaintiff was at all material times an applicant for the renewal of his said licence. The justices of the Newbury division of Berks are the licensing justices by whom the plaintiff's application for renewal of his said licence would of necessity be heard, and the said Francis Quekett Louch is and was at all material times the clerk to the said justices. Messrs. H. and G. Simonds are the brewers owning the said Castle Inn, and are entitled to be heard on any objection to the renewal of the said licence. The said John Gamble is the chief superintendent of police for the said division, and is also entitled to be heard on any such objection as aforesaid. The plaintiff's said application was heard by the said justices at the general annual licensing meeting for the said division on Feb. 5, 1914. The said justices, in entertaining and hearing the said application, exercised judicial functions authorised by law. The defendant, as he lawfully might, desired and intended to oppose the renewal of the said licence and to appear for that purpose at the said hearing, and accordingly published the words complained of by giving the necessary notice of objection required by law and serving the same on the said Louch, Gamble, and H. and G. Simonds, Ltd., and not otherwise. In so publishing the words alleged the defendant was taking a necessary and proper step in a judicial proceeding—namely, the hearing of the plaintiff's application for a renewal of his said licence, and any lawful objections thereto, and was taking a necessary preliminary step in such judicial proceeding in accordance with the recognised and usual procedure before the said justices, and such publication is absolutely privileged."

By the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 16 (3):

Subject to the provisions of this section, the licensing justices shall not, where the holder of a justices' licence applies for the renewal of his licence, entertain any objection to or take any evidence with respect to the renewal thereof unless written notice of an intention to oppose the renewal of the licence stating in general terms the grounds on which the renewal is opposed, has been served on the holder thereof not less than seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 16, 1914. AVORY, J., read the following judgment.—This action is brought to recover damages for an alleged libel contained in a written notice of objection to the renewal of the licence of the Castle Inn, in the county of Berkshire, an old on-licence within the meaning of s. 16 and s. 18 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, of which the plaintiff was then the holder. The notice was served by the defendant on the plaintiff, on the clerk to the licensing justices, on the superintendent of police, and on H. and G. Simonds, Ltd., the owners of the said premises. The question of law set down for argument is whether the occasion of this publication was one of absolute privilege—in other words, whether the defendant can claim absolute immunity from liability to an action for libel in respect of anything defamatory of the plaintiff contained in this notice of objection. For the purposes of the decision it must be assumed that the defamatory statement complained of may have been made falsely, with knowledge of its falsity, and maliciously, i.e., from a motive of personal ill-will; and the principle of law to be applied is that contained in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (2), that no action for libel or slander lies, whether against judges, counsel, witnesses, or parties, for words written or spoken in the ordinary course of any proceeding before any court or tribunal recognised by law. This principle was approved by the Court of Appeal in Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society v. Parkinson (3), with the qualification that the tribunal referred to must be a court in law or a court recognised by law (see the judgments of FRY and LOPES, L.JJ.).

The first question to be determined, therefore, is whether the licensing justices sitting at the general annual licensing meeting for the consideration of the renewal of an old on-licence, in the case where the applicant for the renewal is the holder of the existing licence, are a court in law or recognised by law within the meaning of these decisions. In such a case the holder of the licence need not attend in person at the licensing meeting unless he is required to attend—the licensing justices cannot entertain any objection or take any evidence with respect to the renewal unless written notice of an intention to oppose the renewal has been served on the holder, and the licensing justices cannot receive any evidence with respect to the renewal of the licence which is not given on oath: (see s. 16 (2), (3), and (6) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910). The notice of objection in this case was on grounds specified in the second part of Sched. 2 to the Act and therefore, if established, gave jurisdiction to the licensing justices at the annual meeting to refuse the renewal under s. 18, and it is contended on behalf of the defendant that in these circumstances the licensing justices would be investigating a charge of personal misconduct involving, perhaps, offences against the law which could only be decided on the evidence on oath before them; that, being justices of the peace engaged in an investigation of that character, they ought to be held to constitute a court in law to which the privilege claimed attaches, and several decisions of the High Court to the effect that licensing justices must act judicially were quoted in support of this view.

On the other hand, it is to be observed that the licensing justices at the annual meeting may themselves object to the renewal of such a licence (see s. 16 (4)) and afterwards sit and adjudicate on their own objection (see R. v. Howard, etc., Farnham Licensing Justices (4)) and may in the exercise of their discretion, on proper materials including their own knowledge of the locality, refer the matter of the renewal to the compensation authority under s. 19, although the objection of which notice has been given, as in this case, is not established by the evidence, and in the event of such a reference the licensing justices themselves are entitled to be heard before the compensation authority in support of their own report (see s. 19 (2)). Further, in the event of the licensing justices refusing the renewal of the licence on such an objection as is made in this case, the applicant has a right of appeal to quarter sessions. On such appeal the licensing justices themselves are the only possible respondents (see s. 29), provision being made for their costs in sub-s. 31 and sub-s. 32, and the objector has no right to appear or be heard (see Tynemouth Corpn. v. A.-G. (5), a position which appears incompatible with that of a court recognised by law, and against the contention of the defendant in this case there is finally the opinion expressed by LORD HALSBURY in Boulter v. Kent Justices (1), ([1897] A.C., at p. 561) that justices sitting at a licensing meeting are not a court at all. In answer to this it has been argued that this opinion was not necessary to the decision, the only question before the House of Lords in that case being whether they were a court of summary jurisdiction, and that since the decision in that case the jurisdiction of the licensing justices to refuse the renewal of an old licence has been restricted to the grounds specified in the schedule to the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, but I do not think the opinion can be regarded as an obiter dictum. It was the foundation of the reasoning by which the learned Lord arrived at his conclusion, and was adopted by the Court of Appeal in R. v. Howard, etc., Farnham Licensing Justices (4), and I do not think the restriction on the jurisdiction can be held to have completely altered the nature of the tribunal.

As to the point that licensing justices dealing with objections to renewal and other matters are bound to act judicially, I think the passage in the judgment of FRY, L.J., in the Royal Aquarium Case (3) applies in this case. He said ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 447):

> "It was said that the existence of this immunity is based on considerations of public policy, and that, as a matter of public policy, wherever a body has to decide questions, and in so doing has to act judicially, it must be held that there is a judicial proceeding to which this immunity ought to attach. It seems to me that the sense in which the word judicial is used in that argument is this: it is used as meaning that the proceedings are such as ought to be conducted with the fairness and impartiality which characterises proceedings in courts of justice, and are proper to the functions of a judge, not that the members of the supposed body are members of a court. Consider to what lengths the doctrine would extend, if this immunity were applied to every body which is bound to decide judicially in the sense of deciding fairly and impartially. It would apply to assessment committees, boards of guardians, to the Inns of Court when considering the conduct of one of their members, to the General Medical Council when considering questions affecting the position of a medical man and to all arbitrators. Is it necessary, on grounds of public policy, that the doctrine of immunity should be carried as far as this? I say not. I say that there is ample protection afforded in such cases by the ordinary law of privilege."

The rule of law which establishes this immunity, being founded on grounds of public policy and convenience, it would, I think, lead to much confusion and inconvenience if the licensing justices when dealing with the renewal of an old on-licence on the application of the holder were held to be a court in law to which the privilege attaches, and not such a court when dealing at the same meeting with applications for new licences or the renewal of licences which are not old licences within the definition or in respect to which the applicant is not the holder, in which latter case the applicant is not entitled to notice of objection under s. 16 (3). While recognising the force of the argument for the defendant, I have come to the conclusion that the licensing justices at their annual meeting, even when dealing with an objection to a renewal of a licence as in this case, are not a court in law to which the privilege attaches.

The second question is whether the defendant, in objecting to the renewal of the licence, comes within any of the classes of persons entitled to claim the privilege, if the meeting of licensing justices were held to be a court in law. It was clearly held in Boulter v. Kent Justices (1) that such an objector was not a party. He cannot be made liable in costs either on the original hearing or on appeal, and is not entitled to notice of appeal, nor can the privilege in this case be claimed as that of a witness, and therefore he does not appear to come within the category of persons on whose behalf the immunity has been established.

The third question is whether, if the licensing justices at their annual meeting were held to be a court in law and the objector a person who could claim the privilege, such privilege or immunity from action would extend to the notices of objection served in this case on the superintendent of police and on the brewers, the owners of the premises. The Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 16, only requires the notices of objection to be served on the holders of the licence. It is obviously convenient and necessary for purposes of procedure that the notice should also be served on the clerk to the justices, and it was said in argument that it is usual in such cases also to serve the superintendent of police and the owners of the premises. I do not know that this is so where the objection is made by a private individual, but in my opinion such a statement of procedure is not sufficient to justify me in holding that the notices served on the superintendent and the owners which were unnecessary come within the rule as to words written in the ordinary course of any proceeding before a court. On all grounds, therefore, I think the defendant's plea of absolute privilege and immunity from liability in this action fails and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the question of law.

Licensing—Offence—Child allowed in bar—Kitchen of licensed premises—Kitchen used for both trade and domestic purposes—Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 67) s. 120.

By s. 120 of the Children Act, 1908 [now s. 126 of the Licensing Act, 1953], the holder of the licence of licensed premises is prohibited from allowing a child to be in the "bar" of the licensed premises, except during the hours of closing; and "bar" is defined [see now s. 165 of the Licensing Act, 1953] as meaning any open drinking bar or any part of the premises "exclusively or mainly used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor."

The appellant was the licensee of a small beer-house. One evening, when the house was open for business, a woman, who had a child with her, was found in the kitchen of the beerhouse consuming beer purchased from the appellant, there being other customers in the room. The kitchen was the only room in the house which was used or could reasonably be used for domestic purposes; in it were the ordinary fittings and appliances of a kitchen, but it was also fitted up as a drinking room. The appellant was summoned under s. 120 for allowing the child to be in the "bar" of his licensed premises, and the justices convicted him, being of opinion that the room was extensively used for trade purposes during certain parts of the day, and that the fact that it was used during certain periods of the day for domestic purposes did not prevent them from holding that at other periods of the day it was "mainly used" for the sale and consumption of liquor.

Held: in deciding whether a room was or was not a "bar" the justices must look at the general character and general and regular user of the room; in the present case there was clear evidence that on every day on which the house was open for business the kitchen was extensively used for trade purposes; the user of the room during certain periods of the day for domestic purposes did not preclude the justices from holding that it was mainly used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor; and, therefore, the appellant was properly convicted.

Case Stated by justices for the borough of Leigh in the county of Lancaster.

The appellant was convicted and fined 5s. and costs for an offence under the Children Act, 1908, the charge being that the appellant being the holder of a licence for the sale intoxicating liquors by retail in his house and premises on Sept. 21, 1913, did unlawfully allow a certain child aged two years to be in the bar of his licensed premises during part of the period during which the licensed premises were open in pursuance of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, contrary to s. 120 (1) of the Children Act, 1908 [now s. 126 of the Licensing Act, 1953]. Upon the hearing the following facts were proved or admitted: The appellant was a licensed beerseller and was on Sept. 21, 1913, the licensee of the Globe Inn, Leigh. On the date in question at 8.40 in the evening a woman named Smith was found by the police in a room in the appellant's beerhouse consuming certain beer which she had purchased from the appellant. She had with her in the room her daughter, a child aged two years. There were two other customers in the room and later whilst the police were there three other customers came into the room. The room in question was the kitchen of the appellant's beerhouse. The appellant's beerhouse was but a small one. It was two stories high and had on the ground floor a bar, a parlour, a taproom, and a kitchen, and on the first floor a clubroom and two bedrooms. There was a cellar for the storage of beer. Accompanying the Case was a plan which showed the appellant's premises. It will be observed that the bar, the parlour, the taproom, the kitchen, and the clubroom were in such plan tinted with pink colour. This indicated that such rooms were intended by the brewery owners to be used by the licensees for trade purposes. It will also be observed that there was no back kitchen or scullery. The justices found that the kitchen was the only room in the house which was used and could reasonably be used for domestic purposes. In the room were the ordinary fittings and appliances of a kitchen—namely, an oven and grate, a gas stove, shelves for crockery, a slopstone, a clothes drying line, and in fact the ordinary requisites of a kitchen. At the same time the justices found that the room was also fitted up as a drinking room, there being in the room a long table with a white top with a hand bell on it, a form or bench such as is commonly used by customers of beerhouses and a number of stools. It was not contended that the child referred to in the charge was such a child as could lawfully have been on the premises under the provisions of s. 120 (4) and it was not disputed that the appellant allowed the child to be in the kitchen at the time mentioned, and that at such time the kitchen was being used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor. The defence was that the kitchen was not a "bar" within the meaning of s. 120 (5) of the Children Act, 1908. The appellant's contention was that the "main" user of the room was for domestic purposes as a kitchen, and that the occasional user of the room during certain periods of the day was merely secondary, and was not inconsistent with the "main" user of the room being domestic. The justices agreed with the appellant that the room could not be said to be "exclusively" used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the subsection, and that the only point they had to consider was whether on a correct construction the room could be said to be "mainly" so used. The justices were satisfied that the room was extensively used for trade purposes during certain portions of the day, and they came to the conclusion that they were justified in holding that the user of the room during certain periods of the day for domestic purposes did not preclude them from holding that the same room during other periods of the day could be "mainly used" for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

Rigby for the respondent.

AVORY, J.—If counsel for the appellant had satisfied us that these justices really found, and meant to find, that they had to look at a particular period of the day and determine whether at that particular period of that particular day the room in question was mainly used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor, the case would, I think, have required further consideration; but, in my opinion, that argument is founded upon what I may call a hypercritical examination of the words of the Case. We must look at the substance of the matter and at what the contention of the appellant was before the justices. Here was a room in respect of which there was clear evidence—as I read the statement of facts—that on every day on which the house was open for business this kitchen was extensively used for trade purposes—that is to say, for drinking purposes. There were the ordinary fittings for trade purposes, the table, the form and stools, and the bell upon the table to enable customers to summon the attendant, and the contention which was put before the justices was that as the room was used as a kitchen—that is to say, for domestic purposes—it could not be said to be "mainly" used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor within the meaning of this statute. The justices say:

A "We were satisfied that the room was extensively used for trade purposes during certain portions of the day [I think that means during certain portions of every day when the house is open] and we came to the conclusion that we were justified in holding that the user of the rooms during certain periods of the day for domestic purposes did not preclude us from holding that the same room during other portions of the day could be mainly used for the sale and consumption of intoxicat-
B ing liquor."

It is the use of those words "during other periods of the day" that has given rise to this argument. I do not think that the justices meant by those words to limit their own judgment in the sense which has been contended for. I think the substance of this finding is that in their opinion the user of the room during certain periods of the day for
C domestic purposes did not preclude them from holding that it was mainly used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the Children Act, 1908. I am of opinion that there was certainly evidence upon which they were justified in coming to that conclusion, and I think therefore that this appeal must be dismissed.

ROWLATT, J.—I agree. The case turns entirely upon what we think is the proper
D construction of the finding of the justices in this case, and speaking for myself, I wish to guard myself carefully against giving any countenance to the idea that for the purpose of ascertaining what is the "main" user of a room you can split the day up into parts and say that a room comes within the definition of a bar during certain parts of the day and does not come within the definition of a bar during other parts of the day. It seems to me that this definition contemplates a room either being a room which is open to E children or a room which is forbidden to children, and that the character of the room must be impressed upon it, having regard to its "main" user once and for all, until the user, of course, changes. Any other construction would, as it seems to me, open the door to great dangers to the children, because in any case, except that of the open bar—namely, in any case where the question would have to be gone into, whether the room was "exclusively" or "mainly" used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor, if
F the publican were entitled to come and say, "Although this is the bar parlour of the public house I can show you that at this particular time of the day there never was anybody supplied with drink or consuming drink therein," I think that a door would be open to the abuse aimed at by the section.

SHEARMAN, J.—I agree that this conviction should be affirmed. In my view, the G argument that has been put before us, that we must look at the regular and general user of the room, is the correct one. I think that appears from sub-s. 120 (1) of the Act of 1908, which runs as follows:

"The holder of the licence of any licensed premises shall not allow a child to be at any time in the bar of the licensed premises, except during the hours of closing."

H It seems to me that those words make it clear that it was intended to impress a regular character on each particular room of any licensed premises, and I think we must look for the same result when we come to the definition of "bar" in s. 120 (5), [now s. 165 of the Act of 1953]. What the justices, therefore, in my judgment, have in each case to decide, if a child is found in a room in licensed premises, is whether the room in which the child is found is a prohibited room or is not a prohibited room, and in deciding that I matter, which is purely a question of fact, they must look at the general character and general and regular user of the room. Having arrived at that result, we have to look closely at this case in order to see exactly what the justices did find. It appears to me that, reading the Case in a sensible manner and trying to make it consistent throughout with the arguments put forward before they could have found for the appellant, they would have to say that this place could not be a prohibited room because at certain periods of the day it was regularly used as a kitchen; but all that is found by the Case is that the justices said that the fact that this room during certain portions of the day was used as a kitchen did not prevent them from holding, as they did hold upon the facts, that it was a place mainly used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor. In these circumstances I think that the justices were right, and that this conviction should be affirmed.

Ecclesiastical Law—Sexton—Tenure of office—No presumption of law that office freehold.

The applicant had carried out the customary duties of a sexton for 25 years in a certain parish. He received a salary which at some time during this period had been increased, and he was paid the usual sexton's fees for marriages and burials. He was found to be negligent in his duties, and the vicar and churchwardens served on him a written notice determining his office. On an application by him for a writ of mandamus directed to the vicar and churchwardens commanding them to restore him to the office he contended that the vicar and churchwardens had no right to dismiss him and claimed to be restored to his office on the ground that his office of sexton was a freehold one for life.

Held: there was no presumption that the office of a sexton was a freehold, and, in any event, in the present case there was no evidence to satisfy the court that the applicant was ever elected to the office of sexton as a freeholder.

Per DARLING, J.: "There is also another ground upon which the application fails—namely that mandamus is not the only remedy which is open to the applicant . . . he can bring an action to recover the fees to which he claims that he is entitled."

B Rule Nisi directed to the vicar and churchwardens of the parish of Dymock, in the county of Gloucester, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue against them commanding them to restore the applicant for the rule, George Brooke, to the office of sexton of the church of St. Mary, Dymock, on the ground that the office of sexton was a freehold office.

E. W. Hansell and A. M. Latter, for the vicar and the churchwardens, showed cause.

C Harold Hardy in support of the rule.

DARLING, J.—In this case a rule was granted calling upon the vicar and the churchwardens of the parish of Dymock to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them commanding them to restore one George Brooke to the office of sexton of the parish of Dymock on the ground that the office is a freehold one. It is true that Brooke has for many years performed the duties which a sexton has to do, D and in one sense I think he may be called a sexton. He was a sexton in the sense that he rang the bell, dug the graves, and did such other things as a sexton would ordinarily do; but the mere fact of calling a man a sexton does not make him the holder of a freehold office.

It is entirely a question of evidence whether such a man has a freehold or not, and the E cases which have been cited in the course of the argument go to show that the court will only issue a mandamus to restore a person to the office of sexton provided evidence is given that he was really a sexton and holding a freehold office. There is, indeed, something against this view, for in vol. 11 of HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (1st Edn.) at p. 478 there is the following statement:

"In the absence of a custom to the contrary, the office of sexton in ancient parishes F is a freehold for life."

In support of that proposition reference is made to certain cases, and also to BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES (Edn. 1809), vol. 1, p. 395. The passage in BLACKSTONE is as follows:

"Parish clerks and sextons are also regarded by the common law as persons who have G freeholds in their offices; and therefore, though they may be punished, yet they cannot be deprived, by ecclesiastical censures."

That looks like an assumption that the office is one that is to be held for life. For the statement in BLACKSTONE a reference is made to ROLLE'S ABRIDGMENT, vol. 2, p. 234, but at that page in ROLLE'S ABRIDGMENT there is nothing at all dealing with the appointment of a sexton, nor with the nature and tenure of the office. The statement of H BLACKSTONE has been reproduced in STEPHEN'S COMMENTARIES (16th Edn.), vol. 2, p. 794, and also in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (1st Edn.), vol. 11, p. 478. But on the same page of HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, in the footnote, there are cases cited, and the two important ones are Ile's Case (1) and Merrick's Case (2). The first of these two cases simply says this:

"A mandamus was prayed to restore a sexton. The court at first doubted whether I they should grant it, because he was rather a servant to the parish than an officer, or one that had a freehold in his place. But upon a certificate from the minister, and divers of the parish, that the custom was there to choose a sexton, and that he held it for his life, and that he had 2d. a year of every house within the parish, they granted a mandamus, and it was directed to the churchwardens."

The latter of the two cases is reported thus:

"John Merrick voted for his office of sexton. It was proved in support of the voter's title that he had acted as sexton of Uxbridge; and an entry was shown from the proceedings of the vestry of his election as sexton on Aug. 29, 1799; but it did not appear that he had been elected for life: and no proof being given that the office was for life, the committee determined the vote to be bad."

In my opinion these two cases make it perfectly clear that there must be evidence that the office of sexton in the particular parish is a freehold which the person elected thereto is entitled to hold for life unless gross misconduct can be proved against him. In the present case has Brooke shown that he was a freeholder? All that he can say in his affidavit is this, that he is informed and believes that he held the office of sexton as a freehold. He gives no reason for his belief. He says that he was appointed to the office about twenty-five years ago. There is no entry in the books of the vestry, and no reference anywhere else to his appointment. He has carried out the work of a sexton during the period of twenty-five years or so, and he has been paid a sum of money for his services. The salary was also increased after a certain time. If Brooke had been elected for life why should there have been an extra salary paid to him? There was no necessity for it. It seems to me, therefore, that this rule must be discharged on the ground that there is no evidence to satisfy the court that the applicant was ever elected to the office of sexton in the parish of Dymock as a freeholder.

There is also another ground upon which the application fails—namely, that mandamus is not the only remedy which is open to the applicant. If he is entitled to hold the office for life as he suggests, he can bring an action to recover the fees to which he claims that he is entitled. In the event of such an action being brought, he can then prove the real terms of his appointment.

LORD COLERIDGE, J.—There are two questions in this case. The first is whether the office of sexton is a freehold office by presumption of law, and the second is whether Brooke was appointed to that office. It is quite true that in BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES (Edn., 1809) vol. 1, p. 395, to which reference has been made, it is stated that sextons and parish clerks are presumed to have freeholds in their offices. But whilst my brother DARLING has been speaking I have referred to a later edition of BLACKSTONE, that of 1825, and there the editor, in commenting upon the text of the 1809 edition which has been already read, says:

"With respect to sextons, it can hardly be said that they are regarded by the common law as having freeholds, because the tenure by which they hold varies accordingly, and is as often during pleasure, as for life, or during good behaviour. It should seem that the presumption of law is that they hold by the first. In R. v. Thame (Churchwardens) (3) it was said that a mandamus to restore a sexton ought not be granted unless there was a certificate that he was chosen for life. And it was decided in an election committee of the House of Commons, 2 Peck. 91, that where the office of sexton is not shown to be held for life, it gives no right to vote."

Therefore, the dictum of BLACKSTONE was certainly discovered to be erroneous so long ago as 1825, and the presumption, so far from being as stated by BLACKSTONE, is quite the other way. In the absence of any presumption that the office of sexton is a freehold one, I am not satisfied that any evidence has been given which shows that Brooke was appointed to the office of sexton as a freehold office. For these reasons I agree that the rule nisi must be discharged.

SHEARMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Even supposing that the parish of Dymock is one where the vicar and the churchwardens are empowered to appoint a person to the office of sexton as a freehold for life, there is, in my opinion, no evidence at all before the court to show that Brooke was ever appointed to fill that office for life.

Rule nisi discharged.

STOCK v. CENTRAL MIDWIVES BOARD

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Reading, C.J., Avory and Low, JJ.), May 7, 11, 12, 1915]

[Reported [1915] 3 K.B. 756; 84 L.J.K.B. 1835; 113 L.T. 428; 79 J.P. 397; 31 T.L.R. 436; 13 L.G.R. 1227]

Midwife—Misconduct—Removal from roll—Matters for consideration—Need for strict compliance with rules—Midwives Act, 1902 (2 Edw. 7, c. 17), s. 3, s. 4.

The appellant was a certified midwife and three years after she had separated from her husband she had a child of whom H. was the father. Subsequently she went to live in the same house as H. and his sister and was living there at the time the Central Midwives Board held an inquiry into her conduct. At the first hearing of the inquiry the appellant, H. and H.'s sister gave evidence. At the adjourned hearing of which the appellant was given notice, but which she did not attend, the Board had before them a report which was now admitted to be inaccurate, and the appellant's name was removed from the roll of midwives. Under the rules of the Board, the report should have been verified by statutory declaration and a copy supplied to the appellant, neither of which steps had been taken. On an appeal to the High Court by the appellant under s. 4 of the Midwives Act, 1902,

Held: "misconduct" was not confined to matters connected with a woman's ability to perform her duties properly as a midwife, and, if the Board were satisfied from the facts and circumstances of the case that a woman was unfitted by her conduct to act as a midwife, they were entitled to remove her from the roll; each case depended on its own facts, and it was for the Board to judge the fitness of the midwife; but the power to remove the name of a midwife from the roll should not be exercised except in strict compliance with the rules, and in the present case the evidence which was admitted was not in accordance with the rules and the evidence given during the appellant's absence was inaccurate; and, therefore, the appellant was entitled to succeed.

Per LORD READING, C.J. In my view, the right of appeal is as full a right of appeal as is given by any statute which gives a right of appeal to this court, and R.S.C., Ord. 59, rr. 19 and 20 [now Ord. 59, r. 38], make it clear that this court has full power to hear further evidence.

Notes. The Midwives Act, 1902, has been replaced by the Midwives Act, 1951, s. 3 (1) of which empowers the Central Midwives Board to remove from the roll the name of a certified midwife "who misconducts herself." The present rules relating to appeals from the Central Midwives Board are in R.S.C., Ord. 59, r. 38.

Appeal by Mrs. Lucy Henrietta Stock, a midwife, from a decision of the Central Midwives Board striking her name off the roll of midwives on the ground that she had been guilty of misconduct under s. 3 of the Midwives Act, 1902.

The appellant was a married woman and had two children. She lived with her husband until the year 1909, when she obtained a separation order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, on the ground of her husband's misconduct. The custody of the two children of the marriage was given to the appellant, and the husband was ordered to pay to her a sum of 10s. a week. The husband had failed to pay the money ordered, and the appellant had been compelled to earn her own living. In 1912 appellant became acquainted with a man named Hill, and had a child of which Hill was the father. From 1912 until 1914 the appellant's name was on the roll of midwives, and she practised as a midwife. In 1914 Hill obtained work at a place near where the appellant was employed, and went to live with his sister. The appellant afterwards went to live in the same house, and whilst there she slept with Hill's sister, Hill himself occupying a separate room. In July, 1914, the Central Midwives Board served a notice upon the appellant charging her with misconduct in cohabiting with a man who was not her husband. An inquiry was heard before the Central Midwives Board on July 22, 1914, at which the appellant, Hill, and Hill's sister attended. All three denied that any immoral relations existed between the appellant and Hill, but the Board were not satisfied with some of the statements made by the appellant as to her past relations with her husband and the custody of her children, and the inquiry was adjourned until October. Notice was given to the appellant of the adjourned inquiry, but she did not attend. The Board made a further investigation into the allegations against the appellant, and had before them a report which contained statements which were now admitted to be inaccurate. They came to the conclusion, however, that the appellant had not spoken the truth with regard to her husband and her children, and removed her name from the roll of midwives.

By s. 3 of the Midwives Act, 1902 [now s. 1 of the Midwives Act, 1951]:

"On the passing of this Act, the Lord President of the Council shall take steps to secure the formation of a Central Midwives Board . . . The duties and powers of the Board shall be as follows:

IV. To publish annually a roll of midwives who have been duly certified under this Act [now s. 2 of the Midwives Act, 1951].

V. To decide upon the removal from the roll of the name of any midwife for disobeying the rules and regulations from time to time laid down under the Act by the Central Midwives Board, or for other misconduct, and also to decide upon the restoration to the roll of the name of any midwife so removed [now s. 3 of the Midwives Act, 1951].

By s. 4 of the same Act [now s. 3 (6) of the Midwives Act, 1951].

"Any woman thinking herself aggrieved by any decision of the Central Midwives Board removing her name from the roll of midwives may appeal therefrom to the High Court of Justice within three months after the notification of such decision to her; but no further appeal shall be allowed."

By R.S.C., Ord. 59 [see now Ord. 59, r. 38].

"Rule 19. An appeal from any decision of the Central Midwives Board, under the Midwives Act, 1902, shall be made to the Divisional Court by notice of motion and supported by affidavit, or, if the court shall so direct on the hearing of the motion by oral evidence.

Rule 20. The notice of motion shall be an eight days' notice, and shall be filed at the Crown Office, and upon filing the notice the appeal shall be set down in the Crown paper for hearing as if it were an appeal from an inferior court."

Lord Robert Cecil, K.C., and Theobald Mathew for the Board.
Eales for the appellant.

LORD READING, C.J.—We are of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. One of the objects of the Midwives Act, 1902, was to place midwives under the control of a Board consisting of persons of experience and repute, and, in order to carry out that object, certain powers were given to the Board which are defined by the Act. These powers included the making of rules. Rules have been made and they have been approved by the Privy Council. Except as provided by s. 4 of the Act, there is no right of appeal from the decision of the Board. In view of the conclusion at which we have arrived, it is unnecessary for us to decide whether an appeal under the Act is a rehearing or whether the right of appeal is of a limited character. Counsel for the appellant, however, has called our attention to Re Feldmann (1), in which that point was left open. I therefore desire to say that in my view the right of appeal is as full a right of appeal as is given by any statute which gives a right of appeal to this court, and rr. 19 and 20 of Ord. 59 [now Ord. 59, r. 38] make it quite clear that this court has full power to hear further evidence. When Parliament invested the Central Midwives Board with the administration of all matters regulating the practice of midwives it gave them an unrestricted right of action, subject to one right of appeal, and, in my opinion, in a case of this kind it is the duty of this court to see that justice is done. Unless, then, the power of this court is fettered by the words of the Act, it must inquire into all the circumstances of the case, and it is absolutely free to make any investigation it chooses in order to ascertain the real facts that are involved.

On behalf of the appellant it is contended that, even if the facts as found by the Board were correct, and even if the appellant was living under such conditions that there was sufficient ground for holding that she was cohabiting with Hill, yet she had not been guilty of such misconduct as to entitle the Board to remove her name from the roll of midwives under s. 3 of the Act when there was no other charge of any kind of misconduct made against her. It is said that the word "misconduct" as used in that section is confined to matters connected with a woman's ability to perform her duties properly as a midwife. I do not think that that is a correct view to take of the meaning of the section. If, in the opinion of the Board, the conduct of a midwife is such as to tend to unfit her for the discharge of her duties, the Board have a right to treat it as misconduct under the Act and to visit it with the penalties which it deserves. If the Board are satisfied from the facts and circumstances of the case that a woman is unfitted by her conduct to act as a midwife, they are entitled to remove her name from the roll of midwives. Each case must be dealt with upon its own merits, and I do not think that there could be any body better fitted to judge as to this fitness or unfitness than the Central Midwives Board as constituted by the Act.

Another point which was taken on behalf of the appellant is that the Board admitted evidence wrongly and in breach of the rules which they had passed. It is also said that the evidence which they admitted was heard in the absence of the appellant, and that the report before them contained inaccurate statements which were bound to have influenced their decision. It is quite clear that under r. 2 (d) the Board ought to have had the statements in the report verified by a statutory declaration, and that a free copy of the report should have been supplied to the appellant. The Board received a report from the relieving officer, and it was upon that report that they arrived at their decision. It was not verified by a statutory declaration, and no copy was supplied to the appellant before the adjourned meeting in October, 1914. The omission is in itself a serious matter. The Board has made rules, as it was empowered by the Act to do, and it is essential that these rules should be strictly adhered to. In cases of this character, if the court comes to the conclusion that evidence has been admitted irregularly and in breach of the rules that fact must be fatal to the decision of the Board. The power of removing the name of the midwife from the roll should not be exercised except in strict compliance with the rules. The evidence which was admitted was not in accordance with the rules. It appears, moreover, from the facts which are before us that the statements made in the report thus irregularly admitted were inaccurate, and that if they were accepted as being accurate they cast such a reflection upon the appellant's veracity as to lead the Board to the conclusion that she was a woman entirely unworthy of credence and that she was in fact still cohabiting with the man Hill. It is possible to understand the Board saying that if she had misled them in one particular, they could not place much reliance upon her statement as to the question which has been investigated before us. If the Board had had before them the correct statement, namely, that all that she had said about her past life was true and that it was she who had suffered ill-treatment from her husband, and that the custody of the children had been given to her when she obtained the order of separation from her husband, the Board might have arrived at a different conclusion. They dealt with the evidence irregularly, and in my opinion as we have now unquestionably the true facts of the case before us, and as we know that the evidence given in her absence was incorrect, the decision of the Board cannot be supported.

Having had evidence brought before us in addition to that which was before the Board, we have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be allowed.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely concur in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, and in the reasons that he has given for it. I desire to add two observations only. If this case had rested solely upon the allegation that in the place where the appellant was carrying on her profession she was cohabiting with a man who was not her husband, I am not prepared to say that the Board would not have been justified on that ground alone in removing her name from the roll; and I am not prepared to say that this court ought to have differed from their conclusion upon the evidence which was before them. It has to be borne in mind that the patients who are attended by the midwife have to be considered. Women are very sensitive of each other's honour, sometimes more so than of their own, and certainly much more so than men are of each other's honour in matters of this kind, and it might be exceedingly mischievous if there was reasonable ground for believing that a woman who professed to be carrying on the calling of a midwife and who was certified as such was leading or was reputed to be leading an immoral life. If the present case rested solely and entirely upon the allegation as to the mode of life of the appellant I should not differ from the finding of the Board; but it is quite clear from a perusal of the shorthand notes of the proceedings that the Board wished to ascertain certain particulars as to the reasons why the appellant's children had been taken by the guardians, whether it was or was not on account of her mode of life, and also to ascertain whether she was speaking the truth in the account which she gave with regard to that matter. From the shorthand notes it appears clear that at that hearing one of the members of the Board said to the appellant, "It was on account of your mode of life that they (i.e., the guardians) took the children?" and she said, "It was because I had no home." The chairman then asked the member of the Board who put the question whether he had any knowledge that that was the reason why the guardians took away the children, and the member replied that he had no evidence. The clerk thereupon said that there was no evidence, but that it could be procured, and the Board then adjourned the hearing for the purpose of obtaining further evidence. On the second occasion a document was produced, the report which has been referred to, and part of it was read as evidence before the Board. That document must have led the Board to believe that the appellant had not spoken the truth when she said that her husband had once been in prison, and had twice been arrested for not paying maintenance for the children, and must have led them to believe that from the guardians' point of view the appellant had been guilty of a dereliction of duty with regard to the children. I agree with my Lord as to the powers of this court, but even if they were more limited than they are, it would be impossible to say that the Board was not influenced against the appellant by statements which are now known to have been incorrect, and also clearly irregularly admitted. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

LOW, J.—I agree. Speaking for myself, I have no desire, and I think that the court has no desire, to give any expression of opinion as to the way in which the facts of any particular case should be dealt with. But on the facts of the present case, and in view of the manner in which the investigation took place, I am quite sure that the court is doing right in ordering that the name of the appellant should be restored to the roll of midwives.

Appeal allowed.

Carriage of Goods—Carrier's lien—General lien—Particular lien—Goods stopped in transitu—Claim to general lien by carriers—No priority over right of stoppage.

The vendors of goods authorised their agents to forward the goods to the buyers "by connecting carrier and upon such conditions as the latter may exact." The goods were delivered to carriers for delivery to the buyers, and a clause in the carrier's consignment note provided that all goods carried were subject to a particular lien "for money due to them for the carriage of and other charges upon such goods" and a general lien "for any other moneys due to them from the owners of such goods upon any account." The vendors paid all delivery charges in respect of the goods. The buyers became insolvent and the vendors exercised their right of stoppage in transitu. The buyers owed the carriers for charges in respect of other consignments and the carriers claimed they had a general lien on the goods as against the vendors for these unpaid charges.

Held: under the common law the general lien had no priority over the right of stoppage in transitu, and as there was no agreement express or implied on the part of the vendors to postpone their right as unpaid vendors to the general lien, the common law rule applied and the carrier's claim failed.

The House took time for consideration.

July 13, 1915. The following opinions were read.

LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C.—The appellants in this case, who are the United States Steel Products Co. of Philadelphia, entered into a contract on Dec. 29, 1910, with a firm of Tupper & Co., Ltd., of Batman's Hill Works, Bilston, in the county of Stafford, for the sale to them of 1,500 gross tons of steel billets. By the terms of the contract the goods were to be delivered to the purchasers at their works at Bilston at a price of £4 12s. 9d. net per ton, cost, insurance, and freight being paid by the vendors. Under this contract a consignment was made by the appellants in February, 1911, of about 499 tons, but before delivery was complete Messrs. Tupper & Co., Ltd., became insolvent, and thereupon the appellants asserted their right as unpaid vendors to stop delivery and regain possession of the goods.

If the only rights to be considered were those between the appellants and Messrs. Tupper & Co., Ltd., there would be no dispute but that the appellants were justified in what they did. The goods, however, were, at the moment when the appellants' notice to stop their delivery was received, in the custody of the Great Western Rail. Co. who are the respondents to this appeal, and they claimed that, under circumstances to which I will more exactly refer, they were entitled to retain possession in order to satisfy a lien for moneys due to them from Messrs. Tupper & Co., Ltd., not for the carriage of these particular goods, but on a general account. Such a lien could not be maintained against the vendors apart from contract, and the real question in this case is whether such a contract exists. PICKFORD, J., has held that it does not, but his judgment was reversed by by the Court of Appeal, from whom the present appeal is brought to this House. In order to answer the question thus raised it becomes necessary to examine in some detail the history and circumstances of the case. The appellants were, as I have already stated, bound under the terms of their contract to provide carriage and pay the freight of the goods in question. They accordingly shipped them by the steamship Manchester Shipper, a vessel which formed part of a line of steamers owned by the Manchester Liners, Ltd., known as the Philadelphia-Manchester Line. The bill of lading, which was dated Feb. 28, 1911, was made to the appellants' order, and contained this clause:

"Goods to be forwarded to Batman's Hill Works, via Great Western Railway, Bilston, England, from Manchester, and the carrier is authorised by the owner to forward by a connecting carrier, and upon such conditions as the latter may exact. The carrier shall pay all charges for forwarding, but shall not be liable for any loss of, or damage to, the goods occurring after delivery to the connecting carrier."

At this date the appellants had full disposing power over the goods, and this condition was a condition to which they assented, and which bound anyone accepting the bill. This is indeed stated by the last clause in the bill of lading, which is in these terms:

"In accepting this bill of lading, the shipper, owner, and consignee of the goods, and the holder of the bill of lading agree to be bound by all its stipulations, exceptions and conditions, whether written or printed, as fully as if they were all signed by such shipper, owner, consignee and holder."

The bill of lading was endorsed by the appellants and dispatched to Messrs. Tupper & Co., Ltd., by the post on Mar. 10, 1911. On this day, accordingly, the property of the goods passed to the purchasers. On the same day the shipping company, the Manchester Liners Ltd., in pursuance of the authority that they had received on the bill of lading, consigned the goods by the Manchester Ship Canal Co. upon terms that are contained in a consignment note of that date. The document is important, and it is necessary that I should read its actual words. They are these:

"Receive and forward the undermentioned goods, to be carried at the reduced through rate below the company's ordinary through or local rate, in consideration whereof I agree to relieve the Manchester Ship Canal Co. and all other companies or persons over whose lines the goods may pass, or in whose possession the same may be during any portion of the transit, from all liability for loss, damage, misdelivery, delay, or detention (including detention of traders' trucks) except upon proof that such loss, damage, misdelivery, delay, or detention arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the company's servants. And I also agree to the conditions on the back of this note. This agreement shall be deemed to be separately made with all companies or persons, parties to any through rate under which goods are carried. All charges to senders."

The general conditions on the back of this note were sixteen in all, but there is only one, cl. 7, that calls for special attention. It is upon the true construction of this provision that the whole dispute depends. It is in these terms:

> "All goods delivered to the company will be received and held by them subject to a lien for money due to them for the carriage of and other charges upon such goods and also to a general lien for any other moneys due to them from the owners of such goods upon any account; and in case any such lien is not satisfied within a reasonable time from the date upon which the company first gave notice to the owners of the goods of the exercise of the same, the goods may be sold by the company by auction or otherwise, and the proceeds of the sale applied to the satisfaction of every such lien and expenses."

The goods were, pursuant to this note, delivered to the Great Western Railway on Mar. 22, they arrived at Bilston Station on Mar. 24, and on the same day, as Messrs. Tupper & Co., Ltd., had then suspended payment, the appellants directed the Manchester Liners, Ltd., to stop delivery, a direction which was at once forwarded by telegraph from the Manchester Liners, Ltd., to the Great Western Railway. In answer to this request the Great Western Railway replied on Mar. 25, that they had already exercised a lien upon the goods for money due from Messrs. Tupper & Co. to them. It is not necessary to pursue the further correspondence that took place between the parties. The railway company claimed that they were entitled as against the goods to payment of £1,170, money owing on a general account, apparently including a sum for costs of some legal proceedings, and to obtain the release of the goods this sum was paid to them by the appellants under an agreement which provided that, in the event of a decision that the respondents had not got a lien on the steel billets ranking in priority to the appellants' rights as unpaid vendors the respondents should repay such sum of £1,170 to the appellants. The dispute was thus transferred from the goods to the money, and it is the claim to this sum that is the subject of this present appeal.

Before more closely examining the terms of the contract of Mar. 10, under which the respondents claim, it is, I think, desirable to state how the law stands in relation to the rival claims of unpaid vendors and carriers of goods. Apart from any express contract, it is clear that a carrier of goods, whether by land or sea, has a lien on the goods for their freight; but this right, which arises from the common law, is confined to the carrier's charges payable on the carriage of the particular goods. Such a lien prevails against the rights of the vendors as well as those of the consignees. On the other hand, a general lien—that is, a right to retain the goods for other freights due upon other transactions—can only arise by express contract or from general usage, and such a lien, apart from contract, cannot affect the right of the consignor. A claim to such a lien was considered in Wright v. Snell (1). In that case goods were consigned by a manufacturer in Staffordshire to his agent in London for sale on commission in May and July, 1820. The carriers had at a date, stated in the report to be between September, 1819, and February, 1821, delivered to the consignor a printed freight note stating:

> "That all goods would be subject to a lien, not only for the freight of such particular goods, but also for any general balance due from the respective owners."

The report does not specify the exact date when this note was delivered, but the argument proceeded upon the footing that its terms were accepted as the terms of carriage. In reliance on this provision the carriers refused delivery to the consignee until he had paid the sum of £58 for the carriage of goods not belonging to the consignors. As in the present case, the goods were sold, the money was retained by the carriers, and the action was brought against them by the consignor for its recovery, and judgment was given in favour of the plaintiff. The different position of the consignee in that case from the consignees in the present instance, and the different character of the contract, prevent the case being treated as a direct decision, but in the course of his judgement BEST, J., made a statement to which reference is useful. He said (5 B. & Ald. at p. 355):

> "But even supposing these goods, instead of being addressed to a factor, had been addressed to the real purchaser, the carrier would have no right to say, if the bargain was rescinded, either from the inability of the purchaser to pay, or his refusal to complete the bargain, that the original owner of the goods should not have them back without paying all that might be due from the proposed vendee."

Apart from special circumstances arising from contract or usage, I see no reason to differ from this statement of the law, and, indeed, it was not challenged before your Lordships. But it is in relation to the law so stated that the meaning of cl. 7 of the conditions endorsed upon the consignment note must be determined. Some discussion has taken place as to whether this consignment note bound Messrs. Tupper & Co. the consignees of the goods; and it appears that the judgment of LORD SUMNER in the Court of Appeal rested in part, at least, upon the view that they could not be bound. Counsel before your Lordships, both for the appellants and the respondents, admitted that Messrs. Tupper & Co. were bound; but as they are not before this House, too great reliance should not be placed on this admission. They were certainly bound by the terms of the bill of lading which they accepted, and it would seem that the only means by which they could avoid the liabilities created by the consignment note would be by establishing that it was outside the powers which the bill of lading conferred upon the shipping company. In my opinion, however, it is not necessary that the consideration of this question should be undertaken by your Lordships. The consignment note was certainly designed to bind the consignees, for it is not, in my opinion, possible to assign any meaning to the words "owners of such goods" in cl. 7, which would exclude them from the ambit of the phrase; in these circumstances interpretation of the document must be independent of the question whether, in fact, it bound the people whom it purported to affect. The efficacy and the meaning of a contract may be, and in this case are, different and independent questions, and the solution of the one is not assisted by the consideration of the other. Whether or not it bound Messrs. Tupper & Co. it certainly bound the vendors. It is argued on behalf of the respondents that when once this is conceded it follows that the appellants (the vendors) intended not only to confer upon the carriers of the goods a general lien for all moneys due to the carriers from the consignees upon any account, but also, in order to make this lien effectual, that the right to stop the goods in transit should be postponed in its favour; and in support of this contention it is pointed out that the contract is one under which the vendors obtained reduced terms for the carriage which they were liable to pay. This is no doubt true. But it does not make the language of the clause more plain; it only affords a reason why the vendors might have been induced to postpone their rights. It does not show that, in fact, they have been postponed. Now, in my opinion, the clause means no more than its actual words imply—viz., that the carriers are to have, first, a particular lien for the special freight and charges applicable to the particular goods; and, secondly, a general lien that will cover all outstanding moneys. These two liens take their position according to the law: the first has priority over the right of stoppage in transit, the second has not. It was argued that the fact that the first lien took precedence over the vendors' right showed that the second was intended to enjoy the same priority. Examination of the clause leads me to a contrary conclusion. The first lien was not stated to enjoy those rights, nor do they arise, by virtue of the contract, they attach to it by the character of the lien itself; in the same way the rights associated with the general lien are also defined, and in the absence of express bargain to the contrary they rank subsequent to those of the vendor. It was, indeed, contended on behalf of the respondents that such a bargain was to be found in the consignment note, since the contrary view would destroy the value of the general lien. I cannot accept this view. Without the provision as to the general lien the railway company could only have enjoyed a right against the consignees to retain the goods in respect of their general account by proof of a usage in the trade to that effect, while the contract gives them expressly rights of the widest character, which it might be difficult to support by any evidence of usage.

These considerations would be sufficient to answer the case set up by the respondents, but another view appears to have been presented to the Court of Appeal by the appellants, with which I cannot agree. The argument there seems to have been that the phrase "owners of such goods" in cl. 7 meant only the consignors, that consequently the general lien was only intended to cover moneys due from them, and, since no such moneys were due, no lien existed. It must have been to this contention that LORD SUMNER directed his observations when he said ([1914] 3 K.B. at p. 578):

> "If you scratch out 'owners of such goods' and write in 'Tupper & Co.' cadit quæstio, and yet what other interpretation is to be put upon it?"

That in the circumstances of this case Messrs. Tupper & Co. were included within the meaning of the phrase "the owners of such goods" seems to me plain, but they are not the only people who answer to the description. I entirely agree with PICKFORD, J., that the phrase covers all persons who under the contract and the bill of lading were entitled to go to the railway company and receive the goods. But it does not follow from this that the general lien was a lien to be exercised as against any persons except such owners, or defeated rights that were paramount to theirs. The real question does not depend on ascertaining from whom the money is due, but as against whom the claim of retention in respect of such money can be asserted. For the reasons that I have already stated, it is my opinion that such right can only be asserted against the persons who both owe the money and claim the delivery, and if a person from whom no money is due is in a position to assert his right to the goods, the general lien is inoperative. I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that of PICKFORD, J., restored.

LORD ATKINSON.—The question for decision in this case is the true construction of the seventh of the conditions printed on the back of a certain contract, dated Mar. 10, 1911, entered into between the Manchester Liners, Ltd., and the Manchester Ship Canal Co. for the carriage of certain steel billets from Manchester to Batman's Hill Works, Bilston. These Batman's Hill Works belonged to Messrs. Tupper & Co., who had purchased, on credit, these billets from the appellants on Feb. 15, 1911. The purchasers had before the delivery of the goods stopped payment. The appellants, purporting to exercise their right as unpaid vendors to stop the goods in transitu, duly served notice on the respondents on Mar. 24, 1911, requiring them to stop delivery to Tupper & Co. of the consignment or any part of it undelivered. In fact, only a small portion of the billets had been delivered. The respondents held possession of the balance. The freight for the goods had been prepaid. Nothing whatever remained due to the respondents in respect of the carriage of these goods to their destination, but a sum of £1,170 was owed by Tupper & Co. to the respondents on a balance of account between them. The nature of the account or of the items composing it does not appear. The wording of the condition is wide enough to cover debts of any kind. The respondents contend that by this condition, properly construed, the lien of the appellants as unpaid vendors for the price of the goods is postponed to a general lien for this sum of £1,170, purported to be given to them by the terms of this condition. The appellants on the other hand contend that even if Messrs. Tupper & Co. are bound by this seventh condition, and have thereby, as owners, given to the respondents a general lien on goods in respect of this sum £1,170, yet that this condition does not, when properly construed, amount to an agreement binding upon the appellants to postpone their vendor's lien to this general lien. The question for decision resolves itself, then, into this: Which of these two constructions of the condition is its true construction? But, before dealing with that question, it is, I think, essential, owing to some of the observations of the learned lords justices in the Court of Appeal, to determine who, in the circumstances of the case, are bound by the provisions of this condition, whatever its precise meaning may be.

The goods were shipped by the vendors on board a steamship named the Manchester Shipper, belonging to the Manchester Liners, Ltd., under a bill of lading dated Feb. 28, 1911, signed by the latter company, according to which they were to be delivered at the port of Manchester to the order of that company or their assignees subject to the conditions, exceptions, and restrictions in the clauses (marginal and other) in the bill of lading contained. In many of these clauses the consignees are expressly named. By cl. 10 it is provided:

> "that goods destined to ports or places other than the ship's port of discharge are to be forwarded thence at the risk of their owners, and subject exclusively to the conditions of the carriers who may complete the transit," and by the last clause but one it is provided that,

"in accepting this bill of lading the shipper, owner, and consignee of the goods and the holder of the bill of lading agree to be bound by all its stipulations, exceptions, and conditions, whether written or printed, as fully as if they were all signed by such shipper, owner, consignee, or holder."

By a clause printed in the margin of the bill of lading it is provided that the goods are to be forwarded from Manchester to Batman's Hill Works, Bilston, via the Great Western Railway, and that

"the carrier is authorised by the owner to forward by a connecting carrier upon such conditions as the latter may exact."

On Mar. 10, four days before the arrival of the goods at Manchester, this bill of lading was admittedly endorsed in blank by the appellants and forwarded by post to Tupper & Co., who, from the moment of the receipt of the bill of lading, if not from the moment of its posting, became holders of it, and presumably owners of the goods.

By s. 1 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, it is provided that every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, and every endorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such consignment or endorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself. By the s. 2 it is provided that nothing contained in the statute should prejudice or affect any right of stoppage in transit. Tupper & Co. accordingly became, by force of this statute and of the provision of this penultimate clause of the bill of lading itself, as much bound by every one of its provisions as if they had themselves signed it. Under its tenth paragraph they became bound to submit to any conditions the carrier, who completed the transit of the goods, might insist upon.

On the same day, Mar. 10, 1911, whether before or after the bill of lading had been endorsed does not appear, the connecting carrier (the respondents) made a contract with the Manchester Liners, Ltd., for the carriage of these goods to their ultimate destination upon certain conditions. Clause 7 was one of these. One provision contained in it was to the effect that the respondents were to receive and hold the goods, subject to a general lien for any moneys (other than those due for the carriage of, or charges upon, the goods) due from the "owners" of the goods to them upon any account. This provision thus became one of the terms of a contract by which Tupper & Co. were as fully and effectually bound as if they had themselves been executing parties to the contract of carriage of Mar. 10, 1911. If they were, as is contended, the "owners" of these goods, within the meaning of the condition, then they contracted that the respondents should, altogether, irrespective of the vendors' lien, have a general lien on the goods for such sum as they, Tupper & Co., should owe the respondents on any account. And if they were not the "owners" of the goods, within the meaning of the condition, they assented that the respondent should have that general lien for such sum as the persons who were the owners should owe the respondents on any account. Indeed, counsel for the respondents did not dispute this. In my view, it is a matter of importance, because it would appear to me, from some of the observations made in the Court of Appeal, that it was assumed that this provision of cl. 7 would be futile and useless unless it had the effect of postponing the vendors' lien to the general lien claimed, inasmuch as Tupper & Co. were not bound by the condition, and did not, by their contract, create that general lien. I am wholly unable to take that view. I think that if Tupper & Co. were the owners of the goods, they being bound by this condition gave a right to the respondents, very valuable while they continued owners, even if the lien of the vendors was not postponed, for this general lien and the vendor's lien would not be conterminous. The second is only called into existence in one event, namely, the bankruptcy or insolvency of the purchaser. In that

A event the enforcement of it might, no doubt, render the general lien, good in other respects valueless or comparatively valueless, but in all other circumstances the general lien might afford most effective and valuable security to the creditor to whom it was given. In my view, there is nothing illogical or inconsistent in holding, as I think PICKFORD, J., held, that while by the terms of this condition Messrs. Tupper & Co., as owners, clearly contracted to give to the respondents a general lien for all sums due by them, yet that the B language of the condition is not so clear and unequivocal as to bind the appellants to postpone to this general lien their own lien as unpaid vendors.

There is no controversy as to the nature, extent, and operation of a vendor's lien either at common law or by statute. The vendor's right to stop in transition means not only the right to countermand delivery to the vendee, but to order delivery to the vendor. It is subject to the possessory lien of the carrier for the charges due in respect of the C carriage of the goods; but is not subject to any general lien which the carrier might have, as against the consignee of the goods, in respect of freight due on other goods: Oppenheim v. Russell (2). The vendor by stopping the goods in transition does not thereby regain the property in them, nor does he thereby cancel the sale. In no proper sense of the word does he, by the stoppage, become the "owner" of the goods. It is the indebtness of the "owners" for which a general lien is given. Yet if the goods have been sold during D transit, and before notice given, to a bona fide holder to whom the bill of lading had been endorsed or the document of title mentioned in s. 47 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, transferred, he would unquestionably be the "owner" of the goods and yet might owe nothing to the respondents. Again, it was, as I understood, admitted by counsel for the respondents that the vendors' lien was not lost, but merely postponed to the general lien of the respondents. If that be so, it would follow that, Tupper & Co. remaining the E owners, the vendors upon payment of this sum of £1,170 would be entitled to the possession of the goods, though they were not "owners," and did not as "owners" owe the respondents anything, and yet it was only the liability of the "owners" which was secured. The first three lines of the conditions, which merely embody the existing rule of law, do not raise this difficulty, as the word "owners" is not found in them. Under them whoever was entitled to demand possession of the goods would be bound to pay F the carriage of them and the other charges mentioned, no matter from whom those moneys might be due. The second clause of the condition appears to me to be most ambiguous. In the construction of it the word "owners" cannot receive its ordinary meaning. At law the vendor's lien would clearly take precedence of the general lien, however valid. It is not shown that the vendors knew of the existence, nature, or extent of the indebtedness covered by it. That indebtedness might have arisen from trans- G actions unconnected with any goods or their transit. It might have exceeded, as in fact it did exceed in this case, the price of the goods carried.

It is, I think, necessary before one decides that the vendors have postponed their lien, and thus practically given up in toto all the benefits of their legal right, to find in these conditions a clear agreement, express or implied, upon their part so to do. Their mere assent to the creation of a general lien by Tupper & Co. would not suffice, nor would, H I think, even a mere contract by them that Tupper & Co. should, as owners, give the lien. The only consideration received by the vendors to induce them to take a course so contrary to their interest, and apparently so reckless, was this, that the goods were to be forwarded at the lower rate, which rate they had to pay; but the general lien which the respondents got, whether it ranked behind or in front of the lien of the vendors, might I well have been in itself a sufficient inducement to them to carry the goods at a lower rate. In my opinion there is not to be found in this condition any clear and definite agreement, express or implied, binding on the appellants to postpone their lien as unpaid vendors to the general lien, thereby purported to be given by Tupper & Co., as owners, to the respondents. If that be so, then upon the authorities their lien ranks in front of the latter lien, and the appellants were entitled to obtain the possession of these goods without paying the sum of £1,170. I think, therefore, that the decision appealed from was erroneous and should be reversed; that the decision of PICKFORD, J., was right, and should be restored, and this appeal be allowed with costs.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—On Dec. 29, 1910, the appellants agreed to sell to Messrs. Tupper & Co., Ltd., 1,500 tons of steel billets to be delivered c.i.f. to buyers' works, Bilston, England. The goods were to be shipped by about equal monthly quantities in February, March and April, 1911, and each delivery was to be treated as a separate contract. Pursuant to this agreement, the appellants, on Feb. 28, 1911, shipped a parcel of steel billets on board the steamship Manchester Shipper, taking therefor a bill of lading to their order of assigns, according to which, though the port of discharge was Manchester, goods destined to places other than Manchester were to be forwarded thence at the risk of their owners, and subject exclusively to the conditions of the carriers who might complete the transit. There was a marginal note to the effect that the goods were to be forwarded via Great Western Railway from Manchester to the works of Messrs. Tupper & Co., Ltd., at Bilston, upon such conditions as the connecting carrier might exact. Accordingly on Mar. 10, 1911, the owners of the steamship Manchester Shipper, pursuant to the authority conferred on them by the bill of lading, entered into a contract with the Manchester Ship Canal Co. to forward the goods to Messrs. Tupper & Co., at Bilston, at the reduced through rate therein mentioned. The contract provided that that it should be deemed to have been entered into separately with all companies or persons parties to the through rate. The Great Western Rail. Co. was such a party, and the contract, therefore, may be considered to have been entered into with them. It provided, cl. 7, that all goods delivered to the company, that is, for the purposes of this case, the Great Western Railway Co., should be received and held subject to a lien for money due to them for the carriage of and other charges upon such goods, and also to a general lien for any other moneys due to them from the "owners" of such goods upon any account, and, further, that in case any such lien were not satisfied within a reasonable time from the date upon which the company first gave notice to the owners of the goods of the exercise of the same, the goods might be sold by the company by auction or otherwise, and the proceeds of sale applied to the satisfaction of every such lien and expenses. The question your Lordships have to decide depends primarily upon the construction of this clause, for it has not been contended that the contract was outside the authority conferred by the bill of lading, or that anyone claiming a title to the goods under the bill of lading was not bound by the authority so given, at any rate unless and until it had been rescinded. Indeed the bill of lading contains an express provision to that effect. On the same day on which the contract of carriage was entered into the bill of lading, endorsed in blank, was forwarded by the appellants' London house to Messrs. Tupper & Co., Ltd. It was assumed in argument that, under these circumstances, the property in the goods was in Messrs. Tupper & Co. at the date of the contract of carriage. I will adopt this assumption, though I do not think it is necessarily correct. Clearly, however, the appellants, as unpaid vendors, had the right to stop the goods in transit for the purpose of asserting their lien for unpaid purchase money. It is admitted that as between the appellants and Messrs. Tupper & Co. this right of stoppage has been duly exercised, so that the vendor's lien prevails, but it is contended on behalf of the respondents that such lien is by virtue of the contract of carriage postponed to the lien thereby created in favour of the Great Western Rail. Co. for certain moneys due to them from Messrs. Tupper & Co. on general account. It is not disputed that the lien of the Great Western Rail. Co. for money due to them for the carriage of and other charges upon the goods in question would take precedence, apart from any agreement, over any vendor's lien, but all these moneys were prepaid by the appellants. It seems, however, reasonably clear that a carrier cannot claim any general lien upon goods which he carries unless such lien be created by express agreement. It is equally clear that no such express agreement between carrier and consignee will oust the right of the consignor to stop the goods in transit for the purpose of asserting his lien for unpaid purchase money. To oust this right there must be an express agreement by the consignor. The respondents' counsel in their argument accordingly relied on cl. 7 of the contract of carriage, first as an agreement on the part of Messrs. Tupper & Co. creating the lien in question for moneys due from them as the owners of the goods, and, secondly, as an agreement on the part of the appellants postponing their vendor's lien to the lien so created

It was assumed in argument on both sides that the agreement, according to its true construction, operated in the manner first suggested by the respondents' counsel. The dispute was whether it also operated in manner secondly suggested. The Court of Appeal on the other hand, were of opinion that Messrs. Tupper & Co. were not parties to or bound by the agreement at all, and therefore that the clause creating the lien of the Great Western Rail. Co., if any effect be given to it, must operate simply upon the interest of the appellants as unpaid vendors, and preclude them from setting up their vendors' lien as against the lien thereby expressed to be created in favour of the Great Western Rail. Co.

It does not seem to me to be very material whether Messrs. Tupper & Co. be considered a party to the agreement or otherwise. As endorsees of the bill of lading they were, both by general law and by the terms of the bill itself, bound by its provisions, and could not claim the goods thereunder without giving effect to any lien created under the authority thereby conferred. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Great Western Rail. Co. could by virtue of the agreement have lawfully refused to deliver the goods to Messrs. Tupper & Co. until they had paid the amount due from them to the railway company on general account. It might, of course, be contended, on the one hand, that the creation of this lien prevented the vendors from fulfilling their contract for delivery at the Bilston Works; and, on the other hand, that the acceptance of the endorsed bill precluded the purchasers from raising this point, but your Lordships are not in the present appeal concerned with either contention. It is enough to say that, by virtue of the contract of carriage, Messrs. Tupper & Co. could not demand delivery of the goods by the Great Western Rail. Co., except on the terms of satisfying the lien thereby created. It was assumed by the Court of Appeal that the word "owners" in cl. 7 of the contract of carriage referred to the persons who at the date of the contract were the legal owners of the goods. I have the gravest doubts whether the contract can be so interpreted. The contract is a common form contract for use in cases in which the consignor desires to secure what has been called a preferential rate in lien of the rates ordinarily chargeable for carriage by the companies concerned, and under these circumstances I think that the expression "owners" in the clause may well be used to denote the person entitled to the delivery of the goods, whoever such person may be, and does not necessarily refer to the person who at the date of the contract or at any other time may have the legal property in the goods. These common form contracts are intended to meet a variety of cases, and it is highly improbable that their effect was intended to be quite different according to whether the legal ownership, as to which the carriers did not necessarily know anything, was in one person or another. The goods carried might, for all the carrier could tell, be the property of consignor, consignee, or some third party, and the property might shift during the transit. Thus in the present case Messrs. Tupper & Co. might at the date of the contract have resold the goods and passed the property to a sub-purchaser. Again, but for the endorsement of the bill of lading, the property in the goods in question would have remained in the appellants, and according to the respondents' contention no one could have obtained delivery without satisfying all money due from the appellants to the Great Western Rail. Co. Or, again, the appellants might have endorsed the bill of lading in favour of a third party for re-endorsement and delivery to Messrs. Tupper & Co. in exchange for a draft in payment of the purchase price, in which case the agreement might create a lien for moneys due from the third party. These difficulties would not be met by construing "owners" as the owner for the time being, for non constat that the person entitled to delivery would be the owner. On the other hand, all difficulty is avoided by treating the word "owners" as meaning the persons entitled to demand delivery, whoever they may be, when the time for delivery comes, and this construction seems to be borne out by the fact that the company cannot sell to satisfy their lien without notice to the owners. If "owners" means the person demanding delivery this provision raises no difficulty, but if it means the person having the legal property as opposed to the person demanding delivery, all sorts of difficulties might arise in enforcing the lien.

If, as I think, this be the true construction of the contract of carriage, the "owners" were, in the events that have happened, the appellants. They were entitled to demand delivery by virtue of the stoppage in transit. They can only get such delivery on payment of what is due from them to the carriers on general account, as well as the charges in respect of the goods themselves. But there is no question of their having to pay anything due to the respondents from Messrs. Tupper & Co., who ceased to be entitled to delivery as soon as the right of stoppage was exercised. If, however, I am wrong in this construction, I still think that the appeal ought to succeed. There is, in my opinion great difficulty in giving to cl. 7 the double-edged effect for which the respondents contend. Had the parties to the contract intended that cl. 7 should not only create a lien for moneys due from Messrs. Tupper & Co. as the actual owners, but should give such lien priority over the right of the appellants as unpaid vendors, the contract would, in my opinion, have contained an express provision to that effect. Had the carriers insisted on any such express provision it is difficult to believe that the appellants would have been willing, for the sale of the preferential rate, to accept the risk which such a clause would involve. The debt from the owners in respect of which the lien was created might have far exceeded the value of the consignment. For the above reasons, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of PICKFORD, J., was right and ought to be restored.

LORD PARMOOR.—The appellants by a contract of Dec. 29, 1910, agreed to sell to Tupper & Co., carrying on business at Bilston, 1,500 tons of steel billets. In February, 1911, the appellants dispatched to Tupper & Co. approximatly 500 tons of steel billets. The goods were shipped with the Manchester Liners, Ltd., who were further authorised by the appellants to forward the goods from the port of destination, Manchester, to the works of Tupper & Co. at Bilston. On Mar. 10, 1911, the Manchester Liners, Ltd., contracted with the Manchester Ship Canal Co. for the forwarding of the goods over the Great Western Railway system to Bilston. On the same day the appellants forwarded to Tupper & Co. the shipping documents and the bills of lading endorsed in blank. These bills of lading were duly received by Tupper & Co., and thereupon the property in the goods passed to them. The goods arrived at Manchester on Mar. 14, 1911, and were duly forwarded by the respondents, arriving at or near Bilston about Mar. 18. A portion of the goods was delivered to Tupper & Co., but on Mar. 22, the respondents stopped delivery, and claimed to hold the balance in their possession under a general lien for money due to them from Messrs. Tupper & Co., amounting to £1,170. The appellants had received no payment for any part of the goods, and on Mar. 24, 1911, they, as unpaid vendors, gave notice to the respondents to stop delivery of the goods, or any portion thereof undelivered. It is not disputed that the respondents were entitled to hold the goods under a lien for freight as against the appellants, but the respondents claimed further that they were entitled under the contract of carriage to hold the goods as against the appellants under a general lien until they received payment of the general balance of £1,170 due to them from the consignees, Messrs. Tupper & Co.

Whether the respondents were so entitled or not depends entirely on the conditions on which they held the goods under the contract of carriage, and the question is one of construction. The contract is in a form very generally adopted when goods are carried from station to station at owner's risk under special conditions. There are a number of these conditions on the back of the consignment note which are binding upon, and affect, any party in respect of the receiving, forwarding, or delivery of the goods, if they are reasonable, and signed by such party, or by the person delivering the goods for carriage. There was an option of sending the goods by the ordinary rate, the respondents accepting the ordinary liability, and it is not suggested that the conditions are unreasonable. Contracts at owner's risk have been extensively adopted, to the benefit and convenience both of the traders and the railway companies. The person delivering the goods for carriage, and who signed the contract, was R. J. Darlington, for Manchester Liners, Ltd., who were agents of the appellants. The contract, therefore, is binding upon the appellants and all other parties in a position to make any claim on the respondents in respect of the receiving, forwarding, and delivery of the goods. Clause 7 is as follows:

> "All goods delivered to the company will be received and held by them subject to a lien for money due to them for the carriage of and other charges upon such goods, and also to a general lien for any other moneys due to them from the owners of such goods upon any account, and in case any such lien is not satisfied within a reasonable time from the date upon which the company first gave notice to the owners of the goods of the exercise of the same, the goods may be sold by the company by auction or otherwise, and the proceeds of sale applied to the satisfaction of every such lien and expenses."

There is often a difficulty in contracts of carriage to distinguish between the respective rights of the consignors or consignees. To meet this the appellants as senders of the goods are made liable in the first instance to pay the moneys due to the respondents for the carriage of the goods. It is a condition in the contract that where the charges of the carrier are not prepaid the goods are accepted for carriage only upon the condition that the sender remains liable for payment of the amount due to the carrier for the carriage of such goods without prejudice to the company's rights, if any, against the consignee or any other person. It is only necessary to add that the words "consignor" and "consignee" are found in the conditions, but that the general lien attaches, not in respect of moneys due to the respondents from the consignor or consignee, but from the owners of the goods. Apart from any obligation created by the contract, the respondents would have the right to hold the goods for money due to them on their carriage, as against unpaid vendors who have exercised their right to stop delivery. It is not necessary to consider whether any greater right of lien is given in this respect under the contract than would arise from the common law obligation, since the moneys due to the respondents for the carriage of and other charges upon the goods have been paid. In substance, there is no need to insert this term in the contract to meet the case of a claim to possession of the goods by an unpaid vendor, and I doubt whether the contract was framed with reference to the rights of an unpaid vendor. On the other hand, it has long been established that the respondents have no common law right to hold the goods against an unpaid vendor, who has stopped delivery, under a general lien for any other moneys due to them on any account from the owners of the goods. If such a right exists in the present case it must be imposed by the contract. It was pointed out in an early case—Rushforth v. Hadfield (3)—that if it is not convenient for the consignee to pay for the carriage of specific goods at the time of delivery, it is easy for the carrier to stipulate that they shall have a lien for their balance upon other goods which they may thereafter carry for him. A general lien of this character has been extensively introduced in contracts of carriage, in order to protect carriers in respect of moneys due to them on ledger accounts. These contracts have been found to be convenient as a matter of business and of advantage both to the carrier and to the trader, and in the present case the respondents have a general lien for moneys due to them from the owners of the goods on any account. The expression "the owners of such goods" under the terms of the contract means the persons for the time being entitled to demand and demanding actual possession of the goods by delivery from the carriers. I agree in this respect with the judgment of PICKFORD, J. BRAY, J., in his judgment in the Court of Appeal says ([1914] 3 K.B. at p. 585):

> "I do not think it means the owners for the time being; I think it means the owners of the goods at the time this contract was made."

I am unable to agree in this construction, but assume, although the matter is not quite free from doubt, that the owners at that date were the consignees, Messrs. Tupper & Co. It is clear that when the goods first reached the destination to which they were consigned and delivery of a portion thereof was made, the persons entitled to actual possession by delivery from the carriers were the consignees, Messrs. Tupper & Co.; and that a sum of £1,170 was due from them to the respondents on general account.

I do not doubt that as against Messrs. Tupper & Co. the respondents were entitled to a right of general lien for the sum of £1,170. Before, however, the delivery was completed the respondents, having reason to doubt the solvency of Messrs. Tupper & Co., stopped further delivery. The appellants subsequently, on Mar. 24, gave notice to the respondents to "stop Delivery Billets Tupper & Co. pending instructions," a notice effective in reference to the portion of the goods still in the possession of the carriers, and of which delivery had not been made. So soon as this notice had been given the repondents became liable to re-deliver the portion of the goods not actually delivered to the appellants, or according to their directions. It is not suggested that there were any moneys due to the respondents from the appellants on any general account, but if such moneys had been due the respondents would have had a general lien upon the goods to the amount of such moneys, and could have refused to deliver the goods to the appellants, or according to their directions, until such moneys had been paid. In other words, the carriers would have the protection for which they bargained, a right to hold the goods subject to a general lien for moneys due to them on any account from the person rightly claiming to take or direct delivery. It makes no difference that on the arrival of the goods at their destination Messrs. Tupper & Co. had a right to claim delivery and received actual possession of a portion of the goods. The effect of the notice of stoppage in transitu has the same operation against the portion of the goods undelivered as it would have had against the whole parcel if none had been delivered, and in respect of that portion the appellants became entitled to demand or to direct possession. It is said that on this construction the main object of the contract would be defeated, and the carrier deprived of his right to a general lien in respect of a ledger account due to him from a consignee. I do not think that this is the main object of the contract. In my opinion the words "owners of such goods" have been carefully selected, and the condition is not intended to give the respondents a right to retain goods against a person rightly claiming possession for moneys due to them on general account from some other person. In any event, the only question before your Lordships is one of construction and subject to the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, it is open to the contracting parties to make any contract which will best meet the varying business contingencies. In my opinion the appeal succeeds and the judgment of the Court below should be restored.

LORD WRENBURY.—The question for decision is limited to the construction of a single clause—nay, more, to the meaning of a single word in the clause. The clause is cl. 7 in the contract of carriage of Mar. 10, 1911; the word is "owners." It is not disputed that while the right of the unpaid vendor to stop in transitu is subject to the particular lien of the carrier for charges for carriage, it overrides any general lien of the carrier in the absence of special contract to the contrary. The whole question is whether between the consignors—the unpaid vendors—and the Great Western Co., the carriers, there existed a special contract to the contrary. Clause 7 is by the words on the face of the contract note of Mar. 10, 1911, rendered binding upon the parties to that note. The parties are the Manchester Liners, Ltd., and the Manchester Ship Canal Co. The contract, however, binds the United States Co., the consignors, as having been made on their behalf under the authority given by the bill of lading of Feb. 28, 1911, and binds the Great Western Rail. Co. as a party to the through rate by virtue of the words to that effect in the contract of carriage. It is said that it binds the consignee also by virtue of the concluding words of the bill of lading. I do not doubt that it does, but it is, I think, immaterial whether it does or not. Clause 7, then, is part of a valid contract, binding at any rate the two parties to this appeal. The only question is, What does it mean? The condition is one which comes into operation when, notwithstanding the lien in favour of the carrier for which it provides (whatever that lien is), another party claims that the carrier must deliver the goods, because, as that party asserts, there is no subsisting lien in favour of the carrier. The condition deals with two liens, the one the carrier's common law lien for charges for carriage, the other the contractual lien created by the words on which the question arises. The vendor consigning the goods may, of course, give such rights paramount to the right arising in himself upon stoppage in transitu as he thinks proper. It is said that by the first words of the clause he has given such a paramount right to the carrier's common law lien. This seems to me erroneous. That paramount right existed already. The consignor could not give the carrier that which the carrier already possessed. By the next words the consignor gives some paramount right. What is it? There are three possible meanings. First, the words may mean to grant in priority to the right of the unpaid vendor a right in the carrier to a charge on the goods for any money due from the consignor; or secondly, to a charge for any money due from the consignee; or thirdly, to a charge for any money due from such person (whoever he turns out to be) as is entitled to claim and claims delivery of the goods. To my mind the third is the only reasonable or possible meaning of the words. The first meaning would render it impossible for the consignee (if entitled to delivery) to get the goods without paying the consignor's debt, howsoever arising. The second would render it impossible for the consignor (if entitled to delivery) to get the goods without paying the consignee's debt, howsoever arising. The third is perfectly intelligible, and strictly pertinent to questions arising when some one comes and demands delivery and is met by the assertion of a lien in favour of the carrier, who in the absence of a lien would be bound to deliver. The word "owners" means, I think, "persons entitled to claim and claiming delivery." This is the meaning which PICKFORD, J., gave to the word, and in my opinion he was right in that view. For these reasons I think that this appeal succeeds.

Appeal allowed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MILNE

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Haldane, L.C., Lord Dunedin, Lord Atkinson and Lord Parker of Waddington), March 6, April 7, 1914]

Estate Duty—Passing of property—Settlement estate duty—Liability of property deemed to pass—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 30), s. 1, s. 2 (1) (c), s. 5 (1).

By a deed dated May 20, 1909, a settlor settled personalty on trust for his son for life and thereafter on trust for the issue of the son. On Dec. 8, 1911, the settlor died. It was accepted that estate duty was payable in respect of the settled fund under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c). On the question whether settlement estate duty was also payable,

Held (LORD DUNEDIN dissenting): section 5 (1) of the Act of 1894 ought to be read literally as referring to property which actually "passes" on the death within s. 1 of the Act of 1894, and as excluding property which notionally passes within s. 2 (1) of that Act, and, therefore, settlement estate duty was not payable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, [1913] 2 K.B. 606, affirmed.

Observations on the relationship of s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1894 to s. 1 of that Act.

Notes. The Finance Act, 1894, s. 5 (1), was repealed by the Finance Act, 1914, s. 18. This case remains important in view of the distinctions drawn between s. 1 and s. 2 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (COZENS-HARDY, M.R., BUCKLEY and KENNEDY, L.JJ.). Henry Ernest Milne died on Dec. 8, 1911, having by indentures dated May 20, 1909, settled certain shares and sums of stock upon trust for his son, John Rothwell Milne, for life, and, subject thereto, on trust for the benefit of the children or issue of John Rothwell Milne. The question arising for decision on this appeal was whether, on the death of Henry Ernest Milne, who predeceased John Rothwell Milne, settlement estate duty became by virtue of s. 5 of the Finance Act, 1894, as amended by s. 59 of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, payable in respect of the property comprised in this settlement. It was admitted that the settled property was "property passing on the death of the deceased" within the meaning of s. 2 (1), of the Finance Act, 1894, and that estate duty was payable in respect of it, but the Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed in addition "settlement estate duty" under s. 5 of the Act. The trustees of the settlement contended that the property did not pass under the settlement on the death of the deceased to some person not competent to dispose of it, and therefore the further duty was not payable. HORRIDGE, J., held that the duty was payable, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and from that decision the Attorney-General appealed.

The House took time for consideration.

April 7, 1914. The following opinions were read.

VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C.—At the conclusion of the case made for the Crown, the inclination of my opinion was that the Attorney-General had succeeded in shaking the foundation on which the judgment of the Court of Appeal rested. After further consideration I have arrived at a different conclusion, for which I will state my reasons.

The question is whether settlement estate duty became payable under s. 5 of the Finance Act, 1894 [now repealed] on the death of Henry Ernest Milne, which took place on Dec. 8, 1911, within three years of a voluntary settlement of property made by him on May 20, 1909. By s. 2 of the Act of 1894 property taken under a disposition purporting to act as an immediate gift inter vivos is, unless the disposition was made twelve months before the death of the disponer, deemed to be property passing on his death, and is accordingly liable to estate duty at all events. The period of twelve months was, by s. 59 of the Finance Act, 1910, extended to three years in the case of dispositions made after April 30, 1908. That estate duty became payable on the death of the deceased is not disputed. But as the first taker under the disposition succeeded for life only, and was alive when he died, whereby no further estate duty could become payable until the death of a person taking under the settlement and competent to dispose, the question is raised whether settlement estate duty is not payable. The answer to this question depends mainly on the interpretation to be placed on four sections of the Finance Act, 1894. By s. 1 estate duty is to be levied on the principal value of property, settled or unsettled, which passes on death. By s. 2 "property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include" certain specified cases of property which does not actually pass on death, like the property to which s. 1 relates. The meaning of s. 2 was discussed in this House in Earl Cowley v. I.R. Comrs. (1), and was explained to be that the section was not a definition of the field of s. 1, but was framed for the purpose of rendering liable to taxation certain kinds of property that do not actually pass on death, but are sufficiently analogous to property so passing as to make it proper to tax them. Section 2 is thus not a definition section, but an independent section operating outside the field of s. 1.

I think that this view of s. 2 as not being a definition section is the correct one. It is confirmed by the presence in s. 22 of what is a real definition of property passing on death as including property passing at a period ascertainable only by reference to death. I now come to s. 5. It is in these terms:

> "Where property in respect of which estate duty is leviable is settled by the will of the deceased, or having been settled by some other disposition passes under that disposition on the death of the deceased to some person not competent to dispose of the property—(a) A further estate duty called 'settlement estate duty' on the principal value of the settled property shall be levied at the rate hereinafter specified, except where the only life interest in the property after the death of the deceased is that of a wife or a husband of the deceased."

The section, therefore, applies only to a case in which certain conditions are fulfilled. The property must be property on which estate duty is leviable. It must then be either settled by the will of the deceased, and so be properly falling within s. 1, or it must be settled by some other disposition, and pass under that disposition on the death of the deceased to a person not competent to dispose. If the disponer is someone other than the deceased, a case of the kind in question is outside s. 2 altogether. What happens is the event of passing in point of fact on death according to the natural meaning of the words. The only case to which a notional passing under that section can possibly extend is one where the disposition which creates the settlement is that of the deceased himself.

For reasons already indicated, I have, after consideration, come to the conclusion that s. 2 cannot properly be read as extending the category of a notional passing on death beyond what is requisite for the special purpose of bringing certain cases within s. 1 in order to impose the particular tax which s. 1 levies. Section 2 does not purport to contain a general definition made applicable to every reference to passing on death of the subsequent sections of the Act. Such a definition occurs only in s. 22, a real definition section which is general in its application, but which does not affect the question before us. If this be so, then s. 5 ought to be read literally, as referring only to an actual passing under his disposition on the death of the settlor, and as excluding the notional passing, which s. 2 recognises for special purpose of s. 1. The duty imposed by s. 5 is a new and quite different duty. It may be that what Parliament thought it was doing in inserting after "passing" the words "under that disposition" was, as the Attorney-General suggested, merely to provide against the event of the passing to a person not competent to dispose taking place under some disposition made independently of the deceased. It may be that, if probabilities, apart from the words used, are to be looked at, there is, on the construction which the Court of Appeal have put on the statute, a casus omissus which the legislature was unlikely to have contemplated. But, all we are permitted to look at is the language used. If it has a natural meaning, we cannot depart from that meaning unless, reading the statute as a whole, the context directs us to do so. Speculation as to a different construction having been contemplated by those who framed the Act is inadmissible, above all in a statute which imposes taxation. It is not only possible but natural to give to the words of s. 5 the meaning contended for by the respondents—a meaning which restricts them to what has taken place in fact. The only legitimate consideration that could justify a different interpretation would be one which resulted from s. 2 being read as defining what was meant by "passing on death" throughout the Act. A close examination of the structure of the Act has satisfied me that this section lays down no such general canon of construction, but is confined in its operation to the limited function of adding to the cases in which the duty enacted by s. 1 is imposed. In other words, s. 2 has no reference to the settlement estate duty which s. 5 imposes as a new and separate duty. Having come to this conclusion, I see no answer to the reasoning of BUCKLEY, L.J., in the Court of Appeal. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal fails, and ought to be dismissed with costs. I move accordingly.

LORD DUNEDIN. - Put in a single sentence, the question in this case may be stated thus: Does the word "passes" in s. 5 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, mean "passes in the sense of this Act," or does it not? Unfortunately, to answer that question, as to which there has been a difference of judicial opinion, it is necessary to speak more at length.

I am not aware that, as a mere question of terminology, "to pass" has any technical meaning. I do not know if it has been used in other Acts of Parliament before the Finance Act. I have myself only succeeded in finding it in the Succession Duty Act, 1853. It is not there used in the taxing sections—which speak of dispositions and devolutions of law conferring a "succession"—but it is used in s. 14, which enacts that > "Where the interest of any successor in any personal property shall, before he shall have become entitled thereto in possession, have passed by reason of death to any other successor," then only one duty shall be payable. It is obvious that the word is here treated as a word of ordinary language; and the meaning in the context is plain enough. The Finance Act itself does not define it. Section 22 (1), provides that the expression "property passing on the death" shall include certain things, but there, again, the word "passing" is not itself defined. We are, therefore, left to the meaning of ordinary language, subject to such light as the general use of the word in the Act and the context may give. I shall revert to this, but first I wish to treat it in reference to the general scheme of the Act. The paramount enacting section of the Act is undoubtedly to be found in s. 1. I need not quote it. The duty which it is the object of the Act to levy is imposed on property real and personal, settled or not settled, which "passes" on the death of any person dying after the commencement of the Act. Now, although the word "passes" is what I may call a neutral or vague word, it is so naturally associated with the idea of "from" and "to," and "on the death," so directs attention to the death of a person who leaves property behind him, that had that section stood alone it is reasonably clear that much property would have escaped which the framers of the Act wished to tax. Accordingly we have s. 2. That section was authoritatively discussed in your Lordships' House in Earl Cowley v. I.R. Comrs. (1). Whether LORD MACNAGHTEN was strictly correct or not in saying that the two sections were mutually exclusive seems to me to matter little. At any rate—and that is all that is material—s. 2 sweeps into the net various things which s. 1 would have failed to secure, or, as LORD WATSON put it in A.-G. v. Beech (2) ([1899] A.C. at p. 59),

> "it extends it to all cases where a survivor of the deceased takes a succession, or I should say rather derives a benefit by reason of the death of the deceased dependent upon and emerging upon the death of the deceased."

How does s. 2 do this? It does not do it by being conceived in the words of a taxing section imposing the duty on certain specified kinds of property. It does it by saying that property passing on the death of the deceased—which is already taxed by virtue of s. 1—shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say—and then follow the various subsections. It seems to me that that is as much as to say that the words, "property passing on the death," in the first section, are to be read as if the words, "including the property following, that is to say—(and then all the subsections)"—had been there inserted. In other words, I do not think that anyone can criticise LORD MACNAGHTEN because in Earl Cowley v. I.R. Comrs. (1) he talks of property being "deemed to pass," although that expression is not actually used. The net result is that the expression, "property which passes," in the first section, must include property which is deemed to pass by virtue of the second section—for s. 1 is the only taxing section.

I now pass to s. 5, but before I examine it minutely let me look at the situation as it would have been if there had been no s. 5 at all. By s. 1 and s. 2 a tax is imposed whenever, to use very untechnical language, a death occurs, and somebody, in consequence, gets property which he did not have before; and this tax is imposed on the property according to its value, irrespective of the question of the kind of interest which the new taker gets, and of his or her relation to the deceased person. It is very clear that had the matter rested there, the successive takers, under settlement, of interests less than a full fee would be very hardly dealt with. The whole object, therefore, of s. 5 is to temper this hardship, and the paramount provision of it is sub-s. (2), which enacts that once estate duty has been paid since the date of the settlement in respect of settled property, then no more shall be paid till the death of a person competent to dispose. But if sub-s. (2) had stood alone, the property under settlement would in a series of years have come off advantageously in comparison with settled property. It was therefore thought right to arrange for a further estate duty, to be called settlement estate duty, to be levied on settled property, and that is done by sub-s. (1) (a). So far, then, it would seem that there are two questions to be answered: (i) Is property liable to estate duty? That is answered by answering whether it does or does not pass on a death, either as under s. 1 or as under s. 2. Then (ii) if it is so liable, is it also liable to settlement estate duty? Now, primâ facie one would expect that the scope of the two sets of provisions would be the same, i.e. in other words that the question must be answered as to those kinds of property which are swept in by s. 2, just as much as to those which fall under s. 1. Inasmuch, however, as this is a taxing statute, and the duty here is an additional duty, I consider that it must be shown that the words would clearly cover the individual case to which it is right to apply them.

I now take the words of s. 5 (1) (a). Now, I think there we have three conditions expressed: (i) The property must be property in respect of which estate duty is leviable. That obviously includes property brought in by s. 1, and also that brought in by s. 2. (ii) It must be settled either (a) by the will of the deceased, or (b) by some other disposition. (iii) If it falls within the case (ii) (b), i.e., is settled by some disposition other than the will of the deceased, it must pass under that disposition on the death of the deceased to a person not competent to dispose. It is common ground that as regards the property here in question, conditions (i) and (ii) (b) are fulfilled. It is property in respect of which estate duty is leviable. It is settled by a disposition other than the will of the deceased. The whole controversy arises as to whether it fits the words of condition (iii). Now let me suppose for a moment that the words "on the death of the deceased" had been omitted. I imagine there could have been little controversy. Why, then, are these words inserted? The opponents of the Crown say in order to make sure that the passing is a natural passing which synchronises with the death, and here there was no such passing, for the property passed when the disposition was made two years before the death. I think the words were introduced for quite another purpose. We must notice that here we are making an inquiry which is unnecessary as regards the duty imposed by s. 1. That duty, the regular estate duty, is imposed quite irrespective of who is the taker of the passing property, or of what his interest therein is. But here we wish to know whether, the property being settled, the taker is a person who is not competent to dispose. Now, that necessitates a time element as applied to the different and successive interests possible to be taken by someone under the settlement. That time element is given by these words. If they were not there consider what might be the result. A settlement might be made two years ago. A succession of limited interests are created with an eventual remainder in full fee. By the time the death occurred all the possible takers of the limited interests might have died, and the actual taker would be a person competent to dispose. It would be very unfair that he should have to pay a settlement duty for a settlement which had, so to speak, evaporated as a settlement before the time for paying the tax arrived.

I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the word "passes" in this section is used in the same sense as it is used in every other section, as equivalent to passes within the meaning of the Act—inclusive, that is to say, of such passing as is described in s. 2. When I say every other section I allude particularly to ss. 4, 7 (4), 7 (10), 8 (4). As I understand the argument against me, it is that what I may call the non-natural meaning of passing explained by s. 2 is limited to the purposes of the duty imposed by s. 1, and that s. 5 imposes a new duty, and, therefore, being a taxing statute, as the non-natural meaning is not repeated in so many words as regards the new duty, the natural meaning must be reverted to. I quite bow to the rule as to taxing statutes. But after all, the question is what the words mean, and the expressions used must be given fair play. If, as here, where the word "passes" is used in any section except the fifth you are bound to give it the extended meaning to make sense, I think it not giving the words used fair play suddenly to revert to another meaning in s. 5, a section which is inextricably intertwined with the other sections, and which, if construed as that argument would construe it, leaves a perfectly obvious casus improvisus; for why should a will bring liability for the duty—other dispositions bring none? I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and the judgment of HORRIDGE, J., restored.

LORD ATKINSON.—I think the decision of the Court of Appeal was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed. The question turns on the construction of the fifth section of the Finance Act, 1894. To succeed, the Crown must bring the case within the letter of that enactment. It is not enough to bring the case within the spirit of it, or to show that if the section be not construed as the Crown contends it should be construed, property which ought to be taxed will escape taxation or will enjoy, under s. 5 (2), an immunity from successive levies of estate duty. These evils, if such they be, must, if they exist, be cured by legislation. The judicial tribunals must in interpreting these taxing Acts stick to the letter of the statute: Partington v. A.-G. (3); A.-G. v. Earl of Selborne (4).

The passing of property within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act has been conveniently styled "actual passing," and that under the s. 2 "notional" passing—that is, passing which in fact takes place before it is to be taken to have taken place. Under this latter section the property, the subject of this settlement of May 20, 1909, which in fact passed from the settlor to the trustees and the beneficiaries at that date, was deemed to pass on Dec. 8, 1911, and by virtue of that assumption became liable to estate duty. Now, the conditions which must be fulfilled in order to render, under s. 5, property subject to the additional duty styled settlement estate duty are these: First, estate duty must be leviable on it. That condition has been fulfilled. Second, the property must be settled by one or other of two kinds of dispositions. "Settled property" is, by the definition clause, s. 22, defined to be property comprised in a "settlement," and a "settlement" is defined to be "any instrument, whether relating to real or personal property, which is a settlement within the meaning of s. 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, or if it related to real property would be a settlement within the meaning of that section, and includes a settlement effected by a parol trust." Under this section a settlement must limit land or any estate or interest in land to or on trust for persons by way of succession, and whether it does so or not is to be determined (sub-s. (4)) by the state of facts and the limitations of the settlement at the time of the latter's taking effect. In the case of a settlement by will, this time, of course, must be at the death of the testator, since the will only speaks from that date. The "notional" passing of property cannot in any way relate to the first mode of settlement mentioned in s. 5. The second mode of settlement must, like the first, create a succession, and whether it does so or not must in this case, as in the first, be determined by the condition of things and the limitations of the settlement at the time that settlement takes effect. This in the present case must be the date of the instrument. The limitations of the settlement then become operative, and to be within this section must provide that under them and by virtue of them the property should on a certain event pass to some person not competent to dispose of it. That event is the death of some person not necessarily the settlor. The words "under that disposition," in my view, can only mean that the settlement itself is to indicate the event on which the property is to pass, the person to whom it is to pass, and the estate or interest which is to pass to that person. Primâ facie, the word "death" naturally means a real death, not a "notional death." There is no such thing provided for in the Act as a "notional death"—no clause to the effect that a person shall be deemed to be dead when in fact he is alive. There is a provision that there shall be a "notional" passing of property, not, however, to any person named or indicated, or for any particular estate or interest. Section 2 no doubt enacts that property which, in fact, has passed while a person was alive shall, in certain cases, be deemed to have passed as if he were then dead. This section, however, is not a definition section. It is supplementary to s. 1, and is designed to make liable to estate duty certain dispositions of property which are outside the scope and beyond the reach of s. 1. Even if the words of s. 5 were so altered as to run "by some other disposition, passes, or is deemed to pass, under that disposition on the death of the deceased to some person not competent to dispose of the property," as, in effect, the Crown, I think, contend they should, it does not appear to me that it would be sufficient for the purpose of the Crown, because the property would then pass, not under the "disposition," but under s. 2 of the Act, while it would not be carried by that section to the person to whom it must, under s. 5, be carried, namely, one not competent to dispose of it. I do not think the provision of the settlement can be put aside in part and retained in part, in this way, put aside where they fix the event on which the property is to pass, actual death, and retained when they designate the individual to whom it is to pass. Neither do I think words can be interpolated into the section to fix a burden on the subject not imposed by the letter of the statute. If there be a casus omissus in the Act it must be provided for by legislation. The appeal should, I think, be dismissed with costs.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—Section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, imposes in the case of every person dying after Aug. 1, 1894, a duty, called "estate duty," leviable on the capital value of all property which passes on the death of such person. The expression "property passing on the death" includes, according to the definition contained in s. 22 of the Act, property passing either immediately on the death or after any interval either contingently or certainly, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and the expression "on the death" includes "at a period ascertainable only by reference to death." The expression "passing on the death" is not further defined, but is evidently used to denote some actual change in the title or possession of the property as a whole which takes place at the death. For the purpose of this section it is absolutely immaterial to whom or by virtue of what disposition the property passes. Section 2 of the Act, by providing that property passing at the death shall be deemed to include certain kinds of property which do not in fact pass at the death, artificially enlarges the ambit of the expression "property passing at the death." It also artificially limits such ambit by expressly excluding certain kinds of property which do in fact pass at the death. It is in no sense a definition section. It cannot be disputed that by virtue of s. 2, coupled with s. 59 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, the property passing on the death of Henry Ernest Milne is to be deemed to include the settled property, and estate duty on such settled property is therefore clearly payable.

Section 5 of the Finance Act, 1894, imposes an additional estate duty (called settlement estate duty), not on all property in respect of which estate duty is leviable, but where property on which estate duty is leviable is settled by the will of the deceased, or having been settled by some other dispositions, passes under that disposition on the death of the deceased to some person not competent to dispose of the property. It was argued that the initial words of this section, "where property in respect of which estate duty is leviable," raise some inference or presumption as to the kinds of property in respect of which settlement estate duty is intended to be charged. I do not think that this is so. The words in question merely make it clear that in no case when estate duty is not leviable is it intended to impose settlement estate duty. The kinds of property on which, where estate duty is leviable, it is intended to impose the additional duty, must be gathered from the following words, and consist of (i) property settled by the will of the deceased; and (ii) property which, having been settled by some other disposition, passes under that disposition on the death of the deceased to some person not competent to dispose of the same. Clearly the property comprised in the settlement does not pass under the will of the deceased; nor, though it was settled by some other disposition, does it pass under that disposition on the death of the deceased. How, then, is it proposed to show that it is subject to settlement estate duty? The argument to that effect may be stated as follows: First, it is said that, by virtue of s. 2, the settled property must be deemed to pass on the death of Henry Ernest Milne; secondly, it is said that, this being so, it must be deemed to pass under the settlement to the person in possession of it at that death; and, thirdly, it is said that this person is a person not competent to dispose of the property. In my opinion this argument reads into s. 2 a great deal more than it contains. Section 2 even if it be construed as providing that the settled property is to be deemed to pass on the death of Henry Ernest Milne, certainly does not provide to whom or under what disposition it shall be so deemed to pass. Indeed, these points seem to me to be immaterial for the purpose of s. 2, which merely enlarges on the one hand and narrows on the other the ambit of the expression, "passing on the death." For the purpose of the imposition of estate duty, it does not matter to whom or under what disposition the property passes. It is otherwise for the purpose of the settlement estate duty, and had the object of s. 2 been to create a notional passing for the purpose of settlement estate duty as well as for the purpose of estate duty, one would have expected s. 2 to contain some provisions as to whom and by what disposition the property was to be deemed to pass. Further, s. 5 is so worded as, in my opinion, to point to an actual as distinguished from a notional passing on death. I do not think, therefore, that the argument I have referred to ought to prevail. The Finance Act is a taxing statute, and if the Crown claims a duty thereunder it must show that such duty is imposed by clear and unambiguous words. All the words of s. 5 can be satisfied without having recourse to any notional passing of property, and in my opinion considerable violence would be done to these words if the idea of a notional passing of property were introduced into the section. In my opinion the appeal fails.

Contract—Breach—Damages—Breach resulting in conviction of plaintiff of criminal offence—Right to recover fine and costs in criminal proceedings.

By a verbal contract the defendants, advertising agents, agreed to address circulars on behalf of the plaintiffs, a firm of moneylenders, to persons whose names appeared in Kelly's Handbook, omitting minors. By mistake a circular was addressed and sent to a minor and the plaintiffs were convicted of an offence under s. 2 of the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892, as amended by s. 5 of the Moneylenders Act, 1900, and were fined. In an action brought by them to recover the fines and costs as damages for breach of the contract,

Held: as the plaintiffs had known the facts which constituted the offence and had been convicted of "knowingly" circularising the infant the principle of Colburn v. Patmore (1) applied and the action failed.

Per ROWLATT, J.: A possible breach of the law, if a mistake was made in the list, with resulting penalties must have been within the contemplation of the parties, and no circumstances intervened to influence the magistrate in his decision other than the arrangement to which the defendants were parties.

Further Consideration of an action tried by ROWLATT, J., with a jury.

The plaintiffs, who were a registered firm of moneylenders, made a contract with the defendants to address a large number of circulars to the persons whose names appeared in the 1914 edition of KELLY'S HANDBOOK OF THE TITLED, LANDED, AND OFFICIAL CLASSES. The terms of the contract, which was verbal, were admitted to be accurately represented by the following letter from the plaintiffs to the defendants:

"Dear Sirs,—We confirm our instructions over the telephone to you to-day to address KELLY'S HANDBOOK for the year 1914 at 6s. per 1000. Also to address cards and inclose in envelopes, sealing down flaps, at an additional charge of 4s. per 1000 inclusive, and we agree to pay you a further 15s. to delete all minors from this list, and you will take every precaution to see that no such person is addressed."

The work, which necessitated the examination of about 32,000 names, was carried out by the defendants in a little over twenty hours at a cost to them of 11s. 2d. By a mistake the name of an infant was left undeleted, and a circular was sent to him. The plaintiffs and their manager were in consequence charged under the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892, and the Moneylenders Act, 1900, and were convicted, being fined £20 each with costs. They appealed to quarter sessions, where the conviction was affirmed, but the fines were reduced to £10 each. The plaintiffs then brought this action against the defendants to recover as damages the amount of the fines and the costs paid to the prosecution, together with the costs of their defence and of the appeal to quarter sessions, contending that the defendants had committed a breach of the contract and were negligent in carrying out the work. In their defence the defendants denied that the damage alleged or any damage was caused by any breach of contract or negligence on their part; they contended that it would be contrary to public policy to allow the plaintiffs to recover any part either of the fines inflicted or the costs paid to the prosecution. They also contended that the damages were too remote, and as a separate defence they brought into court the sum of £5 with a denial of liability, and said that the same was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, if any. At the trial the jury found that the mistake was due to a want of due care on the part of the defendants.

By the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892, s. 2:

"(1) If anyone, for the purpose of earning interest, commission, reward, or other profit, sends or causes to be sent to a person whom he knows to be an infant any circular, notice, advertisement, letter, telegram, or other document which invites or may reasonably be implied to invite the person receiving it to borrow money, or to enter into any transaction involving the borrowing of money, or to apply to any person or at any place with a view to obtaining information or advice as to borrowing money, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

By s. 5 of the Moneylenders Act, 1900:

"Where in any proceedings under s. 2 of the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892, it is proved that the person to whom the document was sent was an infant, the person charged shall be deemed to have known that the person to whom the document was sent was an infant, unless he proves that he had reasonable ground for believing the infant to be of full age."

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 28, 1915. ROWLATT, J., read the following judgment.—This action was brought to recover the amount of fines inflicted upon the plaintiff company and its manager for an offence under the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892, as amended by s. 5 of the Moneylenders Act, 1900, together with costs of the prosecution and defence, by way of damages for a breach of contract by the defendants.

It was contended for the plaintiffs that the contract of the defendants was absolute to omit minors and not merely to exercise care. However, I left the question of care to the jury, and they found that the mistake was due to want of due care, so that in either view of the contract there was a breach. I was not asked to leave any other question to the jury. The effect of the two statutes referred to above, stated shortly, and so far as material for the present purpose, is to make it an offence to send a money lender's circular to an infant without reasonable ground for believing him to be of full age. The only ground the plaintiffs had for such a belief was the contract they had made with the defendants, and the magistrate held that the making of the contract above referred to did not afford them such reasonable ground. The position, therefore, is that a contract, reliance upon which in sending out the circulars was a default made a crime by statute, is now made the basis of an action to recover as damages compensation for the punishment in which such reliance has involved the plaintiffs, and their manager. I confess that when first I saw the nature of this action I formed and indicated a strong opinion that it was misconceived on the broad ground that a person convicted of a criminal offence could never have the assistance of a civil court to ease himself of the punishment by the recovery over either of the amount of any fine or costs or of damages to compensate him for any imprisonment, and that there could be no difference between cases where the legislature had made an act or default punishable as a crime without the existence of a guilty mind and any other class of offence. This view seems to me to have been accepted by the Court of Common Pleas in Colburn v. Patmore (1), though the decision itself went on another point. The action was by a newspaper proprietor against his editor to recover damages in respect of the conviction and fining of the plaintiff for a libel inserted in the paper by the defendant, and the question which I am now discussing seems to have been mooted in the broadest form during the argument. GURNEY, B., asked whether there was any instance of an action having been brought for compensation for having been convicted of an offence. The answer was that there was not, but that the action could be maintained in that particular case because, though the plaintiff by the policy of the law had been convicted, the defendant was the real offender. In the argument on the other side by Mr. Maule the contention is put quite clearly and broadly that no action lies by a convicted person to exonerate himself from the consequences, and that all crimes are alike in this respect. I think the court accepted this view, for, though the Lord Chief Baron speaks of the impossibility of a convicted person recovering damages against another who participated in the crime, I do not suppose he intended to indicate that the guilt of the defendant was what made the plaintiff's action fail.

In support of this view it may be said that a law which imposes a punishment as distinguished from a payment of compensation is defeated by the punishment being passed on to another. The object sought to be secured by such a statute in the public interest is not that so much money shall be collected by way of fine, but that a person who puts himself in such and such a position shall be punished by way of fine in order to make such persons prevent such things happening again, and I should have thought that the statute could not have its effect if the convicted person could obtain compensation in a civil court for the punishment inflicted upon him in the criminal court. There are, however, authorities the other way. In Crage v. Fry (2), before KENNEDY, J., and in Cointat v. Myham & Sons (3) before LORD COLERIDGE, J., plaintiffs, who had been convicted under s. 47 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, for having unsound fish or meat for sale, were allowed to recover their penalties against their vendors. In neither of these cases was the point now in question raised. It was, however, discussed by KENNEDY, J., in Burrows v. Rhodes (4). In that case the plaintiff had not been convicted though he had committed an offence, and the only objection to his claim was that the damages were the consequence of his own illegal act. The learned judge held against that contention, applying the rule laid down in Adamson v. Jarvis (5) and Betts v. Gibbins (6) that such objection cannot prevail where the act in itself was indifferent and the circumstances which made it illegal were not known or believed to be absent. He went on, however, to express the opinion that in cases, of which he gave two instances, where a person may be convicted as a criminal without a guilty mind he might recover damages in respect of the penalty imposed. The cases he mentioned were serving a drunken person with liquor and keeping two or more lunatics without registration or licence. Speaking of the latter case, the learned judge adds this ([1899] 1 Q.B. at p. 832):

> "I am unable to see upon what ground of public policy or principle of justice the proprietor, who has been led into the commission of the offence by the fraud of another and who is free from any imputation of moral wrongdoing, should be denied a right of suing for damages the person whose successful fraud has led him to do that which the law in its care for the health and safety of lunatics has made an offence."

He does not consider the question whether criminal punishments are not by their nature incapable of being the subject of indemnity, and whether in saying that a person in such and such circumstances shall be punished by fine as a criminal the legislature is not also impliedly but necessarily saying (and this too in its care for lunatics) that he shall not recover the fine over against any one else. The learned judge then refers to the express provision in the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 28, enabling a convicted person in certain cases to recover penalties over, as showing that there can be no principle of public policy or justice opposed to the existence of such a right. But there is no question of such a general principle of policy. The question is as to the position created by a penal statute where such a right over is not given. With regard to Colburn v. Patmore (1) the learned judge treats the view of the court as turning upon the circumstance that the defendant could not after the conviction be heard to say that he did not falsely and maliciously publish the libel, although in truth personally innocent of it, and he refers to a question put in the course of the argument by ALDERSON B., as follows (1 Cr.M. & R. at p. 76): "Is it not more correct to say that the plaintiff was actually ignorant though legally cognisant?" It seems to me, with great respect, that that is merely another way of saying that the moral guilt or innocence of the plaintiff was immaterial inasmuch as the law treated him as a guilty person. A little further on in the course of the argument, ALDERSON, B., made this further observation (ibid.):

> "If the law presumes the proprietor cognisant of the acts of his servants, and holds him criminally liable, must not that liability be taken with all its usual consequences?"

Whether a man is said under certain circumstances to have knowledge imputed to him by the statute and to be therefore correctly indicted for doing the act knowingly, or whether he is said under the same circumstances to be guilty without regard to his knowledge, so that he might be correctly indicted by alleging the fact and those circumstances without mentioning knowledge, seems to me a question of words. The question is not whether the conviction involves guilty knowledge, but whether the fine is punitive. Punishments would appear to be of necessity strictly personal no less when they are pecuniary than when they take the form of imprisonment. For the reasons given above, if it had not been for the views expressed by KENNEDY, J., I should have decided this case against the plaintiffs on much broader grounds than those I am about to set forth. It seems to me, however, that, giving the fullest effect to all that was said or even suggested in Burrows v. Rhodes (4), this action fails. To begin with, if KENNEDY, J.'s, explanation of Colburn v. Patmore (1) is correct, this case is precisely within it, for the plaintiffs were convicted by virtue of s. 5 of the Moneylenders Act, 1900, of "knowingly" circularising the infant. Secondly, if the substance is looked at, what the plaintiffs were convicted of was sending the circular without having reasonable ground for believing the addressee to be of full age. They knew what ground they had—namely, their contract with the defendants—and it was insufficient. They knew the facts which constituted the offence. It is not to the point to say that the defendants contracted to omit the minors and cannot be heard to say that the plaintiffs had not good ground for believing every recipient of the circular to be of full age. The action fails on the ground of the plaintiffs' illegal action whether the defendants do or can allege it or not.

It was contended in addition for the defendants that the damages were in any case too remote. It is not really necessary to decide this, but as it was argued I may as well say that in my judgment they were not. A possible breach of the law, if a mistake was made in the list, with resulting penalties must have been within the contemplation of the parties, and no circumstances intervened to influence the magistrate in his decision, either in principle or as to the amount of the fine, other than the arrangements to which the defendants were parties. A subsidiary point was made that, even if the fine and the costs paid to the prosecution cannot be recovered, the costs incurred by the plaintiffs in defending themselves can. It seems to me that the ground on which I have decided this case clearly applies to the costs even if the broader ground on which I should have liked to decide it would not, as to which I say nothing. In the result, the plaintiffs are entitled to nominal damages of 1s. for breach of contract, but as the defendants paid £5 into court the defendants are entitled to the general costs of the action, and the plaintiffs to the costs of proving the breach of contract. As I think, however, that this action ought never to have been brought, and has in substance totally failed, I deprive the plaintiffs of those costs.

Judgment accordingly.

LIVERPOOL SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN v. JONES

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Coleridge, Avory and Atkin, JJ.), June 10, 1914]

[Reported [1914] 3 K.B. 813; 84 L.J.K.B. 222; 111 L.T. 806; 79 J.P. 20; 30 T.L.R. 584; 58 Sol. Jo. 723; 24 Cox, C.C. 434; 12 L.G.R. 1103]

Child—Wilful neglect—Person having custody, charge or care—Illegitimate children—Liability of putative father—Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 67), ss. 12, 38.

By s. 12 (1) of the Children Act, 1908 [now s. 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933]: "If any person over the age of sixteen years, who has the custody, charge, or care of any child or young person wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes such child or young person . . . that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

By s. 38 (2) of the same Act [now s. 17 of The Children and Young Persons Act, 1933]: "Any person who is the parent or legal guardian of a child or young person or who is legally liable to maintain a child or young person shall be presumed to have the custody of the child or young person. . . . Any other person having actual possession or control of a child or young person shall be presumed to have the care of the child or young person."

By s. 23 (1) of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904 [now repealed]: "The provisions of this Act relating to the parent of a child shall apply to the step-parent of the child and to any person cohabiting with the parent of the child, and the expression 'parent' when used in relation to a child, includes guardian and every person who is by law liable to maintain the child."

The respondent cohabited with a certain woman and both were charged under s. 12 of the 1908 Act with wilfully neglecting their four illegitimate children. The woman had never applied for an affiliation order against the respondent. The magistrate convicted the woman, but dismissed the charge against the respondent on the grounds that he was not the parent or legal guardian or legally liable to maintain any of the children under s. 38 (2) of the 1908 Act.

Held: the magistrate had taken too narrow a view of s. 12; it was a question of fact in each case as to who had the custody, charge, or care of a child, and it did not depend on who was the legal guardian of the child; and, therefore, the case would be remitted to the magistrate to determine that question of fact.

Notes. The Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, has been repealed. Sections 12 and 38 (inter alia) of the Children Act, 1908, have been repealed. Section 12 of the 1908 Act has been replaced by s. 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, and s. 38 of the 1908 Act has been replaced by s. 17 of the 1933 Act.

(1) Butler v. Gregory (1912), 18 T.L.R. 370; 15 Digest (Repl.) 1035, 10, 177.

On Mar. 13, 1914, Alfred Jones (hereinafter called "the respondent") and Gladys Owens were brought up before the learned stipendiary magistrate for the city of Liverpool under a warrant issued at the instance of the Liverpool Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (hereinafter called "the appellants"), charging the respondent and the woman Owens for that they, on Feb. 28, 1914, and on other days at the city of Liverpool, being each over the age of sixteen years, and having the custody, charge, or care of four children within the meaning of the Children Act, 1908, did wilfully neglect such children in a manner likely to cause them unnecessary suffering, contrary to s. 12 of the Children Act, 1908. The prisoners were remanded until Mar. 16, and again until Mar. 23. On the last occasion the learned stipendiary magistrate convicted the woman Owens and sentenced her to two months' imprisonment with hard labour, but dismissed the charge against the respondent. On the hearing of the charge the following facts were proved or admitted:

"(1) That on seven occasions, once in each of the months of October, November, December, 1913, and January, 1914, and three times in February, 1914, an inspector in the service of the appellants visited the house occupied by the respondent and Gladys Owens, and found four of the latter's illegitimate children, whose ages ranged from ten to two years, in a very dirty, ragged, verminous, and neglected condition. Of the four rooms in the house three were empty, and the other contained scarcely any furniture. On most of the visits the inspector found the woman Owens in the house drunk or drinking with other women. (2) That on four of the said visits the inspector saw the respondent in the house, and on two of the occasions he was drunk. (3) That the respondent during the period of the said offences, and for a considerable time prior thereto, had been cohabiting with the woman Owens. (4) That the respondent was and is the putative father of some, if not all, of the said children. (5) That no affiliation order in respect of the said children, or any of them, had ever been made or applied for against the respondent."

Having regard to the last-mentioned fact that no such affiliation order had been made, and in view of the decision in Butler v. Gregory (1), the learned stipendiary magistrate was of opinion that the respondent did not come within the scope of the first paragraph of s. 38 (2), of the Children Act, 1908, as being the parent or legal guardian or legally liable to maintain any of the said children. On behalf of the appellants it was contended that s. 23 (1), of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, entitled the learned magistrate to convict the respondent of the said offence on the ground that he was cohabiting with the parent of the children. He decided, however, that this section had no application to the Children Act, 1908, under s. 12 of which the respondent was charged. It was further argued on behalf of the appellants that the last paragraph of s. 38 (2) of the Children Act, 1908, enabled the learned magistrate to treat the respondent as a person liable under s. 12 of that statute, but the learned magistrate was of opinion that the mere fact of the respondent living with a woman and her illegitimate children did not constitute him a "person having actual possession or control" of such children, she being in law their sole lawful custodian or guardian. As above stated, the charge against the respondent was dismissed.

J. H. Layton for the appellants.—The respondent was liable to be convicted of the charge laid against him. By s. 23 (1) of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, he was a person who was responsible in the case of wilful neglect, since that subsection applied to "any person cohabiting with the parent of the child." The subsection made him responsible just in the same way as the parent of the child was responsible. By s. 23 (3) of the Act of 1904: "Any person who is the parent of a child shall be presumed to have the custody of the child," and by s. 1 of the same Act any person over the age of sixteen years who has the custody, charge, or care of a child under sixteen is guilty of an offence if he wilfully neglects it. It was clear then that the respondent would have been liable to be convicted under the Act of 1904. Much of the Act of 1904 had been repealed and re-enacted, with additions and variations, by the Act of 1908. For example, s. 1 of the Act of 1904 had been replaced by s. 12 of the Act of 1908. The Act of 1908 was stated in the preamble to be a consolidating statute. But s. 23 (1) and (3) had not been repealed, as was shown by the schedule to the Act of 1908. As these subsections had not been repealed they must still have some meaning, and the only meaning that could be attached to the words at the beginning of s. 23 (1), namely, "The provisions of this Act," was "the provisions of this Act or of any subsequent Act which are substituted for the provisions of this Act." If that was so, the respondent was liable, as cohabiting with the parent of the child, as though he had been the parent and since the mother was liable for wilful neglect under s. 12 of the Act of 1908, the respondent was also liable to be convicted in the same way that she was. Again, by s. 38 (2) of the Act of 1908, the respondent was liable as having the actual possession or control of the child. This was a question of fact, and the learned magistrate had found that the respondent was actually maintaining the child. Where the learned magistrate made a mistake was in construing actual possession as meaning legal possession. This was taking too narrow a view of s. 12. Butler v. Gregory (1) was decided under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, an Act which was repealed in toto by the Act of 1904, and did not apply to the present case at all.

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

LORD COLERIDGE, J.—This case has been referred to us for our decision upon the question of the responsibility of the father of an illegitimate child, when the father and mother are living together in the same house, and children are residing with the authors of their beings. Is the father liable to be convicted under s. 12 (1) of the Children Act, 1908, if he wilfully neglects it? It has been contended that all the responsibilities of a parent attach to the respondent because he was cohabiting with the parent of the child—the mother—and reliance has been placed upon s. 23 (1) of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904. That subsection says:

> "The provisions of this Act relating to the parent of a child shall apply . . . to any person cohabiting with the parent of the child," the provisions, of course, including responsibility for wilful neglect. We have been asked to say that this subsection to s. 38 (2) of the Children Act, 1908, and the fact of the cohabitation with the mother of the child makes the respondent a person having the custody of the child. The learned magistrate had the same argument addressed to him and he was of opinion that however applicable the contention might have been if the case had arisen under the Act of 1904, inasmuch as the summons was under the Act of 1908, the subsection of the Act of 1904 could not be called in aid. The Act of 1908 has been substituted for the Act of 1904. And when one examines the wording of s. 23 (1) of the Act of 1904, it is seen that it is expressly limited in its application to "the provisions of this Act." I am of opinion that this subsection is entirely confined to the Act of 1904, and I think that the decision of the learned magistrate on this point was quite right.

There arises the question as to the proper construction to be placed upon the words of s. 12 (1) and s. 38 (2) of the Act of 1908. As far as I have been able to gather, the learned magistrate was of opinion that the person who had the custody, charge, or care, within the meaning of s. 12 (1) were limited to those who were presumed to have the custody, charge, or care under s. 38 (2). That being his opinion, he came to the conclusion that he could not convict the respondent, seeing that he was not the parent of the child or legally liable to maintain it—he had not been proved to be the father in law—and, further, that in view of the fact that the mother, who was the legal guardian of the child, was resident in the house, the respondent could not be said to have the actual possession or the control of it, in fact, that as the mother had the possession and the control the respondent was excluded from possession and control within the meaning of the statute. We think that the learned magistrate was mistaken in both respects. In the first place we are of opinion that s. 38 does not in any way cut down or limit the meaning of the words in s. 12; on the contrary, s. 38 is intended as an amplification of s. 12. But quite apart from s. 38, s. 12 says:

> "If any person over the age of sixteen years, who has the custody, charge, or care of any child or young person wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes such child or young person . . . that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

Whether a person has the custody, charge, or care of a child is a question of fact to be determined by the magistrate: and, secondly, a person is not to be excused because he does not happen to be the legal guardian of the child. The section has a much wider meaning than that. We do not think that the magistrate is precluded from determining that a person has the custody, charge, or care of a child because he happens to be co-habiting with the mother of the child, and because the mother has the legal custody, charge, or care of it. As to this question of custody, charge, or care, the facts as stated by the learned magistrate do not appear to us to be conclusive. I have already said that the fact as to custody, charge, or care is one to be considered by the magistrate, and the case must, therefore, go back to him to decide whether the respondent was or was not guilty of the offence charged against him.

AVORY, J.—I agree. I know the great care which is always taken by the learned stipendiary magistrate of Liverpool, and his opinions are always entitled to the greatest respect. In the present case he appears to have been led to take the view that he could not find the respondent guilty of the offence with which he was charged as a matter of law. He was led to take this view by supposing that s. 38 (2) of the Children Act, 1908, was an exhaustive definition of the persons who were liable to be proceeded against under s. 12 (1). The learned magistrate, in the first place, came to the conclusion that the respondent could not be presumed to have the custody of the child because he was neither the parent nor the guardian of the child and he was not legally liable to maintain it. If that was all I should entirely agree with his decision. But then he went on to hold that the respondent could not be a person having the actual possession or control of the child, because the mother, who was the child's sole legal custodian and guardian was living with it. In that conclusion I think the learned magistrate was incorrect. It is one of the main objects of s. 38 (2) to make persons who are neither the parents nor guardians of children, nor legally liable to maintain them subject to the provisions of s. 12, if in fact they have the custody, charge, or care of such children. But whether this custody, charge, or care really exists is a pure question of fact and must be decided according to the circumstances of the case. The fact that an illegitimate child lives with its mother does not exclude the actual possession and control of some other person, and actual possession is not to be confined in its meaning to legal possession. The question in the present case is whether the respondent had the custody, charge, or care, and I am of opinion that he may be such a person. Whether he is or is not such a person is a matter of fact entirely for the learned magistrate, and I agree that the case should be remitted to him with the expression of our opinion.

ATKIN, J.—I am also of the same opinion. In my view a person may have the custody, charge, or care of a child, even though there are all the persons mentioned in s. 38 (2) in existence who are presumed to have the custody, charge, or care. It is a question of fact whether a person has or has not custody, charge, or care. I think, moreover, that the real effect of s. 38 (2) is that the persons there named as being presumed to have the custody, charge, or care of children may be convicted in certain circumstances under s. 12, even though they have not in fact such custody, charge, or care.

Appeal allowed.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Bailhache, J.), February 2, 3, 1915]

[Reported [1915] 1 K.B. 681; 84 L.J.K.B. 967; 113 L.T. 48; 13 Asp.M.L.C. 68; 20 Com. Cas. 252]

Contract—Exception clause—"Force majeure"—Delivery delayed in breach of agreement—Delay caused by indirect effect of general coal strike and breakdown of machinery, bad weather and absence of workman.

By a contract in writing the defendants agreed to build a steamer for the plaintiff, a Roumanian national, to be delivered on a named date. It was a term of the agreement that the defendants would pay the plaintiff £10 for each day delivery was delayed "excepted only the cause of force majeure, strikes of workmen of the building yard where the vessel is being built, or the workshops where the machinery is being made, or at the works where steel is being manufactured for the steamer, or any works of any sub-contractor." The steamer was delivered 175 days late. A general coal strike had dislocated the defendants' business and had caused a delay of 70 days in the steamer being laid down in the berth. Other causes of the delay were: a breakdown of machinery, a shipwrights' strike, bad weather, and the absence of the defendants' workmen when attending football matches and the funeral of their manager. The plaintiff who had paid the full amount of the contract price under protest now claimed £1750 or £10 per day for each day delivery was delayed.

Held: (i) as the universal coal strike had completely dislocated all the businesses in the north of England it could come within the reasonable meaning of force majeure having regard to the way in which the ship was built, the berthing, and the fact that the words were inserted by a foreign national who was familiar with the meaning of the words on the Continent; (ii) breakdowns in machinery also came within the force majeure exception, but bad weather and absence of workmen attending football matches and a funeral did not; (iii) the shipwrights' strike came within the exception relating to strikes; and, therefore, the plaintiff had partially succeeded and was entitled to £1000 damages.

As to force majeure clauses, see 8 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 181-2; and for cases see 12 DIGEST (Repl.) 429-430 and 39 DIGEST 429.

Action in the Commercial List tried by BAILHACHE, J., with a jury.

The plaintiff, Jean Gerassime Matsoukis, of Roumania, claimed damages for delay in the delivery of a steamship built by the defendants at their yard in Sunderland at the request of the plaintiff. The plaintiff pleaded that by an agreement in writing made between the Bank of Athens, as agents for the plaintiff, and the defendants, the latter agreed to build a steamer and deliver her at Sunderland afloat and ready for sea on or before Feb. 20, 1913. It was provided that if the steamer was not delivered entirely ready at the time mentioned the defendants were to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £10 for each day of delay and in deduction of the price stipulated in the contract. He said the defendants did not deliver the steamer on the date agreed, and failed to deliver her until Aug. 22, 1913. The plaintiff paid the price stipulated for in the contract without deduction in respect of the delay under protest in order to get delivery of the steamer, and he claimed as damages, or as money had and received £1,750, being £10 per day for every day's delay in delivery after Feb. 28, 1913, and, in addition, £518 interest at 5 per cent. By their points of defence the defendants admitted that the steamer was not delivered until Aug. 22, but they denied that any breach of the agreement was committed, and that the delay was wholly due to causes within the exception clause of the contract, which was as follows:

> "If the steamer is not delivered entirely ready to purchaser on or before Feb. 28, 1913, the builders hereby agree to pay to the purchaser for liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty, the sum of £10 for each day of delay, and in deduction of the price stipulated in this contract, being excepted only the cause of force majeure, strikes of workmen of the building yard where the vessel is being built, or the workshops where the machinery is being made, or at the works where steel is being manufactured for the steamer, or any works of any sub-contractor. In case of strikes or any cause of delay, as above, the builders are to advise immediately the purchaser and at the beginning of the strike."

Among the items causing the delay were the following: Bad weather caused sixteen days' delay, shipwrights' strike two days, breakdown of machinery in Sunderland works three and three-quarter days, delay in supply of materials eleven days, football matches and holidays seven days, funeral of a Mr. Knox one day, miners' strike 182 days, making a grand total, according to the defendants, of 222 days.

Hudson, K.C., and Dunlop for the plaintiff.
Roche, K.C., and Lewis Noad for the defendants.

BAILHACHE, J.—This action was brought by Mr. Matsoukis, who is a Roumanian gentleman, against Messrs. Priestman & Co., who are shipbuilders in this country, on a contract to build a ship, which is dated Feb. 21, 1912. The action was tried before myself and a City of London special jury, and there was one question of fact left to them. It was this: Assuming that Mr. Priestman was entitled to an allowance for the delay occasioned indirectly by the Welsh coal strike, how much time ought he to be allowed in respect of this? The jury found in respect of this he should be allowed seventy days. The total amount of the delay was 175 days; seventy from 175 leaves 105. He was to be liable for this in any case, but for the fact that there were two other exceptions, in respect of which I think he is entitled to time. This in respect of the shipwrights' strike and breakdown of machinery. Allowing seven days for this, this would bring the total amount which was due to £980. A question of interest has been agreed between the parties at £20, and this is the only question which has been agreed between the parties.

The only question about which I have found a great deal of difficulty in the case turns upon this: Whether the consequential result of the Welsh coal strike, which, according to the verdict of the jury, delayed the vessel by seventy days, can it be said to be covered by exceptions in the contract. The contract is to deliver the ship on Feb. 28, 1913, and unless Mr. Priestman can bring this Welsh coal strike within the exceptions, then he is not entitled to the allowance of the seventy days which the jury by their finding have given him. It turns upon the construction of the contract. The contract says that if the steamer is not delivered on the due date, the plaintiff agrees to be paid as liquidated damages £10 a day in deduction of the price stipulated in the contract. Then comes the clause, which is written in English, it is true, but obviously by a gentleman who is not familiar with English idiom, but, still, it is plain enough. It goes on to except the cause of force majeure, strikes of workmen in building yard where the ship is being built, or in the machinery shops, or works of sub-contractors; and the question is, what is the meaning of the words force majeure in the contract. Counsel for the plaintiff, has argued that the words force majeure can never in any circumstances cover the strike or consequence of a strike, and that in particular they cannot do it in this case because, if I take the whole of the clause and read it together, I shall find that strikes are excepted as a special cause of extension of time, and that I shall find these strikes are excluded by the fact that strikes are specifically referred to as a cause of extension. My own opinion about the matter has fluctuated a great deal in the case, although the clause as it stands seems simple enough. The words force majeure are not words which are appropriate to an English contract, and they are not common in an English contract. They are taken from the Code of Napoleon, and they were inserted in this contract by a Roumanian gentleman or by his advisers, who no doubt were familiar with the words as used in the Code of Napoleon and as used on the Continent. We have had the opinion of a Belgian lawyer, and he says the words as understood in Belgium and on the Continent are in case you cannot prevent or avoid and for which you are not responsible. Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the words practically meant the same as vis major, which in substance means very nearly the same as act of God. In my construction of the words I am influenced to some extent by the fact that they were inserted by this foreign gentleman, who was familiar with the meaning of the words upon the Continent. But I am not sure that on this account I should be entitled or bound to give them the full meaning they have on the Continent. I am not going to attempt to give any definition of the words force majeure. But I am quite satisfied I ought to give them a meaning which is more extensive than the meaning we give to the words "act of God," or the words vis major. The trouble is how much more extension, and where shall I stop? I think the strike was anticipated in this sense, that it was obvious a strike might take place, although it was common knowledge everybody was expecting that such disaster would be avoided, such a national strike. The result was that, as far as Mr. Priestman was concerned, the yards from which he had contracted to get his materials for other ships, not this one, got very much behindhand in their supplies. We all know that shipbuilding in shipyards can only be done upon certain ways or berths, and Mr. Priestman had four berths, but had other ships to build besides this, and he had in contemplation to build this ship in berth No. 2. But this ship was to follow No. 239.

The result of the coal strike, and his inability to obtain materials and coal, was this. Ship No. 239 occupied the berth for a great deal longer than it otherwise would have done. The result was that the berth was detained, and No. 231 ship could not be laid down in the berth until some time in October. As a matter of fact, it was not laid down until December. Now would, under such circumstances, the delay be described as coming under the words force majeure if it had been a direct result of the coal strike? It was not the operation of this strike directly at No. 231 which caused the delay. What did cause it was a general dislocation not only in all of Mr. Priestman's business, but all businesses in the North of England, such as makers of steel plates and things of this kind and a general dislocation of the whole businesses in the North of England. In my opinion —although, as I say, my opinion has fluctuated from time to time during the arguments in the case—I think I should be right in saying, justified in saying, that, under the circumstances, this had constituted the case of force majeure. If I were to give the words force majeure the full meaning which the Belgian gentleman said they had on the contract, there would be no doubt about it at all. I think the events which happened, this calamity of a universal coal strike, could completely dislocate all the businesses in the North, and could come within the reasonable meaning of the words force majeure. I think, therefore, Mr. Priestman to this extent is absolved from delay. This delay did not operate directly on ship 231, and if it had been a case of building a ship which is to be built at a berth in turn, I should have had great doubt whether the words force majeure could be held to apply to a case of this kind. But, having regard to the way in which the ship was built and to the berthing, and to Mr. Priestman's right to carry on his business that way, I think I am justified in holding that these are circumstances I can take into consideration.

Then Mr. Priestman wanted an allowance in respect of bad weather, shipwrights' strike, breakdown in machinery, football, and a funeral. So far as the shipwrights' strike is concerned, this comes in the clause. I think the words force majeure cover breakdowns in the machinery. But when I come to bad weather, football matches, and funerals, then I think the words force majeure cannot in any circumstances be held to cover such things. So far as weather is concerned, I have no doubt that Mr. Priestman, in making the contract, took into account the ordinary weather one experiences in Sunderland, and took care to allow himself some time for this. The time he stipulated for to build the ship was twelve months and a week, when the actual operation of the building of the ship does not take more than six or seven months. I shall give effect to the finding of the jury, and allow him seventy days, which they have held was due to the general dislocation of the business in the North of England in consequence of the Welsh coal strike. Then there are seven days for the shipwrights' strike and breakdown in the machinery shop. I am told this leaves the number of days as ninety-eight, and for this the sum of £980 is due. Then counsel for the plaintiff wants interest in respect of a certain sum, and the parties have sensibly agreed at £20 interest. Add this to £980, and you have £1,000, and I give judgment for this amount for the plaintiff, with costs.

Company—Winding-up—Examination of persons as to affairs of company—Examination in open court—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 69), s. 174.

A liquidator in a voluntary winding-up drew attention in his report to serious irregularities in the company's affairs, but did not allege fraud. In order to investigate these matters the liquidator stated that it would be necessary to examine the applicants who were past directors of the company. He suggested that this examination should be in open court and the registrar subsequently made an order on those terms. The applicants, who had no objection to a private examination, objected to a public examination.

Held: an examination in open court under s. 174 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [now s. 268 of the Companies Act, 1948], should only be ordered in very exceptional circumstances, and, as there was no charge of fraud against the applicants, the registrar ought not to have ordered them to be examined in open court.

Quære: whether there was power in any circumstances to order an examination in open court under s. 174 of the Act of 1908.

Motions by two directors and a former director of the Property Insurance Co., Ltd., to discharge an order made by the registrar for their examination in open court under ss. 174 and 193 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.

The company was incorporated on Apr. 27, 1898, and the applicants were appointed directors on Aug. 25, 1909. The third applicant resigned on Jan. 8, 1913. A resolution for voluntary winding-up was passed on Nov. 17, 1913, and a liquidator appointed, and a supervision order was made on Dec. 16, 1913. The liquidator made a report on Feb. 2, 1914 drawing attention to serious irregularities, but not alleging fraud. He stated that these matters could not be investigated without the applicants and others being examined and suggested that the examination should be in open court. An ex parte summons for leave to examine the applicants and others in open court under s. 174 was issued on Feb. 3, 1914, by the liquidator, and the registrar on Feb. 16, 1914, made an ex parte order directing the applicant and others to attend before a registrar to be examined in open court under ss. 174 and 193.

By the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 174 (1): The court may, after it has made a winding-up order, summon before it any officer of the company or person known or suspected to have in his possession any property of the company or supposed to be indebted to the company, or any person whom the court deems capable of giving information concerning the trade, dealings, affairs, or property of the company. (2) The court may examine him on oath concerning the same, either by word of mouth or on written interrogatories, and may reduce his answers to writing and require him to sign them. (3) The court may require him to produce any books and papers in his custody or power relating to the company; but when he claims any lien on books or papers produced by him the production shall be without prejudice to that lien, and the court shall have jurisdiction in the winding-up to determine all questions relating to that lien. (4) If any person so summoned after being tendered a reasonable sum for his expenses, refuses to come before the court at the time appointed, not having a lawful impediment (made known to the court at the time of its sitting, and allowed by it), the court may cause him to be apprehended, and brought before the court for examination.

By the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 193 (1): Where a company is being wound up voluntarily the liquidator or any contributory or creditor may apply to the court to determine any question arising in the winding-up, or to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls, or any other matter, all or any of the powers which the court might exercise if the company were being wound up by the court. (2)

The court, if satisfied that the determination of the question of the required exercise of power will be just and beneficial, may accede wholly or partially to the application, on such terms and conditions as the court thinks fit, or may make such other order on the application as the court thinks just.

Wheeler for the third applicant.
Micklem, K.C., and H. Johnston for the liquidator.

ASTBURY, J., stated the facts and read ss. 174, 175, and 193, and said: In the present case the voluntary liquidator has made a very serious report in connection with the affairs of the company, and has obtained an ex parte order under ss. 174 and 193 for the examination of the applicants and others in open court. The question is whether this order ought to have been made. Rule 5 (2) of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1909 [now rule 5 (2) of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949], provides that "examinations of persons summoned before the High Court under s. 174 of the Act shall be held in court or chambers as the court shall direct." The Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1903, r. 5 (2), contained precisely similar language as to examinations under s. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, while the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1892, r. 3 (2), provided that:

"Examinations of persons summoned before the High Court under s. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, shall, unless the judge of the High Court shall otherwise direct, be held before the registrar in chambers."

Rule 61 of 1909 provides that the consideration of the official receiver's report "shall be before the judge of the court personally in chambers" and in practice, orders for public examination under s. 175, are always made by the judge personally. Rule 73 (2) provides that the notes of the depositions of a person examined under s. 174

"shall not be filed, or be open to the inspection of any creditor, contributory, or other person, except the official receiver or liquidator, unless the court shall so direct."

Examinations under s. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, have been treated over and over again as being private. In Re Great Kruger Gold Mining Co. (1) LINDLEY, L.J., referred to the power of ordering a public examination under the Companies Winding-up Act, 1890, and said ([1892] 3 Ch. at p. 325):

"Now it is obvious that the power here given to the court goes much further than the power which was conferred by s. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862. It not only in terms applies to persons who have been connected in any way with the promotion or formation of the company, as to which there may a doubt under s. 115, but it alters the whole character of the examination. The examination under s. 115 was an examination in private. This is an examination in public, and it is an examination in which any creditor or contributory may take part. It is, therefore, a very serious matter. It is all very well to say that it does not hurt a man to be examined, but we know perfectly well to what length these examinations go, and it is a very serious matter indeed to be examined under this section."

In Haddock's Case (2) BYRNE, J., said ([1902] 2 Ch. at p. 76):

"The Companies Winding-up Rule of Nov., 1895, provides that the notes of the deposition of a person examined under s. 115, or any order of the court, before the court or before any officer of the court, or person appointed to take such an examination, shall not be placed on the file of proceedings or be open to the inspection of any creditor, contributory, or other person, except the official receiver or liquidator, unless and until the court shall so direct; and the court may from time to time give such general or special directions as it shall think expedient as to the custody and inspection of such notes, and the furnishing of copies and extracts therefrom. That goes to emphasise the importance of secrecy in these proceedings, except where the seal of secrecy is removed for particular purposes."

In Re John Twiddle & Co. (3) COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said ([1910] 2 K.B. at p. 702):

"Now it has been decided by the House of Lords in Ex parte Barnes (4) that there is no power to direct a person to attend to be examined unless the official receiver has pledged himself to this extent that he must say, 'In my opinion I think that A.B. and C.D., who are directors and officers of the company, have been guilty of fraud in the promotion of the company'; then the court may make an order requiring the directors to attend."

In Re New Zealand Loan and Mercantile Agency Co., Ltd. (5) VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., made an order for the public examination of certain former directors, and refused a motion to discharge the order. The directors were anxious to be examined under s. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, and in public to get rid of the stigma of fraud cast upon them by the order under s. 8. A consent order was made discharging the order under s. 8, and directing a public examination with liberty for the official receiver and any creditor or contributory to take part putting such questions only as should be allowed by the court.

It is not necessary to decide whether there is power in any circumstances to order an examination in open court under s. 174. I am quite satisfied that an examination in open court under that section should only be ordered in very exceptional circumstances. Here there is no report by a public official. The registrar has acted on the report of the voluntary liquidator, who has stated that there are numerous matters requiring investigation, and that it is impossible to investigate them without examining the applicants and others. But there is no charge of fraud against the applicants, and the registrar ought not to have ordered them to be examined in open court, and to that extent his order will be discharged.

By s. 12 (1) of the Children Act, 1908 [see now s. 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933]: "If any person over the age of sixteen years, who has the custody, charge, or care of any child or young person wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes such child or young person . . . that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

By s. 38 (2) of the Act [s. 17 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933]: "Any person who is the parent or legal guardian of a child or young person or who is legally liable to maintain a child or young person shall be presumed to have the custody of the child or young person . . . Any other person having actual possession or control of a child or young person shall be presumed to have the care of the child or young person."

A husband and wife agreed to live apart, and the wife had the custody of their children. The husband paid the wife regularly a weekly sum sufficient for the maintenance of herself and the children, but the wife neglected the children and failed to provide proper food and clothing for them. The husband knew of the wife's neglect and had several times complained to the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Both husband and wife having been summoned for wilful neglect of the children, the wife only was convicted, and the prosecutor appealed contending that the husband should also have been convicted.

Held: the husband had delegated to his wife as his agent the duty of providing clothing and food for the children; he knew that his agent was not performing the duty; and therefore, he had failed to do his duty and should have been convicted.

Notes. Section 12 of the Children Act, 1908, has been replaced by s. 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, and s. 38 of the 1908 Act has been replaced by s. 17 of the 1933 Act.

Case Stated by justices for the city of Nottingham.

At a petty sessions held at the Guildhall in the city of Nottingham on Feb. 5, 1913, one Henry Stokes (the respondent) was charged in and by a certain information made by William Poole (the appellant), an officer of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, that the respondent on Jan. 25, 1913, and on divers days prior thereto in the city of Nottingham, then having the custody of six children and one young person aged respectively fifteen years, thirteen years, twelve years, nine years, seven years, six years, and four years, unlawfully and wilfully did neglect such children and young person in a manner likely to cause such children and young person unnecessary suffering or injury to their health, contrary to the Children Act, 1908, s. 12. The respondent's wife Margaret Stokes was charged before the justices by an information made by the appellant that she on Jan. 25, 1913, and on divers days prior thereto in the city of Nottingham, then having the custody of the same six children and one young person, unlawfully and wilfully did neglect them in a manner likely to cause them unnecessary suffering or injury to health. On the hearing of this information it was proved to the justices that Margaret Stokes was then living with and had the custody of the six children and one young person, of which children and young person the respondent was the father, and that Margaret Stokes had wilfully neglected such children and young person in a manner likely to cause them unnecessary suffering and injury to health, and the justices convicted her of so doing, and sentenced her to one calendar month's imprisonment with hard labour. It was proved to the justices that the respondent had not been living with his wife since 1909, when he and his wife entered into an agreement to live separately and apart from one another, and that he had been paying her regularly a weekly sum of 20s. for the maintenance of herself and the above-mentioned children and young person under such agreement, and had also on occasion sent clothing for the children. The respondent said to the justices that he was a dealer in old metals, but there was not any evidence to show how much he earned on an average weekly. It was also proved to the justices that the respondent knew of the condition of the children, that the appellant had read over to him s. 38 (2) of the Children Act, 1908, and that the respondent had himself several times invoked the assistance of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children because of his wife's neglect of the children. It was also proved before the justices, and admitted by the appellant that the respondent had to travel about to earn his living and that he could not supervise his children, and that the appellant first visited the children in consequence of the respondent's complaint to him of his wife's neglect. It was contended before the justices on behalf of the appellant that the respondent could not get rid of his responsibility to see to his children's welfare merely by making money payments, and that it was his further duty to see that the payments made were properly applied to the maintenance of the children, and that under s. 38 of the Children Act, 1908, he should be presumed to have the custody of the children and should not be deemed to have ceased to have the custody of them on the ground that he did not reside with the mother and children. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that as he was not living with the mother and children and paid towards their maintenance he could not be presumed to have the custody of the children under s. 38 of the Children Act, 1908, and that if he had such custody such neglect had arisen in spite of the respondent's efforts, and that by consulting the officers of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children he had taken reasonable steps to avoid his children suffering from neglect. The justices were of opinion that upon the above facts the respondent had done all he could to see that the children were not neglected in a manner likely to cause them unnecessary suffering and injury to health, and had thereby carried out his legal responsibility, and they therefore discharged the information against him. The question for the opinion of the court was whether on the facts proved before the justices the respondent was guilty of an offence under s. 12 of the Children Act, 1908.

Upon the case coming on for hearing on Oct. 15, 1913, the court made an order that the Case be remitted to the justices to be re-stated by showing (i) whether the moneys provided by the respondent were sufficient to provide for the maintenance of the wife and children and young person, and (ii) in what respect the wife of the respondent was guilty of negligence under s. 12 of the Children Act, 1908. Pursuant to the order of the court the justices stated, supplemental to the Case stated by them that they were of opinion that the moneys provided by the respondent were sufficient to provide for the maintenance of the wife and children and young person. On Jan. 25, 1913, it was proved to them that there was not any food in the house, but there was in the house a postal order for 20s. The wife of the respondent was guilty of negligence in that the children, though fairly nourished, were verminous and poorly clad, that the rooms in the house were dirty and smelt foul, and that there was not any proper bed clothing for the children.

CHANNELL, J.—The question we are asked is whether on the facts proved the respondent was guilty of an offence under s. 12 of the Children Act, 1908 [now s. 1 of the Children and Young Person Act, 1933]. We are all of opinion that upon these facts he was guilty of an offence, and therefore the case will go back to the justices, and they will deal with it properly. It is very probable that there are facts which have not been stated, but which will be known to the justices, and will affect the way in which they may deal with the case, and therefore it would not be right to say more than that upon the facts stated the case does not appear to me to be one for any considerable or substantial punishment. It may even turn out to be a case in which the justices might say under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts that there ought to be no further proceedings or punishment in the matter. That might or might not be so. It is, however, clear that under this statute the respondent has committed an offence. [HIS LORDSHIP read s. 38 (2) [now s. 17 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933] and continued:] The respondent and his wife had entered into a separation agreement. There was a voluntary separation and a voluntary payment by the husband, and he had been paying her 20s. a week under that agreement for the maintenance of herself and her children. The justices have found in the supplemental Case that this sum was sufficient and therefore he has provided her with a sum of money and he has sent that money to her. The respondent intrusted to his wife the spending of that money, and delegated to her the duty of providing clothing and food for them. That might be satisfactory for a time, but it is clear that he became aware of the fact that his wife was not properly using the money and that she was not providing for the children, and consequently he was in the position of having employed an agent to perform his duty and of having knowledge that that agent was not performing the duty. The consequence is that he was not doing his duty, and he has failed to do his duty. He was sending the money to his agent to do it, and that agent did not do it. He has failed to provide adequate food for the children, and therefore he is clearly liable. What he did was to go to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and to draw their attention to the facts; but the fact that he went to the society, apparently for the purpose of protecting the children, does not relieve him from the obligation to perform his duty himself. There was nothing, as far as we can see, to prevent him from taking his children away from his wife. Section 12 (1) of the Act says that a parent who is legally liable to maintain a child shall be deemed to have neglected him if he fails to provide adequate food, clothing, and so forth. I understand that to mean that he is to be punished as if he were guilty, although there may be no moral blame attaching to him.

[Court of Appeal (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Bankes and Warrington, L.JJ.), October 25, 1915]

Company—Winding-up—Preferential creditor—Clerk or servant's claim for wages—Services rendered during four months before statutory date—Voluntary winding-up followed by compulsory winding-up—Claim for wages for services rendered within four months before voluntary winding-up, but outside that period before compulsory winding-up—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 69), s. 209.

A company passed a resolution for a voluntary winding-up, and the plaintiff, who was a servant of the company, sent in a claim to the liquidator as a preferential creditor for salary earned four months before the winding-up. The liquidator included him in the list of creditors. A year later a petition was presented for the compulsory winding-up of the company and the Official Receiver, who was appointed liquidator, disallowed the plaintiff's claim on the grounds that the services in respect of which he claimed were not rendered within four months of the commencement of the compulsory winding-up.

Held: the winding-up was a continuous process which began with the commencement of the voluntary winding-up; there was nothing to indicate that persons who had already acquired statutory preferential claims were to be deprived of them on a subsequent compulsory winding-up; and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to be admitted as a preferential creditor.

Summons taken out in the liquidation of the Havana Exploration Co., Ltd., against the official receiver, who was liquidator of the company, asking that the decision of the liquidator in rejecting a claim of the applicant's for preferential payment in the liquidation might be reversed.

The applicant was a servant of the company and was engaged under an agreement recorded in writing in a minute dated Feb. 15, 1911, for a period of three years from Feb. 1, 1911, at a salary of £600, £700, and £800 per annum for the three years respectively. On June 23, 1913, the company went into voluntary liquidation and the voluntary liquidator admitted the applicant as a preferential creditor for £50 for salary earned four months before the resolution to wind-up voluntarily, and this was entered in the directors' statement of affairs. On July 9, 1914, a petition was presented for the compulsory winding-up of the company, and on July 21 an order was made for compulsory winding-up. The applicant claimed £50, preferential payment, and lodged a proof in the compulsory winding-up for £750, being the balance of salary due to him. On May 22, 1915, the official receiver gave notice disallowing the applicant's claim for preferential payment of the £50 on the ground that the service in respect of which his claim of £50 was made was not rendered to the company within four months before the date of the "commencement of the winding-up" by the court.

The summons was adjourned into court and came on to be heard before Neville, J., on June 22, 1915. Neville, J., held that the commencement of the winding-up meant the time of the presentation of the petition for compulsory winding-up, and not the resolution to wind-up voluntarily; and that the preferential claim must be disallowed. From that decision the applicant appealed.

By s. 209 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [now s. 319 of the Companies Act, 1948]:

"(1) In a winding-up there shall be paid in priority to all other debts . . . (b) All wages or salary of any clerk or servant in respect of services rendered to the company during four months before [the date specified in the section], not exceeding fifty pounds. . . . (5) The date hereinbefore in this section referrred to is (a) in the case of a company ordered to be wound-up compulsorily which had not previously commenced to be wound-up voluntarily, the date of the winding-up orders and (b) in any other case, the date of the commencement of the winding-up."

F. Wheeler for the applicant.
Croom-Johnson for the liquidator.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This case raises a curious point which, I think, has not been previously raised in any reported case.

The material facts are very short. The company was resolved to be voluntarily wound-up in June, 1913, and a liquidator, of course, was appointed. At that date the applicant, who is the present appellant, was a clerk or a servant in the employment of the company. And he says that under s. 209 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, he is entitled to the extent of £50 to be paid in priority to everyone else. He says that he has that right because of the opening words of s. 209:

"(1) In a winding-up there shall be paid in priority to all other debts . . . (b), all wages or salary of any clerk or servant in respect of services rendered to the company during four months before the said date, not exceeding fifty pounds."

The applicant sent in his claim to the voluntary liquidator. The money was not paid, but the voluntary liquidator included him in the list of creditors, and, so far as he could, he admitted the claim. Has anything happened to deprive the applicant of that right, which is a statutory right? It is said that the circumstances are these: In July of the following year, July, 1914, there was a compulsory order made by the court and the effect of that undoubtedly is that the voluntary liquidator was ousted. The existing winding-up order is undoubtedly a compulsory order, and the liquidator under the compulsory order happens to be the official receiver here. He is the person whose duty it now is to get in the assets of the company and to administer them according to law, and the question which then arises is: What is the right given by s. 209? In order to answer that question, I must look at one or two other sections. Section 209 (1) (a), dealing with parochial rates, says: "All parochial or other local rates due from the company at the date hereinafter mentioned." They are the same words as those mentioned in sub-s. (b), the words being "before the said date," which carries you back to "at the date hereinafter mentioned." When you get to s. 209 (5) there are two cases dealt with:

"The date hereinbefore in this section referred to is (a) in the case of a company ordered to be wound-up compulsorily which had not previously commenced to be wound-up voluntarily, the date of the winding-up order."

It is quite clear that this company is not within s. 209 (5) (a) because it had commenced to be wound-up voluntarily for a year. That voluntarily winding-up order, which had commenced according to the language of the section, seems to me to exactly meet what you find in s. 209 (5) (b), "in any other case" which has not been mentioned, and this is one of them, "the date of the commencement of the winding-up." What is the date of the commencement of the winding-up in this case? It seems to me to be that which in s. 209 (5) (a) is contemplated as that of a company previously commenced to be wound-up. That being so, the only thing that this means is that the official receiver, the liquidator under the compulsory order, is not bound by the decision of the voluntary liquidator if his decision is disputed. But here it is not, because the facts are agreed. If it is disputed, the applicant must come in and prove it. Then if his position as a clerk or servant of the company during the four months is either proved or admitted, the compulsory liquidator is bound, in the administration of the assets by him, to pay the claim to the extent of £50 as one of the preferential debts of the company. That seems to me really to be the whole of this case. Every point that could be urged has been put before us by counsel for the liquidator. But I am bound to say, with great respect to the learned judge in the court below, that I have not been able to appreciate the difficulties of the case.

It is said, however, that there are two authorities which bind us as well as the learned judge to decide otherwise. One arose under s. 38 of the Companies Act, 1862 (s. 123 of the 1908 Act). It was held by a majority of the court in Re Taurine Co. (1); that when the sequence of events is that which happened here—a voluntary winding-up being followed by a compulsory winding-up—the date ranks from the second, the compulsory order, and not from the voluntary winding-up. That seems to me to have very little bearing on the present case. The language was quite different. There is nothing equivalent to cl. 5 here. There is no such vested right as it is sought to take away from the creditor in the present case. The other case—Midland Counties District Bank, Ltd. v. Attwood (2)—is the comparatively recent decision of SWINFEN EADY, J. That case again seems to me to create no difficulty. That was a case under the following section, s. 210, which is sometimes referred to as the fraudulent preference section; and s. 210 (2) there is in language which I should have thought was quite clear:

"For the purposes of this section the presentation of a petition for winding-up in the case of a winding-up by or subject to the supervision of the court, and a resolution for winding-up in the case of a voluntary winding-up, shall be deemed to correspond with the act of bankruptcy in the case of an individual."

There was no such language there as is found in the present case—namely, a statutory contemplation of the event that there may be first a voluntary winding-up and next a compulsory winding-up and what is to happen in that case. In my opinion the view of the learned judge in the court below was wrong, and the appeal must be allowed, and the appellant must be admitted to the position of a preferred creditor to the extent of £50.

BANKES, L.J.—I agree. In my opinion, the authorities to which we have been referred really do not touch the question which we have to decide in the present case. That depends upon the proper construction to be put upon s. 209 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. In order to do that, it is necessary to consider not only the language of the section, but the object with which it was passed. The object with which the section was passed is quite plain. It was passed to create certain statutory preferential claims in favour of the persons mentioned in the section, in the event of the ordinary carrying on of the business of the company being interrupted by a winding-up. That was the object of the section, and the persons intended to be benefited were persons who come within the various sub-sections which are appended to the section. The section itself deals with the winding-up of a company, and I think it is plain that it deals with that winding-up as a process, and a continuous process. It may be commenced as a voluntary winding-up, and it may be continued as a compulsory winding-up. But the section speaks of it as one continuous process, because when you are dealing with s. 209 (5) (a) it speaks of the case of a company ordered to be wound-up compulsorily, which had not previously commenced to be wound-up voluntarily. Therefore it contemplates the winding-up commencing in one way and being continued in another, but for the purpose of the section being one continuous process. It is in a process of that kind, in a winding-up of that kind, that there shall be priority to all debts given to these that are mentioned. And in order to define what particular classes of persons and debts come within the preference created by the section, it speaks of them as either wages or salary or parochial or other local rates, or whatever it may be which either become due at the date hereinafter mentioned or in respect of services rendered to the company during a certain period before a certain date, and so forth. You have to look at the end of the section to see what the date referred to is, and you find that in s. 209 (5), which is split up into two sub-sections; and if you read the second sub-section in full as applicable to this case, it seems to me impossible to accept the argument that is presented to us on behalf of the respondents, because if the section was written out in full it would be: "In the case of a company ordered to be wound-up compulsorily and which had previously commenced to be wound-up voluntarily, the date of the winding-up."

Now, which winding-up? Which of those two? They are both mentioned. Why should the compulsory winding-up be accepted rather than the voluntary, when the whole scheme of the section is to benefit the persons who are in a particular position at the date of the commencement of the process of winding-up, and to whom the section has given the statutory preferential claim? What is there in the section to indicate that, in the events which happened here—namely, the commencement of the winding-up voluntarily—the persons who had already acquired those statutory preferential claims were to be deprived of them, possibly in favour of other people who had come into the service of the company after the commencement of the winding-up and after it had altered its status? I entirely fail to see any ground upon which the learned judge's view of the section can be supported, and I think this appeal ought to be allowed.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I agree. Section 209 (b) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 gives to a clerk or servant a priority to the extent of £50 in respect of services rendered to the company during four months before a certain date. That date is defined by s. 209 (5) in these words:

> "The date hereinbefore in this section referred to (a) in the case of a company ordered to be wound-up compulsorily which had not previously commenced to be wound-up voluntarily, the date of the winding-up; (b) in any other case, the date of the commencement of the winding-up."

That is to say, "and in a case in which the company has been ordered to be wound-up compulsorily and has previously commenced to be wound-up voluntarily, the date of the commencement of the winding-up." In my opinion, I cannot see any other construction which can be put upon s. 209 (5) (b) except that the winding-up there referred to is the winding-up which has previously been referred to under the words "previously commenced to be wound-up," treating the whole winding-up as, for this section, one continuous winding-up. What we are deciding is on this section only, and the authorities which have been cited to us refer to other sections, and seem to me neither to affect our judgment nor to be affected by it.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—The declaration will be that the applicant is entitled to be admitted as a preferential creditor to the extent of £50, and he will get the costs both here and in the court below out of the assets of the company.

Appeal allowed.

Licensing—Permitted hours—Beer paid for and deposited outside premises during permitted hours—Collected by customer outside permitted hours—Completion of transaction during permitted hours—Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. 7 & 1 Geo. 5, c. 24, s. 61).

Under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, Sched. 6, para. C, the respondent's public house had to be closed on Sunday night between the hours of 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. on the following morning. A customer called at the public house at about eight o'clock on a Sunday evening and left a bottle which he asked should be filled with beer and be put in the stable yard that evening so that he could collect it and take it with him to his work the following morning. This was done, and the customer collected the bottle of beer before 6 a.m. on the Monday. The respondent was charged with having unlawfully opened his licensed premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours, contrary to s. 61 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910.

Held: (AVORY, J., dissenting), if a material part of the transaction of sale had remained to be carried out as a part of the whole bargain between the parties within prohibited hours, there would have been an offence within the section, but here the whole transaction was carried out and completed on the Sunday evening when the property in the beer passed to the customer, and not only was the beer sold in the strictest sense of the word, but it was delivered by being put in the yard.

Notes. Section 61 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, has been replaced by s. 100 of the Licensing Act, 1953.

Case Stated by Midhurst, Sussex, justices.

An information was preferred by Thomas Bristow, a superintendent of the West Sussex Constabulary (hereinafter called the appellant) under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, against George Piper, the respondent, for that he, on May 25, 1914, in the parish of Rogate in the county of Sussex, being the holder of a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail in his house and premises there situate, did unlawfully open his licensed premises for the sale of intoxicating liquor during part of the time that his licensed premises were required to be closed by the Act. Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved: George Piper was the holder of a justices' licence in respect of the premises known as the Wyndham Arms, Rogate, in the county of Sussex, the hours of closing of which licensed premises were according to para. C of Sched. 6 to the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910; on the evening of May 24, 1914, about 8 p.m., a man named Benjamin Brider called at the Wyndham Arms and handed to the respondent a quart bottle which he asked should be filled with beer and put out in the stable yard that night so that he could call for it and take it away with him to work next morning before the house opened, and such beer was paid for at the time that it was ordered; the bottle was so filled by the respondent and placed in the stable yard the same evening; the stable yard was within the curtilage of the premises known as the Wyndham Arms; and at 5.37 a.m. on May 25, 1914 the man Benjamin Brider came and took away the quart bottle of beer from the stable yard. The justices, being of opinion that there was a doubt whether the sale and delivery was not complete on Sunday, May 24, 1914, gave the respondent the benefit of the doubt and dismissed the information.

By s. 61 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, [see now s. 100, of the Licensing Act, 1953,]:

> "If any person during the time at which premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors are directed to be closed by or in pursuance of this Act, sells or exposes for sale in those premises any intoxicating liquor, or opens or keeps open those premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors, or allows any intoxicating liquors although purchased before the hours of closing to be consumed on those premises, that person shall be liable in respect of each offence to a fine not exceeding in the case of the first offence ten pounds, and in the case of any subsequent offence twenty pounds. . . ."

By Sched. 6, para. C, of the Act the hours of closing for the premises in question were:

> "(a) On Saturday night from 10 p.m. until 12.30 p.m. on Sunday; (b) on Sunday afternoon from 2.30 p.m. until 6 p.m.; (c) on Sunday night from 10 p.m. until 6 a.m. on the following morning; (d) on the nights of all other days from 10 p.m. until 6 a.m. on the following morning."

AVORY, J.—As I have the misfortune to differ from my learned brothers in the conclusion at which they have arrived, I am delivering my judgment first. The question that is raised is whether the respondent's premises were open during prohibited hours within the meaning of s. 61 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. According to the Act the premises could not be opened before 6 a.m., and the time when the purchaser fetched away the beer from the stable yard was 5.37 a.m. It appears to me that it is beyond doubt that the premises were open within the meaning of this section. I adopt entirely the words of BRUCE, J., in Jeffrey v. Weaver (1) where the question discussed was whether a public house was kept open during prohibited hours under s. 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874—the section which has now been replaced by s. 61, of the Act of 1910—and I think they are an excellent test in a matter like the present. The learned judge there said ([1899] 2 Q.B. at p. 454):

> "It is really a question of means of access to the interior of the premises from the outside, and if there are no such means of access, then the premises are not open or kept open within that section."

In the present case it is found as a fact that the stable yard is within the curtilage of the licensed premises, which I understand to mean that it forms a part of the licensed premises, and as the purchaser fetched away the beer from the stable yard, it seems to me quite clear that the licensed premises were open during prohibited hours on the day in question.

Then arises the question whether the premises were open for the sale of intoxicating liquor. In Pletts v. Beattie (2), WILLS, J., said ([1896] 1 Q.B. at p. 523):

> "A 'sale' may be something incomplete in itself, and the expression 'sale' may be satisfied although the actual delivery of the goods still remains to be carried out. The provisions of the Licensing Act were not framed with a regard to the niceties which sometimes enter into the consideration of a contract for goods sold and delivered; these provisions are satisfied if the substantial elements of a sale take place on the licensed premises, though the beer is consumed or delivered off them."

And in the same case WRIGHT, J., said (ibid. at p. 524):

> "Enough has been done to satisfy the language of the statute, which is not to be construed with excessive legal nicety as to what constitutes a sale."

Applying the principle there laid down to the present case, I am satisfied that the transaction altogether constituted a sale; and as I have already stated that I think the premises were open during prohibited hours for the sale of intoxicating liquor contrary to s. 61 of the Act of 1910.

It has been suggested that there is a difference between the present case and that of Noblett v. Hopkinson (3). True, the facts are different, as there never have been two cases which are identically the same as to the facts. But as to the law which is applicable I can see no distinction at all between the two cases. In Noblett v. Hopkinson (3) the beer was in fact delivered by the barman who took it from the premises to some other place and there gave it to the purchaser, whereas in the present case the purchaser fetched the beer from the stable yard. As I have just said I see no distinction in law between the two cases. The present transaction is one which falls precisely within the words used by CHANNELL, J., in Saunders v. Thorney (4) (78 L.T. at p. 629):

> "A person opens his licensed premises within the meaning of the section when he opens them for the carrying out of any material part of the transaction of sale."

I have not overlooked the fact that the judgment of LORD RUSSELL, C.J., in that case turned upon the question whether there had been an appropriation of the goods, but in the words which he used CHANNELL, J., expressed his view as to the meaning which ought to be put upon the section. Perhaps if it had stood alone it might have been said that this was merely an obiter dictum and not necessary for the decision; but these words were expressly adopted and quoted with approval by the majority of this court in Noblett v. Hopkinson (3). In that case LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., said ([1905] 2 K.B. at p. 219):

> "This point (i.e., the opening of licensed houses during prohibited hours) depends on the question whether we are to adopt the test laid down by CHANNELL, J., in Saunders v. Thorney (4)," and after quoting the words which I have already read, he proceeded (ibid.):

> "Personally, I adopt that view, and think that if any part of the bargain of sale involves the opening or keeping open of the premises for delivery of the goods on Sunday the case falls within the mischief of the section."

It appears to me that in the present case not only was it a material part of the transaction of the sale of the beer that the purchaser should fetch it from the premises during the hours when they ought to have been closed, but that it was a term of the contract of sale that he should do so. In answer to this it is asserted that the delivery of the goods was in fact complete on the Sunday night when the bottle was put in the stable yard. No doubt if the question was raised as to the exact time when the property in the beer passed or as to the exact moment when there was a delivery such as would satisfy the requirements of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, that answer would be relevant and correct; but in my opinion it is not correct to say that for the purpose of sale under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, the whole transaction was complete and the whole delivery complete when in point of fact the purchaser did not obtain possession until the Monday morning, at an hour when the licensed premises were required by law to be closed. For the reasons which I have given I feel bound by the decision of the majority of the court in Noblett v. Hopkinson (3) to hold that the premises of the respondent were in fact open for the sale of intoxicating liquor during prohibited hours within the meaning of s. 61 of the Act of 1910. I may also add that I also feel bound by the judgment of KENNEDY, J., in the same case on the question of appropriation when he says ([1905] 2 K.B. at p. 222):

> "I confess that I should go further, and, as at present advised, should be prepared to hold that, if on a Saturday night a man were to point to one in a row of bottles in the bar of a public-house and say that he wanted that particular bottle and would pay for it now but it must be delivered to-morrow during prohibited hours, the so delivering it would be carrying out an essential part of the transaction of sale and the case would be within the section, although in such a case there would be an appropriation of the chattel."

In my opinion the justices ought to have convicted the respondent and the appeal ought to be allowed.

LUSH, J.—The question which we are called upon to decide in the present case may be put briefly as follows: Were the justices bound upon the facts stated in the Case to convict the respondent of an offence under s. 61 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910? The justices have said that they did not convict because there was a doubt in their minds as to whether the sale and delivery were not complete on the Sunday night, May 24, 1914, and they gave the respondent the benefit of the doubt. The question which they have submitted to this court is in a somewhat curious form—namely, whether they came to a correct determination and decision in point of law that it was doubtful if it could not be held that the sale and delivery were complete on May 24. I think that the justices mean by their question that if this court is of opinion that upon the facts as they were found they ought to have convicted, we are asked to say so and to remit the Case to them for conviction; but if, on the other hand, we hold that the facts were such that it was open to them not to convict, then the matter rests where it is and the information is dismissed.

Numerous cases have been cited in the course of the argument, and I think that the language of s. 61 of the Act affords a clue as to the various decisions. A difficulty arises as to the use of the word "sale," which has an ambiguous meaning in certain cases, and more especially when it is used in the Licensing Acts. The word "sale" may refer to a transaction in which the property in the goods intended to be transferred passes without anything more. In such a case delivery has nothing to do with the matter, or rather delivery is not a condition precedent to the vendor having a right to demand payment for the goods from the purchaser, and, if the purchaser does not pay, the vendor, as plaintiff, can bring an action for the price of goods upon a bargain and sale of the same.

The word "sale" is also used in its most ordinary sense—namely, a contract of sale completed by delivery. If there is any failure on the part of the purchaser to pay for the goods, the vendor brings his action for goods sold and delivered, and in this case delivery must be proved. Bearing these distinct meanings in mind, it is necessary to inquire how the word "sale" has been interpreted when used in s. 61 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, or in the corresponding section of a previous Licensing Act which the Act of 1910 has replaced.

I will first of all take Brewer v. Shepherd (5). The facts in that case were shortly these. A man was seen to enter into a public-house after closing hours and to leave the same carrying a bottle of beer. He afterwards explained that he had left the bottle at the public-house before ten o'clock, the time for closing, ordered it to be filled with beer, and then went to get shaved, after which he only called at the public-house to get the bottle of beer. The court held that there was some evidence upon which the justices might have come to the conclusion that the public-house was kept open for the sale of beer after closing hours. On that ground the court affirmed the conviction; but on reading the judgment it seems to me to be difficult to avoid coming to the conclusion that if the man had gone to the public-house with no other intention than that of fetching the bottle of beer which he had already bought there would have been no offence committed, and I take it that all that was decided was that there was some evidence that the purchase was actually made after closing hours.

The next case is that of Saunders v. Thorney (4), and it is important to examine the facts of it in order to appreciate the judgment of CHANNELL, J. There a person ordered some bottles of beer from a publican on a Saturday evening and paid for the same. It was arranged that the beer should be delivered to the purchaser on the Saturday, but for some reason or other this was not done. On the following day, Sunday, during closing hours, the purchaser sent for the beer and it was delivered to his servant. It was held that an offence had been committed in that the licensed premises had been opened for the sale of intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours. In order to appreciate and to understand the judgments it is necessary to observe that it was there held by the court that the property in the bottles of beer had not passed—a very different thing from delivery. There had been no appropriation of any specific goods, and consequently there was no sale at all until the Sunday morning. It was because there had been no appropriation on the Saturday that LORD RUSSELL, C.J., held that there had also been no sale on that day, and that the sale had taken place during prohibited hours on the Sunday. It is also important to notice the following words used by LORD RUSSELL, C.J., because they are a limitation on the judgment (78 L.T. at p. 629):

> "It is perfectly clear that if publicans were to be at liberty to say, 'It is true we opened our house on the Sunday, but we did so only under and for the purpose of carrying out antecedent contracts'—contracts made without any specific appropriation of the goods—that would open a very wide door to evade what we must take to be the real object of the legislature in these licensing matters."

In other words, if it is found that there has been no passing of property, no appropriation of goods during open hours, it would open a very wide door to an evasion of the Act. In my view it is vital, in order to appreciate the judgment of CHANNELL, J., who agreed with LORD RUSSELL, C.J., to recognise the fact that there had been no sale at all—no appropriation of the goods during the hours when the licensed premises were open. That being so, CHANNELL, J., said,

> "I think a person opens his licensed premises within the meaning of the section when he opens them for the carrying out of any material part of the transaction of sale."

Inasmuch as the house in that case was open during prohibited hours on the Sunday in order that the bottles of beer might be appropriated, it is manifest that there had been no sale at all until the Sunday, and it was in reference to that fact that CHANNELL, J. gave his judgment.

That judgment received the approval of this court and was acted upon in Noblett v. Hopkinson (3). The statement of facts in this last-named case makes it quite clear that it was a term of the contract of sale that the delivery of the beer should be carried out on the Sunday. It is quite true that that is consistent with the property in the beer having passed on the Saturday night, but it was a term of the contract that the delivery should take place during prohibited hours, and this court dealt with the case upon that footing. Although it seems that the statement of LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., in his judgment that the purchasers were to call for the beer on the Sunday morning is not altogether consistent with the statement of fact in the case that the beer was to be sent to them, the Lord Chief Justice came to the same conclusion as had been arrived at in the earlier case of Saunders v. Thorney (4), namely, that the property had not passed on the Saturday, that there had been no appropriation, and consequently that there had been no sale at all on that day. In order to deal with the question what would be the law if there had been an appropriation and a passing of property, LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., and the other judges proceeded to consider whether, if the delivery under the contract was to take place by the licensee during prohibited hours, there would or would not be an offence against the section. In other words, the court were considering the question whether the word "sale" was used in the strictest sense or in the widest sense. Upon that question LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., came to the conclusion that if the delivery of the beer was to be effected during prohibited hours an offence was committed under the section. KENNEDY, J., agreed with that view, and in the passage which has been read by my brother AVORY he said no more than that. It is as well to point out, in regard to the illustration which he gave of bottles of beer being left in a row in the bar, that he expressly said that if the purchaser said that he wanted a particular bottle, that he would pay for it on the spot, and that it must be delivered on the following day during prohibited hours there would be an offence; and this clearly points to this, to my mind that the word "sale" must be read in the wider sense, and that if part of the contract is that delivery is to be made during prohibited hours there is an offence. That judgment does not go any further than this, that the section is contravened if the purchaser buys the beer, as far as the passing of the property is concerned, but stipulates that the delivery shall be effected during prohibited hours.

Let us now turn to the facts of the present case. Was it a term of the contract that the vendor should deliver the beer to the purchaser during prohibited hours? Where was the delivery to be made? That is, to my mind, an all-important matter, because I have not the slightest doubt that the property in the beer passed to the purchaser on the Sunday night. I quite agree that the word "sale" is not to be construed with the strictness which it receives under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, but there must be some limitation on the word even in the Licensing Acts. Some regard must be had as to what delivery means. The stipulation in the present case between the vendor and the purchaser was that the bottle of beer should be placed in the stable yard to be fetched away by the purchaser, and there is no doubt that it was in the stable yard at the risk of the purchaser. That being so, I am of opinion that not only was the beer sold in the strictest sense of the word, but it was also delivered by being put in the stable yard. Can it be said that any part of the transaction of sale was left incomplete? I do not think so. The case is precisely the same as if the purchaser had taken the bottle of beer into the yard himself, had left it there, and had called and taken it away on the following morning. According to my view of the whole circumstances of the case, I do not see how any person could contend that the beer was delivered on the Monday morning, and it seems to me that the whole transaction was carried out and completed on the Sunday evening during the hours when the licensed premises were properly open. As it was quite open to the justices to arrive at the conclusion—namely, that the whole matter was concluded on the Sunday night—and that no part of it had any reference to the Monday morning, I think that they were right in dismissing the information. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree entirely with the judgment of my brother LUSH, and I think that the justices came to a correct decision in dismissing the information. If there had been no previous cases dealing with the question of the sale of intoxicating liquor during prohibited hours. I cannot conceive how any doubt could have arisen about the matter at all. But there are several cases, and they have been cited to us. They run into great niceties, and distinctions have been drawn which have gone quite far enough. It is, therefore, necessary for us to examine them, and to see whether we are in any way bound by the governing principles which have been laid down in them.

One of the most important of these cases is that of Noblett v. Hopkinson (3). It is important, in considering whether there has been a sale or not, to ascertain whether or not there has been an appropriation of goods. I stated that in Noblett v. Hopkinson (3), and I think that that was the principle upon which Saunders v. Thorney (4) proceeded. In each of these cases there had been no appropriation of the beer on the Saturday: there was none until the Sunday. As LORD RUSSELL, C.J., said in Saunders v. Thorney (4) (78 L.T. at p. 629):

> "The matter rested, therefore, entirely in contract, and no property passed under or by virtue of that contract. Then on the Sunday the house was opened for the delivery of goods in respect of which there had been no appropriation and no property had passed."

The Lord Chief Justice held that that was sufficient to justify the justices in coming to the conclusion that the house had been opened for sale during prohibited hours, because the vendor was appropriating and delivering goods under the contract previously made. CHANNELL, J., said (ibid.):

> "I think a person opens his licensed premises within the meaning of the section when he opens them for the carrying out of any material part of the transaction of sale."

It is important to observe that it was a material part of the transaction of sale that the goods should be appropriated in respect of the contract already made. No one would deny that, and that is the subject-matter with which he was dealing. Although the bargain began on the previous day, still a material part of the transaction of sale remained to be completed, and therefore there was, within the meaning of the section, an opening of the premises for the purpose of the sale of intoxicating liquor.

The decision in Saunders v. Thorney (4) was followed in Noblett v. Hopkinson (3). There LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., said this ([1905] 2 K.B. at pp. 219, 220):

> "Personally I adopt that view [i.e., the view expressed by CHANNELL, J.], and think that if any part of the bargain of sale involves the opening or keeping open of the premises for delivery of the goods on Sunday, the case falls within the mischief of the section."

He adopted the principle and applied it to the facts before him in Noblett v. Hopkinson (3) which were not exactly the same as they are here and not exactly the same as in Saunders v. Thorney (4). In the former of these two cases an arrangement was made whereby the bottle having been bought on Saturday night was to be taken by the barman to the brewhouse stable within the curtilage, and he was to deliver it, as he did, in the morning within prohibited hours. That was the bargain, and that bargain was not complete until the bottle was actually handed over on the Sunday morning. As KENNEDY, J., said (ibid. at p. 222):

> "There was merely a contract for the sale of a certain quantity of beer to be delivered from the premises during prohibited hours."

According to my view that cannot be said to correspond with the facts in the present case. Here the purchaser of the beer gave the respondent a bottle and asked that it might be filled with beer and placed in the stable yard so that he might call for it and take it away early in the morning. The whole business transaction between the purchaser of the beer and the respondent was completed on the Sunday evening. I cannot assent to the view which has been advanced that because what subsequently happened took place before six o'clock on the Monday morning and in a part of the licensed premises there was something done during prohibited hours which was a material part of the whole transaction. The decision in Noblett v. Hopkinson (3) went perhaps as far as it is desirable

A that cases of this kind should go. We have said, and I adhere to it, that if a material part of the transaction of sale remains to be carried out as a part of the whole bargain between the parties within prohibited hours, then there is an offence committed under the section; but if the facts of the case are such as to show that the sale has been completed during legitimate hours, then the case does not come within the principle of Saunders v. Thorney (4) and Noblett v. Hopkinson (3) but falls into a different category. For the B reasons which I have given I think that the justices arrived at a correct decision and that the present appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

WOOD v. CONWAY CORPORATION

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Buckley, L.J., and Channell, J.), March 9, 10, 11, 1914]

E [Reported [1914] 2 Ch. 47; 83 L.J.Ch. 498; 110 L.T. 917; 78 J.P. 249; 12 L.G.R. 571]

Nuisance—Injunction—Fumes—Gasworks—Threat of extension—Impossibility of estimating future damage to property—Consideration of possible future use of property.

Where an owner of property, be it a house, garden, park, or anything else, not F necessarily a house or structure, is substantially injured in the reasonable enjoyment of his property, or by the value of the property being affected, and so is entitled to an injunction to restrain the continuance of the nuisance [or, semble, damages in a suitable case], the property is not to be considered only in its present condition. The owner has a right to the protection of his property, not only as it is now, but as it would be in any form in which he is entitled to use it in the future.

G A gas undertaking, in the execution of its statutory powers, discharged noxious fumes and smells over the plaintiff's land, and admitted that they intended to enlarge their plant so as to manufacture such increased quantity of gas as might be required to meet the demand for gas in their original area of supply and also in an extension thereof.

Held: the effect of an order for damages in lieu of an injunction would be to give H the plaintiff compensation in advance for the continuance of the nuisance: if the defendants' works were altered, or the process of manufacturing gas were changed, the question would always arise whether the damage then being done was that for which compensation had been given by the order of the court; and, therefore, it being impossible to foresee what might be done in the future to cause damage, it was also impossible to assess damages, and the proper remedy was an injunction.

I Notes. As to the grant of an injunction to restrain a nuisance, see 28 HALSBURY'S LAWS 165–168, and as to injunctions generally and damages in lieu thereof, see ibid., vol. 21, 352 et seq. For cases see 36 DIGEST (Repl.) 327 et seq., and 28 DIGEST (Repl.) 766 et seq.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of JOYCE, J.

The plaintiff, Albert Wood, had been for many years, and was, the owner in fee simple in possession and occupier of a freehold property situate in the borough of Conway, in the county of Carnarvon, and known as Bodlondeb. The property, which comprised 60 acres or thereabouts, consisted of a dwelling-house, used by the plaintiff as his residence, and the gardens, park, woods and pleasure grounds, lodges and cottages occupied therewith, including a gardener's cottage, called Twthill. The defendants had been at all material times and were the owners of a gasworks undertaking for the supply of gas both within and without the limits of the borough. Such undertaking was constituted under the Conway Gas Order, 1880 (being a provisional order under the Gas and Waterworks Facilities Act, 1870), as confirmed by the Local Government

Board's (Gas) Provisional Orders Confirmation Act, 1880, and under the Conway Gas Act, 1909. The gasworks of the defendants in connection with their undertaking had been for some years past upon a piece of land acquired by the defendants for that purpose under the powers of the Conway Gas Order, 1880, and situate to the west of, and adjoining the plaintiff's said property. The gasworks consisted until shortly before the action of (i) a retort house, with four benches of six retorts, each having six openings each 5 ft. high by 3 ft. wide in the outside wall next to the plaintiff's property, and also having a large louvre or ventilator in the roof, and a chimney or shaft about 38 ft. high above the ground; (ii) a purifier house, containing four purifiers, with oxide and lime house adjoining; (iii) a valve house; (iv) an engine and exhauster house; (v) two gasholders, one of a capacity of 60,000 cubic ft. or thereabouts, and the other of a capacity of 120,000 cubic ft. or thereabouts; (vi) tar and liquor well; and (vii) divers other outbuildings and offices connected with such works. On Feb. 11, 1909, the plaintiff commenced against the defendants, in the King's Bench Division, an action for damages in respect of injury which the defendants had by means of noxious and offensive fumes and vapours from their gasworks caused to the trees, shrubs, and grass on his property, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from continuing or repeating such injury, or committing any injury of a like kind. By an agreement, dated Oct. 8, 1909, and made between the plaintiff and defendants, it was agreed that the action should be discontinued; that the defendants at their own expense forthwith would close the openings in the walls of the retort house on the side next to the plaintiff's property and close the louvre or ventilator in the roof on the same side of the retort house; that in lieu of such opening and ventilator the defendants would construct metal ventilating shafts in the roof of the retort house and enlarge or reconstruct the louvre or ventilator on the south-west or opposite side of the retort house for the purpose of discharging into the air and diffusing by means of the shafts at a higher level and in a less direct method than the then method (so far as regarded the plaintiff's property) vapours or fumes which, according to the then construction of the retort house would pass through the circular openings and louvre so to be closed as aforesaid; and that the defendants would take other specified steps to abate the nuisance. Pursuant to that agreement that action was discontinued, the costs of the plaintiff thereof as between solicitor and client being paid by the defendants. At the date of the commencement of that action and at the date of the agreement a serious nuisance was being caused to the plaintiff and his property by reason of the noxious and offensive fumes and vapours which were being discharged by the defendants in connection with their gasworks over the plaintiff's property. The plaintiff alleged—but the defendants denied—that the defendants had failed or neglected to carry out the agreement in a number of respects. The plaintiff also alleged that since the agreement the defendants had been continuously and to an ever-increasing extent discharging from the gasworks over the plaintiff's property noxious and offensive fumes, vapours, and smoke, which, diffusing themselves over the plaintiff's property damaged and destroyed the trees, shrubs, and grass thereon, and destroyed or diminished the amenity of the property, and interfered with the ordinary comfort, and were dangerous to the health, of the occupiers of the premises. The defendants' area of supply was extended by the Conway Gas Act, 1909, and the defendants, with a view to meeting the increasing demand for gas which had arisen within their original area of supply, and to the extension of such area by that Act, were altering and enlarging their gasworks so as to enable them to manufacture gas in quantities nearly double, as the plaintiff alleged, the quantity which the gasworks in their present condition were capable of manufacturing. The alteration and enlargement was being proceeded with rapidly, and, the plaintiff alleged, the defendants intended so soon as the same was completed to manufacture gas in much increased quantities, with the result that the nuisance already being caused would be seriously increased. In the circumstances aforesaid serious loss and damage had been, was being, and would be suffered by the plaintiff. The plaintiff accordingly brought this action against the defendants, claiming by his statement of claim an injunction to restrain the defendants, their officers, servants, workmen, and agents from carrying on or permitting to be carried on upon the gasworks the business or undertaking of manufacturers of gas so as or in such manner as by the discharge of noxious or offensive fumes or vapours or otherwise to cause a nuisance or injury to the plaintiff's property or to the plaintiff or the members of his family or his servants occupying the same. The plaintiff also claimed damages. By their defence the defendants admitted that they intended so soon as the alteration and enlargement of the gasworks were completed to manufacture such increased quantity of gas as might be required for the purpose of meeting the demand for gas in their original area of supply and their extended area of supply. But they denied that any nuisance had been or was now being occasioned or would be caused or occasioned to the plaintiff or his property or at all by anything done or omitted to be done by them, or that serious or any loss or damage either had been or was being or would be suffered by the plaintiff by reason of anything done or omitted to be done by them. The defendants also stated that as the owners of the gasworks undertaking they had exercised and carried out and were exercising and carrying out and intended to exercise and carry out their statutory powers and duties in a reasonable and proper manner and with due care and skill and without any negligence, and that if in fact any injury or damage had been or was being or would be caused to the plaintiff by reason of anything done or omitted to be done by the defendants (which was denied) the defendants would submit that such injury or damage could not have been and could not now or in the future be avoided by any reasonably practicable care on the part of the defendants; and that the plaintiff had no right or cause of action based on such alleged injury or damage if any. JOYCE, J., granted to the plaintiff an injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying on their gasworks in such a manner as to cause a nuisance to the plaintiff or his property. The defendants appealed.

COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of JOYCE, J., who has granted an injunction in the usual form restraining the defendant corporation, who have acquired certain gas works, from so conducting their works as to cause a nuisance to the plaintiff's property.

The plaintiff is the owner and occupier of a house called Bodlondeb at Conway. So far as I can see it is in a little park. The house itself is at a distance of some 400 yards or 500 yards from the gasworks. Some time ago a plantation of trees was planted, obviously to screen off the gasworks from the house. The plantation, or belt of trees goes right up to the fence or wall dividing the plaintiff's property from the gasworks. Originally the gasworks had a small number of the retorts which occasion the most injurious part of the nuisance complained of by the plaintiff, and the retort house was situated at a corner most distant from the plaintiff's property. Afterwards the defendants changed the position of the retort house, but it was still small. They have recently enlarged it, and have done that on the part of their premises immediately adjacent to the plaintiff's property and the plantation. The enlarged retort house will accommodate, and will in practice, when everything is finished, be worked by, I think, forty retorts. That is a very much larger number than the old house could contain. There were disputes some two or three years ago between the parties, and an agreement was then come to, reference to which might possibly have been objected to on the ground of its having been without prejudice to the rights of the parties in the event of further disputes. But it has been referred to by both sides, and it is quite clear that the effect of that agreement was that any claim for wrong before the date of it was given up, and the defendants thereby undertook to do certain things, which, to put it quite plainly, they have not done. They have enlarged the retort house, have not stopped up the louvres, but have left them quite open on to the plaintiff's ground, and they have not, I think, by any manner of means erected the ventilating shafts which by the agreement they undertook to erect. Before these extension works were commenced, or after they had been slightly proceeded with, the plaintiff complained of the nuisance, and said that the space was not sufficient; that the defendants' extension would be immediately next to his boundary and his plantation; and that the defendants ought to do their objectionable work elsewhere, as they had plenty of other land available. I only mention that to show that there was no undue conduct on the part of the plaintiff, which ought to deprive him of such rights as he has.

According to the finding of the learned judge in the court below, and according to the facts which have been either admitted at the Bar, or established by the evidence, how does the case stand? The facts are that the fumes, the smell, and the vapour come, as obviously they must, in large quantities from the gasworks on to the plantation or belt of trees immediately adjoining the plaintiff's house, the prevailing wind being from the west, and, therefore, blowing directly on to the plaintiff's property. It is said that there are days when the wind does not blow from the west. Of course there are, but the prevailing wind being in the direction which takes the fumes and smell and smoke on to the plantation, the evidence is quite clear that the belt of trees is to some extent injured. There are some trees actually dead; others are dying, and others are so decayed that unless something is done to stop the nuisance I am satisfied that this plantation will cease to be a plantation in the course of a few years. One of the defendant's own witnesses in his evidence in chief admitted that this belt of trees was in a very sickly condition. He said that he did not like the look of the trees and would not himself like a belt of that kind to be in that condition, and that these trees looked very different from any other trees in the neighbourhood. I cannot bring myself to doubt that the effect of the defendant's gasworks upon the plantation and upon the trees, is at the present moment by no means unsubstantial, and unless it is stopped in some way it will become so substantial as in fact to destroy the plantation as a plantation. Then it is said, and we have heard a great deal of argument on this point, that the nuisance does not extend to the house where the plaintiff resides. Of course it does not. The plaintiff has never alleged that it did. But it is in evidence that the fumes, the smoke and the smell come far over the belt of trees. I care not for the present purpose whether the distance covered is 100 yards or 200 yards, because when the wind is favourable the emanations must come right over the plantation, and to some extent into the plaintiff's park. The grass in the park is let to a tenant, and in that sense the plaintiff is, of course, not in actual occupation of the grass land. But he is in actual occupation of the plantation. If and when he goes to that part of his property he will personally feel the effects of the smell and the dirt which will be found there, and it seems to me one cannot disregard that. But some of the most eloquent pieces of evidence that we have had are the actual exhibits. They have not been challenged at all, and anybody who looks at these exhibits would be rather surprised that junior counsel for the defendants, arguing with great courage, should have objected to the word "black" as applied to the trees, or in fact, to the words "very very black." I should be disposed myself to adopt all three of those epithets as applicable to these trees, the exhibits being, as I presume, fair specimens of the trees, in that portion of the belt.

I cannot doubt, and I do not think that anyone can doubt, that there is by reason of the acts of the defendants a serious, growing, and permanent injury to the plaintiff's property. We have heard a great deal about it being temporary. That argument seems to me to have nothing whatever to do with the case. This is not the case of the man who might give up his business next week. It is the case of a corporation who are the successors of a Parliamentary gas company, and, as is quite clear when one looks at the Act of Parliament, it is a corporation which is under Parliamentary obligation to supply gas by its works to its customers.

It is said that importance must be attached to the hardship that will be caused to the defendants if the plaintiff's claim is given effect to. First of all they say that they cannot cure or abate the nuisance. The learned judge in the court below in his judgment stated that he did not believe that. He thought that the defendants could abate the nuisance, and I share his belief. But whether they can or cannot is, to my mind, an irrelevant observation. They are now committing that which is a legal wrong. They are threatening and intending to continue it. There is no element of temporary nuisance here. It is about as permanent a nuisance, according to the defendants' own case, as I ever heard of. That being so, the case seems to me to resolve itself into this: Ought this court to exercise the discretion given to it by Lord Cairns' Act [Chancery Amendment Act, 1858: repealed, but jurisdiction preserved by Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, s. 5; Statute Law Revision Act, 1898, s. 1; and Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, s. 16, now Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 18]—or by the new procedure which is treated for all purposes as identical with Lord Cairns' Act—in favour of the defendants, and say that they ought to be at liberty to buy the right to continue this nuisance to an indefinite extent and for an indefinite time? Or ought this court to say that the settled principle of the court before Lord Cairns' Act ought to be applied—namely, that where there is a legal wrong threatened to be continued the court ought as a matter of course to grant an injunction? JOYCE, J., has thought it is a proper case for an injunction. The 40s. that he gave as damages was obviously not the measure of the damage which the plaintiff had suffered. I can see no reason whatever why we should differ from that view. I do not see how it is possible to measure the damage in a case of this kind with any certainty or with any satisfaction. The plaintiff might bring a fresh action, and a fresh question might arise on each occasion of this kind: Is the damage which is now occasioned, it may be by an increase of the works, covered or not by the sum of money which was paid by the defendants to the plaintiff under the order of the court in satisfaction of the entire nuisance and depreciation of the plaintiff's property? I think that the observations made by LORD CAMPBELL in the House of Lords in Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Broadbent (1) (7 H.L.Cas. at p. 610) are not very much in point here. He indicates the exceeding difficulty of having a succession of actions whenever a nuisance exists—yearly or two yearly actions. Although to some extent that difficulty is got over by the power the court now has to assess the present damages to the property by the works, I do not think that does by any means entirely remove the force of those observations. I think that the learned judge in the court below was perfectly justified in the view that he took in this case, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—In my opinion this appeal fails. I only wish to add a word on the question of law which has been argued, and upon the decision in Sturges v. Bridgman (2) which has been used as the foundation of the argument. Setting aside for a moment the question of injury to the herbage, and setting the two little cottages at Twthill out of consideration, counsel for the defendants has argued that, assuming the noxious fumes are discharged upon the plaintiff's land, there is no cause of action, because there is no house within, say, 200 yards of the gasworks, and consequently there is no occupier who can suffer by the nuisance. That argument to my mind, is wholly unsound. The true rule of law, I apprehend, is that if any owner of property, be it a house, or a garden, or a park, or anything else, not necessarily a house or structure at all, is so substantially injured in the reasonable enjoyment of his property that he sustains that which is equivalent to a legal nuisance, he is entitled to an injunction to restrain the continuance of that nuisance.

It will be obvious that if the argument for the defendants is sound these things follow. Suppose that a man loses all his tenants by reason of the existence of a nuisance and cannot get another tenant he is without remedy, because there is no occupier, meaning that there is no person resident in the house with a nose to smell or with ears capable of being offended by noise. This also follows, that if he has no house upon his land, and erects a house and tries to get a tenant and cannot, then he is without remedy because he is without an occupier of his house, and because he could not get an occupier by reason of the existence of the nuisance. That argument is based on the decision in Sturges v. Bridgman (2). Now the decision in that case was this. It is perfectly true that this court there said that the nuisance up to the time when the physician built his consulting room at the bottom of the garden in Wimpole Street was not actionable. On that counsel for the defendants has founded himself. That I think rested upon this—that so long as the back garden in Wimpole Street was used as a garden the vibration was no nuisance, and the vibration was immaterial. The point of the case was not that the consulting room was a house, and that you could not have a nuisance except in connection with a house. The point was that until a house existed there was no nuisance, because the vibration and the noise were not such as, upon property which was used as a garden, constituted a legal nuisance at all.

It is, however, quite obvious that that is not the present case. If the facts are that persons who walk in the plaintiff's meadow or in his spinney or plantation, which is adjacent to the gasworks, are offended now in their noses or otherwise by the noxious fumes sent over the land, the owner of the property and the occupier of the property are injured, and none the less because there is not a house there. It is not necessary to have a house to be offended by a smell. The right to an injunction results, if the reasonable enjoyment of the property is affected by the nuisance. Moreover, I have no doubt myself that the owner, as distinguished from the occupier, may sue, and obtain an injunction in respect of a nuisance which substantially affects the value of his property. You are not necessarily to regard the property only in the condition in which it is now. It is quite settled in cases of light, as will be remembered in LORD WESTBURY'S decision in Jackson v. Duke of Newcastle (3) that the question whether the enjoyment of light was only such enjoyment as the plaintiff had been utilising in the occupation of his house is not the test. He may alter the user of his house and may want to enjoy lights for larger and for special purposes, and he is entitled to do so. It is true that that is a case in which the plaintiff is asserting affirmatively a right of property, and no doubt there is a distinction in that respect between that case and this, where the plaintiff is asserting negatively a right to protect his property from sulphur. But I do not think that there is any difference in point of principle. In point of principle the plaintiff is entitled to say that this is his property as it is now, or as he is entitled to use it hereafter, and that it is one which is injuriously affected by the nuisance that the defendants are committing, and in respect of that the value of his property is affected. In respect of that, I think, the plaintiff is entitled to sue.

On the facts, I do not think that I want to say anything. It is quite indisputable that there are noxious fumes or smells from these gasworks. It is not disputed that the effect upon the trees is substantial, but as a matter of money the damage is not a large amount. That, however, is not the measure of the damage at all. The fact is that these fumes are so discharged over the land that the land is rendered less capable of beneficial enjoyment for the purposes for which the plaintiff is entitled to enjoy it, and in respect of that it seems to me he is entitled to enjoy, and in respect of that it seems to me he is entitled to sue. I may also add that as regards the reasonable action by the plaintiff, it is quite plain that from 1909 onwards he has been raising objections to the way in which these works were conducted, that notwithstanding the agreement that was come to in 1909 the defendants did not comply with the obligations which they then undertook to discharge with regard to stopping or abating the nuisance. They, after his protest, deliberately built the additional retort house, leaving the louvres open so that the fumes from the old retort house and the enlarged retort house, which now form one building, could escape through the louvres. They enlarged their building with notice of his objection, and thereby so brought about the present state of things. It does not lie in their mouth to say that they will be exposed to considerable expense, after erecting their additional buildings, and it may be they have to go elsewhere. If the result is an unfortunate one for them they have brought it on themselves. Upon the facts therefore it seems to me there is an abundant case of nuisance made out; and I think the plaintiff is entitled to sue and is entitled to the injunction which he has obtained.

CHANNELL, J.—I entirely agree with the judgments that have been delivered. I should like to say a few words upon the point that impressed me most in the present case. I entirely accept the findings of the learned judge in the court below upon the facts, and as far as the evidence has been read to us, I think that it supports those findings and certainly shows no ground whatever for differing from them. Assuming those facts, the only real question that seems to me to be fairly open to doubt is whether it is a case in which the court could properly exercise its discretion and give damages in lieu of an injunction. As to that, the effect of such an order when it is made is that the court gives compensation in advance for the continuance of the injury or damage complained of which it is declining to prevent by refusing an injunction. It is easy to do that when you have got a case of a building which obstructs light, or a wall or a sewer or something of that sort, which encroaches on a neighbour's land. Those cases are easy to deal with. But here what is complained of is a nuisance arising by the process of making gas, and if the works are altered, or if the process of manufacturing gas was changed, the question will always arise whether the damage that is then being done after the alteration, is the damage which was compensated for under the order of the court. It seems to me that in a case such as the present, it is not only impossible fairly to assess the damages, but it is also impossible to foresee exactly what will be done in the future that will cause damage; and, secondly, it is a case in which you cannot reasonably act upon the discretion of the court. In the present case one would be inclined to do it if it were practicable, because I think that it is the fact that the damage that will be done to the defendants by this injunction is, measured pecuniarily, far in excess of the damage to the plaintiff by the continuance of the nuisance. But that is not at all enough to enable the court to make such an order as this to do justice between the parties. On those grounds which have impressed me principally, I think that it is impossible to accede to suggestion that the court should make such an order. I agree, therefore, that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Practice—Service on foreign company—Carrying on of business by foreign corporation in this country—Test—Agents in England booking freight and selling passenger tickets—Remuneration by commission—Service on agents—Validity—R.S.C., Ord. 9, r. 8.

The test whether a foreign corporation is carrying on business in this country through an agent is whether the agent, in carrying on the corporation's business, makes a contract for the corporation, or whether the agent, in carrying on his own business, sells a contract with the foreign corporation. In the former case the foreign corporation is, and in the latter case it is not, carrying on business in this country.

A firm in England issued tickets, made contracts for the carriage of passengers and their luggage and goods, and booked freight for goods in steamers belonging to a foreign corporation. They were paid by the corporation on a commission basis plus an annual lump sum to cover rent, clerks and office expenses. An English writ against the foreign corporation having been served on a member of the firm in England, the foreign corporation applied to set it aside on the ground that it (the corporation) did not reside or carry on business within the jurisdiction.

Held: the foreign corporation was carrying on business within the jurisdiction because the English firm made contracts for the foreign corporation, and the writ had been properly served within R.S.C., Ord. 9, r. 8, since the foreign corporation was served by service on the firm or on a member of the firm.

Appeal by the defendants from an order of LORD COLERIDGE, J., sitting at chambers, reversing an order of MASTER CHITTY. The plaintiffs served a writ on the defendants in an action against the defendants at the place of business in London of the defendants' agents, Marcus Samuel & Co. on a member of that firm, M. Levy. On an application by the defendants to have the service set aside, COLERIDGE, J., held that they were carrying on business at the premises of their agents. The facts are set out in the judgment of BUCKLEY, L.J.

Leck, K.C., and Alexander Neilson for the defendants.

Leslie Scott, K.C., and Dunlop for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 7, 1914. BUCKLEY, L.J., read the following judgment: If contracts have been habitually made for a reasonably substantial period of time at a fixed place of business within the jurisdiction by a firm or a person there, without referring each time to the foreign corporation for instructions, and with the result that the foreign corporation has become bound to another party, then the foreign corporation for the present purpose carries on business at that place. This, in my opinion, is the result of the decisions, of which most have been cited in this case. A foreign corporation can be served within the jurisdiction if it is found here. It is found here if it is carrying on business here. The difficult question in all these cases is to say whether the corporation is carrying on business here or not. I expressed my opinion on this matter so recently in Okura & Co., Ltd. v. Forsbacka Jernverks Akt. (1) that I shall not repeat that which I there said. I think it unnecessary to deal with the cases again.

The facts here are that for ten years (which is a substantial time) at a defined place (namely, Nos. 25 and 27, Bishopsgate Street) Messrs. Marcus Samuel & Co. in a separate part of the building, by a separate staff of clerks, and with the use of special notepaper bearing the name of the Austrian Lloyd Company, have issued tickets and made contracts for the carriage of passengers and their luggage and goods by steamers belonging to the Austrian Lloyd Company, and have on behalf of and in the name of the Austrian Lloyd Company insured luggage or goods, and have advertised in England the sailings of the Austrian Lloyd steamers. In the defendants' handbook, under the head of "General Agencies, London," the address of 25 and 27, Bishopsgate Street is given, not mentioning Marcus Samuel & Co.'s name. That address is there treated as the address of the general agency of the defendants in London. By way of contrast there will be found at p. 38, under the head of "Ticket Agencies," the names of Thos. Cook & Son, Hickie, Borman & Co., and the International Sleeping Car Co., who, on the face of the document, appear to have a limited authority as agents to issue tickets as distinguished from the general agency, which is in Marcus Samuel & Co. The letter of appointment of Oct. 29, 1904, constituted Marcus Samuel & Co. agents general for the defendants at a 5 per cent. commission on tickets sold in Marcus Samuel & Co.'s office, and 2 per cent. on tickets sold by other passenger agencies in England, and a lump sum of £480 a year was payable for rent, clerks, and office expenses. Messrs. Hickie, Borman & Co. are in that letter mentioned as persons who are to continue as passenger agents, and it is provided that their accounts shall be rendered and settled monthly with Marcus Samuel & Co. Under the relations between Marcus Samuel & Co. and the defendants, a very large business has for ten years past been carried on at Nos. 25 and 27, Bishopsgate Street in making contracts between passengers and merchants on the one hand, and the defendants on the other.

Under these circumstances, I hold as a matter of fact that this business, as carried on at Nos. 25 and 27, Bishopsgate Street, has been not the business of Marcus Samuel & Co., but the business of the defendants, conducted by that firm as their agents. If this is right, it follows that the defendants, a foreign corporation, carry on business here. There are cases, no doubt, in which a railway company or a shipping company, or a theatre or other place of entertainment may sell tickets at numerous places without its resulting that they carry on their business at those places. Each case must be judged on its own facts. The test in each case is to find the answer to the following question: Does the agent, in carrying on the foreign corporation's business, make a contract for the foreign corporation, or does the agent, in carrying on the agent's own business, sell a contract with the foreign corporation? In the former case the corporation is and in the latter it is not carrying on business at that place. Marcus Samuel & Co. do the former; Thomas Cook & Son do the latter.

As a second point it was argued that, assuming that the defendants were carrying on business in Bishopsgate Street, the person served was not the "head officer" within Order 9, r. 8. There seems to me here to be a misapprehension. If Marcus Samuel & Co. were the agents carrying on the business, they were the proper persons to be served. The service on one member of the firm is service on the firm, for each member is agent for every other. In such a case, there is no question of "head officer" as distinguished from subordinate officer. The foreign corporation is served by service on the firm, or some member of the firm. The members of the firm are for this purpose the natural persons who in this country represent the foreign corporation. The service on Mr. Levy, I think, was right. The result, therefore, is that this appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—I agree. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Sargant, J.), March 11, 24, 1915]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Assignment—Covenant not to assign or sub-let without consent—Covenant running with the land.

By a sub-lease made in 1899 the lessors demised to the lessees certain ground and
C premises for the residue of a term of ninety-nine years less ten days, and the lessees covenanted, inter alia, that they would not "at any time during the said term assign or sub-let the said demised premises or any part thereof." Under the sub-lease, the expression "the lessors" was to include their executors, administrators and assigns, and the expression "the lessees" was to include their executors and administrators. Later in 1899, the lessees, having obtained a licence to assign from D the lessors, assigned the demised premises to the S. company. In 1915 that company desired to assign the demised premises to another company.

Held: there was a general presumption that a covenant restricting assignment ran with the land, and, although "assigns" of the lessees were not mentioned in the covenant in the sub-lease, there was not sufficient indication of intention that the covenant should not run with the land; accordingly, the S. company could not assign
E the demised premises without the consent of the lessors.

Originating Summons. This was a summons in an action for executing the trusts of a debenture stock deed executed by Robert Stephenson & Co., Ltd., seeking a declaration that the defendant company, Robert Stephenson & Co., Ltd., might assign a sub-lease dated July 24, 1899, and made between the lessors, J. Hall, deceased and Hilton Philipson, deceased, of the one part and the lessees, Sir J. W. Pease, Bart., M.P., and Sir Christopher Furness, Kt., both since deceased, of the other part without the licence or consent of the lessors or their respective executors, administrators, and assigns. Under the sub-lease, certain ground and premises were demised to the lessees for the residue of a term of ninety-nine years from March, 1881, granted by a lease dated May 1, 1883, less the last ten days thereof. By cl. 9 of the sub-lease:—

"The lessees will not at any time during the said term assign or sub-let the said demised premises or any part thereof or use the same as an inn, beerhouse, or spirit shop, or for the retail sale of any intoxicating liquor, nor shall any gunpowder, petroleum, or other explosive thing be manufactured or stored, &c."

And by cl. 13: "The expression 'the lessors' used herein shall, where the context so admits, include besides the said J. Hall and H. Philipson, their respective executors, administrators, and assigns, and the expression 'the lessees' used in these parts shall, where the context so admits, include, besides the said Sir Joseph Whitwell Pease, Bart., M.P., and Sir Christopher Furness, Kt., their respective executors and administrators."

By an indenture dated Aug. 21, 1899 (hereinafter called "the assignment"), and made between the lessees of the one part and Robert Stephenson & Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called "the company"), of the other part, the lessees assigned to the company the hereditaments and premises comprised in and demised by the sub-lease for all the residue then unexpired of the term of ninety years less the last ten days thereof, subject to the rent reserved by the sub-lease and to the covenants, reservations, and conditions therein contained, and on the part of the lessees to be observed and performed. The lessors by a licence dated Aug. 21, 1899, consented to the assignment, provided that that consent should not authorise any further or other assigning or sub-letting of the demised premises or any part thereof without their consent in writing, or prejudice or affect the personal liability of the lessees, their executors and administrators under any of the covenants, conditions, or provisions contained in the sub-lease. By an indenture dated Feb. 19, 1900 (hereinafter called "the sub-demise"), and made between the company of the one part and Sir David Dale and Sir Lindsay Wood (hereinafter called "the trustees") of the other part, the company demised unto the trustees (inter alia) the leasehold hereditaments comprised in the sub-lease for all the residue then unexpired of the term of ninety years granted by the sub-lease less the last twelve days thereof, subject (inter alia) to the covenants, reservations, and conditions therein contained. The lessors, by a licence dated Aug. 21, 1899, consented to the sub-demise, provided that the consent should not authorise any further or other assigning or sub-letting of the demised premises or any part thereof without their consent in writing. The sub-demise was granted to the trustees in the capacity of trustees for the holder of an issue of £250,000 debenture stock created by the company. By an order made on July 9, 1909, in the action a receiver was appointed on behalf of the holders of the stock of certain property and assets of the company, including (inter alia) the leasehold hereditaments and premises comprised in the term granted by the sub-lease. Palmer's Shipbuilding and Iron Co., Ltd. (herein called "the shipbuilding company") entered into a tenancy agreement with the receiver, dated Oct. 7, 1910, for a tenancy for two and a half years of the shipyard works and dock belonging to the company, with an option of purchasing certain assets of the company including the premises comprised in the sub-lease for a sum payable in cash or, at the option of the shipbuilding company, a larger sum payable by the issue of debenture stock of a company to be incorporated under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1898. By an order dated Nov. 14, 1910, the tenancy agreement was sanctioned by the court. On Sept. 28, 1912, the shipbuilding company gave notice of exercising the option of purchasing the premises for the larger sum, payable by the issue of debenture stock of a company incorporated on June 5, 1912, in pursuance of the agreement, and called Palmer's Hebburn Co., Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as "the Hebburn Co."). The completion of the sale was delayed by reason of a question which arose with regard to the proposed assignment to the Hebburn Co. of the residue of the term of the sub-lease. The legal personal representatives of the lessors claimed that the company could not assign the residue of the term of the sub-lease without committing a breach of the covenant against assigning. The company contended that the covenant did not affect them, and was limited to the lessees and their respective executors and administrators. The owner of the reversion expectant on the determination of the sub-lease consented to grant his license to assign or sub-demise the premises to the Hebburn Company.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 23, 1915. SARGANT, J.—This summons, as amended, raises the question whether the assignees of the leasehold interest under an indenture of sub-lease, dated July 24, 1899, are entitled to assign that interest without the licence or consent of their under lessors for the time being. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, and also certain facts as to a deed of waiver to which the original lessors were parties. After stating the argument as to this, which, he said, was not borne out by the terms of the documents referred to, HIS LORDSHIP continued:] So far as the covenant against assignment is concerned, the rights of the lessors and lessees for the time being under the sub-lease have to be ascertained merely from the terms of the sub-lease itself.

The argument of counsel for the plaintiff was, as I understood it, first, that in general a covenant restricting assignment where the assigns of the lessee are not expressly mentioned does not run with the land; and, secondly, that, however this may be in general, the language of this sub-lease contained sufficient indications of intention that the covenant should be personal only, and not run with the land. As to the first point, Williams v. Earle (1) is, of course, an express and binding authority at the present day that a covenant restricting assignment, where the assigns of the lessee are expressly mentioned, does run with the land. And it would be necessary, therefore, for the success of counsel's first argument, to throw covenants restricting assignment into that very narrow class of covenants supposed to have been indicated by the first two rules in Spencer's Case (2), which just sufficiently touch the land to run with it if assigns are mentioned, but to fail to run with it if assigns are not mentioned. But the only covenants of that class mentioned in the first two rules in Spencer's Case (2), are covenants with regard to things not in esse at the time of the demise, such as buildings to be erected afterwards; and, since Minshull v. Oakes (3), this distinction itself must be considered as having been obliterated, as being unreasonable. Further, though the actual decision in Williams v. Earle (1), was only with regard to covenants restricting assignment in which assigns are mentioned, the reasoning of BLACKBURN, J., deals with the broad question whether a covenant restricting assignment touches and concerns the land, and this reasoning is, therefore, applicable to either form of covenant. Certainly covenants restricting assignment touch and concern the land as much as covenants to reside on the premises (Tatem v. Chaplin (4)), or covenants to buy liquors from a particular firm (White v. Southend Hotel Co. (5)); and these covenants have been held to run with the land, although assigns were not expressly named. Further, in Goldstein v. Sanders (6), EVE, J., has expressed the view that, on the balance of the authorities, a covenant not to assign without the consent of the landlord runs with the land, and binds the assigns though not mentioned.

But although covenants restricting assignment may in general be capable of running, and be construed as running, with the land, it will be otherwise if the parties indicate an intention that they should not so run. Here it is said that such an intention is indicated, first, because the covenant does not merely restrict, but absolutely prohibits assignment, so that there can never have been in the contemplation of the parties any assignee to be bound; and, secondly, because, in the definition in the sub-lease, the word "lessees," as contrasted with the word "lessors," is not stated to include assigns. In support of the former of these two arguments, Whitchcot v. Fox (7), was cited. In that case, however, the covenant was to assign only to particular members of the original lessor's family, so that the covenant was obviously personal to the lessee himself, and not applicable after he had assigned; and the case, therefore, is no authority here. And some general remarks of WILMOT, C.J., in Bally v. Wells (8), at pp. 351–352, of that learned judge's OPINIONS AND JUDGMENTS, have, since Williams v. Earle (1), less importance than otherwise would be attached to them.

I have, therefore, to decide this matter on my view of the meaning of the sub-lease. And here it seems to me that the indications above mentioned against the covenant running with the land are entirely outweighed by other considerations. The sub-lease was for a period of some seventy-two years; and the special language from which it is sought to show that the covenant against assignment did not run with the land applies equally to all the other covenants in the sub-lease, such as those to pay rent, to pay outgoings, to repair, to allow entry, and so on. It is inconceivable that, under such circumstances, the parties intended that there should never be any assignment or under-leasing at all during the whole of the seventy-two years; or that, in case of assignment, the assignee should be free from the whole of the obligations of the lease, unless he undertook them de novo. No doubt it was contemplated that the lessees would from time to time apply to the lessors to waive the prohibition against assignment; and that thus the same results would follow as if the more usual form preventing assignments without consent had been used which merely prohibits assignments without consent; and, no doubt, also the word "assigns" was omitted from the definition of "lessees" in the lease in view of this prohibition, and on the same ground on which the phrase "permitted assigns" is sometimes introduced into such clauses—namely, a not unnatural, but unfounded, apprehension that the recognition of the possibility of there being assigns might be held to be inconsistent with the prohibition or restriction of assignment.

In my judgment, therefore, there is not enough in the special language of the sub-lease to negative what I have found to be the general presumption—namely, that a covenant restricting assignment runs with the land; and I declare that the lessees are not entitled to assign or sub-let without consent of their lessors.

BESTERMANN v. BRITISH MOTOR CAB CO., LTD., AND ANOTHER

[COURT OF APPEAL (Vaughan Williams, Kennedy and Swinfen Eady, L.JJ.), February 13, 1914]

[Reported [1914] 3 K.B. 181; 83 L.J.K.B. 1014; 110 L.T. 754; 30 T.L.R. 319; 58 Sol. Jo. 319]

Costs—"Bullock order"—Two defendants—Plaintiff successful against one defendant—Test whether unsuccessful defendant should be ordered to pay costs of successful defendant—Reasonableness of joinder of defendants.

The plaintiff claimed damages from the two defendants for personal injuries incurred in a collision between a cab and an omnibus. The jury found in favour of the plaintiff against the first defendants, and in favour of the second defendants against the plaintiff. The first defendants had before the trial informed the second defendants, but not the plaintiff, that they would hold the second defendants liable; by their defence they did not, but at the trial they did, try to throw the blame on the second defendants. LORD COLERIDGE, J., held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the first defendants the costs which he was liable to pay to the second defendants.

Held: it was not necessary, for an unsuccessful defendant to escape the obligation to pay a successful co-defendant's costs, to have declared that he did not intend to throw any blame on his co-defendant; the proper test whether an unsuccessful defendant should bear the costs payable by the plaintiff to a successful defendant was whether in the circumstances of the case the plaintiff had acted reasonably in joining both defendants; in the present case LORD COLERIDGE, J., had exercised his discretion rightly, and his order must stand.

Appeal by the defendants, the British Motor Cab Co., Ltd., from a decision of LORD COLERIDGE, J.

The plaintiff issued a writ, dated Feb. 19, 1912, against the British Motor Cab Co., Ltd., and the London General Omnibus Co., Ltd., claiming damages for injury to the plaintiff by the negligent driving of the defendants or their servants. By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that he had suffered damage by personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants, or of the servants of one or other of the defendants, while driving motor vehicles on Jan. 20, 1912. As particulars of negligence he alleged that the first-named defendants' servant drove a motor cab in which the plaintiff was a passenger at a furious rate and in a reckless manner down Ludgate Hill and into Ludgate Circus and kept no proper look-out at the intersection of the above-named thoroughfares, driving at a rate unsuitable and dangerous, and ran into a motor omnibus belonging to the second-named defendants. The servants of the defendants the London General Omnibus Co., Ltd., failed to keep a proper look-out while crossing the intersection of Ludgate Hill and Ludgate Circus, and the servants of each defendant were negligent in not avoiding the vehicle of the other defendant. The defendants the British Motor Cab Co., by their defence, denied that their servant was guilty of negligence, but made no reference to the other defendants. The defendants the London General Omnibus Co., by their defence, denied that they or their servants were guilty of negligence. They admitted the allegations contained in the statement of claim save in so far as they contained statements alleging negligence against or imputing liability to them. On Jan. 22, 1912, the general manager of the cab company wrote to the omnibus company saying that the cab company would hold the omnibus company liable for the damage done to the cab. On the same day the omnibus company informed the cab company that they would hold the cab company responsible for the damage done to the omnibus. On Jan. 23, the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the cab company that he would hold them responsible, and on Jan. 26, he sent a similar letter to the omnibus company. On Mar. 7, the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the cab company's solicitor asking whether he would admit liability, in which case he would discontinue the action against the other defendants. The cab company's solicitor answered that nothing had taken place which could occasion the question to be put whether his client admitted liability. At the trial of the action each defendant attempted to throw the blame for the collision on the other The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff as against the cab company with £750 damages, but found in favour of the omnibus company. After argument, LORD COLERIDGE, J., directed that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff against the cab company for £750 with costs, such costs to include all costs incurred against the cab company by reason of there being two defendants, and, further, the costs the plaintiff might have to pay the omnibus company. He further directed that judgment should be entered for the omnibus company with costs against the plaintiff. The cab company appealed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We have had cited to us two recently reported cases, in one of which—namely, Mulhern v. National Motor Cab Co., Ltd. (1)—there is a judgment of BANKES, J., which deals with the question of costs payable to a successful defendant by an unsuccessful defendant. BANKES, J., says that:

> "After the accident the plaintiff first complained to the London General Omnibus Co., and his solicitor applied for compensation from them, but they denied liability and said that the accident had been caused solely by the negligence of the taxi-cab driver. That being so, if in the end the jury had found that it was attributable to the negligence of the omnibus company, that company would have been within the recent authorities as to costs where there were co-defendants, because they had in effect invited the plaintiffs to join the motor cab company as co-defendants. On the refusal of the omnibus company to admit liability the plaintiff applied to the cab company, and they, while denying any liability on their own part, abstained from throwing the responsibility on the omnibus company. Was that mere abstention enough to take them out of the recent rule as to costs? In his Lordship's opinion it was not. He thought that for a defendant to escape the obligation to pay the plaintiff's costs against a co-defendant he must do something more than merely deny negligence on his own part; he must go so far as to say that he does not intend to throw any responsibility on the other defendant. If he made it clear that he did not intend to throw responsibility on the other defendant he could not be said to have invited the plaintiff to go on against the other defendant, but in the absence of a clear disclaimer the plaintiff was left in the same position as if the one defendant had contended that the other was to blame. The plaintiff, therefore, was entitled here to add to the costs which he recovered against the motor cab company the costs which he had to pay to the successful defendants, the omnibus company."

I say of that judgment the same that I say of the argument before us. They are really both of them based upon the old obligation to declare whether or not one person means to throw the blame on the other. So far as that is concerned, I do not think there is any such rule, and I do not believe that any such rule could be supported.

I looked at the other recent case, Vine v. National Motor Cab Co., Ltd. (2). That is a decision of BUCKNILL, J. He says that:

> "The question he had to consider was whether the proper order to make was that the plaintiff should recover from the unsuccessful defendants the costs which he would be compelled to pay to the London General Omnibus Co. who had been successful in the action as against him. In order to determine this question, he must consider what was the attitude taken up by the unsuccessful defendants. His Lordship reviewed the circumstances of the case, and said that when the plaintiff's solicitors wrote before action to the National Motor Cab Co. the latter in replying should have said something which would have been a guide to the plaintiff as to whether he ought to join the London General Omnibus Co. as the defendants or not. The plaintiff with his limited knowledge of the facts was entitled to bring an action against both the defendants, but the first defendants, when they were applied to by the plaintiff, ought to have said whether they alleged negligence against the omnibus company or not. There would be judgment for the plaintiff against the National Motor Cab Co. for £250 and costs, and judgment for the London General Omnibus Co. against the plaintiff with costs; such costs, however, must be paid to the plaintiff by the National Motor Cab Co."

Again, I say I cannot recognise any such duty as is put upon them there. This is based, as was the argument for the plaintiff in the present case, upon a hypothesis that you are entitled to ask a question and have information as to what is the view of one defendant, and what is the course to be taken in respect of the other defendant's liability. I recognise no such duty of any sort or kind. I gave, in the course of the argument, an instance to show that it would be utterly unreasonable; but I do not think my instance was quite as good as the instance which was given by counsel for the Motor Cab Co., who took the instance of a company, who could have only hearsay knowledge as to what took place, and necessarily must wait until the trial came, in order to know whether there was any ground for throwing liability upon the other defendant or not. I entirely reject the idea that there is the right to ask the question or the obligation to answer it.

That being so, I have to deal with this matter upon the basis of the judgment in the Court of Appeal in Bullock v. London General Omnibus Co. (3). I am going to read the judgment of the present Master of the Rolls in that case, because I think that puts—I will not call it a rule, because there is no positive rule—the test whether or not the unsuccessful defendant should have to bear the costs payable to the successful defendant by the plaintiff upon what I understand to be proper grounds. What COZENS-HARDY, L.J., said ([1907] 1 K.B. at p. 272) was:

> "The facts of the case are that there was a judgment for the plaintiff against the General Omnibus Co. and a judgment in favour of the other defendants. Costs followed in each case, but the question is what is the meaning that the learned judge was entitled to give to the term 'costs' in s. 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890? The Master of the Rolls has referred to the opinion of STIRLING, L.J., in giving judgment in Sanderson v. Blyth Theatre Co. ([1903] 2 K.B. at p. 543) that it includes costs which a particular party may be ordered to pay in the first instance, and then to have over against another; but I may refer also to the judgment of ROMER, L.J., in the same case in which he said (ibid. at p. 539):
> 'This jurisdiction has been frequently exercised in Chancery in proper cases, and can, of course, be exercised in the King's Bench Division. The costs so recovered over by the plaintiff are in no true sense damages, but are ordered to be paid by the unsuccessful defendant, on the ground that, in such an action as I am considering, those costs have been reasonably and properly incurred by the plaintiff as between him and the last-named defendant.'

That seems to me to be perfectly right; it has nothing to do with this fancied obligation. There had been a collision, and it arose under such circumstances that the injured person would naturally not have full information as to whose fault it was, but that it might have well been the fault of one or other or of both these people. Those being the circumstances of the case, it turns out after the trial that there was only one wrongdoer, and that that wrongdoer had been sued and successfully sued. Under these circumstances, was it a reasonable thing for the plaintiff in his action against a man who ultimately turns out to be in fact the wrongdoer to join the other defendant in order that the matter might be thoroughly threshed out? If, in the circumstances of the case, it was a reasonable thing to do, then he was entitled to add as part of the costs in bringing this reasonable action in which he reasonably joined this other person the costs of that other person who is found not to be at fault. Of course, the fact that there were two people who, upon the face of the transaction, might, either of them, have been guilty is what made it reasonable in the plaintiff when he brought this action to join both of these defendants, and, as it was part of the reasonable course of the action that he properly brought his action against a man who, it turned out, was a wrong defendant, I agree, under the circumstances, he ought to get the reasonable costs in that action in which both defendants were reasonably joined, although only one turned out to be the real defendant.

I would wish in most emphatic terms to protest against this idea of the right to ask the question: "Are you going to blame your co-defendant?" or the alternative is just as bad—though you do not ask him, he is under some sort of duty to express his view. The proper way is, not to join any defendant unreasonably. If the facts are such that it is reasonable to join two defendants, and reasonable to be in a state of uncertainty as to which of the two is the really guilty one, then it is reasonable that the costs of the action that you have launched against one of those defendants who has succeeded in defending himself should be borne by the one who is to blame. There is no rule in the matter; each case must turn upon its own circumstances. If it were said to me: "This is a discretion exercised by the judge and we must not interfere with his discretion," I do not agree at all. It turns on the facts of each case; and, in my judgment, if the facts of the case do not show any reasonable ground for suing both defendants and the learned judge makes the order that has been made in this case, it seems to me that, without interfering with his discretion at all in the facts of the case, I should have to overrule that order. In this particular case we have ample evidence from both defendants that it was reasonable to join them both, because each blamed the other. I do not say that they gave notice of their blaming, but, in fact, each, when the trial came off, tried to put the blame on the other. Under these circumstances I think it was a reasonable order, and I do not base this judgment on the ground of any rule referring to the costs.

KENNEDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion that this appeal fails on this question of costs. I think that the matter is simple, and without any great difficulty. The question is: Was the discretion, which the judge has in dealing with these costs, rightly exercised? When I say "rightly exercised," it has been now settled law for years that the Court of Appeal will not interfere where there is a discretionary power which is committed to the judge of first instance if there is material upon which that discretion may be judicially exercised and he has judicially exercised the discretion in the matter upon such materials. Here it is unquestionable, to my mind, that the question how these costs should be borne was a matter with which LORD COLERIDGE, J., had to deal, and in respect of which he had to exercise a discretion. They were costs in which he had a right to say: "Good cause has been shown to me why the plaintiff is entitled to add the costs which he is liable to pay to the successful defendant to the costs that he will recover against the unsuccessful defendant."

Was there material upon which he could come to the conclusion to which he came, using his discretion judicially? I think there was. I think, as my Lord has said—and, as I think, the facts show quite plainly—in a case of this kind of a night accident collision, with a man who is rendered insensible, as I understand, by the collision at the time, it is reasonable to join both defendants. I entirely agree that there is no rule. To my mind, directly you use the word "discretion," there cannot be a rule properly so called. There is no rule as to what in all cases all defendants should do. At the same

A time, I can quite conceive a case in which a not unimportant element in considering whether the judge has rightly exercised his discretion is whether or not one of the defendants has or has not made a particular statement with regard to liability. Take the case, for example, which is the easiest and the commonest case, of a man who has represented himself to be an authorised agent when in fact he is not. To my mind, business reasons as well as fairness would require in that case, if the matter was repudiated by B the principal, that the agent should be asked by the person with whom he has made a contract in the name of the principal: "Do you or do you not say that your principal gave you authority? Am I to be quite clear, if I go to trial against your principal in this case, that you are prepared to say that he, and not you, is liable?" But it is impossible to say that there is a rule according to which you can say what will compose reasonableness, as the result will vary in every case, and I strongly suspect that both my brethren C in the cases cited were really meaning to say on the facts in each particular case that it was a reasonable thing to do. Whether they were right or wrong, we are not considering, because, happily, neither of those cases are under appeal; but one must not press dicta quoted in that way beyond a reasonable limit, and I am quite willing to believe that that was the view really expressed in the language quoted to us. But, in my view, to lay down a rule in a matter of discretion is not right, and I do not think D that the learned judges intended to put forward that proposition. In the present case, as I have said, there was a night collision, and, in fact, when the judge had to deal with this question of costs, we find that each of the parties had been trying the case before him upon the basis that their success depended upon their proving the other side to have been to blame, and not on any question of inevitable accident, or anything of that kind. He also found that long before that they had intended to do that which they carried E out.

One word only with regard to Bullock v. London General Omnibus Co. (3). It is quite true that in that case COLLINS, M.R., said in terms ([1907] 1 K.B. at p. 269):

> "The common sense underlying this order is clear, because the learned judge when he made it had before him evidence that, owing to the attitude taken up by the General Omnibus Co., it was reasonable for the plaintiff to join the other defendants."

F The contention on behalf of the Motor Cab Co., is that, unless you can find something on the part of the defendant who is sought to be saddled with the costs which he has done or written or said to mislead the other side, he cannot be reasonably called upon to pay the costs which he has incurred in his defence, and that Bullock v. London General Omnibus Co. (3) is distinguishable. With great respect, I do not agree that in that case G the Master of the Rolls says that that is an artificial condition upon which exercising discretion in this way can alone be justified, and I should point out that in Bullock v. London General Omnibus Co. (3), the main question was whether there was or was not jurisdiction. That is expressly stated by the same learned judge, who was then Master of the Rolls (ibid. at p. 270):

> "In my opinion, the objection taken upon the ground of want of jurisdiction to H the order of the learned judge fails. Upon the merits, the order seems to me to be clearly right, and no argument has been brought before us to show that there was not."

So that it was not really a case which depended upon the merits, or, in other words, on good grounds for the exercise of the discretion, but was, as the Master of the Rolls—who has used the words to which I have just referred in regard to the merits—said:

I

> "I heard no argument to contest the proposition that the merits were quite in favour of the exercise of the learned judge's discretion."

In my opinion, this appeal fails.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Under the Judicature Act and the rules the court has full discretion over the costs of such an action as the present, and it has jurisdiction to order the plaintiff to pay the costs of a defendant against whom the action fails, and to recover the costs so paid from the defendant against whom the action has succeeded, and whose conduct has necessitated the action. That was a jurisdiction which was exercised in Chancery, and the old method of exercising it was by ordering the plaintiff to pay the costs of the successful defendant and then recover the costs so paid, together with his own, from the unsuccessful defendant. Subsequently, to avoid circuity, orders were made whereby one defendant was directly ordered to pay the costs of a co-defendant. But there were difficulties in the way of so doing that where the action was tried with a jury, and, therefore, it was open to a judge to follow the old practice—which has been done in the present case—to order the plaintiff to pay the costs of the defendant who succeeded, and then direct him to recover them over as his own costs against the defendant who has failed.

The ground upon which it was put by ROMER, L.J., in Sanderson v. Blyth Theatre Co. (4), was that the costs were in no true sense damages. The costs are ordered to be paid by the unsuccessful defendant on the ground that, in such an action as I am considering, those costs have been reasonably and properly incurred by the plaintiff as between him and the last-named defendant. It was pointed out by the present Master of the Rolls that that was really the ground upon which Bullock v. London General Omnibus Co. (3), proceeded, because in Bullock's Case (3), COZENS-HARDY, L.J., quotes with approval the passage I have just read from Sanderson v. Blyth Theatre Co. (4), and says this ([1907] 14 B. at p. 272):

> "That was the principle adopted by the learned judge in this case, and, in my opinion, he had ample jurisdiction to make the order and good ground for the exercise of his discretion in making it."

Applying that to the facts of this particular case, it is a case in which there was a collision between a motor cab and a bus, and the plaintiff was injured. Each—that is to say, the motor cab company and the bus company—blamed the other for the collision. They wrote letters the same day, which have been read to us, each blaming the other for the collision, and, after certain repairs had been done to the cab, the cab company sent in a formal claim against the bus company to repay the expenses so incurred. At the trial, when the matter was tried out, each side threw the blame on the other, and alleged that it was the negligence of the servants of the other company which had caused the accident. Under these circumstances the learned judge had the facts before him, and said that the costs were to be paid by the defendant whose conduct had necessitated the action. In substance, that is what his order was—the unsuccessful defendant was to pay the costs of the plaintiff and of the successful defendant. It does seem to me that that was essentially a just and proper order to make. There was a collision, the plaintiff said; in his claim he alleged injury to him so caused by the negligence of the defendants, or one of them. It was obviously convenient that those two claims should be combined in one action arising out of the same set of circumstances and be tried together, and, in my opinion, it is in the interests of justice that the person who fails in an action brought under these circumstances should pay the costs occasioned by his negligence, including the costs reasonably and properly incurred by bringing the other defendant before the court.

Appeal dismissed.

HOLLINSHEAD v. HAZLETON

[House of Lords (Lord Atkinson, Lord Shaw, Lord Parker of Waddington and Lord Sumner), November 11, 12, 19, December 10, 1915]

B [Reported [1916] 1 A.C. 428; 85 L.J.P.C. 60; 114 L.T. 292; 32 T.L.R. 177; [1916] H.B.R. 85]

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Salary of member of Parliament—Attachment for benefit of creditors—Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict., c. 58), s. 51.

C On June 17, 1914, judgment was obtained against the respondent for £2156, being the taxed costs, with interest, of an election petition, which resulted in the respondent being unseated in 1911 as member of Parliament for North Louth. He was subsequently elected member of Parliament for North Galway, but resigned his seat, and on June 5, 1914, was, on his own petition, adjudicated bankrupt. On July 28, 1915, he was re-elected for North Galway, while still undischarged. In bankruptcy proceedings instituted by the election petitioners, who were the only creditors, it was D ordered that the respondent should pay out of his salary as a member of Parliament £200 per annum in quarterly instalments to the appellant, the official assignee in bankruptcy, to be applied for the benefit of the judgment creditors. On appeal.

Held: the annual payment made to a member of Parliament was "salary or income" within the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1872, s. 51, and, therefore, the court had power to appropriate part of it for the benefit of his creditors.

Appeal by the official assignee from an order of the Court of Appeal (Ireland) reversing an order of BOYD, J., in the King's Bench Division in Bankruptcy.

The question was whether the salary paid to members of Parliament could be attached at the instance of a creditor. BOYD, J., held that the salary of a bankrupt member of Parliament was attachable. The Court of Appeal (O'BRIEN, L.C., O'CONNOR, M.R., and PALLES, L.C.B.) held that such salary could not be attached.

The facts are fully stated by LORD ATKINSON in his considered opinion, where also will be found the relevant sections of the Irish, and corresponding sections in the English, Bankruptcy Acts.

The House took time for consideration.

Dec. 10, 1915. The following opinions were read.

LORD ATKINSON.—This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal in Ireland, dated May 10, 1915, discharging an order of the King's Bench Division (in Bankruptcy), dated Feb. 19, 1915. This latter order was made on the motion of the official assignee in the bankruptcy of the respondent, and directs that he (the respondent) should, out of his salary or income as a Member of Parliament for the division of North Galway, pay to the appellant, the official assignee of the court, the sum of £200 yearly, in four quarterly instalments of £50 each, on Jan. 1, Feb. 1, July 1, and Oct. 1 in each year, the first payment to be made by the respondent out of that portion of said salary or income payable to him on or about Apr. 1, 1915. The order purports to be made in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1872, s. 51, which is practically identical with the English Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 90, re-enacted in the English Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 53 (2), and again re-enacted in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 51 (2).

The English authorities, therefore, dealing with the construction of these several sections, appear to me to apply to the construction of the Irish enactment under which the order of Feb. 19, 1915, was made. It will be observed that this last-mentioned order does not purport to attach the quarterly payment of the respondent's salary (to give it its statutory name) before it reaches him, but merely directs him to pay out of the quarterly payments, when received, the sums mentioned. The dates in this case are instructive.

The respondent, who, in or about the month of Dec., 1910, was elected Parliamentary representative of the North Louth Division of the County of Louth, was unseated on petition by the order of the election judges, dated Feb. 27, 1911, and costs were awarded against him. These costs were taxed on March 18, 1914, to the amount of £1,910 8s. 1d., with interest at 4 per cent. per annum from Feb. 27, making together £2,156 15s. 7d. This sum was due to the four persons by whom the election petition was presented. It constitutes the only liability of the bankrupt. On May 20, 1914, a writ was issued by these four persons against the respondent to recover the above-mentioned sum of £2,156 15s. 7d. with interest till paid. The writ, together with the statement of claim, was served on him on May 22, 1914. An appearance was entered by him on May 29, and judgment was marked on June 17 for the amount claimed with costs. The respondent was, however, active in the meantime. He, on May 26, accepted the office of the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, thereby vacating the seat he then held as member of Parliament for the constituency of North Galway. On June 5, 1914, he presented his petition in bankruptcy at 11.45 in the morning on which a final order was made on the same day, by which he was adjudged a bankrupt. The business was quickly done.

It is admitted that, had the respondent's bankruptcy been an English bankruptcy, he would, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1893, s. 32, while his bankruptcy remained unannulled, or he had failed to obtain from the court a certificate to the effect that his bankruptcy was brought about by misfortune, without any misconduct on his part, have been disqualified for, amongst other things, being elected to, sitting, or voting in the House of Commons or any committee thereof; and that, if neither of these things took place within six months from the date of the order declaring him a bankrupt, on the Court of Bankruptcy certifying that fact to the Speaker, his seat would have become vacant. But it is admitted, as I understood, that though the words of 32 (3) provide that the disqualifications imposed by the section shall extend to all parts of the United Kingdom, yet, as the statute only deals with proceedings in the Courts of Bankruptcy in England, these words do not apply to Irish bankruptcy proceedings, and the point is not raised in this appeal.

The Irish Act of 1872 is less stringent. Sect. 40 provides that

A provision similar to this has been introduced into the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. Section 41 of the Irish Act provides that if a person, being a member of the Commons House of Parliament is adjudged bankrupt he shall be, and remain during one year from the date of the order for adjudication, incapable of sitting and voting in that House unless within that time either the order be annulled or the creditors who have proved be fully satisfied. If neither of these things should happen within that period, then on the Court of Bankruptcy certifying that fact to the Speaker the bankrupt's seat becomes vacant.

The respondent, obviously to evade the letter of this section (designed to exclude bankrupts from active co-operation in Parliamentary proceedings), having vacated his seat on May 26, got re-elected for the same constituency on July 28, and became a bankrupt on his own petition in the interval while he was not a member of Parliament. Accordingly, he is qualified to sit and vote in the House, bankrupt though in fact he be, and his counsel contend that there is a venerable principle of public policy which demands that he should be permitted to continue to receive the entire of his salary and devote it to his own purposes, since it was given to him to support the dignity of his position as a member of Parliament and to enable him to discharge the duties of that post.

There is, however, another principle of public policy which has found expression in the provisions of the bankruptcy codes of both England and Ireland for close on half a century, as estimable and as conducive to the welfare of the community as any. It is this, that in bankruptcy the entire property of the bankrupt, of whatever kind or nature it be, whether alienable or inalienable, was subject to be taken in execution legal or equitable, or the contrary, should, with the exception of some compassionate allowances for his maintenance, be appropriated and made available for the payment of his creditors. It will be found, I think, that in these bankruptcy codes, whenever these two principles come in conflict, the latter prevails. Of this, s. 319 of the Irish Act of 1857 is a striking example.

On Aug. 10, 1911, the following resolution was passed by the House of Commons:

> "Resolved, that in the opinion of this House provision should be made for the payment of a salary at the rate of £400 a year to every member of this House, excluding any member who is for the time being in receipt of a salary as an officer of the House or as an officer of His Majesty's Household."

It is to be observed that no condition whatever is attached to the payment of this salary. The members may be qualified to sit and vote in the House or be disqualified to do either, as the respondent would have been had he become bankrupt while he was, in fact, a member. They may attend the sittings of the House or absent themselves continuously from them; they may be rich or poor; resident in some distant part of the three kingdoms or within five minutes' walk of the House itself. If, therefore, these salaries had, as is contended, been given to enable members to discharge, or to secure that they did discharge their duties, one would, not unnaturally, have expected to find some provision to the effect that a member should forfeit his salary for the six or twelve months, as the case might be, during which he was disqualified from sitting or voting in the House, or that the payment of his salary was made conditional on his attending in his place in the House for the whole, or a certain portion of each session. There is nothing of that kind to be found in it. It is an error, I think, to suppose that there is now available any effective legal or parliamentary machinery to compel members to attend the sitting of the House. The only statute I have been able to find dealing with the matter is 6 Hen. 8, c. 16 (Parliament (Attendance of Members) (1514)). It provides that members who depart from Parliament without the leave of the Speaker and the members of the House will lose all the money they should have (I use the words of the statute) for their "wages," and that the counties and boroughs for which they have been elected, shall be discharged for ever from the liability to pay them wages. That was the only penalty.

What was the precise amount of these wages at the time this statute was passed I have not been able to ascertain. It is stated in MAY'S PARLIAMENTARY PRACTICE (6th Edn.), p. 25, that the wages were in the time of Edward III 4s. per day for a knight of the shire, and 2s. per day for a citizen or burgess. The statute 5 Ric. 2, Stat. 2, c. 4 (1382), which required any person summoned to Parliament to attend, or, in the absence of a reasonable and honest excuse, to be amerced, is now repealed. The practice of "calling" the House has long since ceased to find favour, and in no case has it been resorted to since 1836. A member may, no doubt, in justice to his constituents, be morally, though not legally, bound to attend the sitting of the House.

It is well established that in a court of law the motives which influenced the legislature in passing any particular enactment, or the purposes or objects it desired to effect, can only be legitimately ascertained from the language of the enactment itself viewed through the light of the circumstances on reference to which that language was used. See LORD BLACKBURN'S judgment in River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson (1). The reports of the debates leading up to the passing of it cannot be looked at. The same rule of construction must, I think, be applied to the resolutions passed by either House of Parliament. When these motives, purposes, or objects are not, expressly or impliedly, revealed in language of the legislature in its statute, or by either of the Houses of Parliament in that of its resolutions so viewed, it is, I think, wholly illegitimate to surmise or conjecture what those unrevealed motives, purposes, or objects may have been, and to construe and apply the statute or resolutions as if they had been indicated. There is nothing whatever contained in this resolution to suggest what was the special motive or object of the House of Commons in passing it. One simply finds that the House, in effect, granted a salary to each member unconditionally in all respects. That is all. I must therefore, for myself, decline to speculate on this point, and for the purposes of this judgment to accept or be guided by the speculations of the Court of Appeal on the subject.

The Appropriation Act for the year 1911 received the Royal Assent on Aug. 18, 1911, eight days after the passing of this resolution. In sched. B, part 7, class II, of the Civil Services, the item 1a appears. It runs thus:

> "For the salaries of members of the House of Commons not in receipt of salaries as Ministers, as officers of the House of Commons, or as officers of His Majesty's Household, £252,000."

In all subsequent Appropriation Acts this sum does not appear as an independent item, but is included—and, indeed, concealed—in one general item. As, for instance, in the Appropriation Act, 1913, where it runs thus: "Salaries and expenses of the House of Commons, £298,322," but a glance at the estimates shows that of this sum £252,000 is provided for members' salaries. When money is so voted and appropriated the Crown is bound to devote it to the object named in the statute, and under the Exchequer Act, 1886, s. 14, the mode of procedure adopted is this. By Royal Order under the Sovereign's Sign Manual, countersigned by the Treasury, he or she directs the Treasury to pay the sum so appropriated to the respective services named. This applies to all salaries voted by Parliament. In so doing the Treasury merely act as the servants and agents of the Crown. It is the Crown, not the House of Commons, that pays. The payment is compulsory, not voluntary. The House of Commons has passed the resolution once for all. It may rescind it, no doubt, any day. In that sense the payment of the salaries is contingent and not assured, but not more contingent or less assured than the payment of the salaries of all the officers of the Crown, who may be dismissed at pleasure.

PALLES, C.B., in his judgment, laid it down that this sum of £400 per annum is expressly given to each member of Parliament virtute officii, and is payable out of State funds to enable them to support the office with the degree of dignity due to it, and for that reason is unalienable. It is certainly given to the members because they are members, but with infinite respect to that most distinguished judge, I doubt very much whether membership of the House of Commons is, within the meaning of the principle of law and public policy to which he refers, an office of State at all. This, however, might be a matter of importance if the question to be determined in this case were whether these salaries could be assigned, or be taken in equitable execution; but it is, in my view, as the authorities show, wholly immaterial on the question whether they can be made available in whole or in part, under the bankruptcy laws, to satisfy the claims of creditors.

I turn to the consideration of the statutes themselves. By the Irish Bankruptcy Act, 1857, the Irish bankruptcy and insolvency laws were consolidated. The great majority of its sections are still in force. I shall only refer to those which are. Sect. 60 provides for the appointment of official assignees; s. 268 provides that any person adjudged a bankrupt, or on filing a petition of insolvency by an insolvent, if the court shall make an order thereon shall file his schedule, &c.:

> All the personal estate and effects of such person present and future wheresoever the same may be, and all property which he may purchase, or which may revert, descend, be demised or bequeathed, or come to him before such bankrupt shall have obtained his certificate, or before such insolvent shall have obtained his discharge in pursuance of the adjudication made on that behalf, and all debts shall become absolutely vested in the assignees for the time being for the benefit of creditors.

These words could scarcely be wider. They cover everything received which the bankrupt can retain and employ for his own use and benefit. This section is followed by what has been described as a compassionate section, s. 298, whereby a bankrupt or insolvent is declared to be entitled to retain such tools and household furniture as he may select not exceeding £20 in value, and the court is empowered to make such an allowance out of his estate as may be necessary for the support and maintenance of himself and his family. Then comes s. 319, on which much turns in this case. It provides that:

> The court may order such portion of the pay, half-pay, or salary, emoluments, or pension of any bankrupt or insolvent, as on communication from the court to the Secretary of War or the Admiralty, or the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, or the chief officer of the department to which such officer may belong, or under which such pay, half-pay, salary, or emoluments, or pension may be enjoyed by such bankrupt or insolvent, or to the court of directors of the East India Co., they respectively may under their hands or under the hands of their respective chief secretary, or other chief officer for the time being, consent in writing to be paid to the official assignee, in order that the same may be applied in discharge of the debts of the bankrupt or insolvent . . .

On the lodgment of the order of the court, with the consent before-mentioned, with the Paymaster-General or any other person appointed to pay the pay, half-pay, &c., as aforesaid, the sum mentioned is to be paid to the official assignee. It is obvious that this section, which is to the same effect as the English Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 89, applies to a large number, perhaps the majority, of the servants of the State, and it must be assumed, I think, that the salaries they receive are not excessive, having regard to the duties to be performed; but no matter how important those offices may be, how vital in the interest of the State the discharge of those duties, how necessary the receipt of the pay or salary to enable the duties to be discharged, the salary or pay or half-pay may be appropriated in whole or in part for the payment, in bankruptcy, of creditors. Thus the principle of public policy embodied in this and other sections of the bankruptcy codes prevails over any other principle of public policy, which would put these salaries, &c., beyond the reach of creditors. Pensions, when given exclusively for past services, are alienable, half-pay is inalienable and cannot be taken into equitable execution. In Lucas v. Harris (2), Lindley, L.J., deals with all the authorities on this point; but both pensions and half-pay are expressly named in the section, though the public policy which is relied upon to keep the salaries of Members of Parliament safe from the claims of creditors in bankruptcy will be found to be the very same public policy which makes half-pay inalienable, but yet does not protect it from the claims of such creditors. The principle on which half-pay is rendered inalienable is laid down by Lord Kenyon in Flarty v. Odlum (3) and in Lidderdale v. Duke of Montrose (4), and approved of by Parke, B., in Wells v. Foster (5). In the first of these cases a military officer on half-pay made an assignment of his half-pay. Lord Kenyon said (3 Term Rep. at p. 682):

> "Emoluments of this sort are granted for the dignity of the State and for the decent support of those persons who are engaged in the service of it. It would be highly impolitic to permit them to be assigned; for persons who are liable to be called out on the service of their country ought not to be taken from a state of poverty. Besides, an officer has no certain interest in his half-pay, for at any time the government may strike him off the list."

In this last respect the officer on half-pay is not in any different or worse position than is every ordinary military or civil servant of the Crown. They all hold their offices at the pleasure of the Crown, and may, at law, be arbitrarily dismissed at any moment. Indeed, any contract entered into between an authority representing the Crown and a subject, though it purports to appoint the latter to an office for a definite period, must be held to have imported into it a condition that the Crown has this power of arbitrary dismissal, Dunn v. R. (6); Gould v. Stuart (7).

Wells v. Foster (5) was the case of a civil officer to whom compensation was granted on the reduction of offices in his department. Lord Abinger, C.B., in delivering judgment, said this pension is not assignable, it stands on the same footing as the half-pay of an officer in the army. It is fit that the public servant should retain the means of decent subsistence without being exposed to the temptations of poverty. Besides the dependant may be assigning what he has no right to receive, for his pension subsists only during pleasure, and it depends on Parliament whether it shall continue or not. Parke, B., said (8 M. & W. at pp. 151, 152, 153):

> "It is not necessary in this case to determine whether this is an allowance to which the defendant is entitled as a matter of indefeasable right, or whether it is payable only during pleasure; although I have a strong impression that it subsists only during the joint pleasure of the Treasury and of Parliament, by whom the fund for its payment, is provided. On the other hand, even if payable only during pleasure, it appears to me that it is not therefore, in point of law, the less assignable, however little its value would be in consequence of its being liable to be withdrawn at any moment. But viewing the matter on the ground of public policy, we are to look, not so much on the tenure of this pension, whether it is held for life or during pleasure, as whether it is, in either case, such as the law ought to be allowed to be assigned. The correct distinction made in the cases on this subject is, that a man may always assign a pension given to him entirely as a compensation for past services, whether granted to him for life or merely during the pleasure of others . . . But where the pension is granted not exclusively for past services but as a consideration for some continuing duty or service, although the amount of it may be influenced by the length of service which the party has already performed, it is against the policy of the law that it should be assigned. I think the true view of this case is that the defendant is still to be considered as in the public service although not performing any public duty in it, and that the compensation allotted to him under this Act is by way of salary, the object of which is to maintain such a provision in life as will save him from the necessity of risking his character by incurring those temptations which persons reduced to poverty are necessarily exposed to, and which would render him an unfit person to be again employed as a servant of the Crown. For this purpose public policy requires that he should not be permitted to assign it away."

This is the very same principle of public policy invoked to sustain the judgment appealed from.

In Lucas v. Harris (2) it was decided that the pension of Indian officers made inalienable by the joint operation of an Indian statute and the Army Act, 1841, s. 141, could not be taken in equitable execution, but in Re Saunders, Ex parte Saunders (8) it was pointed out by KAY, L.J., that Lucas v. Harris (2) was not a bankruptcy case at all, and did not touch, therefore, the operation of any section of the bankruptcy statutes. But wide as are the terms of s. 319 of the Irish Act of 1857, and of those of the corresponding section of the English Bankruptcy Act, 1869, they were not considered wide enough to afford adequate protection to the right of creditors, and accordingly by the following section (s. 90) of the English Act it was provided that—

> Where a bankrupt is in receipt of a salary or income, other than as aforesaid, the court, upon the application of the trustee, shall from time to time make such order as it thinks just for the payment of such salary or income or of any part thereof, to the trustees during the bankruptcy, and to the registrar if necessary after the close of the bankruptcy, to be applied as the court may direct.

This section is re-enacted as s. 53 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and as s. 51 (2), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. The law of Ireland was attempted to be assimilated by s. 51 of the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1872. It provides that:

> When a bankrupt is in receipt of a salary or income other than is mentioned in s. 319 of the said Act [i.e., the Act of 1857], the court may from time to time make such order as it thinks fit for the payment of such salary or income, or any part thereof, to the official assignee or the trustee, to be applied by him in such manner as the court shall direct, and thereupon such portion of the salary or income as is specified in such order shall be paid to such official assignee until the court shall make order to the contrary."

This section is general in its terms. It is expressly made to apply to every case not coming within s. 319, and I am, with all respect, wholly unable to concur with O'CONNOR, M.R., in thinking that it must be held to be confined to persons not officers of State, because if it applied to such officers as salaried members of Parliament, there would be no person or body who could give the consent required by s. 319. It appears to me unsound to assume that any consent such as is required by that section is necessary in any case coming within s. 51. There is nothing in this last-mentioned section to suggest the necessity for any consent, and as it is expressly directed to cases falling without the scope or reach of s. 319, which does not require consent, I do not think that the necessary consent can be implied.

Re Saunders, Ex parte Saunders (8) is an important case. It has a direct bearing on each of the two points raised by the respondent in this appeal. First, the alleged want of jurisdiction of the bankruptcy judge to make the order he made, and second, the alleged oppressive exercise of his jurisdiction as to the amount of the pension ordered to be paid over to the official assignee. In Re Saunders, Ex parte Saunders (8) a major-general of the Madras Staff Corps who was liable to be recalled to service on an emergency had been granted a pension of £330 a year in respect of his military service in India. This pension was rendered inalienable by an Indian statute, as it certainly would also have been on the principle of public policy relied on by the respondent. An order was made by the county court judge of Wandsworth directing that a portion of the pension (it does not appear how much) should be paid to the trustee in bankruptcy of this military officer. On appeal to the Divisional Court, composed of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and KENNEDY, JJ., this order was reversed on the ground that although there was jurisdiction to make the order, such an order should never be made in the case of an Indian pension, which was intended to be made inalienable by the Indian legislation. On appeal to the Court of Appeal, composed of LORD ESHER, M.R., KAY and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ., it was held that the county court judge had jurisdiction under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 53 (2), to make the order, that there was no rule of law that in the case of an Indian pension such an order should never, as an exercise of discretion, be made, that the discretion to make the order was absolute, and should be exercised in each case according to the facts of that particular case. The appeal was dismissed, but, on the grounds put by KAY, L.J. ([1895] 2 C.B. at p. 427)—viz., that as the county court judge had exercised his discretion one way, and the Divisional Court their discretion in another way, they must look at the facts of the particular case, and without attempting to lay down any rule which would fetter another court in exercising its discretion under s. 53, must say how the discretion should be exercised in that particular case. The court ultimately held that as the bankrupt had no means other than his pension to maintain himself, his wife, and his family, and that as the only property his wife had was a freehold worth £500, it would not be a proper exercise of discretion to order any portion of the pension to be set aside for the trustee. It will be observed that this was not a proceeding under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 53 (1), which is analogous to s. 319 of the Irish Act of 1857, but a proceeding under sub-s. (2) of that section, which is analogous to s. 51 of the Irish Act of 1872, under which the order of BOYD, J., was made. If the reasoning of the judgment appealed from were sound it would have been competent for the bankrupt, Saunders, to have said, "I am a servant of State liable to be called up again for active service. My pension was not given to me solely for past services. It is presumably and is in fact only sufficient to support my dignity in that position and keep me fit to answer the call when made. Hands off. My pension is inalienable. You have no jurisdiction to touch it." But five most distinguished judges have decided that the county court judge had jurisdiction to touch it. They differed from him only as to the mode and manner in which his jurisdiction should be exercised.

Incidentally, too, the case answers the objection of the Master of the Rolls. The bankrupt was an officer of the army. He was dealt with under sub-s. (2) of s. 53, not sub-s. (1). No consent of any person or department was shown to have been given, for none was required. For myself I fail to see anything in the Irish statutes requiring that s. 51 of the Act of 1872 should receive a different construction from s. 52 (2) of the English statute of 1883.

A great number of cases were cited by counsel for the appellant. Many of them are merely illustrations of the application of the same principle. I do not intend to analyse more than a few of them. I begin with Ex parte Huggins, Re Huggins (9). The bankrupt was a retired judge of a Crown colony to whom the Secretary of State for the Colonies had granted a pension which was voted annually by the legislature of the colony, and was included in the annual Appropriation Ordinance of the colony. The bankrupt was not liable to be called on to fill again any public office or situation under the Crown. The Secretary of State declined to recognise assignments of such pensions, following therein the practice of the Treasury in England in relation to pensions granted to members of the civil service. Mr. Registrar BROUGHAM made an order restraining the bankrupt until further order from receiving the pension and directing that the trustees should until further order receive the quarterly payments of the pension as they should become due. The bankrupt appealed. The case turned upon the construction of s. 89 and s. 90 of the English Bankruptcy Act, 1869. It was decided by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ. It is therefore a case of high authority. The two points pressed in argument on behalf of the appellant were: (i) That the pension was inalienable, and (ii) that the payment of it could not be enforced at law, and was therefore a mere payment by way of bounty, and did not come within either of these sections, and Ex parte Wicks (10) and Cooper v. R. (11) were cited. SIR GEORGE JESSEL attached importance to the fact that the group of sections from s. 87 to s. 95 were headed "As to Property Devolving on Trustee." In the Irish statute of 1872 the group of sections from s. 50 to s. 55, both inclusive, are headed somewhat similarly, "Power of Court in Relation to Property." He says (21 Ch.D. at p. 91):

> "The vote of the legislature is merely the mode of ascertaining the only sum which the colony has to pay. Just the same as salaries and pensions of servants of the Crown in this country cannot be paid until they are voted by Parliament, and yet no one would say they are not 'property' of the person who receives them.

> There are, no doubt, some salaries and pensions which are not assignable, but when this is so it is always referable to one of two grounds. It is said to be contrary to public policy that payments made to induce persons to keep themselves ready for service to the Crown, as half-pay officers in the army or navy, or that payments for actual service rendered to the Crown should be assigned. The other class of cases is that of pensions, like the retiring allowance of a beneficed clergyman, which are by statute made not assignable. But still, I think they are all 'property.' The large definition of property given in s. 4 of the Bankruptcy Act goes far beyond choses in action. My view of the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act is that s. 15 and s. 16 vest all the property in the bankrupt in the trustee, saving some express exceptions."

Then he proceeds to say that this vesting is subject to the provisions in the group of sections from s. 87 to s. 95, and holds that the pension of the bankrupt is income, not salary within the meaning of s. 90 and therefore that the order of the registrar was right. LINDLEY, L.J., also held that the pension was "property" divisible amongst the bankrupt's creditors and vested in the trustee. He said (ibid. at p. 93):

> "The different kinds of property . . . vest in the trustee, but subject to the modifications and qualifications contained in this group of sections [i.e., s. 87 to s. 95]. Section 89 and s. 90 are the only ones which are material for the present purpose. Is this bankrupt in the receipt of a 'salary' or 'income' other than aforesaid? His pension is not salary, inasmuch as he is not bound to render any services in respect of it, but why is it not 'income'? Surely it is 'income.' It is not, as in Ex parte Wicks (10) a merely voluntary payment, revocable at any time. It is not an arbitrary allowance which can be stopped at any time at the will of the person who pays it. It is, in my opinion, within the true meaning of the word 'income' in s. 90."

I have already pointed out the very wide words of the vesting section in the Act of 1857, and I have not been able to find that Re Huggins (9), or Re Saunders (8) have ever been questioned, while they have been many times approved of. I do not think that the principle of public policy, which, in the case of officers on half-pay, is disregarded in bankruptcy, in order that the claims of creditors may be satisfied, can legitimately be invoked in such a case as the present, to defeat the claims of similar creditors. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that if this sum of £400 be either "salary" or "income" within the meaning of s. 51 of the Irish Act of 1872, BOYD, J., had jurisdiction to make the order of Feb. 19, 1915.

The question then remains, What is the character of these payments? They are not merely gratuities, or arbitrary voluntary payments, which the authority making them, the Crown, can at any moment stop. That is clear, I think. The Crown is bound by statute to make them. They are expressly styled, both in the resolution and the Appropriation Act, 1911, "salaries." In Re Shine (12) FRY, L.J., endeavoured to give a definition of salary, which he admitted was not complete. He said ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 531):

> "Whenever a sum of money has these characteristics: First, that it is paid for services rendered; secondly, that it is paid under some contract or appointment; thirdly, that it is computed by time; and fourthly, that it is payable at a fixed time; I am inclined to think that it is a salary, and not the less so because it is liable to determination at the will of the payer, or is subject to deductions."

The word "appointment" in this definition renders it a little difficult to apply it to the present case, unless the election of a member to serve in Parliament be considered an "appointment." But this is clear, I think, that this sum of £400 must necessarily be paid to members for one or other of four purposes: (i) To keep up their dignity, and as a remuneration, in advance or otherwise, for the discharge of their duties. (ii) To keep up their dignity, and enable them to discharge their duties. (iii) To keep up their dignity, altogether irrespective of the discharge of their duties, or their ability to discharge them. (iv) As a solatium for their membership, irrespective altogether of either their dignity or duties. That is exhaustive. If the first, I should be inclined to hold that the sum paid was a salary. If any one of the other three, I should be inclined to hold it was "income" in the nature of a salary, but I think, as the judges thought in Shine's Case (12), it must be either the one or the other.

I observe that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has likened this payment to an arbitrary and voluntary allowance, revocable at any moment at the will of the person paying it, such as is dealt with in Re Wicks (10). If that be so, then the pay of every officer in the army and navy and the pay of the bulk of the members of the Civil Service whose remuneration is not charged on the Consolidated Fund must equally be a voluntary allowance, and not either salary or income, since their pay is obtained in precisely the same way as these sums of £400, namely, by a vote passed in Committee of Supply followed by an Appropriation Act. Neither the Crown nor any of its officers could be sued by any naval or military officer or member of the Civil Service in any hostile proceeding in any court of law or equity to recover the salaries voted to them: Kinlock v. Secretary of State for India (13). Mandamus would not lie against the Treasury in respect of the salary voted: R. v. Treasury Lords Comrs. (14) and R. v. I. R. Comrs., Re Nathan (15). A petition of right is merely an amicable litigation taken by the consent of the Crown against the Crown itself. In my opinion Re Wicks (10) has no more application to this case than, according to Lindley, L.J., it had to Re Huggins (9), or than according to Lord Esher, it had to Re Ward (16).

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland also considered, apparently, that Re Hutton, Ex parte Benwell (17) had some bearing on this case. There the trustee asked to have allocated to him for the payment of the bankrupt's creditors a part of the income which the bankrupt might possibly make in the future by the exercise of his personal skill as a surgeon, but might never make. It depended on the accident whether people would come to consult him, and on whether he would choose to be consulted. It was held that this man's capacity to earn money in the future was the only "property" he had, and that could not vest in the trustee, and therefore could not be income within s. 90.

It was contended in the present case that even if Boyd, J., had jurisdiction to make the order of Feb. 19, 1815, he exercised his discretion in such a way that the order should be set aside. The Court of Appeal did not deal with this point. It was unnecessary for them to do so. It was not suggested there that this order should be merely varied, but that it should be set aside. It is quite obvious that a Court of Appeal should not set aside such an order merely because the judge of first instance, in the exercise of his discretion, left something less for the maintenance of the bankrupt than they themselves would be disposed to leave. It was contended, however, that the judgment of the learned judge showed that he inflicted a kind of penalty on the bankrupt because he had refused to allow the claims of the petitioners to be liquidated by his friend or by his political party. I do not think that the judgment of the learned judge when fairly considered, leads to any such conclusion. He took into consideration the fact that the bankrupt had maintained himself on £150 per annum as evidence of what was sufficient for his maintenance, and also the fact that none of the bankrupt's relatives had claims on him, and he formed the opinion that £200 would be an adequate allowance. In fixing it at that figure he considered he was treating the bankrupt liberally, and then he used the words:

> "I think I am dealing liberally with him, especially as he admits that by the party who really caused his indebtedness he could have had his debts paid in full."

That does not, in my view, at all mean that he would have allowed the bankrupt to retain more of his so-called salary but for this refusal. It merely means, at the most, that he considers the adequate allowance which he had made a liberal allowance, for this and other reasons.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the order appealed from was wrong and should be reversed. That the order of Boyd, J., of Feb. 19, 1915, was right and should be restored, and the appeal be allowed with costs here and below.

LORD SHAW.—On Feb. 19, 1915, Boyd, J., sitting in the Bankruptcy Court in Ireland, made an order that Mr. Hazleton, member of Parliament for North Galway, should pay out of his salary of £400 as such member, a sum of £200 per annum to the appellant as official assignee. The judgment was to "be applied by the said official assignee in discharge of the debts due" by the bankrupt. The award of bankruptcy was made on June 5, 1914, and after challenge was sustained. Several matters—notably as to what were the debts and why incurred—appear to have added zest to the discussion in the courts below, but they do not elucidate the issue before this House. On June 5, when Mr. Hazleton was declared bankrupt, he was not then a member of Parliament: he was an ex-member. In July, when he was elected a member of Parliament, he was a bankrupt. On one point, accordingly, an explanation and statement may not be out of place. How comes it that there is a question as to the allocation of a portion of salary of a bankrupt member of Parliament? Are not bankrupts prohibited from sitting in Parliament? On this question there is a cleavage between British and Irish law and practice. It arises from the phraseology employed in the Bankruptcy Acts of the three kingdoms. The cleavage may have been accidental, but it is unquestionably deep.

The law of England stands thus: By the Act of 1883, s. 32 and s. 33, it is provided that "where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt" he shall be disqualified for "being elected to or sitting or voting in the House of Commons." This applies, it will be observed, to "a debtor." The disqualification is removed on annulment of bankruptcy or the discharge of the bankrupt with a certificate that his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune and without his misconduct. If not so removed, within six months the court certifies this to Mr. Speaker, and the seat is vacated. By the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 9, the disqualification is not to exceed a period of five years from the date of discharge. The law of Scotland is substantially the same as that of England. By the Bankruptcy Frauds and Disabilities (Scotland) Act, 1884, s. 5 and s. 6, the disqualification of the English Act of the previous year is adopted for Scotland—that is to say, "where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt" includes the case of > "a person whose estate has been sequestrated or with respect to whom a decree of cessio bonorum has been pronounced."

The law of Ireland stands in this way. While the law of Scotland was put by Parliament on the same footing as the English law of bankruptcy, and the disqualification as to being elected or sitting in Parliament was thus assimilated, no such legislative step took place in regard to Ireland. The Irish position in this particular accordingly rests on the code contained in the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1872. Section 41 thereof provides that > "if a person, being a member of the Commons House of Parliament, is adjudged bankrupt, he shall be and remain, during one year from the date of the order of adjudication, incapable of sitting and voting in that House, unless within that time either the order is annulled or the creditors who prove debts under the bankruptcy are fully paid and satisfied."

Herein lies the difference between the Irish and the British case. In the latter the disqualification applies to "a debtor"—a comprehensive and general term; the former applies to "a person being a member of the Commons House of Parliament," with the result that if a person was adjudged a bankrupt, not while he was, but while he was not, a member of Parliament, then the Irish Bankruptcy Act cannot apply to him and there is no disqualification. I can see at least room for an argument to the opposite effect, but no such argument was offered, and practice seems to be against it. Furthermore, it is more than doubtful whether the competency of a member to be elected for or sit in the House of Commons could in any view be determined by the ordinary judiciary of the country, the question being one for that House under separate procedure. The case of the respondent is the case of a person who had been adjudged a bankrupt before his election.

The result accordingly is that English and Scottish bankrupts in that position may not be elected to, nor sit in, Parliament; Irish bankrupts may. Counsel for the appellant, in an eloquent and humorous aside, called this "another injustice to Ireland." But, my Lords, if it be an injustice at all, it is not an injustice to Ireland alone. For the Irish bankrupt would not be disqualified from election to or a seat in Parliament for any constituency in the United Kingdom, while in the case of the English or Scottish bankrupt the disqualification in all its scope would apply to him; he could not be elected to, or sit in, an Irish seat. I have referred to these matters, my Lords, not alone because of their public interest, but because they have a bearing on a question of public policy which was much canvassed in argument and in the judgments of the courts below. To that question I shall immediately advert.

But before doing so, I refer to the argument submitted to the effect that the payments made to Mr. Hazleton in his capacity as a member of Parliament is not of the nature of salary, and—as I understood it—it is not even of the nature of income. It is admitted that—apart from the considerations pleaded as to public policy—if it be salary or income in the ordinary sense, the ordinary rule of bankruptcy law, giving rights to the creditors therein, would apply. It is notable that both in its origin and its annual distribution by Parliament the payment was treated as salary eo nomine.

On Aug. 10, 1911, the House of Commons passed the following motion:

> "That in the opinion of this House provision should be made for the payment of a salary at the rate of £400 a year to every member of this House, excluding any member who is for the time being in receipt of a salary as an officer of this House, or as a Minister, or as an officer of His Majesty's household."

By the Appropriation Act of the same year a sum of £252,000 was granted—sched. B. part 7, headed "Civil Services, Class II."—"to defray the charges of the several Civil Services herein particularly mentioned." And then the language of this item is thus given—viz., "for the salaries of members of the House of Commons." This language is repeated in subsequent years. I see nothing to induce me to think that these payments are anything else than what Parliament, which granted them, has called them. But the matter does not stop there. It is an admitted fact that income tax is paid and is payable in respect of this salary. It was to this state of matters that Parliament addressed itself by s. 3 of the Finance Act, 1913, which provided that deductions may be allowed in respect of expenses "where the Treasury are satisfied with respect to any class of persons in receipt of any salary, fees, or emoluments." And it is admitted that in respect of these expenses a deduction of £100 is made from the salary of £400 to Members of Parliament. I do not think it possible to treat the payments, in these circumstances, as other than salary, and salary liable to income tax as income.

To this state of matters the provisions of the Irish bankruptcy statutes must apply. These provisions are two in number. By s. 51 of the Act of 1872, it is provided that when a bankrupt is in receipt of a salary or income other than is mentioned in s. 319 of the Irish Bankrupt and Insolvent Act, 1857,

> "the court may from time to time make such order as it thinks just for the payment of such salary or income, or of any part thereof, to the official assignee."

The Act of 1857, in the section just referred to, provides that the court may order such portion of the "pay, half-pay, salary, emolument, or pension of any bankrupt" as, on communication from the court, various departments of State may consent to. It appears to be agreed that this section, which applied in terms to the War Office, Admiralty, the East India Co., or a government department "to which such bankrupt may belong," did not cover the case of the respondent. These two statutes between them are completely exhaustive. And I see no justification for the view of the learned Master of the Rolls that the one statute was exhaustive of all instances of public salaries, and the other and later had only to do with private incomes. Accordingly it would not appear to be doubtful that since this case is "other than" one covered by the Act of 1857, the Act of 1872 must embrace it. I am humbly of opinion that this is so, and that it was within the competence of BOYD, J., acting under the provisions of the later Act, to pronounce the order of Feb. 5, that the bankrupt do pay out of his salary or income £200 yearly in four instalments to the official assignee, to be applied in discharge of the bankrupt's debts.

I think that the various statutes cited are conclusive of the point, and that reinforcement by authority is accordingly out of place. But if such reinforcement had been required there seems little doubt that the decided cases, and notably the important judgment of LINDLEY, L.J., in Re Huggins (9) would lead to the same result—namely, that the payments to Mr. Hazleton are payments of salary or income to which the Bankruptcy Acts apply.

Only a few words are required in dealing with the suggestion made that the payments made to Mr. Hazleton cannot be considered salary or income because it is open to Parliament to alter the law and refuse in future years the vote of salaries to members of the House of Commons. This seems to have no bearing on the question; many of the salaries or incomes earned throughout the country are enjoyed on a tenure equally or even more precarious, with no future rights except, it may be, to a week or a month's notice before dismissal, but the payments as they accrue are nevertheless and unquestionably payments of salary or income.

Another argument is to a converse effect—viz., that it would be to lower a position of such dignity and of great independence to permit of the distribution of any part of the payments made towards the liquidation of the member's debts. I have much difficulty in understanding what the argument means, unless, indeed, we are supposed to have left the regions of fair dealing altogether. I am, moreover, in some measure acquainted with a system of jurisprudence in which such an allowance is made to the creditors of persons who, being overtaken by bankruptcy, have continued to hold positions of the highest dignity and responsibility. Clergymen of the Established Church, town clerks, and professors in universities—all of them, to speak generally, holding office ad vitam aut culpam—have been liable to the action of their creditors in ingathering their salaries, the bankrupt being secured by the court in a beneficium competentiæ. This result, just in itself and just to all parties, is exactly analogous to that achieved by BOYD, J., in the order which he made in this case. As to the amount of the allowance of £200, I do not detain your Lordships. The cases would, and in my opinion ought to be, of the rarest and most special and cogent, when any Court of Appeal would interfere with the estimate and award made by the judge sitting in bankruptcy. In all ordinary cases—of which this seems to be one—the opinion of that judge should be final.

The only question remaining to be dealt with is that of public policy. This is apparently at the foundation of the judgments of the learned Lord Chancellor and PALLES, C.B. The learned Master of the Rolls does not appear to share their views, and sets them aside, basing his own opinion upon the Acts of Parliament. These I have already analysed. It cannot be suggested that this House, sitting as a court of law, should presume to import into the construction of an Act of Parliament any views or conjectures as to the grant of these salaries by the legislature. That—the legislative stage—is concluded. The salaries are there; and they have been instituted without any language of statute to suggest that the salaries so set up should be subject to any differential treatment by law. The argument accordingly is that there is some ground of public policy which should induce the judiciary to prevent the ordinary rule from coming into operation—the rule which distributes this income among creditors a due reserve being made for the bankrupt at the sight of the court. I cannot see that there is any such ground of public policy. There is no injury to the general body of His Majesty's lieges which compels such an abrogation of creditor's rights, or confers a discriminative privilege upon a member of Parliament. Such a privilege—if it be privilege to enjoy for oneself something which of one were not a member would go to one's creditors by the ordinary law of the land—does not seem to me to find any warrant in public policy. The view of the legislature on such a claim is well indicated so late as in the Bankruptcy Act of last year. Section 128 of that Act prescribes:

And I cannot see anything of public policy which should induce the judiciary to come to any different view. I see no reason of public policy arising from the dignity or responsibility of Parliament or any one of its members for raising the latter into an elevation beyond the reach of his creditors. As the law stands on the statutes, and until these are altered by Parliament, the Irish bankrupt may be elected to the House of Commons, while a British bankrupt is under a disability in this particular—a disability which he shares with traitors, aliens, minors, and madmen. I see no ground of public policy which would, this being the case, give to those bankrupts who are so admitted to Parliament a privilege not accorded to any other bankrupts in the country, thus making them not only privileged over their fellow members, but privileged over their fellow citizens. I do not, on public policy, see any reason for thus elevating the position; nor on law, do I, as I have stated, see any ground for lowering the position of salaries of members of the House of Commons by the derogatory treatment of such income as merely as alimentary or eleemosynary dole. I concur in the judgment proposed.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—I agree. The question your Lordships have to decide depends primarily on the true construction of s. 319 of the Irish Bankrupt and Insolvent Act, 1857, and s. 51 of the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1872. These sections have to be read together as part of one Act. (See s. 1 of the Act of 1872.) Section 319 deals with some but not all of the salaries or periodic payments in the nature of salary, which by the common law could not, on grounds of public policy, be assigned or taken in execution either at law or in equity. It enables the salaries or periodic payments with which it deals to be made available to some extent for the creditors of a bankrupt notwithstanding the policy of the common law. Section 51 of the later Act deals with all salaries or income not falling within the provisions of s. 319 of the earlier Act. It enables the salaries or income with which it deals to be made similarly available. The only difference between the two sections is that the extent to which salaries or periodic payments falling within s. 319 can be made available depends on the discretion of the judge in bankruptcy, to be exercised with the consent of the public official therein referred to, whereas the extent to which salaries or income falling within s. 51 can be made available depends on the discretion of the judge in bankruptcy alone. If the sections be read together it is reasonably clear that s. 51 embraces all salaries which were not assignable or capable of being taken in execution by common law other than those specified in s. 319. It was so decided in Re Huggins (9) in reference to the corresponding provisions of the English Bankruptcy Act, 1869. In construing an Act which, on the face of it, is intended to modify public policy for the benefit of the creditors of a bankrupt, it would be wrong for any court of law to limit the plain meaning of the words used by appealing to the public policy intended to be modified. The only public policy which such a court can consider is the public policy embodied in and appearing on the face of the Act itself.

In the present case the judge in bankruptcy, on Feb. 19, 1915, made an order under s. 51 of the Act of 1872 directing the bankrupt to pay to the official assignee in his bankruptcy for the benefit of his creditors the sum of £200 per annum out of his Parliamentary salary or income of £400 per annum. If the Parliamentary salary or income referred to be salary or income within s. 51, the judge in bankruptcy had full discretion to make the order he did, and there is certainly nothing to justify your Lordships in interfering with such discretion. If the order was wrong it must be on the ground either (i) that the Parliamentary salary or income referred to was within s. 319 of the earlier and not within s. 51 of the later Act, or (ii) that it was not within either section. It was not contended before the Court of Appeal, nor is it contended before your Lordships, that the Parliamentary salary or income in question is within s. 319 of the earlier Act. The whole argument before the Court of Appeal and before your Lordships was that it was not within either section, and the Court of Appeal discharged the order made by the judge in bankruptcy on this ground. In order to see whether the Court of Appeal was right in so doing it is necessary to consider the origin and nature of the Parliamentary salary or income with which the judge in bankruptcy had to deal.

It appears that on Aug. 10, 1911, the House of Commons passed a resolution that:

> "In the opinion of the House provision should be made for the payment of a salary at the rate of £400 a year to every member of this House, excluding any member who is for the time being in receipt of a salary as an officer of the House or a Minister or as an officer of His Majesty's household."

Ever since this resolution was passed members of Parliament, as such, have regularly received £400 per annum by equal quarterly instalments, the money required being included in the Estimates, voted in the usual manner, and subsequently appropriated for the purpose by the annual Appropriation Act. The Appropriation Act, 1911, contains an express reference to the "salaries" of members of the House of Commons. In subsequent Appropriation Acts these salaries are included in the general salaries and expenses of the House, but this change of form does not connote any change in the nature of the payment. The payment is made to and received by every member virtute officii. It does not vary with his pecuniary needs or with the expenses he must incur in fulfilling his duties or with the assiduity with which those duties are fulfilled. Indeed, it continues to be payable to him for periods during which he may be disqualified from sitting and voting, and can have no duties to perform: (see Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 33 (1)). It may be precarious in the sense that the House of Commons may at any time see fit to rescind this resolution of Aug. 10, 1911, or to refuse to vote the necessary funds, but there is the same expectation of continuity of payment as exists in the case of all officials whose salaries are not charged on the Consolidated Fund In other respects it bears all the marks of an official salary. Moreover, it is admittedly income, and as such (after allowing the deductions for expenses provided by the Finance Act, 1913), is subject to income tax. Under these circumstances I confess I am unable to see any reason why it should not be held to be salary or income within s. 51 of the Act of 1872. In holding the contrary I think the Court of Appeal were, to some extent at any rate, influenced by a consideration of the objects which the House of Commons might be supposed to have had in view in passing the resolution of Aug. 10, 1911. The Lord Chancellor, for example, was of opinion that the salary must be looked on as payment of money, first, to indemnify the member in respect of general loss of other means of subsistence caused by his having to attend to his public duties; secondly, to indemnify him against the actual expenses which he may have had to incur; and, thirdly, to ensure by means of such indemnity that no member of the House might be prevented from discharging the great public duties entrusted to him by the vote of his constituency. He seems to have thought that on this footing it would be against public policy to make any part of the salary of a member available for the payment of his creditors. Again, the Lord Chief Baron appears to have been of opinion that the salary was granted to enable a member to perform his duties and support his office with the degree of dignity due to it, and that therefore it would be against the principles of the common law to make the salary available for his creditors in the bankruptcy.

In my opinion, courts of law have no business in such a case to speculate on the objects which the House of Commons may have had in view. It is not for them to say that what is voted and paid as, and bears all the distinguishing marks of, a salary is not a salary because, if it were, some presumed intention of the House of Commons might be frustrated by an application of the general law. It may well be that at common law the salary in question would be inalienable, but that is no reason for refusing to apply the provisions of the law of bankruptcy under which other salaries, inalienable at common law, can be made available for creditors. Again, it may well be that one of the objects the House of Commons had in view in passing the resolution of Aug. 10, 1911, was to enhance the dignity and to increase the efficiency of its members, but even so I am not sure that public policy has not on this occasion justified its reputation as an unruly horse, for while, on the one hand, the public is undoubtedly interested in every man paying his lawful debts, it is, on the other hand, by no means clear that either the dignity or efficiency of a member of Parliament would be enhanced by his being placed in a better position to defeat his creditors than the rest of His Majesty's subjects. In my opinion the appeal succeeds.

LORD SUMNER.—The respondent is an undischarged bankrupt, who sits in the House of Commons as Member for North Galway, and in that capacity is paid £400 a year out of funds provided by Parliament. Previous to his election he had been adjudicated a bankrupt in Ireland on his own petition. If he had been adjudicated under the bankruptcy legislation applicable in England, Scotland, and Wales he would have been ineligible for election.

Much has been said on the difference between the Irish Bankruptcy Acts and those which govern other parts of the United Kingdom, and counsel for the appellant warmly disputed and deplored it as an injustice to Ireland. Be this as it may, the respondent receives this sum as having been validly elected to Parliament, and I think your Lordships can but deal with that fact as you find it; otherwise the order of BOYD, J., which the appellants seek to restore, would have neither basis nor operation.

The chief question is whether this payment is either "salary" or "income," that is "salary" or "income" within the meaning of s. 51 of the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1872, but as that Act neither defines nor qualifies these terms, I take it that the best, if not the only, way of deciding whether the payment comes within the meaning of the section is to ascertain whether it comes within its words. The money is paid quarterly. It is not, I gather, forthcoming immediately on election. The payee may be a member and entitled to sit, and actually sitting for some time before he is put in funds. The payments are the same for all members, and all members (except those in receipt of ministerial salaries) are entitled to them. The fund out of which they are made is appropriated by statute annually to the service of the Crown, and the office, which actually disburses them, is that which pays so many public salaries. It is that of the Paymaster-General. They are chargeable with income tax, a fixed sum of £100 per annum being allowed free of tax in all cases on the supposition that it represents the expense of performing Parliamentary duties. The rest is taxed as income belonging to the member and applicable to his own purposes. Judging by the character of these payments, I am, with all respect, unable to join in the views taken in the Court of Appeal in Ireland, that they are either an indemnity against the cost of being in Parliament, or a subvention in aid of the member's private means, in case they are insufficient to support that dignity, or a compensation for the public work he may do, or only a casual and precarious bounty not to be reckoned upon until it is encashed.

The question before your Lordships is one of interpretation of the relevant statutes in the light of the circumstances and the practice proved. As the sum is the same for all, though the expenses, the means, the sacrifices, the labours, and the attendances of the members differ, I think it is in its nature a salary, and a salary none the less that, like all State salaries not specifically charged on the Consolidated Fund or otherwise provided for by statute, it will not be paid unless Parliament annually appropriates public money for the purpose. The legislature has in fact chosen the word "salary" to describe these payments. If I may say so, it has done so with equal deliberation and precision. The term is used in the Appropriation Act, 1911, Sched. B, Part 7, Class II, item No. 1A, and the Finance Act, 1913, s. 3, is also applicable. I think that the modification introduced by the Appropriation Act, 1912, Sched. B, Part 6, Class II, item No. 2 makes no difference in this regard. If, then, the payments which the respondent receives are salary or income within s. 51 of the Act of 1872, an order to pay part of them to the appellant was within the jurisdiction of BOYD, J. The contrary is argued on the grounds either that (i) they fall within the Irish Bankrupt and Insolvent Act, 1857, s. 319, in which case the consent of the head of the respondent's department would have been required, or that (ii) s. 51 of the Act of 1872 is placed in such antithesis to s. 319 of the Act of 1857 that it must be read as referring only to private salaries or incomes, in contradistinction to those derived from the State, or that (iii) there is such a rule of public policy against the alienation of salaries like this as requires the words to be read otherwise than in their apparent sense.

As s. 319 proceeds by enumeration of departments, and necessarily does not name the salary, and as the respondent is not a subordinate in any department, the case does not fall within s. 319. The two sections read together clearly mean that all salaries or incomes not brought in by the first shall be comprehensively brought in by the second. I am not satisfied that this salary has any analogy in fact to those payments, made for the purpose of enabling a certain office of State to be maintained or of retaining the future services of officers, which have been the subject of the decisions cited, but, however this may be, the words of the statute, being clear, import that the legislature considered that the alienation of part of this salary under an order in bankruptcy was consistent with public policy, a view which is supported by the explicit application of similar provisions in other Bankruptcy Acts to various payments, which probably would be inalienable at common law. I think, therefore, that the plain words of s. 51 must be enforced, and that the order of BOYD, J., was rightly made. The quantum to be paid was in his discretion, and, as I read his judgment, it proceeded on no erroneous principle of law. I think that the appeal should be allowed.

Bank—Negligence—Opening customer's account without inquiry—Stolen cheque paid into account—"Account payee only"—Proceeds collected from drawer's bank—"Negligence"—Absence of care to protect payee—"Customer"—Person becoming customer when account opened—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 82.

A banker is guilty of negligence towards the drawer of a cheque crossed "account payee only" if he opens an account for the person presenting the cheque and collects the money for it without making any inquiries concerning the respectability of the customer by requiring references or otherwise.

A person becomes the "customer" of a bank within s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, when he takes to the bank money or a cheque and asks to have an account opened in his name and the bank accepts the money or cheque and agrees to open an account in the name of that person. It is not necessary that the person should have drawn any money on the account or even should be in a position to draw money.

The words "without negligence" in s. 82 means without taking due care to protect the person whose name appears on the cheque as payee, especially in the case of a cheque marked "account payee only."

Action in the Commercial List tried by BAILHACHE, J., without a jury.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover £75 11s. 3d. for money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs, and alternatively, damages for the conversion of a cheque for the like amount.

Hogg and Carthew for the plaintiffs.

Gibbons, K.C., and Frank Newbolt for the defendant.

BAILHACHE, J.—Messrs. Ladbroke & Co. bring this action against Mr. W. T. T. Todd, who carries on business as a banker at No. 27, Old Jewry, under the style of the John Bull Bank, for the conversion of a cheque for £75 11s. 3d., or, alternatively, for the proceeds of the cheque as money had and received to the plaintiff's use.

The matter arose in this way. A young man named Robert Howard Jobson, who was a member of University College, Oxford, had a betting account with the plaintiffs, and at the end of the week ending Oct. 18, 1913, he had won £75. The plaintiffs, intending to pay that betting debt, placed a cheque for £75 11s. 3d. in an envelope addressed to Jobson, and also other cheques in envelopes addressed to other people. These letters were placed in a pillar box, and were soon afterwards abstracted by a thief, who took the cheques out of the envelopes and substituted forged cheques, the letters being afterwards forwarded to their destinations. Subsequently, some men went to various banks with the stolen cheques, representing themselves as being the persons in whose favour they were drawn in order to obtain payment. On Oct. 20, 1913, a young man went to the defendant with the cheque for £75 11s. 3d. and said he wanted to open an account with the cheque. The cheque was one of the stolen cheques, and was drawn in favour of R. H. Jobson, and crossed "Account payee only." He stated that he was Jobson, and the payee of the cheque. He said he wanted the cheque cleared as soon as possible as he wished to go to Oxford that night. He had indorsed the cheque before he went to the bank. The defendant said the cheque would take three days to clear, and that if he wanted it specially cleared it would cost 10s. 6d. The young man then stated that the cheque was the result of a betting transaction, and he, therefore, did not wish it to appear in his banking account at Oxford. That seemed to the defendant to be a reasonable explanation. The young man was well-dressed and well-spoken, and appeared to be of a class likely to be an undergraduate at Oxford University. The defendant accepted the cheque, but gave the young man to understand that he would not be allowed to draw upon the account until the cheque had been cleared. The young man signed his name in the signature book of the bank and then left. The defendant was careful to see that the signature in the book corresponded with the endorsement on the cheque. That, however, only showed that the same person had written both signatures, but did not show that he was the real Mr. Jobson. The defendant was not suspicious, but was taken in by the young man's appearance. The cheque was duly cleared, and on the afternoon of the same day the pretended Mr. Jobson sent a messenger to the defendant's bank with an order for the money written on a stamped piece of paper. The defendant said that would not do, and the young man must come to see him. The pretended Mr. Jobson accordingly came on the following day, drew a cheque for the amount of the stolen cheque, and was paid over the counter. He had asked to be paid in £5 notes, and was very angry because he could not get all the money in notes. The whole of the circumstances, so far as the defendant was concerned, were reasonable, and did not raise any suspicion in his mind. There was also the further circumstance that when the young man came to draw the money, the defendant and he talked freely, and it appeared that both knew Mr. Bottomley. That circumstance made the defendant still less suspicious.

I have no doubt that the defendant took the cheque in good faith, but something more is necessary before he can claim the protection of s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which provides as follows:

> "Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment."

Therefore, it appears that a banker must not only receive a cheque in good faith, but he must also receive payment of it without negligence and for a customer. At one time there were numerous decisions upon the question whether a banker had received payment for himself or for a customer, but that question was put an end to by s. 1 of the Bills of Exchange (Crossed Cheques) Act, 1906 [repealed by Cheques Act, 1957], and the defendant brought himself within the protection of s. 82 if he could show that he received payment of the cheque for a customer in good faith, and without negligence.

I think the pretended Mr. Jobson was in fact a customer of the defendant. It is true that it was the first transaction, but I have to look at the relationship between the parties created by the receipt of the cheque. Was he a customer of the bank when he handed the cheque to the defendant? I think he was. There must be a time when he began to be a customer, and I think a person becomes a customer of a bank when he goes to the bank with money or a cheque, and asks to have an account opened in his name, and the bank accepts the money or cheque, and is prepared to open an account in the name of that person. I think that person becomes a customer then, and after that he is entitled to be called a customer of the bank. I do not think it is necessary that the person should have drawn any money, or even that he should be in a position to draw money. I think such a person becomes a customer the moment the bank receive the money or cheque, and agree to open an account. Therefore, I think the pretended Mr. Jobson was a customer of the defendant's bank.

The last question is whether the defendant received the cheque and collected the money for it without negligence. On that point I have felt great difficulty. The words "without negligence" cannot mean without breach of duty towards himself or towards the person who was his customer. They must mean without taking due care to protect the person whose name appears on the cheque as being the payee, and especially in the case of a cheque marked "account payee only." Was the defendant under any obligation to make any inquiries when he received the cheque? If I had been left without any evidence on the point I should have been disposed to think that the defendant was not under any obligation to make inquiries in the absence of anything to make him suspicious. But I am not left to my own views on this point, because I had the evidence of two gentlemen, one of whom was the manager of a branch of the National Bank, and the other a retired branch manager of the Bank of Australasia, both of whom said it was the practice of banks in a case of this kind to make inquiries. It was true that banks were willing to take cheques, but before they would allow them to be operated upon they must be satisfied as to the respectability of the intended customer. Sometimes that was done by references, and sometimes by an introduction through a customer. That being evidence of the ordinary practice of bankers, I am not left to form my own conclusions. The defendant, in fact, did fall short of that degree of care ordinarily exercised by bankers, and therefore he was guilty of negligence.

I thought at one time that no inquiries would have helped, but counsel for the plaintiffs satisfied me that inquiries would have been useful. The pretended Jobson knew something of the real Mr. Jobson from the letter in which the cheque was enclosed. He knew that he was a member of University College, Oxford, and that his initials were R. H. Jobson, but he did not know what R. H. stood for, and accordingly he gave the names of Richard Henry. The initials, however, did not stand for Richard Henry, but for two other names. It was, therefore, quite clear that if the defendant had taken the precaution of making inquiries at Oxford as to whether Richard Henry Jobson was a member of University College, he would have been told that there was no person of that name in the college, although there was a person of the name of Robert Howard Jobson. This was a case, therefore, in which an inquiry would have been useful, and, as the defendant had failed to take the ordinary precautions which other banks usually take, there would be judgment against him for the amount claimed.

HATFIELD (OWNERS) v. GLASGOW (OWNERS). THE GLASGOW

[House of Lords (Earl Loreburn, Lord Dunedin, Lord Atkinson and Lord Parmoor), November 5, 6, December 8, 1914]

[Reported 84 L.J.P. 161; 112 L.T. 703; 13 Asp.M.L.C. 33]

House of Lords—Jurisdiction—Review of finding of fact—Concurrent findings of courts below—"Tolerably clear" that findings erroneous—Consideration of probability.

The rule that concurrent findings of fact should not be disturbed on appeal does not apply where there is tolerably clear evidence that the findings are erroneous, and this principle is especially applicable where the conclusion sought to be set aside rests upon the consideration of probability.

A vessel, the H., while rendering assistance to another vessel, the G., was rammed by the G. and all her hands with one exception were lost. In the court of first instance both vessels were held to blame, the H. owing to want of skilful navigation and the G. owing to the fact that she did not reverse her engines in time to avoid the collision, but the Court of Appeal reversed that decision and held that the H. was alone to blame.

Held: the House of Lords had jurisdiction to review the findings in the courts below as this was not a true example of concurrent findings; on the facts judgment would be entered for the H. and the G. pronounced alone to blame.

Rule laid down by Lord Herschell and Lord Watson in P. Caland and Freight (Owners) v. Glamorgan Steamship Co. (1), [1893] A.C. 207, as to concurrent findings considered.

Appeal by the plaintiffs, owners of the steamship Hatfield, against an order of the Court of Appeal.

A collision took place in the North Sea on Oct. 11, 1911, while the Hatfield, an iron screw steamship of 1,753 tons gross and 1,086 tons net register, at the request of those in charge of the Glasgow, was attempting to render assistance to the latter. The Glasgow was a steel screw steamship of 1,068 tons gross and 492 tons net register. On the morning of the collision the Glasgow, her steering gear having gone wrong, was drifting in the North Sea, flying signals of distress, and the Hatfield came up to take her in tow. She rounded the stern of the disabled vessel and came out on her starboard quarter. A few minutes later the Hatfield was struck on the port bow by the Glasgow's stem, and almost immediately went to the bottom, all her hands, with the exception of one man named Hagar, being lost. By the decree of the Admiralty Division both vessels were pronounced to blame. BARGRAVE DEANE, J., found that the master of the Hatfield in a heavy sea and wind miscalculated his direction and got too close to the Glasgow. He therefore attributed blame to the Hatfield. He found also those in charge of the Glasgow to blame, because although he did not find that the engines of the Glasgow were set ahead, he found that they were not reversed at the time and at the distance when they were asserted to have been reversed or at any material time. He was advised by the assessors and found that had the engines been so reversed the collision would have been avoided. The assessors in the Court of Appeal agreed with the advice given by the assessors to the judge in the court below. From that judgment both parties appealed to the Court of Appeal (LORD PARKER, LORD SUMNER and WARRINGTON, J.), who found that the Hatfield was alone to blame. In their opinion the sole cause of the collision was a miscalculation by those in charge of the Hatfield and negligence. The charges of negligence made against those navigating the Hatfield were: (i) That a good look-out was not kept (ii) that she failed to keep clear of the Glasgow; (iii) that she was in the circumstances manœuvred too close to the Glasgow, and improperly and at an improper distance attempted to cross the Glasgow's bows; (iv) her engines were not stopped or reversed in due time or at all; (v) that those in charge of her neglected to comply with art. 29 of the Sea Rules.

Art. 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is the only article of such regulations material to the case. Its terms are as follows:

> "Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel or the owner or master or crew thereof from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen or by the special circumstances of the case."

Roche, K.C., and Lewis Noad for the appellants.
Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., A. D. Bateson, K.C., and Raeburn for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Dec. 8, 1914. The following opinions were read.

EARL LOREBURN.—This is a collision case in which BARGRAVE DEANE, J., found both the two steamships to blame—namely, the Hatfield, which was sunk, and the Glasgow. The Court of Appeal found that the Hatfield alone was to blame. A sad feature of the collision is that all hands were lost in the Hatfield, except one man, Hagar by name. In such a state of things the crew of the surviving ship is especially bound to be careful not to admit any unconscious bias in favour of their own vessel into their evidence, and a court has always to keep in mind that what is said against the ship which has been destroyed is said against those who cannot tell their own story. I must advert to the fact that a scrap log was thrown overboard the morning after the collision because, it is said, it had been wetted by sea water and had been reduced to pulp. This has not, though it might have, affected my judgment, but it was very wrong to throw it overboard under the circumstances.

Some things are common ground. The Glasgow is a steamship of 1,068 tons gross. Her steering gear went wrong and she was drifting not far from the Galloper Lightship on the morning of Oct. 1, 1911, flying signals of distress. About 11 a.m. the Hatfield, a steamship of 1,753 tons gross, came up to take her in tow, rounded her stern, and came out on her starboard quarter. What then happened we have to collect from various sources, but in a few minutes the Hatfield was struck on her port bow by the Glasgow's stem, and almost immediately went to the bottom. At the time a gale was blowing from N. or N.E., and there was a rough sea. Everything else that is material we have to find out for ourselves from such evidence and indications as are afforded.

There are three sources of information, in addition to skilled witnesses. In the first place, the surviving ship, the Glasgow, was inspected when she came into port. The forward fluke of the anchor on her port side was broken off. There was substantially no setting over of the stem, and the rivets can be seen in the photographs, apparently not displaced. In fact, except the anchor on the port side, the bows of the Glasgow were not substantially injured. Now that shows one thing. When the impact took place the Hatfield was not going ahead. It is agreed that the stem of the Glasgow struck the port side of the Hatfield. In fact, it was clear, that the Glasgow struck the Hatfield practically at right angles and when the latter ship was not moving, or hardly moving. One more fact appeared from this inspection. The condition of the Glasgow's bows showed that the blow was not an up-and-down blow. The bows of the Glasgow went clean into the Hatfield.

Our next source of information is the solitary survivor of the Hatfield, namely, Hagar, who came on deck immediately after the collision. Bargrave Deane, J., who saw him, says he was an honest witness, but thought he was too agitated to be reliable upon detail. Hagar said that the stem of the Glasgow penetrated 6 ft. or 7 ft. into the Hatfield, at about right angles, and if that is accurate then the experts are satisfied, nor was it disputed that the Glasgow must have had headway on her—in other words, that she rammed the other ship—which, if accepted, would put an end to the case. I will not act upon that because I do not feel absolutely clear about the extent of penetration, and both courts below declined to accept it. It is due to the witness to say that his evidence is decidedly confirmed by the report made by the mate of the Glasgow to the master, and I am by no means sure that this is not true.

The last source of information is the crew of the Glasgow, and before I deal with that I will put together the facts which are either admitted or established, apart from what those present at the collision can prove. I take with me to the consideration of the Glasgow's evidence these facts: The blow was struck at about right angles; the Hatfield was practically motionless at the time; the blow was severe enough to sink her almost at once, and it was not an up-and-down blow.

Now for the account given by the officers of the Glasgow herself. The master's version was as follows, and the others agreed so far as they went. After describing how he had his steering gear broken and how the Hatfield passed under his stern and came out on the starboard quarter in order to take him in tow, he proceeds: "She appeared stationary there for about five or ten minutes and then she appeared to go on the same course as we were heading ourselves, and steaming slowly ahead; but it appeared to me that she was still edging in towards us all the time. When he had got forward of the beam he seemed to act on a starboard helm then and still edging in, and he got nearly abreast of our forecastle head, still under his starboard helm and still edging in towards us . . . well, he still had headway on him; he still appeared to be attempting to cross the bow, and when he had got nearly at right angles to us and about two ships' lengths off I thought it was dangerous and I put the engines full speed astern." Here the witness was interrupted by the learned judge, but he proceeds a little later: "Just when she was about these two ships' lengths off I rang the engines full speed astern, and I could tell by the vibration of the ship that the engines were going astern, and about a minute after I had rung the engines astern the collision occurred." The witness then described by models how the ships were placed towards each other at the time he thought there was a risk and ordered the engines full speed astern, and this diagram showed the Hatfield on the starboard bow of the Glasgow, not far from right angles and about 480 ft. off. The witness said that "the Hatfield came broadside down on us," and was steaming ahead at the time of the collision about four or five knots.

I know how strange are the views that honest men can take of what they have themselves seen, or even done, especially in times of agitation, and I do not wish to be understood as imputing falsehood, but I decline to accept this version, for the following reasons.

There is nothing to show that the relative positions of the two ships a minute before the accident was inaccurately described by the master of the Glasgow, Captain Turnbull. Taking it to have been broadly speaking as he described it, the crucial point is—how did these two ships get in a minute's time from that position into the position they were in unquestionably at the moment of collision, namely, the Hatfield right across the bows of the Glasgow, and the Glasgow's stem running into her at about right angles? They could not have drifted together in so short a time. Captain Turnbull says that the Hatfield "had been edging round on this starboard helm," and "as soon as the wind got her on the port quarter that assisted her to get round," and "the Hatfield came broadside down on us." He adds that at the time of the collision the Hatfield was "steaming ahead about four or five knots." That is in substance his explanation of the Hatfield's movements. In regard to the Glasgow he says that he reversed his engines when the ships were in the position described in the diagram, two ships' lengths apart, but the accident nevertheless occurred. I make all allowances for inexactitude as to distance and time, to which we are all liable. But this is quite clear. If the two ships were in anything like the position described by the master of the Glasgow in his diagram, it was his duty to reverse his engines in time to avoid a collision. The event proves that he did not reverse in time. The Hatfield could not move laterally. The Glasgow could move back, for her engines were in good working order, and there was ample sea room. Now, he says that he did reverse a minute before the collision, when the ships were in the position described. BARGRAVE DEANE, J., did not accept this statement, and his finding is not impaired by reason of the fact that he thought the order was given but not obeyed in the engine room. More than that, there is no statement in any of the logs except the engineer's log that the engines were reversed before the collision, and the engineer's log was written up six or seven days afterwards. More than that, the account given by Captain Turnbull to the owners' agent says nothing about reversing, but the Glasgow was lying dead in the water, and helpless, at the time of the collision. I will add that the nautical assessors advise us that there could have been no collision if the Glasgow had reversed at the time her master alleges. This being so, I agree with BARGRAVE DEANE, J. I am quite satisfied, on the evidence, that the Glasgow could have avoided the collision by reversing, and ought to have reversed, and did not so reverse. Therefore I hold the Glasgow to blame.

Ought we then to say that the Hatfield also was to blame? The contention of her owners at the trial rested partly on an allegation that the Glasgow rammed her by going ahead, and partly on the contention that the Glasgow ought to have reversed. To my mind it does not much signify what alternative views learned counsel thought it right to rely upon, provided there was no surprise, and that is not suggested. We have to act on the evidence. The only blame imputed to the Hatfield is that she came too near, though it was her business to come somewhat near with a view to taking the Glasgow in tow. The only evidence is the evidence of Captain Turnbull. I have already pointed out that his evidence cannot be accepted as to reversing his engines. Nor can it be accepted when he says that the Hatfield was moving at the speed of four or five knots when the collision occurred, because every witness agrees that she must have been practically motionless, judging from the condition of the Glasgow's bows, almost the only solid material we have in this case. Certainly I will not accept his evidence, under these circumstances, to inculpate another ship, when no one can contradict him. I do not mean to charge him with falsehood, because one knows how much room there is for honest error; but the story he tells of the way in which the one ship drifted on to the other is unsatisfactory in itself, quite apart from the errors I have adverted to already, and I cannot act upon it. I find, therefore, that, upon his own statement, upon which he must be judged, when corrected by other testimony, the master of the Glasgow was in fault, because he ought in any view to have avoided the collision by reversing. I am not at all satisfied with the evidence he gives of the Hatfield's default, and it is not proved that she was to blame.

I do not feel the difficulty of accepting Captain Turnbull's evidence when it inculpates himself and rejecting it where it inculpates the Hatfield. It is not a case of founding two mutually contradictory conclusions upon the same basis of facts, though this, too, may be sometimes necessary in a court of law, because a man's own evidence may be conclusive against himself as an admission when it cannot be received, and is no evidence at all against another person. But that is not this case. The master's statement is not an entirety, one and indivisible. Accepting that part of it which is not corrected by other evidence, I think it shows that he was to blame, and does not show that the Hatfield was

A to blame. I feel at liberty to form my own opinion on the whole of the evidence and the advice we receive, and to pick and choose what I believe to be true. I suspect that the Glasgow was going ahead, perhaps manœuvring to get near enough for a line to be thrown. It is sufficient to say that no fault on the part of the Hatfield has been proved to my satisfaction, and it is upon that ground that I found my opinion.

B LORD DUNEDIN.—I agree with the motion made by the noble earl who has preceded me, and I concur with much of what he has said. But, I feel constrained to go somewhat further, and to say that I have come to the conclusion that the true cause of the collision was that the Glasgow at the last moment went ahead and not astern. The fault I have to find with the judgments under appeal is that, with all respect to the learned judges, none of them faces the question: What caused the accident? There was a C collision of sufficient force to effect the sinking of the Hatfield in seven minutes after impact. The question of how that came about is not handled at all by the Court of Appeal, except in an indirect manner in some remarks by LORD SUMNER, and in the court of first instance it is left thus by the learned trial judge:

> "There was sufficient momentum between the two vessels to cause this serious damage which caused the Hatfield to sink."

Now, "momentum" never did and never will cause a collision. I do not make this remark as a mere verbal criticism on the use of the word without something more. What I do mean is that you must have motion in a certain direction on the part of one or both bodies in order to make those bodies collide, and before one can approach the question of blame I think it is necessary to make up one's mind on this topic. Now, the E Glasgow, it is admitted on all hands, was lying in the trough of the sea, with the wind on her starboard quarter, and drifting to leeward, and, upon the assumption that no use was made of her engines, was incapable of forward motion. Therefore, upon this assumption, the impact must have been due to motion on the part of the Hatfield. Inasmuch, however, as the collision, when it took place, was one in which the ships were, according to the description, almost at right angles to each other, the motion must have F been, if it existed, caused by a forward movement on the part of the Hatfield. The idea, however, is to my mind completely negatived by the fact, admitted by all, that if the Hatfield at the moment of collision had had forward way on her the bow of the Glasgow would have been twisted at least to a slight extent to port, which was not the case. Indeed, the expert witnesses for the Glasgow admit that at the moment of collision the Hatfield could not have had any way on her. The only other theory that G remains is, then, that the Hatfield, by her motion, having got into immediate proximity, the actual collision was caused by the effect of a wave lifting up one vessel and, so to speak, dropping it on to the other. But if this had happened the markings on the stem of the Glasgow must have been more or less vertical, whereas in fact they were all horizontal.

The matter, however, does not end there. All the expert witnesses admit that if the H penetration was severe it would speak to forward motion on the part of the Glasgow. Now, what was the penetration? It was at least sufficient to cut through the stringer plates, for without doing that you could not knock a hole in the vessel sufficient to make her founder in seven minutes. How much further did it go? The mate of the Glasgow admitted in cross-examination that the gash extended "to pretty near the coamings of the hatchway," and the sole survivor of the Hatfield said distinctly that he tried to get I past the hatchway on that side, and could not because of the knocked up splinters. I confess I am utterly unable to appreciate the comment of the learned trial judge on the evidence of this witness. I can imagine a great discount would have to be put on computation as to feet. But trying to get past a certain place and failing is a positive fact which does not rest on calculation, and, unless the witness is to be disbelieved, leaves no room for exaggeration one way or other. The calculation as to feet can be done afterwards on the plan.

What, however, is the view of the expert witnesses on the other side. They have to admit that an ugly hole was knocked in the Hatfield, or she would not have sunk. But they think that the penetration of the stem of the Glasgow cannot have been more than 2 ft. because they found marks on the sides of the stem, and those marks do not extend more than 2ft. from the actual nose of the stem. To my mind this is absolutely inconclusive and for a very simple reason. Of course, if you force a V-shaped wedge slowly into a homogeneous substance it may very well be that the marks on the sides of the "V" will register for you the extreme point of penetration. That, however, will only be because in the case supposed there will be lateral pressure on the edges of the wedge. But when you come to the case of a violent blow effected by the edge of a wedge-shaped object against a substance which is not homogeneous no such result necessarily follows. It becomes a question of chance, as to which no one can accurately predict how far the opposing substance is knocked clean away by the blow of the entering wedge. This is especially the case when you are dealing with metal. No one can tell where exactly the stringers, which admittedly were burst, would break away. It is, therefore, in my judgment, quite inconclusive as to the amount of penetration finally achieved to find out how far on the side of the stem you find marks of friction. On the whole matter I therefore come to the conclusion that this collision, with its effects, was impossible except in the view that the Glasgow had forward way. If that is so it settles the whole case, for I entirely concur with the reasoning of the noble earl as to the dearth of any evidence against the Hatfield. I cannot help thinking that the opinion I have just expressed was really shared by my noble friend, LORD SUMNER, and that he over-rated the weight to be put on BARGRAVE DEANE, J.'s, comment on the evidence of the survivor and the mate. I am very far from wishing to depart from the salutary rule as to our not, in this House, interfering with concurrent findings on matters of fact. I cannot, however, look on this case as a true example of concurrent findings. The learned trial judge and the Court of Appeal do not come to the same result, and their theory of what actually happened is not the same. And, further, neither the trial judge nor the Court of Appeal pronounce any finding on what caused the collision? To say that the Hatfield "came too near" is, in the circumstances, not enough. I therefore do not consider that in coming to the conclusion I have come to I in any way do violence to a rule which I should always wish to follow.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur. This is a most painful and embarrassing case. Every soul on board the Hatfield who could have given evidence as to the movements of his vessel and the cause of the collision has perished. The witnesses for the Glasgow have a free field. They can, if their consciences permit, without fear of contradiction, suppress facts, invent facts, minimise or exaggerate occurrences. One has to decide, in reality, on the story of one side. The story of the other side never can be told, and this demands that the case of the living against the dead should be clearly and satisfactorily established.

The Glasgow called for help. She invited the Hatfield to come to her assistance, and in a high wind and heavy sea endeavour to perform the difficult and dangerous operation of taking her in tow. In such an operation, I think, a duty was cast upon the vessel so asking for assistance to be on the alert, to observe the movements of the vessel come to salve her, to accommodate her own movements as far as safety would permit to those of the latter vessel, and to render aid, according to the rules of good seamanship, in assisting in the enterprise both desired to accomplish. The only fault attributed to the Hatfield is that her captain miscalculated his distance and came too close to the ship he was trying to salve. It was not even suggested that any other of his manœuvres were negligent or improper or contrary to good seamanship. But even if it be taken, for the moment, that he did come too close, and was in that respect guilty of negligence, and therefore to blame, the Glasgow would also be to blame if, by the exercise of due care and skill on her part, she could have avoided the consequence of the Hatfield's negligence. It would have been her duty to reverse her engines timeously so as to get stern-way on herself and get out of the way of the approaching ship so far as good seamanship in the circumstances would require. I do not think it is enough that the captain of the Glasgow should merely give the order to reverse at the moment he in fact came to the conclusion that the Hatfield was coming too close, if according to good seamanship he should, with his means of knowledge, have reached that conclusion earlier. If the Glasgow was moving ahead, then the reversing of her engines was in the result useless; no stern-way could be got upon her, and it is not even pretended by Captain Turnbull that any stern-way was acquired by her until the very moment of the collision. He said, I think, that she (i.e., his ship) just got stern-way on at the moment the collision took place.

Now for the case of the Glasgow, the reversing of her engines became the crucial movement. The first question is, Has it been satisfactorily proved that the engines were reversed at all, and secondly has it been satisfactorily proved that, even if reversed, they were reversed as soon as, according to the requirements of good seamanship, they should have been reversed?

I confess, Bargrave Deane, J.'s, way of dealing with this matter somewhat puzzles me. He evidently kept in mind the circumstances that the scrap log in existence at the time of the collision had disappeared; that in only one of the four logs produced is any mention whatever made of this reversing of the engines, though the logs were all written up at leisure; that the only log in which it does appear is written up one week after the arrival of the crew at Dover, and after consultation with the captain; that the entry is merely "Engines working full speed astern at the time"—i.e., the time of collision; that there is any statement whatever as to how soon that operation commenced, and that even this entry is inserted after entries of events occurring some days later than the collision itself. These, in my mind at all events, are rather damning facts. They throw, I think, grave suspicion on the Glasgow's case. Now, the learned judge deals with them thus. He comes to the conclusion—

(i) That the engines were in fact reversed.
(ii) That they were not reversed in time.
(iii) That the delay in reversing them was due to the absence of the engineer from the engine room.

This last finding was wholly wrong. Not only was there no evidence to support it, but it was in direct conflict with the only evidence given on the point. The engineer, according to the evidence, was sent down to the engine room by the captain, not one minute before the collision, but five minutes before the order to reverse was alleged to have been given. And then the judge says :

> "I do not believe, in the absence of proper books made up at the proper time, that these engines were reversing a minute before the collision, or anything like it. If they had been reversing for a minute, then I cannot believe that the Glasgow, which is a speedy ship, and, according to her engineer, would probably go eight knots at her full speed when reversing, could not, in a minute, have got away from the collision. He was not reversing for a minute; there was not time to reverse a minute. The whole thing was done late."

He thus rejects the evidence of the captain and engineer, that the latter was ordered to go to the engine room, and went there five minutes before the order to reverse was given. He further rejects their evidence that the engines were reversed one minute before the collision, but he accepts the statement made by them that the engines were in fact reversed, which is the very fact upon which the state of the log books throws most suspicion.

The Court of Appeal, seeing that this third finding was in conflict with the only evidence given on the point, most properly put it aside, and Captain Turnbull having sworn that he gave the signal to reverse the engines as soon as he observed that the Hatfield was approaching too close, held that he was not guilty of any negligence. It is clear, that if the Hatfield was at the time of the collision steaming across the bow of the Glasgow from starboard to port at any considerable rate of speed, the stem of the Glasgow must have been twisted or bent to port. It has not been bent to port. On the contrary, according to the evidence of the two experts, Messrs. Casebourn and Blackett, it has been bent slightly to starboard. The first of these witnesses said that the existence of this twist to starboard involves the theory that the Hatfield was very nearly motionless. If she had been going about four or five knots, the speed her captain fixes, the stem of the Glasgow would have been bent to port. Mr. Blackett agrees with him, and the theory of the collision which the former of these two gentlemen adopts is this, that there was a hatchet blow "from the Glasgow inflicted on the other vessel." If that means that the Glasgow from the crest of a wave fell down upon the Hatfield, cutting into her hull so deeply that she sank in a few minutes, then the unfortunate thing for this theory is that the Glasgow delivered this blow from above downwards without inflicting a single vertical scratch on her own hull. The marks she bore were horizontal. The same consideration would apply if the Hatfield from the crest of a wave had fallen upon the stem of the Glasgow. It appears to me almost inconceivable that the collision could have occurred in either of these ways without leaving some vertical marks upon the stem and bow of the Glasgow. The fact that the marks are horizontal suggests, I think strongly, that the stem of the Glasgow did not come into collision with the hull of the Hatfield with an ascending or descending motion; but that the blow was, on the contrary, a direct and level blow. I cannot find that BARGRAVE DEANE, J., ever alluded to this important point, or found as a fact, or even indicated what in his opinion, the speed of the Hatfield was as she approached the Glasgow. It is, I think, clear that the speed could not have been as high as that mentioned by her captain, four or five knots. From the evidence of the experts as to the bending the Glasgow's stem to starboard, it could hardly have been half so much.

The captain of the Glasgow must be held bound by the diagram he drew. He said that the Hatfield was distant from him two lengths of his own ship, i.e., 480 ft. (160 yards), at right angles to her, when he concluded that the Hatfield was coming too close, and gave the order to reverse. Now a knot is about 2,000 yards; 160 yards is something a little more than one-twelfth of this. If the Hatfield was going ahead at the rate of two knots, that would be one knot in thirty minutes, she would steam one-twelfth of a knot in two and a half minutes. If going at three knots it meant a knot in twenty minutes and one-twelfth of a knot in one and two-third minutes. But the captain said that though he kept his engines going astern after the impact, he only kept them going for a minute altogether from first to last. Again he said that he only felt the vibrations of the engines going astern for about half a minute. The strange thing is, however, that he says that he thought the Hatfield was getting too close five minutes before he gave the order to reverse. The learned judge put the question to him: "About five minutes before that you saw the chief engineer on the bridge deck?" Answer: "Yes". "And told him what?" Answer: "To be ready, as I thought the ship was getting rather close to us and I might require to go astern or go ahead, whichever I thought fit." He also says when the Hatfield got only 480 ft. away he thought it was dangerous. Captain Turnbull had, therefore, ample warning. He saw and appreciated the threatening danger, yet five precious minutes were by him allowed to elapse before he took action. If he had reversed when the Hatfield was 160 yards away he must, having regard to the rate of progress of the latter vessel, have got stern-way on his own ship in time and kept clear. BARGRAVE DEANE, J., found as a fact that the Glasgow was late in reversing, but gave a bad reason for his conclusion. There are no concurrent findings of fact on this point, and, therefore, nothing to prevent your Lordships from coming to the conclusion that the Glasgow was too late in reversing, and was therefore to blame.

The remaining question is, was the Hatfield to blame? I confess I have the greatest difficulty in accepting the conclusion that the injuries the Hatfield received were brought about in the manner described by the expert witnesses or by Captain Turnbull. It may well be that Hagar was inaccurate as to the precise number of feet to which his ship was penetrated, but he was found to be an absolutely honest witness, intending to speak the truth. Why, then, should his evidence be rejected when he says he could not pass between the hole in the Hatfield's side and the hatch coamings, the jagged ends of the irons helping to prevent his doing so? He tried to pass in order to see the damage done to his ship, and he says he had to go up to the forecastle deck to discover if the water was coming into her hold—a vital matter for him. He states that his opinion was that the Glasgow must have been going ahead to be able to deliver the blow that she did. The forming of that opinion tends I think, to prove Hagar's sagacity rather than his inacliability, but he receives the strongest corroboration of his statement as to the depth of the penetration of his ship from the fact that at the very moment of, or very soon after the collision, the mate of the Glasgow told his captain that his ship had cut into the Hatfield too near the coamings of her hatch. There was little or no time for invention. It was said at once. He repeated it at the Board of Trade inquiry, and though on the trial he tried to wriggle out of this statement, he was ultimately forced to admit that what he had stated at the inquiry was correct. No doubt that evidence was in conflict with the evidence of the two experts, who from the absence of all signs of injury on the bow of the Glasgow beyond 2 ft. from her stem, concluded that she could have only penetrated 4 ft. into the hull of the Hatfield. Well, no doubt it would be somewhat strange that if she had penetrated deeper than 2 ft. some more marks or injuries to her hull more aft of her stem than those found should not have been discovered, but not at all more strange than that she should have given or received a descending or ascending blow, and nothing but the horizontal marks or scorings been found upon her hull. Nor, indeed, more strange, it would appear to me, than that she should have penetrated even to the depth of 2 ft., and, considering what she must have gone through, not been more damaged than she was. For it was, as I take it, proved by Mr. Steel that the stem of the Glasgow must have cut through three stringer plates and for some distance through part of an iron deck, making a V-shaped hole in the side of the Hatfield through which the water rushed in and sank her. It is not disputed that the stem of the Glasgow made this hole. The mate saw it. The blow must, therefore, have been delivered with considerable force, and must, I should think, have been a level and direct blow. An effort was made at the trial to show that it was not delivered at right angles, but that is contrary to the case made at the earlier stages of the proceedings.

I think that the evidence as to the nature of the Hatfield injuries is not inconsistent with Hagar's opinion that the Glasgow had headway on her when the collision occurred. It is scarcely possible, one would think, that all this injury could have been inflicted if the Glasgow was at the time of the collision a receding vessel. Such is the extremely unsatisfactory position in which the case is left. It could not, I think, be successfully contended that the case of the Hatfield came within the principle laid down in Skinner v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Rail. Co. (2) and Great Western Rail. Co. of Canada v. Fawcett (3) and such like cases, to the effect that the happening of the accident is primâ facie proof of negligence on the part of the persons having control over the thing which caused the accident. Bargrave Deane, J., though he apparently disbelieved much that Captain Turnbull and his engineer deposed to on other points, believed them when they said they never went ahead, and endeavoured to reconcile this conclusion with the extent of the Hatfield's injury by saying first that the amount of penetration of the Glasgow stem into the Hatfield was not so great as is alleged, and then by saying that "we all know in these collision cases that the damage is most difficult to reconcile with the history of the case." Certainly this is a case to which this last remark is singularly applicable; but he never dealt with the question of the horizontal marks upon the bows of the Glasgow—no more than he dealt with the speed of the Hatfield. I have no hesitation in saying that in my view the evidence does not, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, establish satisfactorily that the Hatfield was guilty of any negligence causing this collision.

The question is: Am I precluded from giving effect to that opinion by the rule as to concurrent findings of fact laid down by Lords Herschell and Watson in P. Caland and Freight (Owners) v. Glamorgan Steamship Co., The P. Caland (1). Lord Watson said he concurred that the findings of fact in the courts below should not be disturbed in this House unless their Lordships should arrive at a tolerably clear conclusion that the findings are erroneous, and added > "and the principle is specially applicable to a case in which the conclusion sought to be set aside rests upon consideration of probability."

The question of fact there alluded to was this: whether the red side-light of the ship Caland was invisible to the crew on board the Glamorgan—the ship which collided with her—or whether it was visible but was either unseen by the latter's crew, or seen and disregarded. Both the courts held that on a balance of probability the light was not visible. There was in that case, as in Gray v. Turnbull (4) abundant evidence on each side. Here there was no conflict of evidence. There could not be. But once BARGRAVE DEANE, J., believed the captain and engineer on this one point, that their ship did not go ahead, the only point on which apparently he did believe them, he concluded that the Hatfield came too close and was to blame. The Court of Appeal did not feel itself at liberty, notwithstanding the circumstantial evidence, to disagree with the opinion of the judge in the court below as to the credibility of these witnesses, and accordingly accepted his decision as to the culpability of the Hatfield. I think, however, that these two decisions fall far short of such concurrent findings of fact as LORD HERSCHELL and LORD WATSON were dealing with in the case above cited. In my opinion, therefore, your Lordships are not debarred by the rule there laid down from holding that, considering all the evidence, direct and circumstantial, in this case, it has not been satisfactorily established that the Hatfield was to blame. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal of the Hatfield should be allowed, and the Glasgow should be held alone to blame. I do not think that The Ngapoota (5) applies to this case, as the captain of the Glasgow, five minutes before he says he ordered the engines to be reversed, thought that the Hatfield was too close.

LORD PARMOOR, stated the facts and continued.—The main case put forward by the appellants was that, immediately before the collision, the engines of the Glasgow were put ahead and should have been put astern, and that in consequence of this she rammed and sank the Hatfield. The nature and extent of the injury to the Hatfield are not inconsistent with this explanation of the collision, and the marks on the stem of the Glasgow are in a horizontal direction, such as would naturally be found on a ramming ship. Owing to the loss of life it was not possible for the appellants to call direct evidence. They mainly relied on the evidence of experts to prove that the nature of the injuries to the Hatfield was such that they could not have been inflicted unless the Glasgow was steaming ahead at the time. The learned judge held that the amount of the penetration by the Glasgow's stem in the Hatfield's side was not so deep as alleged, and did not sustain the case of the appellants that the Glasgow must have been steaming ahead at the time of the collision. He found that the engines had not been put ahead immediately prior to the collision. In this finding the Court of Appeal concurred.

Although the evidence on this point appears to me to be of an unsatisfactory and inconclusive character, I am not prepared to differ from the finding of the learned trial judge, endorsed in the decision of the Court of Appeal. The learned trial judge further found that the Glasgow did not reverse her engines in time, and that the whole thing was done too late. He says:

I can see no reason for differing from the learned judge's finding under this head, although there is considerable difficulty in dealing with a case in which direct evidence is only available on one side. An agreed diagram to which I attach great importance shows the direction of the wind and "the position of the vessels when Glasgow's engine ordered full speed astern, as stated by Captain Turnbull, a witness for the defendant." In the diagram the distance shown between the two vessels is approximately 480 ft. Captain Turnbull in his evidence estimates that the Hatfield was steaming ahead at about four or five knots. If this had been accurate the collision would have taken place in about a minute from the time that the Glasgow's engines were said to be ordered "full speed astern." Having regard to the state of the stem of the Glasgow after the collision, I think it is impossible that the Hatfield could have been steaming at this rate, and that her speed was probably not more than two knots. Assuming that the speed of the Hatfield did not exceed two knots, the captain of the Glasgow appreciated the danger and ordered "full speed astern," according to the witness of the diagram, two minutes at least before the collision. If the order was so given and had been promptly carried out there was sufficient interval for the stern-way to be got on the Glasgow before the collision took place, and the accident would have been avoided. Without attempting to determine the exact cause of the delay, I should draw the same conclusion as the learned trial judge, that, having regard to the time at which the captain of the Glasgow appreciated the risk of a collision, the engines were not reversed in time, and the whole thing was done too late. I agree with the opinion expressed by Lord Parker, that it is not fair to be too meticulous on the question of time, but it is proved that had the engines been reversed not less than one minute before the collision, an appreciable way astern would have been got on the vessel, sufficient to avoid the collision.

The learned trial judge, in forming his opinion of the time at which the engines of the Glasgow were reversed, comments on the absence of proper books made at the proper time. There is no satisfactory explanation given by the repondents. The statement of the captain of the Glasgow that the scrap log, being reduced to a pulp, was thrown away from the bridge deck, is open to serious adverse comment. Whatever its condition, every document, in a case in which one ship has foundered and the crew is lost, should be carefully safeguarded as a precaution in the interest of truth and good faith. The logs produced, other than the engineer's entry from his scrap log, were upon Oct. 1, and contain no reference to a reversal of the engines of the Glasgow. This same criticism applies to the letter of Oct. 2, written from Messrs. Hammond to the owners of the Glasgow, and forwarded on information obtained from Captain Turnbull. This letter makes no reference to a reversal of the engines. The entry from the engineer's scrap log contains the entry, "engine full speed astern at the time," but it was not made until Oct. 9, and gives no assistance in solving the difficulties which surround the case. I am therefore of opinion that the learned judge was justified in finding that the Glasgow did not reverse her engines in time, and holding that in this respect she was to blame. On the question whether the Hatfield was solely to blame, I concur with the judgment of my noble friend on the Woolsack, and I do not desire to add anything further.

Appeal allowed.

MERCANTILE MARINE SERVICE ASSOCIATION v. TOMS AND OTHERS

[Court of Appeal (Swinfen Eady and Pickford, L.JJ.), November 23, 24, 1915]

[Reported [1916] 2 K.B. 243; 85 L.J.K.B. 311; 114 L.T. 124]

Practice—Parties—Representative parties—Action for tort—Libel—Defendants—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9.

By R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9: "Where there are numerous persons having the same interest in one cause or matter, one or more of such persons may sue or be sued, or may be authorised by the court or a judge to defend in such cause or matter, on behalf of or for the benefit of all persons so interested."

The plaintiffs sued the three defendants, who were the chairman, vice-chairman, and secretary of a guild, "on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members" of the guild, for damages for an alleged libel contained in a newspaper owned and managed by the guild. The guild was an unregistered voluntary association, comprised of some 15,000 members, regulated by rules, and governed by a committee. The plaintiffs applied under Ord. 16, r. 9, for an order that the defendants be appointed to represent all other members of the guild.

Held: in an action for libel the persons responsible were those who published or authorised the publication of the words complained of; only those members of the guild who were responsible for that publication could be made liable; and, therefore, the other members of the guild did not have "the same interest in the cause" as those who had published the words complained of, the rule did not apply, and no order for representation could be made.

Quære, whether Ord. 16, r. 9, applies in an action in tort.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Low, J., at chambers.)

The plaintiffs issued a writ against A. T. Toms, T. W. Moore, and J. W. Grace ("sued on their behalf and on behalf of all other members of the Imperial Merchant Service Guild"), and Charles Birchall, Ltd. The claim on the writ was for damages for libel contained in the "Guild Gazette," a journal of the Imperial Merchant Service Guild, published Sept. 1, 1915. According to an affidavit sworn by the secretary of the plaintiff association the guild, which had for its objects (inter alia) the protection of the interests and the legal defence of captains, officers, and apprentices of the merchant service, was composed of a very large number of persons who had a community of interest in the funds of the guild and in the above-mentioned publication, and the rules of the guild provided that in the event of a dissolution of the guild or its amalgamation by another body, the funds should be divided equally among its existing members. The named defendants were the chairman, secretary, and vice-chairman of the guild, and the chairman and vice-chairman were members of the management committee. The "Guild Gazette" was owned and managed by the guild. The plaintiffs applied under Ord. 16, r. 9, for an order that the defendants, and A. Kinloch and A. Wilkinson, being joint trustees with the defendant T. W. Moore of the guild, should be appointed to represent all other members of the guild, and that the trustees be added as defendants. Low, J., affirming the district registrar, made no order on the application.

Rigby Swift, K.C., and J. H. Layton for the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are entitled to an order under Ord. 16, r. 9, that the defendants and the trustees, who hold the invested funds of the guild, should be appointed to represent in the action all the other members of the guild. Here the defendants and the trustees are fairly representative of the guild; and the plaintiffs require the order for the purpose of getting at the funds of the guild which are vested in the trustees. There appears to be no express authority for making the order in actions in tort, but the plaintiffs should receive the assistance of the court in their attempt to render liable the persons responsible for the libel, and the application of the rule should be extended if necessary to actions in tort.

Gordon Hewart, K.C., and Greaves Lord, for the defendants, were not called on to argue.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Low, J., refusing the plaintiffs' application and affirming the decision of the district registrar. The action is for libel, and the plaintiffs by their writ claim damages. The plaintiffs, the Mercantile Marine Service Association, sue in respect of the libel published, as they allege, upon themselves. The defendants at present on the record are Toms, Moore, and Grace, and then the writ goes on to say "sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members of the Imperial Merchant Service Guild" and Charles Birchall, Ltd. It appears that there is a voluntary unregistered association called "the Imperial Merchant Service Guild." It is an association, we are told, having something like 15,000 members, but it is a voluntary association. There are certain rules by which it is regulated, and its affairs are governed by a management committee. It is said that this association issues three times a year a periodical called the "Guild Gazette," a journal of the Imperial Merchant Service Guild, and of which the short title is "The Merchant Service Guild." The plaintiffs complain that in this publication they have been libelled, and it is for that libel that they claim damages.

The application which has been refused, and the refusal of which is the subject of this appeal, is an application by the plaintiffs by which they ask that the first three defendants—Toms, Moore, and Grace—Toms being the chairman of the association, Moore the secretary, and Grace the vice-chairman, be appointed to represent all other members of the Imperial Merchant Service Guild. That is the first part of their application. Then the second part is for leave to add as defendants in the action Andrew Kinloch and Andrew Wilkinson, who, with the defendant Moore, are the trustees of the invested funds of the guild. So what the plaintiffs desire to do is to obtain an order that these three officers—the chairman, secretary, and vice-chairman—may be appointed to represent all the other members of this association in the action for libel. Then it asks to add the defendant Moore, who is already one of the trustees, Mr. Kinloch and Mr. Wilkinson, as the trustees of the invested funds.

To deal with the latter part first. If it was a mere application for leave to amend by adding additional defendants, there would be no opposition, but what the plaintiffs are really desirous of obtaining is that they may not only sue the three trustees and have them as defendants on the record, so that if they obtain a judgment for damages in the action they may obtain payment out of the funds of which those persons are trustees, but they also ask that the three officers may be appointed to represent all the members of the guild. They make the application under Ord. 16, r. 9:

> "Where there are numerous persons having the same interest in one cause or matter, one or more of such persons may sue or be sued, or may be authorised by the court or a judge to defend in such cause or matter, on behalf of or for the benefit of all persons so interested."

I have great difficulty in seeing that in the present case there are numerous persons having the same interest in this cause or matter within the meaning of the rule. The action is for libel, and primâ facie it is for the plaintiffs to prove the persons who have issued the libel, and it is primâ facie only those who have issued it, either by themselves or their agents or servants, or directly authorised the libel, who are liable. No doubt, every defendant in an action has a common interest with every other defendant in the sense that every defendant hopes and wishes that the action will fail. That is not, of course, what the rule means. The various members of this association may be in a wholly different position. With regard to the defence of some members, if the management committee were sued, and if in fact they authorised the publication of the libel, it may be that their defence would be that the material complained of was not capable of the meaning alleged, or of any libellous meaning. It may be that their defence would be that it did not refer to the plaintiffs; upon the footing that they had authorised it, they may raise such defences of that kind as may be open to them. The other members of the association might say: "However libellous it may be, we did not authorise it and took no part or share in it. We were on the high seas and did not see it in the 'Gazette,' and know nothing about it." In my opinion, this rule is not intended to apply to any such case as this, and the case is not within the rule. I think the statement that LINDLEY, L.J., made in Temperton v. Russell (1) ([1893] 1 Q.B. at p. 438) is applicable to this case and that the persons assumed to be represented by these three officers whom it is proposed to sue, the chairman, vice-chairman, and secretary, the members of the association assumed to be represented by those three persons, have no such interest as is contemplated by the rule.

I have asked whether there is any authority in the case of action of tort, because this is a pure tort, for the application of this rule, and no case has been referred to, and so far as I know there is no case in the books, in which it has ever been done. In Wood v. McCarthy (2), a judgment of the Divisional Court WILLS, J., referring to what LINDLEY, L.J., said in Temperton v. Russell (1) ([1893] 1 Q.B. at p. 438), says that the lord justice was referring to the well-established practice in the Court of Chancery, and was pointing out the distinction between actions of contract and actions of tort:

> "What he [LINDLEY, L.J.] said was: 'This expression only extends, we think, to persons who have or claim some beneficial proprietary right, which they are asserting or defending in the cause or matter. The plaintiff in this case sues for damages, and the action . . . is founded on tort.'"

True it is that the limitation of the rule to which LINDLEY, L.J., gave expression in Temperton v. Russell (1)—that is to say, the limitation—that the expression only extends to persons who have or claim some beneficial proprietary right which they are asserting or defending in the cause or matter has been dissented from and is no longer law. But, apart from that, the decision in Temperton v. Russell (1) is good law. In Wood v. McCarthy (2), WILLS, J., in the passage I have just read, was pointing out that this did not apply to cases of tort, and I am not aware that the rule has ever been applied in cases of this kind, and one can see many reasons why it should not be so applied. That appears in Walker v. Sur (3) both in the judgments of BUCKLEY, L.J., and of KENNEDY, L.J. No doubt, counsel for the plaintiffs is quite right in saying that there are dicta in Taff Vale Rail. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (4), especially in the speech of LORD MACNAGHTEN, which indicate that in a proper case it is possible that an order of that kind may be made; but I am quite satisfied that the present case is not such a case, and no order ought to be made here. Nor do I think that the plaintiffs are in need of obtaining the order which they seem to think they need, because, if it be the fact that the issue of this paper contains a libel, they may sue and recover relief against the persons who have authorised the libel and who directed its insertion. That being so, I am of opinion that the order of LOW, J., affirming the registrar, and refusing to make the order, was right, and this appeal wholly fails.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We start with the fact that no such order has ever been known to be made. It does not follow from that that the order cannot be made, but at any rate it suggests doubts whether it ought to be made. It is sought in an action of libel to make defendants by representation some 15,000 members of an unincorporated association. It does not seem to me that it is at all necessary to do so in order to give the plaintiffs such rights as they may be found to be entitled to. No reason has been given to us why the plaintiffs will be able to try their right more fairly or to get their remedy more certainly by making this order. There are many dicta in wide terms, some of which no doubt would seem primâ facie to cover a case of this kind. There are other dicta equally strong, such as that mentioned by WILLS, J., in delivering judgment in Wood v. McCarthy (2) as having been made by LINDLEY, L.J., in Temperton v. Russell (1), which are as strong as possible against such an order being made. I find that LORD MACNAGHTEN, in Duke of Bedford v. Ellis (5) said this ([1901] A.C. at p. 10):

> "As regards defendants, if you cannot make everybody interested a party, you must bring so many that it can be said that they will fairly and honestly try the right."

I asked the learned counsel for the plaintiffs whether he was able to say that the action, being as at present constituted, or perhaps with the addition of the trustees, he could not fairly try the right, and he admitted that he was not able to say so. If that be so, and the plaintiffs can fairly try the right with the action as at present constituted, or perhaps with the addition of the trustees, it seems to me there is no reason whatever to make the order in this case, and, therefore, the appeal will be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Funds of a registered branch (or lodge) of a friendly society having been used in a manner not authorised by the rules,

Held: a claim by the trustees of the society for a declaration that the trustees, secretary and treasurer of the branch had been guilty of breaches of trust was not a "dispute" referable to arbitration under s. 68 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, and, therefore, an action for such a declaration, an account, and an injunction could be maintained by the trustees of the society.

Appeal by the plaintiff against an order staying further proceedings in the action made by the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster, Manchester district.

The Grand United Order of Oddfellows Friendly Society ("the order") was a registered friendly society composed of branches called districts and lodges, each district consisting of a number of lodges. The objects of the order (r. 2) were the raising of a fund or funds mainly for the payment of sickness and funeral benefits, the relief of members when travelling in search of employment during temporary or permanent disablement, and in old age, the relief of widows and orphans of members, and the establishment of accident, pension, and superannuation funds. There was provision (r. 72) for the establishment of lodges whose duties were stated to be: (i) to establish a sick and funeral fund for the payment of sick and funeral benefits under the lodge rules; (ii) to establish a management fund for the payment of expenses of management; (iii) to establish a distress or relief fund for the assistance of members in distressed circumstances; (iv) to provide medical advice, attendance, and medicine to members in sickness; and (v) the establishment of any other funds, and such other duties as might be provided for by the general and district rules. A lodge was empowered (r. 31) to appropriate surplus capital in the payment of additional benefits, but no lodge could divide its funds (r. 94), to be devoted to the objects of the society, without the sanction of the branch of directors and a certificate of dissolution from the Registrar of Friendly Societies. Money wrongly divided was to be recovered by legal process. The first rule of the Burnley district and that of the Lord Nelson Lodge provided that the objects and rules of district and lodge be carried into effect subject to the rules of the order.

The plaintiffs Mathew Winter and William Coventry, trustees of the order alleged that on or about Nov. 16, 1911, the board of directors of the order sanctioned the appropriation by the Lord Nelson Lodge of surplus capital under the provisions of r. 31, for the purpose of granting increased sick benefits, increased funeral benefits to members and members' wives, and of assisting members who were out of work and could not pay their contributions. They alleged that they had learnt that the defendants, James Wilkinson, John Thomas Whittaker and James Newbold, the trustees, John Thomas Aldersley, the secretary, and Thomas Atkin, the treasurer of the Lord Nelson Lodge, in or about the year 1912, wrongfully and in breach of rr. 31 and 94 of the rules of the order, appropriated and distributed funds of the lodge amounting, so far as the plaintiffs were able to ascertain, to £755 6s., by dividing the same among the whole of the members of the lodge, without having obtained the sanction of the board of directors or a certificate of dissolution from the Registrar of Friendly Societies. Such wrongful appropriation and division constituted, the plaintiffs alleged, a breach of trust on the part of the defendants, and they were personally liable to make good all sums so appropriated and divided. By the provisions of r. 94 the funds so wrongfully divided had become forfeited to the general funds of the order, and were recoverable by legal process. The plaintiffs claimed (1) a declaration that the appropriation by the defendants, as trustees and officers of the lodge, of the funds thereof, and the division of the same among the members of the lodge, were breaches of trust by the defendants, and that the defendants were personally liable to restore and make good all funds and property so divided as aforesaid; (ii) all necessary accounts and inquiries and orders for repayment and otherwise; (iii) an injunction to restrain the defendants from further appropriating or dividing the funds of the lodge or any part thereof. A motion was made by the defendants for a stay of all further proceedings in this action on the ground that the question between the parties was a "dispute" within the meaning of s. 68 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, that ought to be referred to arbitration. On Oct. 13, 1914, the case came on to be heard before the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster, Manchester district, who made an order staying all further proceedings in the action.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 10, 1914. LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., read the following judgment of the court.—This appeal from an order of the Vice-Chancellor staying all further proceedings in the action raises an important question under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. Can an action be maintained against the trustees of a lodge registered as a branch under the Act, or must the matter be decided by the domestic tribunal of the lodge under s. 68?

The plaintiffs are the trustees of the Grand United Order of Oddfellows Friendly Society. Three of the defendants are the trustees of the Lord Nelson Lodge No. 9 of the Burnley District of the order. A fourth defendant is the secretary, and the fifth defendant is the treasurer of the lodge. The statement of claim sets out the material part of r. 31 of the order. [His Lordship read it, and continued:] Rule 72 provides for the establishment of lodges and the duties of lodges, which it is unnecessary to read. It also sets out r. 94 and r. 1 of the rules of the lodge. The language of s. 68 is very wide:

> "(1) Every dispute between . . . (d) an officer of any such registered branch and the society or branch of which that registered branch is a branch . . . shall be decided in manner directed by the rules."

It has, however, been decided in many cases that the dispute to which the section applies must be between the society and a person in his capacity as a member. For example, a society can sue a member for appropriate relief under a mortgage granted by a member to the society: see Morrison v. Glover (1), Prentice v. London (2), and Mulkern v. Lord (3).

It remains to consider what is the legal position of trustees of a friendly society. By s. 49 (1) all the property of a society vests in the trustees, who need not be members. By s. 9 (3) and the first schedule cl. 2 the rules must provide the purposes for which the funds of the society are to be applicable. This is done in r. 28 of the Lodge Rules. If the trustees apply the funds in a manner not authorised by the rules, and indeed expressly prohibited by the rules, they are guilty of a breach of trust. They are liable to be sued, not in their character of members, for they need not be members, but in their character of trustees in whom property is vested by Act of Parliament to be held upon certain trusts. What we have said about an action against the trustees applies in principle also to the secretary and treasurer in so far as they have been parties to the breach of trust. They stand in a fiduciary position. The Court of Queen's Bench more than fifty years ago held that a treasurer might be sued for money had and received, and that the section of the Act then in force, corresponding to s. 68, did not take away the common law right of action: Sinden v. Banks (4). That authority has never been questioned. The present action is not a common law action, but is an equitable action claiming relief by a beneficiary against the trustees, and the same principle must apply. Chitty, J. in Cox v. James (5) granted the precise relief sought in the present case. It is true that the point under the section corresponding to s. 68 was not taken, probably because counsel thought it was not a sound point after Sinden v. Banks (4).

In our opinion the order of the Vice-Chancellor was wrong. The action ought not to be stayed and the defendants must put in a defence. We prefer to base our decision on the general ground that this is not a dispute within the meaning of s. 68. But our decision might be based upon the particular rules of this society. Rule 41 provides that a dispute > "shall be reduced to writing, and referred to the following general meeting for settlement except where otherwise provided by these rules."

And r. 94 does otherwise provide, for it says that money wrongly divided by a lodge is to be "recovered by legal process"—words which exclude settlement by a general meeting. In the view which we take it is not necessary to consider the authorities which have been cited as to the circumstances in which certain disputes between a society and a member in his capacity as a member, may still be dealt with by the court. The result is that the appeal must be allowed and the defendants must pay the costs here and below.

Appeal allowed.

R. v. CREWE LICENSING JUSTICES. Ex Parte BRICKER AND OTHERS

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (A. T. Lawrence, Lush and Atkin, JJ.), July 1, 1914]

Licensing—Transfer of licence—Old on-licence—Undertaking by transferee—Jurisdiction of justices to impose.

Upon an application for the transfer of an old on-licence the licensing justices have no power since the passing of the Licensing Act, 1904, to impose upon the transferee an undertaking or to make the transfer of the licence conditional upon the transferee giving an undertaking as to the management of the licensed premises, even though such undertaking was given when the licence was first granted before 1904.

Notes. Sections 16 (5), 18 (1), 23 (2) (c) and Sched. II, Part II, Supplemental, of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, were repealed by the Licensing Act, 1953, and replaced by ss. 11 (4), 14, 21 (7) and s. 14 (5) of that Act respectively.

As to renewal of licences, see 22 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 549 et seq., as to undertaking on renewal of old on-licence, see ibid., 556; and for cases see 30 DIGEST (Repl.) 29, 30, 36 et seq. For the Licensing Act, 1953, ss. 11 (4), 14 (5), see 33 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 158, 162.

Rule Nisi for a mandamus directed to the licensing justices for the borough of Crewe in the county of Chester commanding them to deliver to one Albert Bricker the transfer of a licence in respect of the premises known as the Earl of Crewe Hotel, situate in Crewe, without any endorsement on such licence, or, in the alternative, for a mandamus commanding them to hold a transfer sessions and to proceed to hear and determine the matter of an application by the said Albert Bricker and by the two executors of Catherine Bebbington, widow, deceased, for the transfer to Bricker of the licence formerly held by Catherine Bebbington in respect of the said premises. The rule was obtained at the instance of Bricker and the executors upon the ground that an undertaking given by one John Bebbington in 1896 had now expired, and that the licensing justices had no power to compel the granting of another undertaking or to impose a condition upon the transfer of the licence. In the affidvit of the applicants' solicitor, upon which the rule was granted, the facts were stated as follows. At the general annual licensing meeting for the borough of Crewe held in August, 1896, John Bebbington, was granted a full licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors for the Earl of Crewe Hotel. That provisional grant was subsequently duly confirmed, and Mr. Bebbington giving an undertaking that the house should be a free house, so long as he had control over it. John Bebbington died in June, 1907, and after his death the licence was transferred to his two sons, and then on Feb. 28, 1911, to Catherine Bebbington, his widow, who carried on the hotel until her death on Feb. 22, 1914, as fully licensed premises under licences annually renewed to her. The hotel remained a free house during that period. On May 12, 1914, the solicitor for the applicant Bricker, who was the tenant selected by a brewery company to whom the hotel was being sold, applied for the transfer to Bricker of the licence granted to Mrs. Catherine Bebbington, and no objection was raised to the proposed tenant. The application was adjourned, and at the adjourned transfer sessions on June 23, 1914, application was again made for the transfer. At the request of the justices evidence was given by the assistant clerk as to the undertaking given by John Bebbington in 1896, but it appeared that no entry had been made in the register of licences as to any condition or undertaking, and no undertaking or condition was endorsed on the original licence or on any renewal thereof. The justices decided to transfer the licence to Bricker, but the chairman stated that the licence would be endorsed to the effect that it was to be conducted on the basis of the undertaking given by John Bebbington in 1896, when the licence was originally granted to him, and they declined to allow the licence to be given to Bricker except with the endorsement upon it. As the transfer could not be obtained without the endorsement and as all the parties objected to the giving of any such endorsement, the hotel had been closed, there being no one entitled to carry on the business, and the brewery company, who had contracted to purchase the hotel, declined to carry out their contract unless the licence was granted without the endorsement.

In answer to the rule, an affidavit was made by the chairman of the licensing justices. He stated (inter alia) that he was present as a justice at the meeting in 1896 when the licence was granted to John Bebbington, and that Mr. Bebbington, stated on oath to the justices that the house should be a free house, free from a brewer, that the licence was granted in 1896 upon that undertaking; and that the licence has been renewed annually upon the basis of that undertaking. When the application was made for the transfer of the licence the justices were informed that the brewery company had contracted to purchase the house for £14.250, subject to the transfer being granted to their tenant, and at the adjourned transfer sessions on June 23 the transfer was granted, and the justices informed the applicants that copies of the undertaking given in 1896 would be served on the owners and the new licensee. It was not intended that any endorsement should be placed on the licence, but the intention was that an endorsement or entry should be made upon the licensing register to the effect that the licence was subject to the original undertaking given upon the grant thereof in 1896, and the justices intended to reconsider the matter at the next general annual licensing meeting, when the circumstances of the undertaking having been given and any other circumstances would be considered. No application had been made for the transfer licence. Upon the same day, June 23, 1914, the clerk to the licensing justices issued a written notice to those concerned that the licence held by the late Catherine Bebbington had on that day been transferred to Bricker "upon the terms of the undertaking given to the licensing justices . . . by John Bebbington upon the original grant of the licence to him the said John Bebbington in the year 1896—namely, that the house in respect of which the said licence was granted should not be a "tied" house, but that it should always be a free house, that is to say, free from a brewer."

By the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910:

> "Section 16. . . . (5) Where the licensing justices, on an application for the renewal of an old on-licence, as defined in the second schedule to this Act, ask the holder of a licence to give any undertaking, they shall adjourn the hearing of the application, and cause notice of the undertaking for which they ask to be served upon any registered owner of the premises, and give him an opportunity of being heard. [This provision was contained in s. 9 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1904.] . . . Section 18 (1). The power to refuse the renewal of any such justices' on-licence as is described in the first part of second schedule to this Act (in this Act referred to as an old on-licence) on any ground other than any of the grounds specified in the second part of that schedule shall be vested in the compensation authority and not in the licensing justices, but shall only be exercised on a reference from those justices and on payment of compensation in accordance with this Act. . . . Section 23 (2) (c). The special provisions of this Act affecting the renewal of an old on-licence shall apply to the transfer of an old on-licence as they apply to the renewal."

In the first part of the second schedule old on-licences are described as justices' on-licences which were in force on Aug. 15, 1904, including renewals of a licence so in force, and in the second part there is the following provision:

> "Supplemental.—If the licensing justices refuse to renew an old licence . . . on the ground that the holder of the licence has failed to fulfil any reasonable undertaking given to the justices on the grant or renewal of the licence, the justices shall be deemed to have refused the licence on the ground that the premises had been ill-conducted."

[This provision was contained in s. 9 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1904.]

Wootton for the justices.

Rigby Swift, K.C. (R. M. Montgomery with him), in support of the rule.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J.—This is a rule for a mandamus to licensing justices to grant the transfer of a licence, or, in the alternative, to hold a transfer sessions and hear the application for the transfer. The dispute has centred upon the terms of an undertaking alleged to have been given when this licence was granted in 1896; and it was said by the licensing justices that that undertaking was not only applicable to the licence while it was held by the original grantee, but that it extended to the house generally into whatever hands the licence might come. The original grantee died; his sons held the house and died, and his widow subsequently held the house, and she also died, and the house was then sold to a brewery company, who put in a tenant called Bricker, and now Bricker has applied for a transfer of this licence to him. There is nothing to be said against him or as to the conduct of the house, and the only thing the justices have alleged is that this undertaking given in 1896 binds the house in the hands of Bricker, and they have sought, on the transfer of the licence to him, to impose upon him an undertaking that this house is to be carried on as a free house, the effect of that being that the brewers who had bought it could not hold it in the ordinary way. The question is whether the justices when they granted the transfer of the licence, as they did on June 23, had any right on granting that licence to impose any clog or undertaking upon it.

Even assuming that the undertaking when it was originally given was in the terms alleged by the justices, I do not think that the justices had any right to impose this clog upon the licence in the hands of Bricker. The house has passed through many hands since the undertaking was originally given, and it does not seem to me that there is any justice in now imposing it upon him; and, I do not think that the justices had any power to impose it. Before 1904 the justices had power in their discretion to refuse a licence of this kind, and they had also power to require undertakings from persons to whom they granted licences; but now, since the passing of the Licensing Act, 1904, they have no such power, and their power to refuse a transfer is limited to certain definite grounds. The case of R. v. Dodds (1) shows that the justices have no such power. In that case COZENS-HARDY, L.J., said ([1905] 2 K.B. at p. 58):

> "In my opinion, the old practice of exacting undertakings on renewals of on-licences cannot survive the destruction of the general discretionary power to grant or to refuse, to which the existence of the practice was due. It is not for us to legislate: our duty is limited to interpretation. The introduction in the licence of the undertaking, was not authorised."

That applies in this case, that construction should be put upon the statute, because since 1904 a contribution to the compensation fund is charged upon these premises according to their annual value as licensed premises. That takes no account of any clog or condition attaching to the premises. Therefore since 1904 this house has been paying a contribution to the compensation fund on its full value, and we ought not to hold that nevertheless the power of the justices to impose the undertaking still remains. For these reasons I think that the rule should be made absolute for a mandamus to grant the transfer.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The circumstances and the reasons in respect of which undertakings were given before 1904 were pointed out by COLLINS, M.R., in R. v. Dodds (1), and he there said that these undertakings were voluntary in the sense that the justices could not compel an applicant for a licence to given an undertaking, but the reason why undertakings were asked for and were often given was that before 1904 the justices had unlimited power, in their discretion, to grant or refuse licences, and therefore in order to get the licence the applicant gave the undertaking. But by the passing of the Act of 1904, this condition of things was altered, and in R. v. Dodds (1) the Master of the Rolls pointed out that it was no longer right to introduce into the licence an undertaking by the licensee. I, therefore, on the authority of R. v. Dodds (1) come to the conclusion that the undertaking, ceased to be one that on a subsequent renewal was binding on the licensee. It certainly does not bind the applicants who never entered into it; and, therefore, the justices, in insisting that the licence should be granted with this condition attached to it, were attempting to impose a clog upon it, which, according to the case of R. v. Dodds (1) they had no power to do, and therefore the rule must be made absolute.

ATKINS, J.—I agree. As the justices could only grant a licence for one year, the undertaking given by Bebbington in 1896 was an undertaking for one year, which might be impliedly renewed on each renewal of the licence. I think, though it is not necessary to decide the point, that the undertaking was not applicable after 1904, because after that date the justices could not have insisted upon it, and there is no reason for inferring that it continued after that date to be given. On the present application for a transfer the justices had no power to impose upon the new transferee a condition or undertaking that the house should be a free house. To my mind, they did exact, or wished to exact, from him such an undertaking. It was contended for them that they did not intend to exact an undertaking from the proposed transferee, but only wished him to understand that he held the licence upon the undertaking given in 1896 by his predecessor. I cannot draw any such distinction between the two things, so far as the jurisdiction of the justices is concerned. To my mind, they did in fact grant this transfer on the terms of an undertaking that the grantee should hold these premises as a free house. I think that they had no power at all to impose such an undertaking. The only doubt in my mind has arisen from the wording of the second part of the second schedule to the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. The paragraph, headed "Supplemental," provides this:

> "If the licensing justices refuse to renew an old on-licence on the ground that the holder of the licence has persistently and unreasonably refused to supply suitable refreshment (other than intoxicating liquor) at a reasonable price, or on the ground that the holder of the licence has failed to fulfil any reasonable undertaking given to the justices on the grant or renewal of the licence, the justices shall be deemed to have refused the licence on the ground that the premises had been ill-conducted."

An old on-licence is one granted before Aug. 15, 1904, and when we find those words in an Act of 1910, it does at first sight look as if an undertaking given before Aug. 15, 1904, might still be operative. But I think that the real explanation of that is that those words are taken from s. 9 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1904, and the words "undertaking given on the grant or renewal of the licence" in s. 9 of the Act of 1904 could have a complete operation with reference to the renewal of licences first granted before Aug. 15, 1904. If that is not so, it is impossible to reconcile the meaning put on behalf of the justices on that supplemental paragraph with the decision in R. v. Dodds (1). I am satisfied that R. v. Dodds (1) does in substance decide this case. It appears to me that the justices in the present case did exactly the same thing that the justices in that case had done. For the reasons given by my brethren I think that the justices had no power to do so, and therefore, I think that the proper order is that they should be directed to hand over the licence without any condition.

Rule absolute.

Re LAW GUARANTEE TRUST AND ACCIDENT SOCIETY, LTD. LIVERPOOL MORTGAGE INSURANCE CO.'S CASE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Buckley, Kennedy, L.JJ., and Scrutton, J.), May 25, 26, 27, 28, June 29, 1914]

Insurance—guarantee of debentures—Insurance by guarantor of part of liability—Liquidation of guarantor—Measure of insurer's liability—Not limited by amount of dividend paid by guarantor to guaranteed creditors.

In 1900 an insurance company guaranteed an issue by a trading company of debentures by affixing to each debenture a statement guaranteeing payment of principal and interest in certain events. A reinsurer then issued to the insurance company a document guaranteeing the insurance company to the extent of two-elevenths of the risk undertaken by the insurance company on the debenture insurance. In 1909 the trading company defaulted in the payment of the debentures, and the debenture-holders preferred a claim against the insurance company which then went into liquidation and claimed against the reinsurer.

Held: the reinsurer's liability to the insurance company was not limited by or proportional to the amount of the dividend payable by the insurance company to the debenture-holders, and, therefore, the reinsurer was liable to pay to the liquidator of the insurance company two-elevenths of the total deficiency of the insurance company in respect of their guarantee, and not merely two-elevenths of the dividend payable by the insurance company to the debenture-holders.

Notes. The Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, has been repealed and is replaced by the Companies Act, 1948. Section 206 of the 1948 Act corresponds, with some minor amendments, to s. 120 of the 1908 Act.

Appeal from a decision of NEVILLE, J., [1913] 2 Ch. 604.

The Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society, Ltd. (hereinafter called "the society"), was incorporated in 1888. Part of the business consisted in issuing policies of insurance to guarantee the repayment of loans on mortgages and debentures. In 1900 Sands, Wilson & Co. (1900), Ltd., issued a series of 275 debentures of £100 each, which were further secured by a trust deed dated Aug. 30, 1900, of which the society was the trustee.

The society guaranteed this issue by appending a memorandum at the foot of each debenture in which it guaranteed to the registered holder the payment of the principal moneys and interest, but not bonus, to become due under the debenture. The memorandum also specified the times when payments of interest and principal in pursuance of the guarantee should be made by the society. A reinsurance was then effected with the Liverpool Mortgage Insurance Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called "the company"), which undertook £5,000, or two-elevenths, of the risk carried by the society. This reinsurance was carried out in the following manner: The society on Sept. 20, 1900, sent the company a document called a putting-on slip, giving short particulars of the risk undertaken by the society, and requesting the company to be placed upon £5,000 of that risk at an initial premium of £109 16s. 7d. and £25 per annum. On Oct. 18, 1900, the company's manager wrote in reply:

"We have entered our share of risk in this matter as per your memorandum of Sept. 20, last."

On Mar. 23, 1904, the company delivered to the society a policy affixed to a debenture in identical terms with one of the guaranteed debentures in the following terms:

"The Liverpool Mortgage Insurance Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called "the guarantors"), hereby guarantees the within-named society to the extent of £5,000, being two-elevenths of the risk assured by and subject to the conditions of the within policy of debenture insurance, and also the like proportion of all costs and expenses incurred by the society with the consent of the guarantors in respect of any claim arising under the within policy or in relation to the enforcement with the like consent of the society's powers as transferees of the debentures so long as the annual premium of £25 shall be paid on Aug. 30 each year or within thirty days thereafter."

In September, 1909, Sands, Wilson & Co. (1900), Ltd., made default in the payment of their debentures, and the society entered into possession of its assets in exercise of the powers conferred by the trust deed, and the risk which the society had guaranteed then became a claim. On Dec. 13, 1909, the members of the society passed an extraordinary resolution for the voluntary winding-up of the society, and by an order of Dec. 14, 1909, this was directed to be continued under the supervision of the court. On July 28, 1910, a scheme of arrangement was approved by the court under s. 120 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, for compromising the claims of creditors and policyholders of the society, with a view to avoiding a forced realisation of the society's assets. The leading feature of the scheme was that the completion of the liquidation should be postponed till Dec. 31, 1918, and that interest of 3 per cent. should be allowed on the unpaid balance of claims in the meanwhile. Clause 23 of this scheme gave the liquidators liberty to offer reinsurers

"to be bound by the scheme in all respects, and accordingly to have their liabilities in respect of reassurances ascertained on the footing of the claims of the assured made and allowed under this scheme being treated as the amount payable under the policies reinsured."

The Company consented to be bound by the scheme, and contended that cl. 23 limited their liability to the society to what the society should have to pay under the scheme; and as the society appeared to be insolvent, there was considerable probability that the society under the scheme would pay less than 20s. in the pound. The realisation of the assets comprised in the debentures of Sands, Wilson & Co. (1900), Ltd., had been completed, and a proof for £26 5s. 1d. on each £100 debenture, or £4,988 6s. 11d. in all, had been admitted by the liquidators of the society. The liquidators thereupon claimed under the reinsurance effected with the company that the latter were liable to the liquidators for two-elevenths of this sum—viz., £967 5s. 6d., together with two-elevenths of certain other small sums which the society had already paid under the policy issued by them, making a total claim against the company of £988 17s. 1d. in all. The liquidators of the society then issued a summons asking a declaration that payment in full by the society in respect of liabilities incurred on policies or guarantees was not a condition precedent to the liability of the company on reinsurances by them of the same risks, and that such liability of the company was not limited by or proportional to the amount of the dividend paid or to be paid by the society to the persons entitled to such policies or guarantees, and, further, or in the alternative a declaration that in respect of the risk undertaken by the society on guarantees to the holders of debentures in Sands, Wilson & Co. (1900), Ltd., reinsured by the company as to two-elevenths of such risk, the company were or would become liable to pay to the liquidators of the society the sum of £988 17s. 1d.

Neville, J., held that the memorandum issued by the reinsurer was a contract of indemnity, and that its liability must be measured by the amount which the insurer would pay and not by the amount for which the insurer was liable. Semble, on the authority of Re Richardson, Ex parte Governors of St. Thomas's Hospital (1), if the liquidators of the insurer could recover more from the reinsurer than they should themselves pay to the debenture-holders, they would recover it for the debenture-holders and not for the creditors of the insurer.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 29. The following judgments were read.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—The question for decision may be tersely expressed thus: Are the respondent company liable to pay to the liquidator of the appellant society two-elevenths of the liability of the society or two-elevenths of the ability of the society to meet that liability? The appellants say the former; the respondents say the latter. The liability of the society is a liability to two-elevenths of a sum of £4,988 6s. 11d., for which the proof of the debenture-holders has been admitted. Are the company liable to pay to the liquidator of the society two-elevenths of £4,988 6s. 11d., or to pay (say) 10s. in the pound on that sum, being the dividend which the estate of the society can pay? The answer to this question is to be found upon an examination of two contracts in order to ascertain, first, their true construction, and, secondly, their legal effect.

The first contract is tripartite. The parties to it are the debenture-holders, Sands, Wilson & Co., Ltd., and the Law Guarantee Society, whom I will call the society. The debenture-holder advanced his money upon the terms that he should be entitled to such liability of Sands, Wilson & Co., Ltd., as is contained in the debenture and in a certain debenture trust deed, and to such liability of the Law Guarantee Society as is found in the instrument appended to the debenture whereby the society guaranteed the debenture-holder in the manner therein expressed. The obligations of Sands, Wilson & Co. under the debenture are to pay £100 in 1910, or at the expiration of six calendar months' notice given by the company to the debenture-holder (in which case a bonus of £5 is to be paid), or when the debenture is drawn for redemption, or upon a certain default in payment of interest, or upon the winding-up of the company, or when the security stated by the debenture trust deed shall have become enforceable and a certain notice shall have been given. The obligation of the Law Guarantee Society to the debenture-holder is that if Sands, Wilson & Co. make default the society will pay (a) in 1910, or (b) on the day after the mortgaged properties have been realised and the proceeds distributed. The obligation of the society (except in one event to be presently mentioned) is not an obligation (a) to pay the same sum, nor (b) at the same time, nor (c) in the same event as Sands, Wilson & Co. are liable to pay. For instance, suppose that default is made for three months in payment of interest but that the mortgaged properties are not realised, the obligation of Sands, Wilson & Co. is to pay at once, but there is no obligation in the society to pay until 1910. The same is true of each of the other obligations. The only case in which the obligation is the same is that of the debentures running until 1910 and the debenture debt becoming then payable for the first time. The obligation of Sands, Wilson & Co. is to pay the debenture-holder in an event or at a date £x; the obligation of the society is to pay the debenture-holder in another event and at another date £y. This is true in every case except that of the debenture running to maturity in 1910. If default is made and the mortgaged properties are realised, the liability of the society is only to pay the differential sum left undischarged by the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged properties. It is, therefore, an obligation to pay a different sum at a different time to the sum and the time at which Sands, Wilson & Co. are liable to make repayment. All these considerations point to an independent obligation in respect of a new debt rather than to a suretyship for the original debt. The respondents argue that the obligation is one collateral to the principal debt, and that no doubt is the case. But it is not every collateral obligation which is an obligation of suretyship. On the other hand, the considerations to which I have pointed attention create no difficulty if the obligation be regarded as one by which the society insure the debenture-holder against the event of his sustaining loss by reason of Sands, Wilson & Co. not performing their obligations. Take, for instance, obligation 2 (b) in the society's guarantee; it is an obligation in case the mortgaged properties do not upon realisation answer the debt to protect the debenture-holder against loss in that event by paying him the balance of the debt. The case seems to me similar to but in some respects stronger than Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corpn., Ltd., (2), as being an obligation of insurance and not of suretyship. I say that it is stronger because the obligation in Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corpn., Ltd. (2), was to pay the principal sum if the debtors made default, whereas in this case the obligation is to pay the differential sum, being the balance unsatisfied after realisation of the mortgaged properties. In Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corpn., Ltd. (2), LORD ESHER, M.R., speaking of the policy in that case, said ([1894] 1 Q.B. at p. 61);

> "The policy is not a guarantee that the bank will be able to pay; it is a positive direct contract that, if the bank does not pay a certain amount on a fixed day, the insurance company will pay that amount."

That is true of the present case, except that there is the stronger point that the Society here is not bound to pay the sum which Sands, Wilson & Co. ought to pay, but only (except in the event of the debenture running to 1910) a different sum—namely, the unsatisfied balance after realisation of the mortgaged property. The reasoning in Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corpn., Ltd. (2), and in Finlay v. Mexican Investment Corpn. (3), applies, I think, to the present case.

In arriving at the conclusion that this tripartite contract is one not of suretyship but of insurance, I have not founded myself at all upon any language in the documents. In fact the society became bound in return for the receipt of a certain premium as the price of its obligation. This, however, does not appear in the documents to which the debenture-holder was a party. The true effect of the contract is to be ascertained, I think, not upon a scrutiny of the terms used, but upon an examination of its effect. I will assume, then, for the moment that I am right in thinking that this tripartite contract is one of insurance. The next question is, what is the effect of the second contract? This was one between two parties only—namely, the society and the Liverpool Mortgage Insurance Co., whom I will call the company. If the first contract was one of insurance, the society had an insurable interest. They were at risk, and this contract is one by which the company guaranteed the society to the extent of two-elevenths of the risk and the like proportion of all costs and expenses. This is a reinsurance. As between the society and the company, the former, having an insurable interest, are entitled to recover from the latter upon the reinsurance the proper proportion of the loss whether the society have paid the entirety of the loss or not. This was assumed in Eddystone Marine Insurance Co. (4). The question there was whether the relation was different when the words of the instrument were "to pay as may be paid thereon." The court held that this did not make a difference, and that the reinsurer was entitled to recover from the reinsuring office payment on the policy of reinsurance although it had not made payment upon the original policy of insurance. If this be the proper view of the effect of the two contracts, the appellants are right in their contention. But, secondly, I will assume (contrary to the opinion which I have expressed) that the first—the tripartite contract—was not one of insurance but one of indemnity. The society are then entitled to be indemnified against a debt of two-elevenths of £4,988 6s. 11d., which, having regard to the liquidation of the society, can be enforced by the debenture-holder only to the extent of, say, 10s. in the pound on that sum. Is the liquidator entitled to recover from the company only that 10s. in the pound or can the company say that they have discharged themselves when they have paid the liquidator 10s. in the pound, being the amount which, under the circumstances, is the limit which the debenture-holder can enforce against the society?

The first question here is, I think, upon the language of the second contract. The company guaranteed the society against two-elevenths of the costs and expenses incurred by the society. They would have to pay these (to the indemnity of the society) to the persons to whom the costs were due, or would have to pay them to the society and thus put the society in funds to pay those persons, whether the society had already paid or was about to pay them or not. Their obligation to pay such sum as is payable in respect of the guarantee to the extent of £5,000, being two-elevenths of the risk, is exactly the same. Each alike must be measured and satisfied either by a payment of 10s. in the pound or of 20s. in the pound. The question is, which of these two is it? The obligation as to the costs must, I think, be an obligation to pay 20s. in the pound as above stated. If so, the obligation as to the £5,000 must likewise be an obligation to pay 20s. in the pound. It is said that in Carr v. Roberts (5), the court found an obligation not to indemnify only but to pay also, and that something turned upon that fact. I do not agree. In Ashdown v. Ingamells (6), BRAMWELL, L.J., pointed out that the fact that the agreement is not merely to indemnify but also to pay is not material. The measure of damage, according to Carr v. Roberts (5), Ashdown v. Ingamells (6), and Re Perkins, Poyser v. Beyfus (7), is not the dividend which the estate of the principal debtor can pay, but the full amount for which the principal debtor is liable. LINDLEY, L.J., in his work on PARTNERSHIP (5th Edn.), p. 375, in a passage which is quoted by WRIGHT, J., in Wolmershausen v. Gullick (8), ([1893] 2 Ch. at p. 528), says:

> "Where one person has covenanted to indemnify another, an action for specific performance may be sustained before the plaintiff has actually been damnified, and the limit of the defendant's liability to the plaintiff is the full amount for which he is liable; or if he is dead or insolvent the full amount provable against his estate, and not only the amount of dividend which such estate can pay."

The latter part of this passage is to be found repeated in the 8th Edn. at p. 438. Effect was given to this obligation in Cruse v. Paine (9), and in Lacy v. Hill, Crowley's Claim (10). The equitable doctrine is that the party to be indemnified can call upon the party bound to indemnify him specifically to perform his obligation, and to pay him the full amount which the creditor is entitled to receive, and that whether having received it he applies it in payment of that creditor or not is a matter with which the party giving the indemnity is not concerned. In such a case the party indemnified is entitled to receive 20s. in the pound, and, having got it, to deal with it as he thinks proper.

The case is otherwise where the party giving the indemnity is concerned with the application of the money which he pays. This was the case in Re Richardson, Ex parte Governors of St. Thomas's Hospital (1). The wife, who was bound to indemnify, was there concerned in seeing that the money which she paid went to the lessor, so as to relieve the property of which she was beneficial owner from the consequences of non-payment of rent and damages for breach of covenant. In Cruse v. Paine (9), the stock jobbers were interested in seeing that the amount which they provided was applied in discharging the calls upon the shares. In Re Perkins, Poyser v. Beyfus (7), the executors of assignee No. 2 were interested in the application of that which they had to pay in discharging the obligations under the lease. But here the company are not interested in the question whether the amount which they pay does or does not go to the debenture holders. The case is that which is put in Carr v. Roberts (5), where both LITTLEDALE, J., and PATTESON, J., at the conclusion of their judgments point out that it is the duty of the defendant to pay the whole amount, and it makes no difference whether it is applied in discharge of the debt, or whether the plaintiff, having recovered it, does not make a proper use of it. In the alternative, therefore, and if the contract is not one of insurance but of indemnity, I think it still results that the company are liable to the liquidator of the society for the full sum, and not 10s. in the pound in respect of the sum. In the winding-up of the society a scheme of arrangement has been carried which provides for a moratorium. The company have come in under art. 23 of the scheme, and have thus assented to have their liability ascertained on the footing that the claim of the assured under the scheme shall be treated as the amount payable under the reinsurance. In the view which I have expressed of the nature of the contract by which the company is bound nothing arises upon the scheme which affects in any way the question to be decided. Except as affecting a moratorium, the scheme leaves the liability of the company unaffected.

I am anxious to point out some consequences which would ensue if the view I have expressed were not the right one. The contrary view is one which makes it to the interest of the company that the society should be insolvent. For to such extent as the society cannot pay in full, the argument is that the company are not liable to make payment. It is obvious that such a consideration cannot have entered into the contemplation of the parties in fixing the premium. The company has received a certain premium upon the terms that in an event it shall pay a certain sum. If its liability is reduced to 10s. in the pound, it has received payment of premium as the price of an obligation to pay 20s., but is, by reason of circumstances, not material at all so far as the company is concerned, relieved of one-half of the liability. If this were true, a society whose credit was bad ought to pay a less premium than a society whose credit was good, because the obligation would in the former case result in a smaller liability. The fact is, I suppose, that as a matter of business, if the credit of the society were bad, a larger, not a less, premium would be demanded as the price of the guarantee. The argument of the reinsurer is best illustrated by an example. Assume that the liability to the debenture-holders is £11,000 and that consequently the liability of the company is £2,000, being two-elevenths of that sum. Assume that the other debts of the society are £5,000 and £4,000. Exclude for the moment the £2,000, there remains £9,000 + £5,000 + £4,000, that is £18,000 of debts. Suppose the assets to be £1,800 this will give a dividend of 10 per cent. The company are liable, says the reinsurer, to pay 10 per cent. on the £2,000. The society then bears nothing as regards the £2,000 debt and has been indemnified, and the creditors will all alike get a dividend of 10 per cent. The fallacy, I think, lies in saying that this indemnity, and that the right of the creditors is satisfied by such an adjustment. If the right of the society against the company is, as it certainly is, an asset of the society, it is one upon which the society is entitled to realise the full amount for which the company are liable. Until that has been got in it is misleading to say that the society can only pay 10 per cent. It can pay such dividend as its assets will produce after the claims against the company and others in like cases have been realised. The liability of the company is an element in determining the amount of the dividend. The respondents want to take the amount of the dividend as a fixed factor, and to determine the liability accordingly. In my opinion this is wrong. If the society had not gone into liquidation, it would have had a right of action against the company for 20s. in the pound on the company's liability, and none the less if its assets were so small that after recovering the amount the assets would be insufficient to pay the creditors, including the debenture-holders, 20s. in the pound. That right of action has vested in the liquidator. Why has he a less right because the estate in liquidation will not pay 20s. in the pound? How is the right affected by the fact that the right of action became exercisable for the first time after winding-up commenced? Whether the contract be one of insurance or one of indemnity, the appellants are, I think, entitled to succeed. It seems to me that the order under appeal ought to be discharged and there should be substituted a declaration which, subject to any suggestion which the parties may make as to its form, should be a declaration that the company are liable to pay to the liquidator of the society two-elevenths of the deficiency remaining after applying the proceeds of the mortgaged properties towards payment of the debenture debt. In this concrete case that would mean, as I understand, that the company are liable to pay to the liquidator two-elevenths of £4,988 6s. 11d.

KENNEDY, L.J.—The question to be decided in this case—and in my view it is by no means an easy one—does not, I think, depend at all upon a close examination of the language of the contract into which the Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society, Ltd. (which I shall call the society), entered under the tripartite arrangement to which Sands, Wilson & Co., Ltd., and their debenture-holders, were the other parties. Some time was expended at the hearing of the appeal in this court in discussing the precise nature of the obligation undertaken by the society towards the debenture-holders: Is its proper category "guarantee" or "suretyship" or "indemnity" or "insurance"? In the document which constitutes the tripartite agreement the word describing the obligation of the society is "guarantee." In my view, this matter is not important. The obligation of the society towards the debenture-holders, although not co-extensive or identical at all events with the obligation of Sands, Wilson & Co. to those parties, might, I think, without thereby affecting the issue which we have to decide, be treated as coming within any one of those categories; one might, in regard to suretyship and insurance, for example, apply to the description of this tripartite agreement the language of KAY, L.J., in Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corpn., Ltd. (2), ([1894] 1 Q.B. at p. 62) and say that > "it does not seem to me material to consider whether the contract sued upon is a contract of suretyship or a contract of insurance."

The one matter which is material to consider is the ultimate effect of the tripartite agreement, so far as it affects the responsibility of the society, and, in my opinion, whether the undertaking of the society ought to be classed as an insurance, an indemnity, a surety, or a guarantee, the effect of it was that under it the society became bound, in an event which has in fact occurred, to pay to the debenture-holders a large sum of money. Having this risk, the society, in order to relieve itself of it in some part, entered into a contract with the Liverpool Mortgage Insurance Co. (referred to hereafter as the company) which was endorsed on each of the debentures in the form of a memorandum dated Mar. 23, 1904, and signed by the representatives of the two interested parties. That memorandum, so far as it is material, is in the following terms:—It is headed:

> "Premium £25—The Liverpool Mortgage Insurance Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called the guarantors), hereby guarantee the within-named Law Guarantee and Trust Society, Ltd. (hereinafter called the society), to the extent of £5,000, being two-elevenths of the risk assured by and subject to the conditions of the within policy of debenture insurance and also the like proportion of all costs and expenses incurred by the society with the consent of the guarantors in respect of any claim arising under the within policy or in relation to the enforcement, with the like consent, of the society's powers as transferees of the debentures so long as the annual premium of £25 shall be paid on Aug. 30, in each year or within thirty days hereafter."

I may note, in passing, that the company, according to the actual words of this document, assent to the description of the nature of the society's liability under the tripartite agreement as the liability of insurers.

What is the legal effect of this memorandum? The society contends that it created a contract of reinsurance. NEVILLE, J., has held that it is more properly described as a contract of limited indemnity. In my opinion, if, as I think it is not incorrect to say, the obligation of the society under the tripartite agreement was a contract of insurance, this contract between the society and the company is a contract of reinsurance. But, whatever name be given to the obligation which the society undertook towards the debenture-holders under the tripartite agreement, I think that the company by this contract insured the society against the risk which that obligation involved to the extent of £5,000, being two-elevenths of the sum which the society might in a certain event be called upon to pay in performance of that obligation, and also the like proportion of the costs and expenses incurred by the society, as mentioned in the memorandum. In other words, the company, in the event of the society becoming, as it has become, liable to pay the debenture-holders, became thereupon liable to pay the society two-elevenths of the amount, together with the like proportion of costs and expenses incurred by the society. I hold this to be a contract of insurance. I will add that I should not be prepared to hold that there would be a difference in the result in regard to the liability incurred by the company if it be treated as a contract of indemnity. There appears to me to be authority for holding that, in the view of a court of equity, to indemnify does not merely mean to reimburse in respect of moneys paid, but (in accordance with its derivation) to save from loss in respect of the liability against which the indemnity has been given: see WRIGHT, J., in Wolmershausen v. Gullick (8), ([1893] 2 Ch. at pp. 527, 528), citing LORD LINDLEY's work on PARTNERSHIP, (5th Edn.), pp. 374, 375. As NEVILLE, J., points out in the course of his judgment in this case, if it be held that payment is a condition precedent to recovery, the contract may be of little value to the person to be indemnified, who may be unable to meet the claim in the first instance. If this is true in regard to a contract of indemnity in general, it is certainly true of contracts of insurance and reinsurance, which are essentially contracts of guarantee against loss by an event: see BRETT, L.J., in Castellain v. Preston (11) (11 Q.B.D. at p. 387), and per BOWEN, L.J. (ibid. at p. 403). In the case of a reinsurance policy the attempt was made in Re Eddystone Marine Insurance Co. (4), to argue that the reinsurer was not bound to pay the party who effected the reinsurance until he had paid the assured on the original policy, but STIRLING, J., held that payment on the original policy was not a condition precedent to the right to recover on the policy of reinsurance.

In my view, the society, upon the happening of the event which, under the terms of the tripartite agreement, involved it in the liability to make a payment to the debenture-holders, became entitled under the contract which it had made with the company to require the company to pay to the society two-elevenths of that amount, and the same proportion of the costs and expenses referred to in the memorandum, and the company had no right to say to the society: "We will wait, before paying, to see how much you will pay in discharge of your liability to the debenture-holders." This being that which may be called the normal position, is it altered by the fact of the insolvency and liquidation of the society? It is contended on behalf of the company that it is; that, inasmuch as the debenture-holders will not be able to enforce against the company payment in full of the amount due to them from the company, but only payment of a dividend upon their proof in the liquidation for that amount, the company, so far as the indebtedness to the debenture-holders as distinct from costs and expenses is concerned, will satisfy its contractual obligation to the society if it pays only the amount of that dividend. This question might have arisen on the points stated in the report of that case in Re Eddystone Marine Insurance Co. (4), but it does not appear to have been argued by counsel or dealt with by the learned judge. I do not think that this contention of the reinsurer is sound. How the person who receives payment of a sum of money under a contract of insurance or reinsurance, or, I will call it, of indemnity, deals with that sum is, in general and apart from special considerations, no concern of the party who, in fulfilment of his contract, has made the payment to him. Upon what grounds of equity or legal logic can it be argued that, because the law, on grounds of public policy, compels the creditor, the liability to whom is the event upon which the right of a bankrupt or of an insolvent company to payment of the sum covered by the contract arises, to be content with such share of the assets of the bankrupt or the company in liquidation as a pari passu distribution between creditors will give, those assets are not to include the payment due under the contract? If the discharge of the liability, against which the contract of insurance or reinsurance was the protection, is not, and I think that it is not, a condition precedent to the right to claim payment of the amount of the insurance or the reinsurance, upon what ground ought it to be held that if the person entitled to that payment becomes bankrupt or, if a company goes into liquidation, the trustee of the bankrupt or the liquidator of the insolvent company does not have the right to the payment of that amount in full which the bankrupt before his bankruptcy or the company before its liquidation possessed because, when he has received the amount, the law intercepts the asset in his hands and compels him to apply it in a particular way as part of the estate divisible amongst all the creditors? I confess myself unable to see any principle upon which such a contention can be supported; and, although there is not, so far as I know, any express decision upon the point, counsel for the insurance company was, I think, warranted in citing language in the judgments of LITTLEDALE, J., and PATTESON, J., in Carr v. Roberts (5), and in referring to the grounds upon which Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corpn., Ltd. (2), and Finlay v. Mexican Investment Corpn. (3), and Ashbury v. Ingamells (6), were decided as tending to support his contention to the contrary. I do not think that it is true to say that in such a case as the present the party who is entitled

A makes a profit; he gets only the amount of the payment for which he bargained in the event which has occurred, and he has paid a premium based upon the risk, in such event, of that amount having to be paid. BUCKLEY, L.J., has dwelt in his judgment upon the strange consequences that would, as pointed out by the counsel for the insurance company in their argument before us, ensue if the argument put forward in the present case on behalf of the company were held to prevail. I agree with him in these criticisms.

B I desire only, in conclusion, to refer to the case of Re Richardson, Ex parte Governors of St. Thomas's Hospital (1), which my brother NEVILLE, J., seems to treat as an authority for the view which he has taken of the present case. It appears to me that we can decide the present question in favour of the society without differing from the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case. The circumstances were peculiar. The husband's right of indemnity, upon which the wife was sued in an action in which the trustee in bank-

C ruptcy of her husband's estate and the husband's landlord were joint plaintiffs, was not a contractual right, but an equitable obligation arising from the relation of cestui que trust and trustee which existed between wife and husband; and it was held by the Court of Appeal that the husband's trustee in bankruptcy could avail himself of the husband's right of indemnity only for the purpose of passing on the money which his wife paid by way of compromise in the action to the landlord, his co-plaintiff, who was the principal

D (or ultimate) creditor. To hold otherwise, said the Master of the Rolls ([1911] 2 K.B. at p. 711), would be to allow a trustee to make a profit out of his position as trustee. In the present case the right to payment upon which the society is insisting depends upon an express contract, whether of insurance or reinsurance, for the payment in a certain event of a sum of money. The debenture-holders are not parties to these proceedings. There is no bond of connection between the company and the debenture-holders. The E company has no sort of interest in seeing how the money due from the company to the society is applied by the society.

For the reasons which I have stated, I concur with the other members of this court in holding that the appellant society is entitled to succeed; and I have only to add that I have not referred to the scheme of arrangement which has been adopted in the liquidation of the company and into which the company has entered because, if I understand rightly

F the nature of its provisions, they do not affect the decision of the particular point involved in the present appeal.

SCRUTTON, J.—This an appeal by the liquidators of the Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society, Ltd., whom I will call "the society," against orders of NEVILLE, J.,

G ([1913] 2 Ch. 604), dated Oct. 31, 1913, and WARRINGTON, J., ([1914] W.N. 117), dated Mar. 9, 1914. These orders purport to fix the amount and conditions of liability of the Liverpool Mortgage Insurance Co., Ltd., whom I will call "the insurance company" under their insurance or guarantee of the society. The liability of the society insured is under their guarantee, under conditions to be referred to, to the debenture-holders of Sands, Wilson & Co. (1900), Ltd., of the principal and interest due to them from Sands, H Wilson & Co. on their debentures.

The society as part of its business guaranteed to debenture-holders the payment of principal and interest by the company issuing the debentures. They usually did so as part of the arrangement under which that company offered debentures to the public, and had an arrangement with that company in the nature of a debenture trust deed, while their guarantee to the debenture-holder was annexed to each debenture issued.

I Accordingly each £100 debenture issued on Aug. 30, 1900, by Sands, Wilson & Co. contained a promise by Sands, Wilson & Co. to pay the principal sum of £100 on Aug. 30, 1910, or upon such earlier day as it might become payable in accordance with the conditions endorsed thereon (with a bonus of £5 per debenture if Sands, Wilson & Co. repaid the debenture before the appointed day on six months' notice). It also contained a promise to pay interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. on Feb. 28 and Aug. 30 in each year. There was also annexed to the debenture a "guarantee" by the society to the registered holder of the debenture of the payment of the principal moneys and interest, but not bonus: (i) As to interest, that if Sands, Wilson & Co should make default for thirty days, the society would pay the amount on demand; (ii) as to principal, that if there were default in the payment of the principal moneys or any part thereof, the society would pay the amount thereof upon whichever of the days following should first happen—(a) Aug. 30, 1910, (b) the day after the securities for the debenture-holders shall have been enforced and completely realised and distributed. The society, having taken this and numerous other similar liabilities, desired to protect itself by reinsurance, and by a policy endorsed on a specimen debenture and dated Mar. 23, 1904, the insurance company

> "guaranteed the society to the extent of £5,000, being two-elevenths of the risk assured by, and subject to, the conditions of the within policy of debenture insurance [that is, the society's guarantee endorsed on the debenture], and also the like proportion of all costs and expenses incurred by the society with the consent of the guarantors in respect of any claim arising under the within policy . . . so long as the annual premium of £25 shall be paid on Aug. 30, in each year."

In September, 1909, Sands, Wilson & Co. being in difficulties, the society as trustee for debenture-holders entered into possession. On Dec. 14, 1909, an order for liquidation of the society's affairs under the supervision of the court was made. In this liquidation a scheme of arrangement was sanctioned by the court which provided for a moratorium of claims in the liquidation for principal moneys till Dec. 31, 1918, the liquidators paying interest meanwhile at the rate of 3 per cent. The loss of principal of the debenture-holders of Sands, Wilson & Co. after realisation of securities was assessed at £4,988, or £26 5s. 1d. per £100 debenture, and a proof to that amount was admitted in the liquidation of the society. This loss was finally assessed after Aug. 30, 1910, and therefore the society were under their guarantee liable in strictness to pay the full amount of the principal, getting the benefit of the securities when realised. The scheme of arrangement of the society offered reinsurers of risks guaranteed by the society two options, the second of which was

> "to be bound by the scheme in all respects, and accordingly to have their liabilities in respect of reassurances ascertained on the footing of the claims of the assured made and allowed under this scheme being treated as the amount payable under the policies reinsured."

The insurance society accepted the latter option. Accordingly, as the claims of debenture-holders of Sands, Wilson & Co. have been allowed at £4,988, this amount will be payable on Dec. 31, 1918, by the Society, and the insurance company accept this as the amount payable by the society under their guarantee. The proof as pointed out might strictly have been based on the full amount of principal. It is highly probable, however, that the assets of the society will not be sufficient to pay the creditors in full, and the question then arises which is the subject of this appeal, whether the insurance company are bound to pay the society two-elevenths of the admitted proof or only two-elevenths of the amount of the dividend which the society pays on the proof.

The liquidators accordingly took out a summons before NEVILLE, J., asking for a declaration that payment in full by the society in respect of liabilities incurred on policies or guarantees was not a condition precedent to the liability of the insurance company on reinsurances by them of the same risks, and that such liability of the insurance company was not limited by or proportional to the amount of the dividend paid, or to be paid, by the society to the persons entitled to such policies or guarantees. On this summons NEVILLE, J., made an order declaring that payment by the society of liabilities incurred under policies or guarantees is not a condition precedent to the liability of the insurance company on reinsurances by the latter company of the same risks, but that the ultimate liability of the insurance company under such reinsurance is limited to the proportional amount of the dividend and other sums paid or to be paid by the society to the persons entitled to such policies or guarantees, and that any sum in excess of such proportional amount paid by the insurance company to the society in respect of such reinsurances will be held by the liquidators on behalf of the society. This order, if I follow it, though WARRINGTON, J., has taken a contrary view of its effect, allows the liquidators of the society to recover the full amount of the admitted proof from the insurance company, with an obligation to repay so much of it as the liquidators do not pay in dividends to the debenture-holders of Sands, Wilson & Co. NEVILLE, J., in his judgment threw out the suggestion that the society might recover or be compelled to recover the whole amount for the benefit of the debenture-holders, but declined to decide it as the matter was not before him. A further summons was taken out on Nov. 10, 1913, for a declaration that the liquidators might properly be required to pay direct to the debenture-holders the sum guaranteed; and this summons came on before WARRINGTON, J., on Mar. 9, 1914. That learned judge treated the decision of NEVILLE, J., as one > "that the company might be called on to pay as soon as the liability has actually matured—that is to say, as soon as it is ascertained that the assets of the society are liable to pay a dividend on £x to the debenture-holders in Sands, Wilson & Co., the company might be required to pay that £x to those debenture-holders."

He treated the declaration he was asked to make as inconsistent with this interpretation of the judgment of NEVILLE, J., and refused it. Thereupon the liquidators appealed to the Court of Appeal, asking in substance for three alternative declarations: (i) That payment in full by the society was not a condition precedent to the liability of the insurance company, who were not entitled to limit their liability to the amount of the dividend paid by the society; (ii) that to the extent to which the liquidators pay the debenture-holders' proofs they will be entitled to be repaid by the insurance company those amounts in full, but not exceeding two-elevenths of the sum guaranteed; or (iii) that the insurance company may be required to pay directly to the debenture-holders two-elevenths of their loss. The second alternative may be disposed of at once. It was apparently founded on a suggestion that the insurance company had really reinsured or guaranteed the first two-elevenths of the loss, and might, therefore, be required to pay two-elevenths of the admitted proof although only a dividend was paid on the proof, so long as the total dividend paid was equal to or more than two-elevenths of the proof and two-elevenths of the proof did not exceed £5,000. On this it is sufficient to say that a bargain might be made to reinsure the first two-elevenths of the loss, or the first £1,000, or the loss in excess of £1,000, or any other proportion or part of the loss, but that there is no trace of such a bargain in this case.

The questions before us resolve themselves into this: Is a reinsurer or guarantor relieved pro tanto from liability to his assured or guaranteed by the fact that the latter is insolvent and so unable to pay more than a dividend on the liability reinsured, the liability of the reinsurer being thus reduced by the insolvency of the reinsured? And, if so, can the reinsurer or guarantor be compelled to pay direct to the original assured or principal creditor the sum for which the latter has an admitted claim on his assurer or guarantor, for which sum such assurer or guarantor would, if he paid, have an admitted claim on his reinsurer? It was obvious from the arguments before us that this was a matter of considerable difficulty. For the insurance company it was said that their contract, whatever it was called, was a contract of indemnity, and that they indemnified the society if they paid it what it had to pay; to pay it more would be to enable the society or its general creditors to make a profit. For the society it was said that the whole object of reinsurance might be to save oneself from bankruptcy in case of claim, but that the contention of the insurance company involved that a person with no assets other than full reinsurance against his insurance liabilities would yet be driven into bankruptcy, and only recover from his reinsurers the nominal dividend his general assets could pay. Premiums on such reinsurances would have to be regulated not only by the solvency of the original principal debtor, but also by the solvency of the person whose risk was reinsured; the more insolvent the latter was the less the reinsurer would have to pay. And it was said, how is what the reinsurer is to pay—that is, the dividend—to be ascertained until you know his contribution? His contribution when made will increase the general dividend, and this increase will again increase his contribution. To this it was answered that the rule would be, find what dividend the general assets apart from claims on reinsurances would pay the general creditors apart from those whose claims were reinsured and collect this dividend from such reinsurer.

It is, perhaps, sufficient to say there is no trace of this complicated rule in the policy, and it would not apply to cases where there were no general creditors whose claims were not reinsured. For instance, for simplicity, take a man who has only insured one risk of £1,000, and, having no assets, has reinsured his whole risk. He becomes insolvent, and a claim for a total loss accrues on his policy. Left to himself, his dividend to his creditors will be nil, and, on the argument of the insurance company, the amount payable by his reinsurer will be nil. Yet in fact he should remain solvent, his reinsurer providing the funds to satisfy his only debt. The same result would follow if he had ten fully reinsured policies and ten losses. If it be said that the society's argument enables the general creditors to make a profit, the answer appears to be that it is not the society's argument, but the operation of law which, though a creditor has a claim which the debtor has reinsured, takes the contribution of the reinsurer and divides it between the general body of creditors, because the creditor has no privity with the reinsurer, and no charge, lien, or equitable security on his payment to the debtor.

Considerable discussion took place before us whether the obligation of the society to the debenture-holders was that of surety for the principal debtors, Sands, Wilson & Co., or insurers of the debenture-holders against the insolvency of Sands, Wilson & Co. In the view I take of the case it is immaterial to decide this point or to discuss whether this document is nearer to that in Re Denton's Estate, Licences Insurance Corpn. and Guarantee Fund, Ltd. v. Denton (12), which the Court of Appeal held to create the relation of principal and surety, or that in Shaw v. Royce Ltd. (13), which WARRINGTON, J., held to be an insurance. I incline to the latter view. But it is clear that under the document, whatever it is, the society ran a risk of being called upon to pay if Sands, Wilson & Co. did not, or of incurring a loss if the realised securities did not cover the principal sum due under the debentures. This risk of having to pay, or risk of loss, was intended to be covered by the agreement entered into with the insurance company. And it seems to me clear that on the principles laid down by the Court of Appeal in Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corpn., Ltd. (2), and applied by CHARLES, J., in Finlay v. Mexican Investment Corpn. (3), and by MATHEW, J., in Parr's Bank v. Albert Mines Syndicate (14), this contract is a contract of insurance. Probably as an insurance against loss by a liability to pay money in certain events it may be correctly described as a contract of reinsurance. There is, however, no direct privity between the debenture-holder or principal debtor, Sands, Wilson & Co., on the one hand and the insurance company on the other. The debenture-holder cannot sue the insurance company direct. If the insurance company can get at Sands, Wilson & Co. it will be by subrogation or payment of the society, and in the society's name. I am not aware of any way in which an original assured can get at a reinsurer; his rights are only against the original insurer, the reinsured. If so, the insurance company has guaranteed two-elevenths of the risk assured by the society; the society has become liable to pay a sum of so many pounds, but has not the funds to pay it.

Does this fact reduce the liability of the insurance company? Stated in this way the question seems to me to answer itself. In marine insurance the question has been treated as comparatively settled. In England, in 1892, in Re Eddystone Insurance Co. (4), the Western Insurance Co. reinsured certain of its liabilities on marine policies on ships with the Eddystone Co. by policies containing the clause "to pay as may be paid thereon." Losses occurred in which the Western Co. were liable on the policies, and the Eddystone Co. to the Western Co. on their policies. But both companies were in liquidation, and the Western Co. had not paid their assured anything, even a dividend. Before STIRLING, J., the Eddystone Co. contended that they were liable to pay to the Western Co. the proper rateable proportion of any dividend which might be paid to the original assured only when and not until such dividend had been actually declared and paid. Their counsel argued ([1892] 2 Ch. at p. 427):

> "We cannot under this clause be compelled to indemnify the Western Co. except in respect of what they may actually pay, and not until they have paid."

A The Western Co. contended that as they became liable to pay the sum assured by their policy on the occurrence of the loss, the Eddystone Co. became liable to pay their proportion of such sum, irrespective of any question whether the Western Co. had paid wholly or in part the claim under their policy. Their counsel argued (ibid. at p. 426):

> "The Eddystone Co. are bound to indemnify the Western against all claims > B up to the full amount of the reinsurance, whether the Western have paid anything or not,"

and (ibid. at p. 427)

> "It cannot be contended that if the insured is insolvent and can pay nothing, the reinsurer is to keep his premium and escape all liability."

C STIRLING, J., said (ibid.):

> "Now, a main object of reinsurance is to relieve the reinsured from a portion of the risk previously undertaken by him; and the result of giving effect to the liquidator's contention would be that, before the reinsured obtains the benefit of his reinsurance, he must himself have paid on the original insurance, even though
> D bankruptcy might be the result. I think that this could not be intended, and that such a construction ought not to be put on the language of the policy unless it is clearly called for. In my opinion the words do not clearly require to be so construed. They would be satisfied if they were held to amount simply to this—that the payment to be made on the reinsurance policy is to be regulated by that to be made on the original policy of insurance. I am fortified in this view by the > E observations of MATHEW, J., in the unreported case of Martin v. Munich Assurance Co. (15), with the shorthand notes of which I have been furnished. The contention of the liquidator of the Western Co. must accordingly prevail; and I hold that payment by his company is not to be taken to be a condition precedent to his recovering against the Eddystone Co."

F The judgment may appear to be ambiguous, for the phrase "the payment to be made" might mean liability or might mean actual payment. It has, however, been held that actual payment without legal liability will not do (Chippendale v. Holt (16)), and STIRLING, J., says that the contention of the Western Co. must prevail. The amount paid before the original insurer has paid can only be the whole liability, and the case is treated by the editors of ARNOULD ON MARINE INSURANCE (8th Edn., p. 422, para. 324), as deciding that the whole amount of liability and not the dividend only is payable.

G This view of the case has, to my knowledge been taken in practice and business. The law in the United States seems to be the same. In Herckenrath v. American Mutual Insurance Co. (17), in 1848 the Chancellor held that the original assured had no claim for the whole sum received by his insurer from a reinsurer, but only to a dividend. The argument deals with the suggestion that the insurer makes a profit, pointing out
H that he makes no profit, but the State requires his assets to be distributed in a particular way; he parts with them all: "It is none the less a loss because they are unable to pay it in full." The Chancellor cited and apparently approved a decision of the Commercial Court of Marseilles in 1748, cited by EMERIGON (TRAITÉ DES ASSURANCES, vol. i, cap. 8, s. 14, p. 253; translation by MEREDITH, 1850, p. 202), where the insolvent insurer paid 60 per cent. of the loss, but recovered 100 per cent. of the loss from his
I reinsurer, the court holding that the reinsurer was bound to pay what the original assurer became liable to pay, not what he had actually paid. American text-writers take the same view. PARSONS in his work on MARINE INSURANCE, vol. 1, p. 300, says:

> "The reinsured is not bound to pay his insured and found his claim on this actual payment before he can call on the reinsurer. For if the reinsured be insolvent and pay but a small dividend on their policy, they have still a claim on the reinsurers for the whole amount for which they are reinsured, this amount being measured by the risks which the reinsurers assume for the premium paid them."

PHILLIPS in PHILLIPS ON INSURANCE (5th Edn.), paras. 1751, 1752, states the law:

> "A reinsurer is not liable for over the amount for which the insurer is legally liable. The amount of a total loss in a policy of reinsurance is not subject to be reduced below the value at which it is stipulated to estimate the property in the policy of reinsurance on the ground of the insolvency of the reassured, and of his failure to pay the full amount insured by the original policy."

This may only deal with valued policies, but the principles do not seem to differ. It was suggested in argument that marine policies stood in a peculiar position. Having some acquaintance with them, I do not see why. The insurer reinsures a subject-matter, the ship, in which he has an insurable interest, in that if she is lost he will have to pay under his policy. The measure of his loss is not what he pays, but what he is liable to pay: Chippendale v. Holt (16). The original assured cannot sue the reinsurer, or claim that the money the latter pays is charged or secured to him. If the original assured has no privity with the reinsurer, why can the latter avail himself of the transactions of the assured?

NEVILLE, J., thought himself bound by the decision in Re Richardson, Ex parte Governors of St. Thomas's Hospital (1) to hold that the society could not recover from the insurance company more than they had actually paid, but could call upon the insurance company to pay off the debenture-holders. The latter point, however, he said was not before him, and it was not in the original summons. The facts in Richardson's Case (1), were remarkable and peculiar. Richardson, the husband, was twice bankrupt. He was also lessee of some properties from St. Thomas's Hospital, and held them as trustee for his wife under circumstances explained in Governors of St. Thomas's Hospital v. Richardson (1). Between his first and second bankruptcy the landlords got judgment against him for arrears of rent, damages for non-repair, and costs, and he then went into bankruptcy. The Court of Bankruptcy gave leave to the landlord to join with the trustee in an action against the wife as cestui que trust. I understand how the husband and his trustee could ask to be indemnified by the wife. I do not understand how the landlord had any direct claim against the wife to the sum claimed. However, the action never came to trial, for the wife paid £520 to the two plaintiffs in compromise of a claim for £720. Then the question arose who was to have the £520, the trustee for the general body of creditors, or the landlords against whose claim the husband was to be indemnified, and the Court of Appeal gave the money to the landlords. But the Master of the Rolls stated ([1911] 2 K.B. at p. 709) that it was not the case of a contractual right to indemnity but of the equitable right which every trustee has to be indemnified by his cestui que trust. The case did not decide that the trustee could not recover till he paid, and only what he paid. He had in fact paid nothing and got £520 by consent. The authorities on insurance were not cited to the court, which was not dealing with any questions of reinsurance, and, while FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., made some very general statements as to the common law right of indemnity, they were not, as I read the decision, necessary for it, and, if I understand the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ashdown v. Ingamells (6), were contrary to the common law rules therein laid down. In Ashdown v. Ingamells (6), A. agreed for valuable consideration to pay the trade debts of B.; he did not do so, and B. was forced into liquidation by his trade creditors, whose proof for £1,750 was admitted. The trustee of B. sued A. for damages, and it was replied that as B.'s estate would only have to pay a nominal dividend there was no damages. HUDDLESTON, B., agreed with this contention, but the Court of Appeal reversed him. They held that the insolvent, if solvent, would have recovered the full amount—whether it was a contract to indemnify or pay was immaterial—and that the trustee could recover what the bankrupt could, if solvent, have recovered, without regard to whether the estate had paid or not. I do not understand how this supports the view of NEVILLE, J., or justifies the general observations of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., Carr v. Roberts (5), is to the same effect.

In the result, I am of opinion that as the society have admittedly incurred liability to the debenture-holders to the amount of £4,988, the insurance company, who have guaranteed two-elevenths of that risk and insured them against two-elevenths of that risk, must pay them the amount of their liability. This would be even more strikingly true of the liability to pay expenses incurred imposed by the second part of the policy. If the society is liable to pay these expenses, but insolvent, will the insurance company only be liable to pay a dividend on them? That after they have paid, the law takes that sum they pay and divides it among general creditors so that the legal claim of the debenture-holders is not satisfied in full does not seem to me to afford any defence to the insurance company, who have no privity with the debenture-holders, but only when they have paid in full a right of subrogation to the rights of the society. I think the society are entitled to the first and second declarations asked for in their notice of appeal. The third declaration cannot be supported from any point of view. It is unnecessary to decide whether the society are entitled to the fourth declaration, but I incline to the view that under the decisions in Lacey v. Hill, Crowley's Claim (10), and Cruse v. Paine (9), they would be if they were not entitled to the first and the second declarations.

Appeal allowed.

Re LAW GUARANTEE TRUST AND ACCIDENT SOCIETY, LTD. GODSON'S CLAIM

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Neville, J.), December 2, 3, 1914]

[Reported [1915] 1 Ch. 340; 84 L.J.Ch. 510; 112 L.T. 537; 59 Sol. Jo. 234; [1915] H.B.R. 103]

Insurance—Guarantee of debentures—Insurance by guarantor of liability—Payment to guarantor by insurers—Right of debenture-holders to money paid.

In 1901 a company issued debentures secured by a trust deed under which certain property was assigned to a guarantee society as trustees for the debenture-holders. The society also guaranteed payment of principal and interest due on the debentures, and a form of guarantee signed on behalf of the society was printed upon each debenture. The company went into liquidation in 1908, the security thereon became enforceable, and the society went into possession of the property comprised in the trust deed on behalf of the debenture-holders. In December, 1909, the society also went into liquidation, and in 1910 a scheme of arrangement was agreed to by creditors and confirmed by the court. The society had previously insured its liability under the guarantee and were now entitled to payment in full of the insurance money.

Held: while it was true that the society were trustees for the debenture-holders of the mortgaged property, there was no fiduciary relation between the society and the debenture-holders with regard to the insurance money, and, therefore, that money formed part of the general assets of the society and the debenture-holders were not entitled to it.

Adjourned Summons for a declaration.

On Mar. 5, 1901, the Bedford Brewery (Plymouth), Ltd., issued a series of 1,000 first mortgage debentures of the company of £100 each. In each debenture they promised to pay to the registered holder thereof the sum of £100 on Dec. 31, 1910, or on such earlier date as it might become payable in accordance with the conditions endorsed thereon, and until payment of such principal moneys to pay to the holder interest at £4 10s. per cent by half-yearly instalments. The debentures were charged upon the company's undertaking and property, and were declared to be subject to the conditions endorsed on the debentures. According to these conditions the principal moneys were repayable (inter alia) when an order should be made by any competent court or an effective resolution should be passed by the company for winding-up. The debenture-holders were also entitled to the benefit of a trust deed dated Mar. 5, 1901, and made between the company and the Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society whereby certain property of the company was vested in the society as trustees for the debenture-holders and the company agreed to pay the society a sum of £105 per annum in consideration of its services. The society had also agreed to guarantee the debentures, and in pursuance of this arrangment an agreement was printed at the end of each debenture, signed by one of the directors on behalf of the society, and in the following terms:

"The society acknowledges that the above debenture was subscribed for on condition and in part consideration that the society would give the guarantee following, and accordingly the society hereby guarantee to the registered holder of the above debenture the payment of the moneys and interest, but not bonus, to become due under the said debenture in manner following—that is to say: (1) As to the interest. If and whenever the company makes default in the payment of any interest for more than thirty days the society will pay such interest on demand. (2) As to principal. If the company makes default in the payment of the principal moneys or any part thereof the society will pay the amount thereof upon whichever of the days following shall first happen—viz.: (a) On August 30, 1910, above mentioned; or (b) on the day after the securities for the debenture-holders shall have been enforced and completely realised and distributed so far as regards the holder of the above debenture. (3) At any time after the company shall have made default for more than fourteen days in the payment of any of the said principal moneys or interest, the society may, by notice in writing to the debenture-holder, call upon him to transfer to the society the above debenture and all his rights thereunder, and the debenture-holder shall be bound to comply with such demand on payment of the full amount of the principal moneys and interest then owing in respect of such debenture. (4) If the company makes default for more than thirty days in the payment of any principal moneys or interest secured by the above debenture, the debenture-holder must give notice in writing of such default to the society as to interest within six calendar months after the default, and as to principal within twelve calendar months after the default."

By the trust deed the company agreed to pay the society a premium of 15s. per cent. in consideration of this guarantee. After the date of this guarantee the society entered into contracts of reinsurance in respect of the debentures with the Law Accident Insurance Co. and other companies. The question of reinsurance was not referred to in the original proposal for guarantee nor in the debenture bonds, nor had the debenture-holders, according to the evidence, any knowledge of such contracts. In September, 1908, the Bedford Brewery (Plymouth), Ltd., went into voluntary liquidation, and the society appointed a receiver of the company's property in exercise of the powers contained in the trust deed. Thereafter the business was carried on by the receiver, but the profits were not sufficient to pay the interest due on the debentures in full. In December, 1909, the society also went into voluntary liquidation, and two liquidators were appointed. A suspension order was made, and on July 28, 1910, a scheme of arrangement was sanctioned by NEVILLE, J., under s. 120 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. By this scheme the payment of all claims was postponed until Dec. 31, 1918, interest at 3 per cent. being allowed on all claims proved and admitted, and it was further provided that on payment of a final dividend in the winding-up the holders of debentures guaranteed by the society should relieve the society from all claims. The claimant, Edmund Probyn Godson, who was the registered holder of all the outstanding debentures of the Bedford Brewery (Plymouth), Ltd., as to which the society were guarantors and trustees under the deed of Mar. 5, 1901, sought a declaration that he was entitled to the benefit of all reinsurances effected by the society in connection with the debentures so held by him.

Maugham, K.C., and W. A. Greene (R. Younger, K.C., with them), for the liquidators of the society, were not called on to argue.

NEVILLE, J.—I think in the case of an indemnity (and personally I do not see any distinction between an express contract for indemnity and an implied contract resulting from the relations of the parties) the doctrine of law was that the indemnified person could only sue the indemnifier in respect of matters coming under the indemnity when he had actually had the burden cast upon him and discharged it. In other words, you had to plead payment in an action on the indemnity. That relief was obviously in some cases insufficient, as is pointed out in Re Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society, Ltd., Liverpool Mortgage Insurance Co.'s Case (1), both in the court below and in the Court of Appeal, and the result was the introduction of equitable relief. That equitable relief consisted in granting to the indemnified a right against his indemnifer to have the obligation discharged, and this was done by a suit in equity either by the direct payment from the indemnifier to the creditor or in some cases by the provision or appropriation of a fund to meet the liability.

Subject to what I am going to say, I think that exhausted the rights under the contract of indemnity; but it appears from Ashdown v. Ingamells (2) and from SCRUTTON, J.'s remarks in his judgment in the Court of Appeal in the Liverpool Case (1) that, in the eye of the law (and I think this has nothing to do with equity), bankruptcy operated in this respect as a discharge of the debtor's obligations. One can see the reason for it, because, in the case of bankruptcy, the law discharged the debtor from his obligation to the creditor; the creditor got certain consideration for that in that he could prove the debtor's bankruptcy for the amount of his debt and get such dividend as the estate was capable of paying. I do not myself see that any distinction exists there between the case of the creditor actually proving in the bankruptcy and having the right to make the proof, because what discharges the obligation of the debtor is the bankruptcy, and not the proof of the creditor in the bankruptcy. I think that was sufficient to dispose of the case before the Court of Appeal, because, if that were so, then it seems to me obvious that my judgment was wrong and that there was no necessity to resort to equitable relief of any kind. It was the simple question of what was the legal right of the indemnified upon a contract of indemnity. I can draw no distinction between the liquidation of an insolvent company and bankruptcy; in both cases the debts owing to the creditor seem to be discharged. Whether the Court of Appeal purported to decide the case upon that point I am not sure, but I think what undoubtedly they did decide was that the particular contract they had before them (and probably that would apply to that class of contracts) was a contract to pay a defined sum on a particular contingency, and that when that contingency happened the right to recover the amount arose, and that was quite independent of an application of the money or anything but the right of the contractor under the contract that he had entered into. Here again I think from that point of view that was enough to decide the case, contrary to the decision I had given in the court below. Which of these grounds was the ground upon which the court proceeded I do not think is very material, because I think that either of them would have been sufficient. They say, first of all, under this particular contract you have got a contract to pay on a contingency, and, the contingency having happened, you must pay it. From the other point of view they say you have got a contract of indemnity; the debt has been discharged by operation of law and consequently you are entitled to recover. In either case it is the assertion of legal right and there is no need to resort to any equitable doctrine or any equitable relief at all. On the best consideration which I can give to the judgments of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, that, I think, is the outcome of their decisions.

If that is so, that decides the present case subject to one point. It might be that although the guarantee society were entitled to recover the money, and the payer of the money had no right to say anything with regard to its application, still when it came into their hands there might be some relation between themselves and the debenture-holders which would make them the trustees for the debenture-holders, so that, instead of dealing with the money as part of their general assets, they would have to apply it for the benefit of the cestuis que trust. But in my opinion, there was no such relation between the parties. True it is that the guarantee society were the trustees for the debenture-holders of the mortgaged property, but they also entered into a guarantee with the debenture-holders for the payment to them by the company issuing debentures, and it seems to me that their relations there were totally independent of the relation of trustees in that they involved no fiduciary relationship to the debenture-holders at all. Consequently, it seems to me that they are entitled to recover the money and apply it to their own use as part of the general assets of the society, and that the debenture-holders have no special claim on it.

Highway—Negligence—Misfeasance of highway authority—Widening of roadway—Equivalent to making of new road—Removal of telephone pole by postal authorities—Negligent filling of hole left by removal—Damage to vehicle—Liability of highway authority.

Acting under statutory powers, a corporation widened a road by taking in part of the footpath, and gave notice to the Postmaster-General to remove a telephone pole which stood within the part of the footpath taken in. The Postmaster-General removed the pole, but filled in the hole negligently, and when the road was again thrown open to the public the plaintiff's steam waggon sank axle-deep in the hole and was damaged.

Held: the plaintiff was entitled to damages for negligence (i) against the corporation because turning part of the footpath into a roadway was equivalent to making a new road and the failure of the corporation to see that the road was fit for the traffic intended to use it was an act of misfeasance and not non-feasance; McClelland v. Manchester Corpn. (1), [1912] 1 K.B. 118 and Hill v. Tottenham Urban District

Appeal against an order of Bradford County Court.

The plaintiff, Mary Ann Thompson, brought an action, as executrix of Isaac Thompson, against Bradford Corporation as the highway authority, and William Smith Tinsley, one of the principal officers in the Post Office Engineering Department, representing the Postmaster-General, for damages caused to the deceased's steam waggon by the defendant's negligence. Under the powers conferred by s. 25 of the Bradford Corporation Act, 1910, the corporation had determined to widen a road known as Horton Bank, which was very narrow, by setting back the kerb and throwing part of the pathway into the roadway. On the edge of the pathway there was a telephone pole which, in consequence of the widening of the road, was left standing in the roadway, and which it was necessary to remove. The corporation accordingly wrote to Mr. Tinsley giving him notice to remove it. On Apr. 3, 1914, Mr. Tinsley's men removed the pole and re-erected it on the new footpath, and filled in the hole. The work was completed on the evening of Apr. 3, and on Apr. 6, the corporation opened the road to traffic. On Apr. 10, the wheel of the deceased's steam waggon, which was of a type in ordinary use in the neighbourhood, sank into the hole where the pole had been, and was considerably damaged. There was nothing in the appearance of the road at the time of the accident to indicate that the hole had not been properly filled in. Evidence was given on behalf of the Postmaster-General that the hole had been filled in and the earth well rammed in the usual way. The county court judge found that the hole had not been filled or rammed in such a way as to make the road safe for the traffic of vehicles such as the deceased's, and he gave judgment for £83 damages against both the defendants: against the corporation on the ground that they had neglected their duty to see that the hole was properly filled in; and against the defendant Tinsley on the ground that he had done the work negligently. The defendants appealed.

Macmorran, K.C., and T. R. D. Wright for the corporation.

Harold Murphy for the Postmaster-General.

Waugh, K.C., and R. Watson for the plaintiff.

BAILHACHE, J.—In this case there are two appeals in an action brought by the plaintiff as executrix of a man named Thompson, against the Bradford Corporation, as the highway authority, and Mr. Tinsley, representing the Postmaster-General, for damages caused to the deceased's waggon by the negligence of the defendants. The county court judge gave judgment for £83 damages against both defendants, and both defendants appealed on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of either of them on which the judgment of the county court judge could be upheld.

The facts, which are not in dispute, were as follows. Under powers conferred on them by the Bradford Corporation Act, 1910, Bradford Corporation had full power to do certain street works within their district. No. 13 work, which they had full power to do under s. 25 of the Act, is > "a widening and improvement of High Street, Great Horton, on the northern side thereof, between Holly Bank Road and a point about 54 yds. westward of that road."

It was that part of the district of the corporation in which this accident happened. The road there consisted of a road and a footpath, and the road became too narrow for the traffic that required to use it, the corporation therefore widened the roadway at the expense of the footpath by setting back the kerb and taking a part of the footpath into the roadway. On the old footpath as it originally stood there were two poles—a telephone pole belonging to the Postmaster-General, and a tramway pole belonging to Bradford Corporation. When the footpath became narrowed by the corporation these poles stood in the road which the corporation were widening for the vehicular traffic, and it became necessary to remove these poles. The corporation thereupon gave notice to the Postmaster-General or to his servant to remove his pole, and his pole was removed by Mr. Tinsley's men on April 3, of last year; their own pole remained a few days later, and that was removed on April 6. So long as these poles were there, they had not thrown open this part of the road for vehicular traffic; obviously, it would have been a very dangerous thing to do. Instead they had enclosed that part with ordinary posts and trestles, which were lighted up at night by lamps. After they had removed their pole on April 6, there was no longer any reason, so far as they knew, to keep these things up, and the whole road was thrown open for traffic by the corporation. Then, four days afterwards, the engine belonging to the plaintiff came along, and the wheel sank up to the axle into the place where the telephone pole had been.

The first question is whether Bradford Corporation are liable for the accident. Counsel for the corporation has reminded us that for mere non-feasance the road authority, i.e., the corporation, are not responsible, and he has cited authorities which establish that principle. We do not wish to say a word against that principle, which is far too well established to be shaken, even if we desired to shake it now. He has further called our attention to the Telegraph Act, 1863, and in particular to s. 15 to s. 19 of that Act and to s. 42. Under s. 15 the duty was cast on the company to remove poles of this description when they were requested to do so by the local authority. By s. 2 of the Telegraph Act, 1868, that duty is now transferred to the Postmaster-General. Section 17 of the Act of 1863 gave the local authority power to supervise the work if they pleased and s. 18 provided that the Postmaster-General if he did the work was to restore the street and keep it in repair—that is the part that had been put out of repair by the work of removal done by him—for a period of six months. By s. 19 the local authority were empowered to do the work themselves if they chose, and to recover the expenses from the Postmaster-General; and then by s. 42 the Postmaster-General was to be liable, if he did the work which the local authority requested him to do, for all accidents which resulted from the fact that the work was done by him in a negligent way. On those sections counsel for the corporation has founded this argument, that whereas here the Postmaster-General does the work at the request of the local authority, the Act of 1863 imposes on him, and on him alone, the duty of doing this carefully, and throws on him, and on him alone, the responsibility for any injury and expense that may result from the work being improperly done. I do not think myself that that is the result of the statute.

It is quite clear, of course, that the statute does impose those liabilities on the Postmaster-General, but I do not think it imposes them on him to the exclusion of any other authority that may be for other reasons liable in respect of the work which has been done by the local authority. I do not think the Act of 1863 has very much to do with this case at all. I think the case here, so far as the Postmaster-General goes, may be treated as a case of a man having done work by request, which possibly he need not have done, but having done it and done it negligently, he is liable, even if it was work he need not have undertaken.

But to go back to Bradford Corporation, the Act of 1863, even if that be the Act under which this work was done—and there is some doubt whether that Act or the Act of 1878 is the proper Act—does not, in my opinion, dispose of or take away any responsibility which the corporation might have come under independently of it. Bearing in mind their non-liability for non-feasance, did the corporation come under any liability in respect of this pole? I think they did, and for this reason that they were making a new road. However, counsel for the corporation contends that it always was part of the road and part of the highway, and I quite agree that the pavement and the roadway together form one highway, and when I speak of a new road I mean that what they were doing here was turning what had been a footpath into a roadway, and to my mind that is equivalent to making a new road. They were altering the character of part of an old road, and, in my opinion, that is making a new road. Now, what is the duty of a highway authority which makes a new road? Surely the duty of a highway authority is to make it so that when they throw the road open to the public for the use of the public it shall be reasonably safe for the purposes for which it is intended to be used. In this case very heavy traffic passes over this road, and, in my judgment, it was the duty of the highway authority, who were making this road and who were intending to throw it open for the traffic, to see that it was reasonably fit for that purpose. It is true that this particular piece of road was unfit by reason of what have been done by the Postmaster-General, but that does not seem to me to matter at all in this case, because I think it is no answer, when a highway authority throws open a new road and that road is in fact unfit, to say: "The unfitness arises because that part of the road which was unfit was not rendered unfit by anything we did, but was rendered unfit by reason of something which someone else did at our request." I do not think that is any answer at all, and in my judgment the corporation are liable on the simple ground that, altering the character of this road, turning it from a footpath into a roadway for heavy traffic, there was an obligation on them to see that when they opened it to the public it was fit for the traffic and fit for the purposes for which it was intended to be used. I think that is in accordance with the judgment of LUSH, J., in McClelland v. Manchester Corpn. (1), and I think it is in accordance with the judgment of BRUCE, J., in Hill v. Tottenham Urban District Council (2). The fact that it was a new road—a road devoted to a new purpose as distinguished from an old highway—distinguishes this case from Steel v. Dartford Local Board (3). For these reasons I think Bradford Corporation were liable.

The Postmaster-General seems to me to be liable on the very simple ground that having done, perhaps voluntarily, a piece of work which he may not perhaps have been compelled to do, he did it negligently, and I understand the law to be that if a person undertakes a piece of work which he need not have done at all, he must do it with reasonable care. The Postmaster-General appears to have neglected his duty in that respect, and on that simple ground, apart from statute, it seems to me he is liable. I think the county council judge was quite right in giving judgment against both Bradford Corporation and the Postmaster-General—in the person of Mr. Tinsley—and this appeal must be dismissed.

SHEARMAN, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Unless express words in some statute prohibit it, an offence punishable on summary conviction may be tried in any one of the petty sessional divisions of the county in which the offence was committed and trial is not restricted to the division in which the offence was committed. Any justice of the peace for the county may issue a summons in respect of any such offence although not acting for the division in which it was committed, and justices for the county can sit in any petty sessional division in the county to hear and determine the charge.

Justices "having jurisdiction in the place where the article or drug sold was actually delivered to the purchaser," before whom proceedings were required to be brought under s. 20 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, in a county means justices having jurisdiction in the county where delivery was effected.

Notes. The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1953. The law on the subject is now governed by the Food and Drugs Act, 1955, and by regulations made or continued under that Act. The comparable section to s. 20 of the 1875 Act is s. 108 (2) of the 1955 Act which provides: "Where a sample has been procured under this Act, any proceedings in respect of the article or substance sampled shall be taken before a court having jurisdiction in the place where the sample was procured."

R. v. BEACONTREE JUSTICES. Ex parte MIDDLETON.

Rule Nisi for a writ of prohibition to the Essex justices acting for the petty sessional division of Beacontree, to prohibit them from further proceeding to hear and determine an information laid against Ernest Middleton, the applicant for the rule, charging him with having unlawfully sold on Mar. 10, 1915, at Chigwell, Essex, to the prejudice of the purchaser a certain article of food, milk, which was adulterated with at least ten per cent. of added water, and was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser. The rule was obtained on the ground that the justices in petty sessions assembled for the Beacontree Division had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the summons, as they were not the justices having jurisdiction in the district where the sale actually took place, the petty sessional division of Epping, that the justice who issued the summons had no jurisdiction to do so for an alleged offence outside the district in which he generally acted as a justice, and that there was no jurisdiction for the proceedings to be instituted in Beacontree Division.

On an information laid by an inspector, a summons was issued on Mar. 23, for the applicant to appear before the court of summary jurisdiction sitting at the Court House, Stratford, on Apr. 10, 1915. The justice who issued and signed this summons was at the time an ex officio justice for the county of Essex as chairman of Walthamstow Urban District Council which was comprised in Beacontree Petty Sessional Division, and he acted within and for that petty sessional division, and not in or for Epping Petty Sessional Division. Chigwell, where the offence was alleged to have been committed, was within the petty sessional division of Epping, and not of Beacontree; and Stratford, where the applicant was required to appear was not in the Epping Division but in the Beacontree Division. On Apr. 10, 1915, the applicant appeared before the court of summary jurisdiction at Stratford, when his solicitor objected that the court had no jurisdiction to hear the information. Following an adjournment a notice was sent to the applicant's solicitor that the justices had restored the case to the list for hearing on Apr. 24. The rule nisi for prohibition was obtained. The justices did not appear to show cause but in answer to the rule an affidavit was filed by the chairman of the justices, which stated that in 1881 an arrangement was made between the justices of Beacontree Division and the justices of Epping Division. Under this arrangement, all cases (other than those specially exempted by statute) arising in the districts of Chigwell and some other districts, all in the county of Essex, but outside though adjoining Beacontree Division, be heard at Epping, Waltham Abbey, or Stratford petty sessions for general convenience. The ground for making the arrangement was that there was direct railway communication with Stratford, and that a court was held at Stratford petty sessions every day, thereby enabling a large number of small charges to be dealt with without remand, and avoiding unnecessary delay in the administration of the law. The courts at Waltham Abbey and Epping only sat once a week. This arrangement had worked satisfactorily since 1881, and no question appeared to have been raised previously as to the jurisdiction either by litigants or their advocates. It had been believed that the jurisdiction of the Stratford justices, who were sworn in as justices for the county of Essex, was concurrent and extended throughout the whole of the county of Essex, with the exception of those boroughs in the county which had separate courts of quarter sessions. After the adjournment of the summons the chairman consulted with the clerk to the justices as to the objections taken, and having regard to the authorities was advised that there was no substance in the objections, and therefore instructed the clerk to restore the summons to the list for hearing.

R. v. Wright and others.

Rule Nisi calling on justices of the peace for the county of Essex and one Alfred Stone to show cause why the justices should not proceed to hear and determine an information preferred by Arthur Horsnell against Alfred Stone, charging him with having unlawfully sold, to the prejudice of the purchasers, on Mar. 3, 1915, at the parish of Hornchurch, Essex, a certain article of food, milk, which was adulterated with at least twenty-five parts per cent. of water, and was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchasers. The rule was obtained on the ground (i) that the justices were wrong in law in refusing to hear and determine the summons issued on the information; (ii) that the summons was properly and legally issued by the justice who issued it; and (iii) that the justice had jurisdiction to issue the summons.

On Mar. 3, 1915, the applicant for the rule, an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts for the county of Essex, at Hornchurch, a place in the petty sessional division of Romford, took a sample of milk in the course of delivery by Stone, a farmer at Hornchurch, in the county of Essex, to certain purchasers in Romford. He caused an analysis to be made, from which it appeared that two offences against the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1879, had been committed. On Mar. 19, 1915, he attended before a justice of the peace for the county of Essex, at the court-house for the petty sessional division of Orsett at Grays, Essex, and presented to him two informations. One charged the defendant, Stone, with having sold to the prejudice of the purchasers a certain article of food, milk, which was adulterated with at least twenty-five parts per cent. of water, and was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchasers. The second information was in the same terms, charging that the milk was adulterated with at least eight parts per cent. of water. The inspector also asked to have the summonses made returnable before the justices sitting in and for Romford petty sessional division of the county of Essex, at Romford, on Apr. 8, 1915. The justices issued the two summonses, and made them so returnable. Mr. Williams, who issued the summonses, stated in his affidavit that since his appointment as a justice of the peace for the county of Essex in 1902 he had been in the habit of sitting at the petty sessions for the petty sessional division of Orsett, and that he had not on any occasion sat at the petty sessions for the petty sessional division of Romford. On Apr. 8, 1915, when the summonses came on for hearing at Romford before the justices for the county sitting in petty sessions for the petty sessional division of Romford, counsel for the defendant took the preliminary objection that the summonses were bad in law on the ground that by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 20, proceedings had to be taken before the justices in petty sessions assembled having jurisdiction in the place where the milk was actually delivered to the purchasers, and that Mr. Williams, the justice who issued the summonses, had no jurisdiction to issue the summonses under the Act.

The justices were of opinion that the arguments of counsel for the defendant were correct and ought to prevail, and they declined to hear the summonses on the ground of want of jurisdiction to do so.

The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 20, provides:

"When the analyst having analysed any article shall have given his certificate of the result, from which it may appear that an offence against some one of the provisions of this Act has been committed, the person causing the analysis to be made may take proceedings for the recovery of the penalty herein imposed for such offence, before any justices in petty sessions assembled having jurisdiction in the place where the article or drug sold was actually delivered to the purchaser, in a summary manner."

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 46, provides:

"For the purposes of the trial of any offence punishable on summary conviction under this Act or under any other Act, whether past or future, the following provisions shall have effect— . . . (2) Where the offence is committed on the boundary of the jurisdiction of two or more courts of summary jurisdiction, or within the distance of five hundred yards of any such boundary, or is begun within the jurisdiction of one court and completed within the jurisdiction of another court of summary jurisdiction, such offence may be tried by any one of such courts."

C. E. Jones in support of the rule in the first case.
Rowand Harker in support in the second case.

The justices did not appear to show cause against the rules.

LORD READING, C.J.—The fault which is found with the decision of the justices in the first case, and with the proceedings so far as they have taken place, is that it was not the justices sitting in Epping Division, but the justices sitting in Beaconcree Division,

A who heard and determined the case. An application was made to this court for a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition, and it was granted because it was thought that the matter was one of importance that ought to be determined. Now that we have before us the affidavit of the chairman of the justices, we find in it the statement that in 1881, as a matter of convenience between themselves, the justices had arranged certain divisions for the justices of the county, and that certain justices should be the justices for one B petty sessional division and other justices should sit for another petty sessional division, and they state that in consequence of what they had done they were entitled to adjudicate on this matter within Beacontree Division.

The first point that has been raised has not been really pressed by counsel for the applicant. Justices for one petty sessional division of the county can sit in any part of the county unless there are express words of some statute which prohibit it. That is a C principle of general law which has been laid down, and which is to be found in R. v. Beckley (1) where Lord Coleridge, C.J., said (20 Q.B.D. at p. 190):

> "It is contended that the offence cannot legally be dealt with by magistrates acting in a different petty sessional division from that in which the offence was committed, but there is no such rule of law; for in dealing with an offence committed in the county the magistrates for the county have jurisdiction throughout the county, and D there is nothing in the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859, to limit their power to hear and determine the case."

A general proposition is there laid down which we think correctly states the law. It has been dealt with in Caistor Rural District Council v. Taylor (2). There Lord Alverstone, C.J., sitting with Darling and Phillimore, JJ., on a similar question coming E before him, but arising under another Act of Parliament, said (97 L.T. at p. 284):

> "I think that s. 6 of the Division of Counties Act, 1828, which has been referred to, was a section which enabled new divisions to be made and which enabled and directed business to be done in such new divisions; but that does not oust the jurisdiction which the justices in another petty sessional division have got if they are lawfully entitled to hear a case and it is properly brought before them. The F justices are justices for the county, and the case of R. v. Beckley (1) decided distinctly that justices sitting in and acting for one petty sessional division of a county have jurisdiction to deal with an offence committed in another petty sessional division of the same county."

That states very clearly and well the general propositions of law to be applied.

The passage in Archbold's Quarter Sessions (6th Edn. at p. 14) to which Scrutton, G J., during the argument called attention contains a quotation from R. v. Sainsbury (3), (4 Term. Rep. at p. 456) by Lord Kenyon to this effect:

> "That the King may grant a commission of the peace for a county and that the jurisdiction of such justices may pervade the whole county cannot be doubted. Neither can it be disputed that he may grant commissions of the peace for any H particular district in the county, and that that sub-division may have justices of its own, exclusive of the jurisdiction of the justices of the county at large; but the latter can only be effected by a non-intromittent clause, prohibiting the county justices from interfering in that district."

And, as was said by the same learned judge in Blankley v. Winstanley (4) (3 Term. Rep. at p. 287):

I > "The exclusion of county justices from acting in particular districts has always been watched with a jealous eye, and nothing but express words are sufficient to exclude them."

Notwithstanding that we have had a very interesting discussion and search into the original introduction of the terms "petty sessions" and "petty sessional division" and an endeavour to ascertain the origin or creation of petty sessions, it becomes unnecessary for us to pronounce any opinion on the result of that discussion except to affirm the important principles of law which have been dealt with in the two cases to which I have called attention, supplemented by the quotation from LORD KENYON. That states the general law, and there can be no limitation on the right of the justices of the county to sit in every petty sessional division of the county as a matter of law unless a limitation is found either in the commission, which would not take place if a person is appointed justice for the county, or in express words of the statute.

The real question in this case arises on the second point raised by counsel for the applicant, on which he has insisted, whether or not the words in s. 20 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, do impose a limitation on the jurisdiction of the justices of the county so as to enable only the justices sitting in the petty sessional division of the place where the milk was actually delivered, to adjudicate on this case. In my opinion these words do not amount to such a limitation. I read the words in s. 20 as meaning that any question with regard to jurisdiction of the justices is to be determined by the place of delivery, and no other question is to be brought into consideration. The place of delivery determines jurisdiction, and that means that the place of delivery will determine the county in which the justices have jurisdiction to deal with this matter. It is quite easy to see that part of the transaction of sale or delivery of milk may take place in one county, whereas the actual delivery might take place in another county, and there might be difficult questions arising as to the place where the justices should have jurisdiction to deal with the matter. That is set at rest by s. 20. The first thing to ascertain is the time of delivery to the purchaser, and the next thing to ascertain is the place of such delivery, and when that has been ascertained then only the justices in that county of the place of delivery have jurisdiction to deal with the matter; and the only reason why the words "justices in petty sessions assembled" were introduced was because the justices were to be sitting in court, acting as a court, and not acting elsewhere. Consequently, the well-known phrase "in petty sessions assembled" was used so as to prevent the matter from being dealt with elsewhere, or otherwise than properly where justices are assembled in court.

In my view, the point is an interesting one, and was worthy of discussion to set at rest this matter which has been discussed apparently outside this court and has given rise to some controversy. As a consequence, the decision at which we arrive on this section is the one I have expressed, that the justices of the county may sit where they please for the purpose of determining the matter, so long as the delivery of the milk took place in the county in which they do sit. It may be, and no doubt is, better for the justices of the petty sessional division to be assembled in the petty sessional division of the place where the milk is delivered to the purchaser. However, that is a matter of convenience; but as a matter of law and jurisdiction there is nothing to prevent other justices from sitting, and from sitting in other divisions within the county. That disposes of the first case, and the rule nisi in that case for a writ of prohibition must be discharged.

In R. v. Wright the point raised is a somewhat different one. It also arose under s. 20 of the Act. In that case the milk was delivered in a place in a certain petty sessional division. The justice to whom application was made for a summons, and who granted the summons, was not a justice for that petty sessional division, but was a justice for another petty sessional division. The summons was returnable in the first petty sessional division where the milk was delivered. When the case came before the justices of that petty sessional division where the milk was delivered, they declined to hear and determine the matter on the ground that the justice to whom the application for the summons had been made, and who had granted the summons, had no jurisdiction to deal with the matter, inasmuch as it could only be a justice for the petty sessional division in the place where the milk was delivered who could grant the summons; i.e., that only in the petty sessional division in which delivery took place could the summons be granted, and that it would only be granted by a justice of that petty sessional division and could not be granted by a justice of any other petty sessional division of the county. In our view that is wrong. A justice of any petty sessional division in the county could deal with this matter. For the reasons which I have already given, and which I indicated in the last case, a narrower meaning is to be attributed to the words in the section, and, once we have given the different meaning from that contended for in the earlier case, it follows in this second case that the justices were wrong in refusing to hear and determine the matter which was brought before them. The consequence of that must be that the rule nisi for the mandamus to hear and determine this matter must be made absolute. Certainly counsel in support of the rule, who has called our attention to the various authorities and also to the law on the subject, has made good his point and has established to my complete satisfaction that the justices in this case ought not to have refused to hear the case. These cases have turned on the same question, and apparently, in the county of Essex, there has been a controversy about the matter which this decision will set at rest. In the second case the order must be made absolute to hear and determine.

RIDLEY, J.— I agree with the Lord Chief Justice. I have never had any doubt at all as to this, that a justice of the peace for a particular county can act throughout the county and in all the petty sessional divisions which it contains, though as a rule he does act only in one or two of those petty sessional divisions. But I certainly had an impression that a person summoned for an offence triable at petty sessions had a right to be summoned in the petty sessional division where the offence was committed. I now think that was wrong. It has been so far the universal custom, or the almost universal custom, that a person should be summoned in that place where the offence was committed, that it might be easily supposed that there was a right to be summoned in that place where there was not. I do not think that there is such a right unless it is to be found in some statute. In this instance, therefore, the question is whether there is such a statute, and I think, on the construction of s. 20 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, on which counsel in support of the rule in the first case relies, there is no such right. "Petty sessions" is a phrase the origin of which it is difficult to trace. There are sessions described at considerable length in the old books which we have been looking into. I find quarter sessions are called also the general sessions. They were held in some counties sixteen times a year. General sessions were held as many as sixteen times in the year for the convenience of people who resided in the county. They are, generally, held quarterly, however, or four times a year, and so they came to be called quarter sessions. The phrase "petty sessions" has no particular significance as to district; it is merely the word small, or minor, session as compared with the general sessions. As time went on it gradually came to have the significance which we attach to it. It was in the last century that this process began, and the Division of Counties Act, 1828, is perhaps the first Act which uses the phrase. It was used again in the Petty Sessions Act, 1849, and it was also used in an Act of 1847 which speaks of "petty sessions assembled," and the Act of 1849 refers to "petty sessions," and to the districts as "petty sessional divisions." On that enactment Stephen, J., in his History of the Criminal Law, vol. I, at p. 124, says that that phrase must have been rather a popular than a legal phrase at that time; but it has since that time acquired a special meaning, and I think that all now understand what a petty sessional division or district is. That is how the phrase came into being. It was a particular part of the county constituted into a petty sessional division. For that district all justices of the county had a right to act.

The question that troubled me in this case was whether, whilst the justices can act for the whole county, an offender has a right to be tried in the petty sessional division where the offence was committed. The whole of the law relating to summary conviction is the creature of statute and nothing else. There would not, I think, have been such a thing in this country as a summary conviction if it had not been for statutes. There is no common law summary conviction. That is so stated in the law books, and I believe it is correct. If that is so, in order to give to the offender in a petty sessional division the right to say that he has a local venue entitling him to have his case heard in that petty sessional division in which he is charged with having committed the offence, the right must be found in some statute. The common law of this country will not give it to him. Crime is certainly local; but then as regards the venue, i.e., the right to be tried locally, the place where the crime must be tried is limited to the county. I have never heard of any principle which by itself goes to the length of saying that the doctrine of venue must be pressed so far that an offender in one petty sessional division must be tried only in that division. I think there could not be such a law, and I feel that I was mistaken in supposing that that could be a matter of right which was really only a matter of custom. For these reasons I agree with the Lord Chief Justice.

SCRUTTON, J.—I agree with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

Rule in the first case discharged. Rule in the second case made absolute.

R. v. LICENSING JUSTICES AND COMPENSATION AUTHORITY FOR THE CITY OF CHESTER. Ex Parte BENNION

[King's Bench Division (Ridley, Rowlatt and Shearman, JJ.) May 18, 1914]

[Reported [1914] 3 K.B. 349; 83 L.J.K.B. 1259; 111 L.T. 575; 78 J.P. 447]

Licensing—Licence—Renewal—Objection—Objections not addressed to holder of licence—Reference to compensation authority—Application for prohibition against proceeding with reference—Jurisdiction to grant.

The licensee of a public-house having died, the house was being carried on by his executors and his daughter applied to the licensing justices for the transfer of the licence to her and for its renewal. The hearing of the applications was adjourned because notices of objection to the renewal had been given to the executors by the chief constable and the clerk to the licensing justices. At the adjourned hearing the licensing justices took applications for transfers first and granted the transfer applied for. After hearing the applicant and the objectors and their evidence they rejected a submission that the objections could not be considered on the ground that the notices had been addressed to the executors and not to the applicant and referred the renewal of the licence to the compensation authority. The applicant applied for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the justices and the compensation authority from proceeding with the reference.

Held: the writ of prohibition was not the proper remedy and would not be granted since once the question of the renewal of the licence was referred to the compensation authority they were bound to deal with the matter under s. 10 (2) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, even if the renewal were so referred without any notice of objection having been given to the holder of the licence.

Rule Nisi calling upon the licensing justices and the compensation authority for the city of Chester to show cause why a writ or writs of prohibition should not issue to prohibit the licensing justices from proceeding with the reference to the compensation authority, of an application for the renewal of her licence by Sarah Bennion, the applicant for the rule, and to prohibit the compensation authority from further considering such reference. The grounds of the application were that the necessary notice of objection to the application of Sarah Bennion for the renewal of her licence was not given, and that the licensing justices had no jurisdiction to hear evidence in opposition to such renewal or refer the licence for compensation.

The applicant's mother was tenant and licensee of the King's Arms, in the city of Chester, until her death on Dec. 4, 1913. She left a will which was proved by the two executors named therein on Jan. 6, 1914. The King's Arms public-house was an old fully licensed public-house. The executors carried on the business of the King's Arms after the death of the testatrix under s. 65 (7) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. Sarah Bennion, the applicant and present licensee, lived at the house and assisted in carrying on such business, but the owners did not accept her as tenant until February, 1914. On Jan. 8, 1914, two notices of objection in similar terms by the chief constable and the clerk to the licensing justices were left at the King's Arms. These notices were addressed to the legal personal representatives of the late Mrs. Sarah Bennion, of the King's Arms, and required them to attend at the general annual meeting on Feb. 5, The three specified objections were that a fully licensed house in the place was not required, that the licence was unnecessary, and that in the interests of the public the renewal of the licence was not desirable. At the general annual licensing meeting for the city, on Feb. 5, 1914, the applicant was in court accompanied by one of her mother's executors. An inspector on behalf of the chief constable (who was absent through illness) informed the justices in their hearing that he objected to the renewal of certain licences, including that of the King's Arms, and that formal notices of objection had been served. The justices announced that all these cases would be adjourned to Mar. 5, and that the applicants for renewal must then attend. Thereupon the applicant's solicitor applied on behalf of the applicant for a protection order to enable her to sell in the interval, and called the executor to assent to her application which was granted. The applicant continued to sell at the King's Arms under the protection order. On Mar. 5, the justices decided to take applications for transfers at the outset. Among other applications the applicant applied through her solicitor for a transfer of the licence, and after hearing evidence as to notices and character they expressed their willingness to grant a transfer, but no transfer was signed till the close of the meeting. After the applications for transfers had been disposed of the justices proceeded to deal with applications for renewals, and the applicant's solicitor applied for a renewal to her. The chief constable stated that he objected, and evidence was given of the service of the notices of objection left at the King's Arms on Jan. 8, but not of any other service of notices of objection. The chief constable gave evidence on oath to the effect that this licence was not required, and was cross-examined by the applicant's solicitor. At the close of his evidence the solicitor submitted that the justices could not legally hear the objection by the chief constable to the renewal of the licence but were bound to grant the renewal, as the only notices were the notices addressed to the legal personal representatives of the late licensee, and that, as no notice of objection had been served on the applicant or to an application for the renewal of her licence to her, they had no power to refuse the renewal to her unless they further adjourned the annual licensing meeting. He said also that he wished to put before them reasons why a renewal ought not to be refused. He addressed them on the merits of the case and called the applicant, who was examined and cross-examined as to the amount and class of business done at the house. At the close of her evidence he said that he did not wish to call any further witness. The justices were satisfied that the executor, whose co-executor had died shortly after proving the will, had full knowledge of the notice served on the applicant, and also heard what was said in court on Feb. 5. They were of opinion that sufficient notice had been given to enable the justices to deal with the matter without any further adjournment, and that, if the applicant's solicitor could legally have insisted on a further adjournment, he waived such right by cross-examining the chief constable on the merits of the case, and by addressing the justices and calling evidence on the merits. The justices referred the licence of the King's Arms to the compensation authority for compensation. The applicant obtained rules nisi for prohibition directed to the justices and the compensation authority.

The Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, provided:

"19 (1) Where the licensing justices, on the consideration by them, in accordance with this Act, of applications for the renewal of justices' licences are of opinion that the question of the renewal of any particular old on-licences requires consideration on grounds other than those on which the renewal of an old on-licence can be refused by them, they shall refer the matter to the compensation authority, together with their report thereon. (2) The compensation authority shall consider all reports so made to them, and may, if they think it expedient, after giving the persons interested in the licensed premises, and, unless it appears to the compensation authority unnecessary, any other persons appearing to them to be interested in the question of the renewal of the licence of those premises (including the licensing justices), an opportunity of being heard, and, subject to the payment of compensation under this Act, refuse the renewal of any licence to which any such report relates.

"16. . . . (3) Subject to the provisions of this section, the licensing justices shall not, where the holder of a justices' licence applies for the renewal of his licence, entertain any objection to or take any evidence with respect to the renewal thereof, unless written notice of an intention to oppose the renewal of the licence, stating in general terms the grounds on which the renewal is opposed, has been served on the holder thereof not less than seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting."

G. R. Hill for the justices.
R. M. Montgomery for the applicant.

RIDLEY, J.—In this case it seems to me that prohibition is the wrong remedy. With regard to the facts I cannot see that the points taken before the justices were not good, but I wish to express no opinion on them at present. I am not inclined to say that there was not a good foundation for the objection which was taken, that the transfer had been granted, that it could not be refused and that there could be no recall of it, and that therefore the applicant was the holder of the licence and that she had not received notice of objection to which she was entitled under s. 16 (3) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. At all events the objection would have been well worthy of consideration.

That being the objection taken to the order made by the licensing justices referring the matter to the compensation authority, it appears to me that prohibition is not the proper remedy. The Act of Parliament, after providing in s. 19 (1) that the licensing justices in dealing with applications for renewal of licences shall, in the circumstances there mentioned, refer the matter to the compensation authority, together with their report thereon, goes on in sub-s. (2) to say: "The compensation authority shall consider all reports so made to them." It lies on them on receipt of a report from the licensing justices to consider the matters referred to them, and on the evidence put before them to come to a conclusion whether the premises are to be closed and compensation awarded.

That is the position that the compensation authority occupy. The applicant comes here with a rule for a prohibition and asks this court to prohibit the compensation authority from doing that which the statute says that they shall do. Counsel in support of the rule with much ingenuity submits that the licensing justices who made the order referring the matter to the compensation authority had no jurisdiction to make that order, and that, therefore, the order was to be treated as bad, and the compensation authority are to be prohibited from acting on it. In my opinion that is an unsound view of the remedy by way of prohibition. Prohibition is granted to prevent courts and authorities from proceeding in cases where they have no jurisdiction. Take, for instance, this simple case: Suppose a court has authority given to it by statute to try cases of the value of £100 and no more, and it proceeds to endeavour to try a case of the value of £200, obviously a jurisdiction is being assumed which the court has not got. If the order in a similar way be a clear nullity, I am not going to say that that may not be a case for interference by way of prohibition. One can readily understand such cases: for instance, if a person were to forge an order, that would be really a non-existent order. That class of cases I should put in quite a distinct category from the present case where it appears, as in R. v. Somersetshire Justices, Ex parte Joyce (1), that the compensation authority have got before them the report from the licensing justices which primâ facie is a good report, and it is a good report unless there be some foundation for the appeal made against it to us on the merits, to which I have already referred.

If that is so, it seems to me that the proper remedy is to get that put right, and not to proceed by way of prohibition against the compensation authority, which cannot do otherwise than act on the report sent to them by the licensing justices in pursuance of the statute. I have not any distinct recollection of R. v. Somersetshire Justices, Ex parte Joyce (1) but I have no doubt that it is correctly reported in the judgment which has been read to us; and I have no distinct recollection of R. v. Tolhurst, Ex parte Farrell (2), but neither of them is in the least degree an authority against the view that I have expressed in this case. I am strongly of opinion that prohibition is not the proper remedy in this case, and that in applying for prohibition the applicant has gone outside the boundaries in which that is allowed to be the remedy. For these reasons, therefore, I think this rule must be discharged.

ROWLATT, J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 19 (1) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, provides that when the licensing justices consider that the question of the renewal of an old on-licence requires consideration on grounds other than those on which the renewal of an old on-licence can be refused by them, they should refer the matter to the compensation authority, together with their report thereon. Subsection (2) provides that the compensation authority shall consider all reports so made to them, and have the proceedings before them which the subsection goes on to set forth. The construction of that sub-section seems to me to be that, when the compensation authority get a report they are to proceed on it, and counsel for the applicant did not dispute that. It was conceded by him that the compensation authority had no option, that they must go on and hear it, and that nobody could object to their going on and hearing the matter. But he said that, although they are bound to go on, still, if the reference was made to them without proper notice of objection having been given in the first instance, this court can prohibit them. In other words, what he is saying comes to this, that this court can prohibit a body of justices, the compensation authority, from proceeding with a matter which they could not refuse to proceed with. A more grotesque view of the remedy by prohibition I have never heard of. Prohibition was invented to prevent an inferior tribunal from usurping a jurisdiction which the law did not give to it, and involves the element that the inferior court is doing something not only which it could have refused to do, but which it never ought to have done. To say that it can be prohibited in a case as to which at the same time it is said that it could not have refused to proceed seems to me a mere contradiction in terms. It is very easy to see why this step has been taken and counsel for the applicant with perfect candour admitted it. If the applicant had taken the proper steps to make the licensing justices proceed properly, namely, to grant an adjournment and consider this objection as to which it was said that no notice was given, she would not have gained much by the delay, except extra expenses, as the justices might conceivably have come to the same conclusion. Therefore, the ingenious plan was adopted of trying to prevent the compensation proceedings from now taking place, so that the provisional licence might enure for the whole year. It is ingenious, but it fails. I express no opinion as to the point which would have arisen if the decision of the licensing justices had been attacked by mandamus, or in some such way as that, because in my judgment it does not arise.

SHEARMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the licensing justices in this case made exactly the same slip as was made by the licensing justices in Blencowe & Co., Ltd. v. Lord Hatherton (3). I think, if the applicant had confined herself to asking the licensing justices to reconsider their decision because she had not been served in the proper manner with the notice, she would have succeeded. But instead of doing that she has taken the step of applying to prohibit the compensation authority from proceeding with the reference. The statute is quite clear on the point. It is quite clear that the licensing justices have referred the question of the renewal of the King's Arms to the compensation authority, and the statute in s. 19 (2) is clear that the compensation authority shall consider all reports sent to them. This report has been sent to them, and it is their duty to consider it. It appears to me that, if the report is a wrong one, the proper remedy and the reasonable remedy was to take the proper step to set aside the report which had been made by the justices, and then the compensation authority indirectly would not have been able to go on. I think it is clear that in a case of this description prohibition will not lie, and I agree in my judgment with the other members of the court.

Rule discharged.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ROE

[Chancery Division (Sargant, J.), December 10, 21, 1914]

[Reported [1915] 1 Ch. 235; 84 L.J.Ch. 322; 112 L.T. 581; 79 J.P. 263; 13 L.G.R. 335]

Highway—Nuisance—Quarry adjoining highway—Collapse of wall separating excavation from footpath—Fall of footpath into quarry—Mandatory order to reinstate footpath and wall.

The surface of a public highway vested in the local authority and that of the adjoining land had been level until the owner of the land, or the occupier with his consent, excavated the land to a depth of 45 feet immediately next to the footpath forming part of the highway. To protect the public and the road from the danger of the excavation, the owner or occupier built a wall alongside the footpath which served as a retaining wall for the subsoil of the footpath and as a protection against the danger of the excavation. Part of the wall collapsed and fell into the quarry below it, and with it part of the subsoil and surface of the footpath, making it impassable and a source of danger to persons trying to use it and also a nuisance under s. 8 of the Quarry (Fencing) Act, 1887, liable to be dealt with summarily under the Public Health Act, 1875. In an action by the Attorney-General at the relation of the local authority,

Held: there was a common law obligation on the possessor of a dangerous excavation by the side of the highway to keep it fenced off, whether it was or was not there before his possession began: Coupland v. Hardingham (1) (1813), 3 Camp. 398, applied; and irrespective of any liability to his landlord: R. v. Watson (2) (1703), 2 Ld. Raym. 856, and Tarry v. Ashton (3) (1876), 1 Q.B.D. 314, applied; and a mandatory order would, therefore, be made on the owner or occupier to abate the nuisance by restoring the footpath to its condition before the subsidence and by rebuilding the wall or providing some other reasonable fence to separate the footpath from the quarry.

Action for declarations and for a mandatory order requiring the abatement of a nuisance.

The action was brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of Knottingley Urban District Council, Knottingley Urban District Council being themselves also co-plaintiffs with the Attorney-General, against Roe, the owner or occupier of a plot of land being a worked-out quarry which immediately adjoined a footpath vested in the council and repairable by the inhabitants at large.

According to the statement of claim, the surface of the footpath and the surface of a plot of land now owned by the defendant had formerly been on the same level. About 1865 the then owner of the plot of land or the occupier with the consent of the owner, excavated the land to a great depth alongside the footpath for the purpose of quarrying limestone for profit. The date when the excavation reached the edge of the footpath was long subsequent to the date when the footpath first became a public highway. The result of the working was to leave an excavation 45 ft. deep with perpendicular sides immediately adjoining the south-east edge of the footpath and extending along it for a distance of sixty-five yards. Such excavation was a source of danger and obstruction to persons using the footpath, and a public nuisance by reason of (a) the danger of passengers falling over the edge and (b) the danger of the footpath and the underlying soil slipping into it. For the protection of the footpath, and of persons lawfully using it, the then owner or/and occupier of the quarry erected a wall alongside the footpath. The bottom of such wall was based on a ledge of limestone left ungotten for the purpose, and it served as a retaining wall to the subsoil of the footpath and also above the surface of the path, as a fence wall.

The plaintiffs submitted that it was the duty of the owners and occupiers for the time being of the quarry to erect, and thereafter maintain in good condition the wall or some other equally efficient protection and they had so maintained and repaired the said wall up to 1913. About February, 1913, a portion of the wall 51 ft. long collapsed and fell into the quarry, and at the same time or shortly afterwards, a considerable quantity of the subsoil of the footpath and a portion of the surface slipped into the quarry, leaving a gap in the footpath 50 ft. long and 6 ft. wide, the bottom of which sloped at a steep angle into the quarry. The footpath was impassable and a source of danger to persons trying to use it, and the plaintiffs alleged that its condition amounted to a public nuisance. They contended that the defendant was under an absolute obligation to maintain the wall or otherwise protect the footpath and persons using it. Alternatively they contended that it was his duty periodically to inspect the wall and its foundations and to adopt all proper and reasonable means for strengthening, supporting, and repairing it, and that the fall of the wall was due to his negligence in failing to fulfil such duty. On April 6, 1914, by a letter to the defendant's solicitor the plaintiff council called on the defendant to restore the footpath and afterwards fence it from the quarry and to carry out such work as might be necessary to secure the footpath from being again let down into the quarry, and by a letter of his solicitor dated April 16, 1914, the defendant refused to do any of such work.

The plaintiffs claimed (i) A declaration that it was the duty of the defendant as owner of and in possession the quarry to erect and maintain such wall or other protection as might be necessary to prevent the footpath or the subsoil from slipping into the quarry and to safeguard passengers using it. (ii) A declaration that the existing condition of the footpath amounted to a public nuisance and that the defendant was responsible therefor. (iii) An order that the defendant forthwith abate the nuisance by restoring the footpath and rebuilding the wall or doing such works as might be necessary for the purpose.

The defendant did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21. SARGANT, J.—This action comes on by way of motion for judgment in default of delivery of defence. It was originally set down as a short cause, but I did not feel myself at liberty to deal with it on that basis or without some examination of the authorities. Accordingly, it has since been fully argued on behalf of the plaintiff and, although I have not had the assistance of any argument on behalf of the defendant I am now in a better position to give judgment.

The plaintiffs claim a declaration as to the duty to maintain and repair, a declaration as to the existing condition of the footpath, and a mandatory injunction compelling the defendant to abate the nuisance by rebuilding the wall and restoring the footpath. By the Quarry (Fencing) Act, 1887, a special obligation is imposed on owners of quarries to fence quarries within fifty yards of a highway, and a quarry not so fenced is liable to be dealt with as a nuisance under the Public Health Act, 1875. But, further than this, it seems clear that there is a common law obligation on the possessor of a dangerous excavation by the side of the highway to keep it fenced off whether the excavation was or was not there before his possession began: Coupland v. Hardingham (1), a case in which, as pointed out in Barnes v. Ward (4), it is clear that the excavation was not in any way part of the highway, but by the side of it. And this being so, the right of the plaintiffs to enforce the obligation is clear: Wednesbury Corpn. v. Lodge Holes Colliery Co. (5). Again, as regards nuisance on or by the highway, the obligation of the actual occupier is clear whether he is or is not liable to his landlord, if any: R. v. Watson (2); and Tarry v. Ashton (3). And in A.-G. v. Tod Heatley (6) this obligation was enforced by injunction. Cases such as Greenwell v. Low Beechburn Coal Co. (7), which deals with the obligations between private owners when support has been removed by a predecessor in title, appear to stand on a somewhat different footing. And even there the question of liability was left open in cases where there ought to be a structure to be maintained. For my own satisfaction I required an affidavit to be filed for the purpose of showing what would be the probable cost of rebuilding the wall and restoring the footpath. An affidavit was accordingly made by Mr. Ingle, the county surveyor, and in this he estimates that the cost of rebuilding the wall from the quarry bottom to its original height, i.e. to 4 ft. above the level of the footpath, would be £70 6s., and the cost of filling in the footpath when the wall has been built would be 11s. It appears, therefore, that there would be no real difficulty in abating the present continuing nuisance. The declarations that are asked for appear to represent the state of the law with substantial accuracy, and to constitute the logical foundation for the relief to which the plaintiffs are entitled. But I see no sufficient reason for embodying these declarations in the actual judgment. I merely grant a mandatory order on the defendant forthwith to abate the nuisance complained of in the pleadings by restoring the footpath to its former condition prior to the subsidence in or about February, 1913, and by rebuilding the former wall or providing some other reasonable fence to separate such footpath from the defendants' quarry, and by doing all works reasonably necessary for the purpose aforesaid. The defendant must pay the costs of the action to be taxed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Reading, C.J., and Buckley, L.J.), January, 17, 30, 1914]

Company—Winding-up—Costs—Taxation—Taxation in the winding-up—Costs incurred before winding-up—Assets of company in hands of solicitors.

Where solicitors to a company in compulsory liquidation submit, on a summons instituted in the matter of the winding-up, to an order for delivery of their bill of costs, the bill, when delivered, may be ordered to be taxed in the winding-up proceedings. This is so, although the bill is in respect of costs incurred before the liquidation and the solicitors are not making a claim against the assets of the company because they have money of the company in their hands more than enough to satisfy their costs.

Semble: If the summons had been intituled in the matter of the Solicitors Act, 1843, and in the matter of the winding-up, and not in the matter of the winding-up only, the judge making the order for the delivery of the bill, though sitting in winding-up, would have power to order the taxation under the Solicitors Act.

Appeal from a decision of ASTBURY, J.

C. W. and S. E. Brown were a firm of solicitors, and in July, 1909, Palace Restaurants, Ltd., retained them as their solicitors, and agreed to pay them £250 and all out-of-pocket expenses for their services for three months. Litigation affecting the company was at that time in progress. On Sept. 1, 1909, the company was ordered to be compulsorily wound-up, and the official receiver was appointed liquidator. The solicitors had received a number of sums on behalf of the company amounting in all to £1,271 2s. 4d., but had repaid to the company or the liquidator £800, leaving a balance of £471 2s. 4d. in their hands. Over this sum the solicitors claimed a lien for their costs. No bill of costs had been delivered, and on May 26, 1913, the liquidator took out a summons for an order that the solicitors should render an account of all moneys received by them on account of the company, and a statement of all costs incurred by them as solicitors to the company, and that such costs should be taxed, and the solicitors ordered to pay to the applicant any money found to be due from them to the company. The solicitors raised no objection to the summons, and on June 2, 1913, an order was made by consent that the solicitors should within four days deliver their bills of costs and cash account. No order was made as to the payment of the balance or as to the taxation of the bill of costs. The solicitors delivered their bill of costs and cash account, and a balance of £13 was shown to be due from them to the company. The liquidator then restored the summons of May 26, and asked for taxation of the bill of costs and repayment of the balance. The solicitors opposed this application, contending that the court had no jurisdiction to order these costs to be taxed in the winding-up. The costs, with reference to which the bill was delivered were incurred prior to the winding-up, and the solicitors wished to have the bill taxed under the Solicitors Act, 1843. ASTBURY, J., held that the costs could be taxed in the winding-up and ordered the solicitors to pay to the liquidator the balance, if any, which might appear due on that taxation. The solicitors appealed.

Gore-Brown, K.C., and C. A. Bennett for the solicitors.

The Solicitor-General (Sir S. O. Buckmaster, K.C.) and Austen-Cartmell for the liquidator.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 20, 1914.—LORD READING, C.J.—I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of BUCKLEY, L.J., and I agree with it. Therefore it is unnecessary that I should say anything further.

BUCKLEY, L.J. read the following judgment.—The question is whether upon the application of the official receiver as liquidator in a compulsory winding-up the court

A sitting in winding-up can order taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs against the company for a period before the commencement of the winding-up. The question might arise in either one of two alternatives. First, the solicitor may have no cash account, but may be a creditor for the whole amount of the bill. Under these circumstances he would have to come in and prove in the winding-up. There is no room for doubt but that in that proceeding it would be competent to the court in winding-up to ascertain what is B the amount due to him. Secondly, the question might arise in a case (such as the present) where, having regard to the cash account, there is a balance due from the solicitor. Under these circumstances he might tender no proof, and it would be for the liquidator to enforce against him in a proper manner his liability to pay the amount due from him to the company. If the liquidator brought his action and the solicitor counterclaimed for costs, the judgment would be for the balance to be ascertained by taxation. It C was suggested that, having regard to s. 164 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [Companies Act, 1948, s. 258], the solicitor would not for this purpose be in the position of an ordinary debtor to the company—that the court or the liquidator could, in the winding-up under s. 173 [s. 273 (c) of Act of 1948], call upon him to pay. This argument, I think, is not well founded. The court, under s. 164, or the liquidator, under s. 173, is entitled to call upon a person falling within s. 164 (and the solicitor falls within it D to pay any money to which the company is primâ facie entitled. But, if a dispute is raised whether the company is entitled or not, there is nothing in the section empowering the court or the liquidator to determine that question. If the liquidator asserts against the solicitor that the solicitor is indebted to the company, that must be prosecuted, I think, in the same way as in the case of any other person. It may be, therefore, that the solicitors in the present case, when the liquidator's summons was issued, might E have demurred to the jurisdiction, but they did not do so. An order was taken upon the summons for delivery of a bill, and in submitting to that order the solicitors, I think, submitted to a proper consequential order to give effect to it—that is, an order to tax and an order for payment by such party as the taxation should find to be indebted. The case, therefore, in my opinion, raises the general question whether the court sitting in winding-up can order taxation of a bill due before the winding-up.

F The judge exercising jurisdiction in winding-up derives his authority from ss. 131 and 132 of the Act of 1908 [s. 218 of the Act of 1948]. The jurisdiction is in the High Court (s. 131 (1)), and the court, having jurisdiction under the Act, has for the purposes of that jurisdiction all the powers of the High Court (s. 131 (6)) [s. 218 (6) of the Act of 1948]. The jurisdiction is by virtue of s. 132, assigned from time to time to particular judges of the Chancery Division, but they sit as judges of the High Court and have G all the powers of the High Court. If, therefore, the summons were intituled in the matter of the winding-up and of the Solicitors Act, 1843, I have no doubt that the judge might make an order to tax under the Solicitors Act, 1843. In the present case, however, the summons is intituled in the winding-up only. But the judge has none the less, in my opinion, jurisdiction to order taxation. The solicitor has no right to insist that his bill shall be taxed under the Act or not at all. H This was decided in bankruptcy in the case of a solicitor who tendered a proof in Re Woods, Ex parte Ditton (1). If the twelve months under the Solicitors Act, 1843, expired before the death, bankruptcy, or winding-up so that taxation could not be obtained under the Act, the executor, or trustee, or liquidator is still entitled to question and to have the proper amount ascertained: Re Park, Cole v. Park (2). Whether this is by taxation or moderation, or by a direction to inquire as to particular items, is another I question. In my judgment, the solicitors having submitted to the jurisdiction, the liquidator was entitled to an order to tax this bill in these proceedings, and to a consequential order for payment. The present application does not raise the question whether the one-sixth rule under the Solicitors Act, 1843, applies or not. If it did arise I should have thought that it would be necessary to consider on the one hand the bearing of Ord. 65, r. 27 (38B), and the fact that the summons here is not intituled in the matter of the Act; and on the other hand to notice that the bill in this case was not for a bill of costs incurred by the liquidator, in which case Re Marsh, Ex parte Marsh (3) might apply, but was for costs incurred before the liquidation as in Re Allingham (4). The only question, however, which we have to decide is whether an order to tax in these proceedings, and an order for payment, is right, where an order for delivery of a bill was made in these proceedings without objection by the solicitor. In my opinion, it is. I think the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

WHEELER v. MORRIS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Pickford and Warrington, L.JJ.), June 17, 18, 1915]

[Reported 84 L.J.K.B. 1435; 113 L.T. 644]

Highway—Negligence—Premises adjoining highway—Shop sun-blind overhanging pavement—Collapse under weight of two men catching supporting arm—Injury to passer-by—Liability of occupier.

A shopkeeper had outside his premises a canvas sun-blind extending over the pavement, with a box at the top and two projecting supports or arms which, when the blind was put back, acted so that it rolled into the box. The blind was one of a well-known sort, of which hundreds had been put up, and it was well constructed, well cared for, and in good condition. Two men jumping up caught one of the projecting arms and by their joint weight forced the screws holding the arm out of the top of the box, bringing the box and blind down and causing the arms to drop, one striking and injuring the plaintiff who was passing by. In an action for damages for personal injuries,

Held: the shopkeeper's duty was not that of an insurer against the blind ever coming down, but was to take such reasonable precautions as a reasonable man would take to avoid a reasonably foreseeable accident; there was no evidence that the accident ought to have been foreseen or had not been reasonably guarded against and no evidence that the structure was a nuisance; and, therefore, the action failed.

Appeal by the defendant against an order of a Divisional Court of the King's Bench B (Avory and Rowlatt, JJ.).

The plaintiff claimed in an action in the county court damages for personal injuries sustained by him through the negligence of the defendant or his servants, whereby the plaintiff was injured by a canvas sun-blind and its supports belonging to the defendant falling on his head on April 18, 1914. The county court judge found that the sun-blind which was suspended outside the defendant's premises and overhanging the pavement C in the highway, was brought down by the mischievous act of third persons who, by jumping up and catching hold of one of the projecting arms by which the blind was extended over the pavement, put a strain on the blind as a whole which drew the screws out of the wood forming the top of the box, and thus caused the box and the blind to fall and the projecting rods to drop; and that one of such rods struck the plaintiff, who was lawfully passing along the pavement, and was thereby injured. The judge further found D on the evidence that persons had been known before to act as such third persons had acted, and that similar accidents had happened with similar blinds on previous occasions in consequence of persons jumping up and catching hold of the like projecting blinds. He found also that it had not been proved that reasonable precautions, such as the substitution of bolts and nuts for ordinary screws, would not have obviated the risk of injury to the plaintiff. On these findings he held that the defendant had not discharged E the duty, which, in his opinion, was imposed on him, to have the blind so sufficiently fixed and secured as to prevent its being brought down by persons using the highway, even though the action of such third persons was mischievous, inasmuch as the defendant should have contemplated the possibility of such action and the consequent risk to persons lawfully using the highway by reason of the position of the blind. The defendant appealed to the Divisional Court, which held that there was evidence from which F the learned judge might find negligence on the part of the defendant in having failed to foresee and guard against the consequences of such acts of a third party, and that the defendant was liable for the injury to the plaintiff. The defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is an appeal against an order of the Divisional Court affirming, I think with some hesitation, the decision of the county court judge in the following set of circumstances. The plaintiff was returning from his work on a Saturday early in the afternoon. He had to pass down a road in which there were H blinds overhanging the pavement, the existence of which every person in this court is perfectly familiar with—an ordinary blind, with a box at the top with two supports or arms, which, when the blind is put back, act so that the blind rolls into the box. Two men—not light boys—were there, and, according to the evidence, I think it is reasonably plain that one of them jumped on the back of the other and they both pulled at one of the arms of the blind, and it gave way. The blind fell on the plaintiff, and he was I seriously injured. The question is whether the shopkeeper is liable to the plaintiff in damages for the consequence of this. Counsel for the plaintiff says that the plaintiff was on the highway, as he undoubtedly was; that he was passing along the highway in a perfectly proper manner, and but for the fact of the blind being over the highway this accident would not have happened. He further says that the defendant's liability is none the less because the blind was brought down by the wrongful and mischievous act of two men whose identity has not been established.

In my opinion, this case has been presented in rather the wrong way. The liability in a case of this kind is not a liability of insurance or warranty that the blind will never come down. The utmost which can be put against the shopkeeper is that he, as occupant, is bound to take such reasonable precautions as a reasonable man would exercise in order to avoid the result of an accident which might be reasonably foreseen. In the present case there is ample evidence to this effect. The blind was one of a well-known sort. Hundreds of them are proved to have been put up by the particular manufacturers who put this up. It was a blind which, according to the undisputed evidence, was well constructed, and had been properly cared for, by which I mean it had been cleaned and painted and had had what was necessary done to it only a month or two before the accident took place. The shopkeeper who had it put up—the shopkeeper who was in the premises before the defendant—swears that it was in good condition. The man who examined it and painted it a month or two before the accident took place swears that the blind was in good condition. It was fastened up to the wall by screws and nails in the manner which is usual, and there is no finding by the county court judge—or, if a finding could be implied, there is no evidence to justify that finding—that there was any lack of reasonable care on the part of the defendant.

The principle of law cannot be better stated, I think, than it was by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in the McDowall v. Great Western Co. (1), where a plaintiff, when on a highway, was injured by some trucks which had been mischievously set loose by boys on a railway, and it was sought to make the railway company liable for it. He says ([1903] 2 K.B. at p. 337):

> "I do not think counsel for the plaintiff was wrong when he said that, in those cases in which part of the cause of the accident was the interference of a stranger or a third person, the defendants are not held responsible unless it is found that that which they do or omit to do—the negligence to perform a particular duty—is itself the effective cause of the accident. Bearing that in mind, it seems to me that in every case in which the circumstances are such that any one of common sense having the custody of or control over a particular thing would recognise the danger of that happening which would be likely to injure others, it is the duty of the person having such custody or control to take reasonable care to avoid such injury."

There is not a particle of evidence that anybody in circumstances of this kind would ever think of guarding against the pulling down of the blind by the wrongful act of two grown men. I think it would be altogether extending any of the decisions much too far, and that it would be wrong in principle to hold that this shopkeeper is liable for the consequences of the falling of this blind on to the plaintiff. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal must be allowed.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I am of the same opinion; and, although we are no doubt in the result differing from the judgment of the Divisional Court, one cannot help seeing that that judgment was arrived at with the greatest possible hesitation, and that makes me hesitate less to differ from it.

The case has been put before us in two different ways. One was that the blind was a nuisance to the highway qua blind; and the other was that it was brought down by the mischievous act of third parties jumping on to it and getting hold of it, and that reasonable care had not been taken to provide against that mischievous act which the defendant ought to have foreseen. I do not think that those two ways of putting the case are quite the same, and there is no finding that this blind was a nuisance. I do not see any trace of the county court judge having been asked to find that. And I doubt very much whether the contention would be open here, because the two lines of argument, or the two points—a nuisance to the highway and negligence in not providing against circumstances he ought to have foreseen—are both of them questions of fact, and they are different questions of fact in my opinion.

But I do not wish to decide the first point on that ground, because I can see no evidence whatever that there was any nuisance at all. In the cases to which we have been referred something was put on the highway, or so near the highway or over the highway, in such a way that of itself it was a danger. There is the case of the holes which were near the highway, so near that a person accidently straying will fall into them; and there is the case of the lamp. The things were of themselves dangerous. The holes were dangerous because they were so near the highway, and the lamp because it was out of repair and would not have come down at all if it had not been out of repair. The present case does not seem to me to give rise to any such questions as those. The blind, according to the evidence, was perfectly properly put up. It was not of itself dangerous at all, and nothing would have happened but for the act of these third persons. Was that an act which the defendant ought to have foreseen? I think that it is perhaps well to look a little carefully at the evidence of how the accident did happen. The first evidence was given by a girl who said that she saw two people walking in front of her, who she would say were men, not boys. She did not see exactly what happened. She saw either one or both of the men jump to the iron of the blind. Another witness was called, no doubt for the defendant, but there is no contradiction of his evidence at all. He said that when he was on the doorstep he saw two men coming along laughing, and the blind came down. [HIS LORDSHIP read that evidence and continued:] It seems to me that the only finding possible on that evidence would be that it was the one man jumping up and the other man jumping on his back and so bringing the weight of the two men at the same time on to the blind which brought it down. The county court judge has not found that in terms. But I do not think that he has found anything to the contrary, and, if he had, with the greatest respect to him, I think that he would have been finding against the evidence.

Is that a thing which the defendant ought to have foreseen? The evidence as to that is that the same girl to whom I have already referred said that she had seen someone jump up at the blind like that before; and a man who was employed by a firm of blind-makers said that he had put up this class of blind hundreds of times. [HIS LORDSHIP read that evidence and continued:] That is the evidence on which it is said that the defendant ought to have anticipated that what happened in the present case would happen. I am bound to say that I doubt very much whether there is evidence that would —I will not say justify a finding—but evidence on which a finding could be based that he ought to have anticipated as an ordinary thing that passers-by would jump up. I certainly think that there is no evidence that the defendant ought to have anticipated that two men at the same time would jump up and put the weight of both of them on the blind at the same moment, which is what happened here. Therefore I am inclined to think that there is no evidence on which it can be said the defendant ought to have anticipated the act of the third person.

If he ought, what was his duty? His duty was to take reasonable precautions against it; not to insure against it, but to take reasonable precautions against it. That is stated in all the cases to which we have been referred. What is the evidence on that point? The only evidence is the evidence of the two men who had actually worked on the blind, and their evidence is to this effect. They described how the blind was erected. It was fastened to a holdfast by screws which did not go through the box although they went into it. The blind box was properly constructed in the opinion of one of the witnesses, and the other man who worked at it said that the blind and box were in perfectly good order, and good for another ten years if painted properly. That is the only evidence. There is no evidence whatever that the attachment was not reasonably secure, and that the attachment was not such as a reasonable person would have put up. There was a suggestion by counsel for the plaintiff that it was easy to make it safe by using a bolt and nut instead of a simple screw. And the county court judge has found that the defendant did not take reasonable precautions, because it was not proved to him that reasonable precautions, such as the substitution of bolts and nuts for ordinary screws, would not have obviated the risk of injury to the plaintiff. He held that the defendant had not discharged the duty which in his opinion was imposed on him to have the blind so sufficiently fixed and secured as to prevent its being brought down by persons using the highway. I do not think that there was evidence to support either of the findings, or that what happened in this case was what ought to have been reasonably anticipated. Even though the defendant might have anticipated somebody jumping up at the blind in some way, I do not think that there was any evidence to show, or on which it could be found, that he ought to have anticipated that two people would jump at it and bring such a weight as this on it. And I do not think that there is any evidence that, if he anticipated such a thing would occur, he did not take such reasonable precautions as a reasonable man ought to take.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Licensing—Offence—Found drunk on licensed premises—Lodger found drunk in bar of premises after closing hours.

At 3 p.m. on a Sunday the appellant engaged a bedroom at a fully-licensed hotel for that night. At 1.20 the next morning which was during closing hours the defendant was found drunk in the bar of the hotel.

Held: the defendant could not be convicted under s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, for the offence of being found drunk on licensed premises as he was there in his capacity of a resident and the premises were not open to the public at the time.

Case Stated by justices for the county borough of Brighton.

An information was preferred on Sept. 21, 1914, by William Benjamin Gentle, chief constable of the borough of Brighton (the respondent) under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 12, against Charles Young (the appellant) for that he on Sept. 14, 1914, in the county borough of Brighton was found unlawfully drunk on certain premises licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail there situate and called the Shelbourne Hotel, and in the occupation of one Owen Ward.

Upon the hearing of the information it was admitted or proved that the Shelbourne Hotel was a fully-licensed house situate at Middle Street, Brighton, and was in the occupation of one Owen Ward. At 1.20 a.m. on Sept. 14, 1914, police inspector Fellingham, accompanied by two constables, demanding admission to the hotel, and on entering the bar found the appellant and two other men there with glasses of stout in front of them. The appellant was then drunk. The inspector stated in evidence that the manageress, who was in the bar, said: "They came here like it at eleven o'clock." On Sept. 13, 1914, about three o'clock in the afternoon, the appellant, who was then quite sober, had called at the hotel and saw the manageress employed by Owen Ward and he there and then engaged a bedroom at the hotel for that Sunday night. The appellant contended that as he had on the afternoon of Sept. 13, 1914, bona fide engaged a room at the Shelbourne Hotel he had thereby become a lodger and was not liable to a conviction for being drunk on licensed premises during the early hours of Sept. 14, 1914. The respondent contended that a lodger might be entitled to the privacy of his own room upon licensed premises, but that the appellant was in the public part of Shelbourne Hotel drunk three hours after closing time. The justices were of opinion that if the appellant had been found drunk in his bedroom they would not have felt justified in convicting him, but that as he was found drunk in the bar of a public room of the hotel, although after closing hours, he was guilty of the offence charged.

Wootten for the appellant.
Rowand Harker for the respondent.

LORD READING, C.J.— In the afternoon of Sunday, Sept. 13, 1914, the appellant went to the Shelbourne Hotel, Brighton, and engaged a bedroom there for the night. He was then sober. At 1.20 on the Monday morning the police demanded admission to the hotel. They entered the bar of the hotel, and there they found the appellant and two other persons with glasses of intoxicating liquor in front of them. The appellant was then drunk. Upon these facts the appellant was convicted before the justices of an offence under s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which provides that > "Every person found drunk . . . on any licensed premises shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten shillings."

The Case Stated raises the question whether the appellant had committed an offence under this section in view of the fact that he was a lodger for that night in the hotel. He was not in the position of an ordinary customer who entered the hotel merely for the purpose of obtaining drink; he was a person who was on those premises which for that night had become his resting place and his home.

It was argued before the justices and before us that a lodger or an inmate of the licensed premises is not a "person" within the meaning of the section, and upon the answer to that argument depends the determination of this case. Undoubtedly the language of the section at the beginning, that is the words "every person," are sufficiently wide to include both the landlord, the inmates of the premises, and the lodger. But it was decided in Lester v. Torrens (1), that the landlord or the licensed person, if found drunk on the licensed premises in his own occupation after licensed hours and when the premises are closed to the public, is not committing an offence under this section of the Act. The court came to that conclusion apparently, and certainly partly, because it thought that the premises ceased to be licensed premises once the hour to which it was permitted to be open had come to an end; when once the closing time had come the learned judges seem to have thought that the premises were no longer licensed premises, and must be treated as the private house of the individual who was residing in it. If the court in that case had confined itself to saying that for the purpose of s. 12 of the Act of 1872 regard must be had to those who were on the premises as the private home or residence or sleeping place of the person, one could better understand the decision; but when they said that the premises were not licensed premises after closing time had arrived, the reasoning is undoubtedly fallacious. When that came before another Divisional Court in R. v. Pelly (2), the court expressed the view that the reasoning of the learned judges in Lester v. Torrens (1) was wrong, at least in part, but that the conclusion at which they had arrived was right—that is to say, the court expressed the view in R. v. Pelly (2) that the landlord who was found drunk upon his premises after closing hours had not committed an offence under s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872. They drew the distinction between the landlord and the customer.

In R. v. Pelly (2) they had to deal with a customer who was obviously not the landlord, neither was he an inmate or a lodger, and the court said that if he, the customer, is found drunk on the licensed premises after the closing hours, he may be convicted under s. 12 because he has no right to be there in any private capacity. The customer was not on the premises as his home; he was on the premises for the purpose of obtaining drink, and therefore the court distinguished Lester v. Torrens (1), and came to the conclusion that the customer was rightly convicted. But it was necessary before they could come to that conclusion that they should express their dissent from the reasoning of the learned judges in Lester v. Torrens (1), to the effect that licensed premises were no longer licensed premises within the meaning of this section after closing time had arrived, and they do express their dissent from that part of the reasoning. The effect is that Lester v. Torrens (1) stands as a decision.

In a later case of Thompson v. McKenzie (3), questions again arose under this section and under s. 13 of the Act of 1872. There a guest had arrived at an hotel after the closing hour and engaged a bedroom. When he did that he was drunk to the knowledge of the hotel manager. He was later on found on the premises by a constable and was found drunk, and it was held that the licensee was properly convicted of permitting drunkenness on his premises, because by reason of these facts he could not discharge the burden which was upon him by s. 4 of the Licensing Act, 1902, to establish that he had taken all reasonable means to prevent drunkenness on the premises. That case has really no bearing on the present case, except that in it Lester v. Torrens (1) and R. v. Pelly (2) were referred to and discussed. Lord Alverstone, C.J., in giving his judgment, made this observation in reference to those cases ([1908] 1 K.B. at pp. 908, 909):

> "It is true that it has been held in Warden v. Tye (4) that the licensed person cannot be convicted under s. 13 of permitting himself to be drunk on his premises, and in Lester v. Torrens (1) it was held that neither can he be convicted under s. 12 of being found drunk on his premises after the closing hour. Nor can a lodger, or other person who is lawfully on the premises after the closing hour, be convicted because he is found drunk on the premises under s. 12. This seems to be involved in the decision in R. v. Pelly (2)."

Then he says (ibid. at p. 909):

> "But it is one thing to say that the drunken lodger cannot be convicted himself under s. 12, it is another thing to say that the licensed person cannot be convicted under s. 13 of permitting him to be on the premises."

It is quite clear, therefore, that in that case what the court was dealing with was the offence of the licence-holder premitting drunkenness, and they said that that offence was committed. They did not express dissent from the views and conclusions of the court in Lester v. Torrens (1) or in R. v. Pelly (2), but indeed the Lord Chief Justice approved the conclusion and went so far as to deal with this very case. It is true that it is only a dictum, but he did say ([1908] 1 K.B. at pp. 908, 909):

> "nor can a lodger, or other person who is lawfully on the premises after the closing hour, be convicted because he is found drunk on the premises under s. 12."

If that dictum is a true statement of the law, then it would be clear that this conviction cannot stand.

I want to call attention further to the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 1, because it has a bearing on the case we are now considering. I refer to the Act of 1902 for the reason that it has been said by James, L.J., in Re Cathcart, Ex parte Campbell (5) (5 Ch. App. at p. 706):

> "Where once certain words in an Act of Parliament have received a judicial construction in one of the superior courts, and the legislature has repeated them without any alteration in a subsequent statute, I conceive that the legislature must be taken to have used them according to the meaning which a court of competent jurisdiction has given to them."

The legislature repeated in s. 1 of the Licensing Act, 1902, the words which are to be found in s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and added something to them, but the words were repeated almost ipsissima verga. By that section

> "If a person is found drunk in any highway or other public place, whether a building or not, or on any licensed premises"

so far the words are the words of s. 12 of the Act of 1872

> "and appears to be incapable of taking care of himself, he may be apprehended and dealt with according to law."

So that there, many years after Lester v. Torrens (1) and some years after R. v. Pelly (2), the legislature deliberately used the same language which had received the interpretation not only of a court of competent jurisdiction, but a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with the present court, and we are not entitled at this date to consider this question as if it were res integra. We must decide it in accordance with the decision of the courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction which have already dealt with it, and if we come to the conclusion that Lester v. Torrens (1) in its conclusions is good law it binds us. I come to the conclusion that Lester v. Torrens (1) is a binding authority, and that it has stood ever since the year 1877. There have been licensing statutes passed since that date and no alteration has been made in the language, and, whatever view might be taken if we could consider this question as res integra we are bound by the earlier authorities, and we must therefore follow Lester v. Torrens (1).

It is worthy of observation that if we were to affirm this conviction the result would certainly be to change what has hitherto been adopted as the practice of the law and considered to be the law since 1877, if not before; because it would result in this—that if the landlord is not to be exempt from the operation of s. 12, and a lodger also if found drunk on the premises is committing an offence under s. 12, it would necessarily follow (as has been quite rightly admitted) that a person who is residing at an hotel (a not unfamiliar state of things at the present day), and who is drunk in the room which he habitually occupies and in which he resides, is committing an offence and might be summoned. It would further follow that if he was incapable he might be apprehended, and it would further follow (as has been pointed out), under s. 81 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, that the police would have the right at any time to enter the premises, and then, finding him in bed drunk and incapable, would have a right to remove him from that place and to take him to the police station. It is not for me to express any view as to whether or not that might not be a very salutary state of things; at any rate, it seems to me that it must depend on the law as enacted by statute, and as interpreted by the cases, and if we were so to hold we should be going very much further than the law has hitherto been expounded or declared. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that we must follow Lester v. Torrens (1), and, if so, it has been conceded, and rightly conceded, that there is no distinction to be drawn between the case of the lodger and the case of the landlord: the lodger and inmate of the house must stand in the same position. In reality it seems to me that Lester v. Torrens (1) is to be supported upon the ground that the persons of the class that I have mentioned are there in their private capacity—that is to say, in their capacity of residents in the private house notwithstanding that it happens to be licensed premises. In any event that decision binds us, and the decision of the justices is wrong. The appeal must be allowed and the conviction must be quashed.

LORD COLERIDGE, J.—If this case were free from authority the argument in favour of upholding the conviction would be strong. It is conceded that licensed premises do not necessarily cease to be licensed premises after closing time. The appellant was found on licensed premises after closing time; he was found drunk and he is a person who is a lodger, and the legislature in this section of the Act makes no special exemption in favour of his position as a lodger, whereas when another class of offence—the offence of being found on the premises after the closing hour—is alluded to in the Act of 1872; that Act in s. 25 (now s. 62 of the Act of 1910) exempts the lodger specifically. It exempts the inmate, the servant, the lodger, and the bona fide traveller from the penalty imposed by that section, which says that if a person is found on licensed permises after closing hours it shall be an offence; but the legislature does not make any exception in favour of these certain classes of persons in regard to the offence of being found drunk upon the premises under s. 12. The reason may be what my Lord has alluded to, that it was thought unnecessary in the Act of 1902 to do so inasmuch as an interpretation had been put upon the words in s. 12 "every person" by subsequent decisions. The act of the landlord in permitting drunkenness differs essentially from the act complained of in this particular case of the individual lodger being found drunk on the premises.

Warden v. Tye (4), which held that a landlord could not be convicted of permitting himself to get drunk on his licensed premises, left it open as to whether or not the landlord could be convicted of being found drunk upon those premises. Then followed Lester v. Torrens (1). That decided that the landlord could not be convicted under s. 12 if found drunk on his licensed premises after closing hours, and the ground of the decision was that "licensed premises" within the meaning of s. 12 were premises that were open to the public during licensed hours. But the reasoning for that decision has not been adopted by the subsequent decisions, though the decision itself has been upheld upon the view that the landlord, being a person entitled to be upon the premises, and the house being in that sense his private house, could not be guilty of the offence of being found drunk after closing hours in his own house, which qua himself and his position of landlord was not licensed premises within the meaning of s. 12. In R. v. Pelly (2) the court held that a customer did not come within the exemption, and that if a customer was found drunk upon licensed premises after closing hours, the customer could be convicted of being found drunk on licensed premises. The reason is that he had no right to be there, and that he was not in the position of a landlord, a lodger, a bona fide traveller, or an inmate; and although it may be that the grounds of the decision in that case were obiter, and the case could be supported without reference to the specified persons, yet still it was a court of great authority, and it purported to interpret for the future the meaning of the language in s. 12. Similarly, the case of Lawson v. Edminson (6) decided that it was permitting drunkenness under s. 13 if guests were found drunk in the licensed premises after closing hours, but that did not affect this question, because, although the remarks of BIGHAM, J., are very general when he said that it was immaterial whether the men found drunk on the premises were guests or not, or whether they entered the premises before or after closing hours, they were in fact drunk on licensed premises. That was said only in view of the question of the licence-holder permitting drunkenness on the premises, and not in regard to his being found drunk himself. There may be strong reasons, which my Lord has pointed out, for adhering apart from custom and practice, to the decisions on s. 12 of these courts of competent jurisdiction. I base my decision simply upon the ground that they have so decided, and I am not in a position in any way to qualify or alter their decision. In these circumstances the conviction in this case cannot be upheld.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is to be observed that the justices in this case have convicted solely upon the ground that the appellant was found drunk in the bar of a public room of the hotel after closing hours, and they say expressly that if he had been found drunk in his bedroom they would not have felt justified in convicting him. It is apparent from that finding that the justices adopted a view of the law which has just been pronounced in this court, but that in this particular case they found, or thought that they had found, a distinction in the fact that the appellant was found drunk in the bar of the licensed premises and not in a private room of his own for the time being. It appears to me that that distinction cannot be justified. The whole of the premises are licensed in such a case as the present. The bedroom of the lodger is a part of the licensed premises, and after the house is closed, for the purpose of this section I think it can make no difference whether the person who is found drunk is found in the bar, or in the billiard room, or in his own room.

I regret with the other members of the court that it is not open to us to construe this s. 12 according to its plain and natural meaning. I think it would have been much more satisfactory if the section had originally been construed in this way, that the words "every person" mean every person and include every person, and that the words "licensed premises" mean licensed premises, whether at night time or in the day time. There can be no question that they are licensed premises during the night as much as during the day, and for some purposes it has been held that they are licensed premises during the night as well as during the day. I venture to go further, and regret that when the legislature were consolidating the Licensing Acts in 1910 they did not refer to the law as it was in the time of King James I, and make it an offence for anybody to be found drunk anywhere, whether in his own private house or elsewhere. Probably it was the repeal of the statute of James which has led to that foolish phrase, which has grown into use, that a man has a right to get drunk in his own house. But it is not open to us, as has been pointed out, to construe this section according to its plain and natural meaning. The courts have put upon it limitations, and the judgment of LUSH, J., in Lester v. Torrens (1), coupled with the judgment of HAWKINS, J., in R. v. Pelly (2), have confirmed and approved of the law upon this subject and the practice of the courts in administering it ever since the year 1877. In Lester v. Torrens (1) LUSH, J., said (2 Q.B.D. at pp. 405, 406):

> "I think, looking at the collocation of words, that 'licensed premises' for the purposes of the section, must mean premises open to the public during licensed hours, or during the time when the premises are a quasi public place. It seems to me that the innkeeper, if drunk on his own premises while they are open, is as much amenable to the penalty as if he was found drunk on the highway. It is clear, however, that the section does not apply to a person, not being an innkeeper, found drunk in his own private house. If the innkeeper lived next door to the licensed premises, he might be drunk in his own house without being liable. Why should he be liable if he lives on the licensed premises and gets drunk at a time when they are not open, because during certain hours of the day they are open to the public? When they are closed, they are as much his private house as a house in which he lives next door."

It is quite clear that these observations would apply equally to a lodger.

HAWKINS, J., in R. v. Pelly (2) in dealing with Lester v. Torrens (1), said ([1897] 2 Q.B. at p. 35):

> "all that was proved was that while using them as his private dwelling he was found in a state of intoxication. Under those circumstances, the court said that the Act could not mean that the landlord was to be subject to a penalty if he were found drunk while using the premises solely as his private dwelling."

These two cases taken together appear to establish the proposition that a person while using the premises, where they are licensed premises in the sense that a licence has been granted to them, as his private dwelling cannot be convicted under s 12 if fou nd drunk thereafter closing hours. I also agree that this view, if not confirmed, at all events makes it impossible for the court now to take a contrary view, when we look at the amendment of the law in 1902 providing that a person found drunk under conditions specified in s. 12 of the Act of 1872 may be apprehended. For these reasons I agree that the decision of the justices must be reversed.

Appeal allowed. Conviction quashed.

TARRANT v. WOKING URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL

[King's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, Avory and Atkin, JJ.), June 10, 1914]

[Reported [1914] 3 K.B. 796; 84 L.J.K.B. 314; 111 L.T. 800; 79 J.P. 22; 12 L.G.R. 1293]

Street—New street—Byelaw—Stipulation as to width—Diminution of width after construction completed—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict., c. 55), s. 157.

By s. 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875: "Every urban authority may make byelaws . . . with respect to the level, width, and construction of new streets." A byelaw made under s. 157 provided: "Every person who shall construct for use as a carriage road a new street intended to form the principal approach or means of access to any building shall comply with" certain requirements as to the width of the carriageway and footways.

Held: after the construction of a new street had been completed no offence was committed against the byelaw by a subsequent diminution of the width of the carriageway or the footways below the minimum required by the byelaw.

Semble. Section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, does not authorise the making of a byelaw which would make an alteration in the original width of a street an offence.

Notes. The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 157, has been repealed by the Highways Act, 1959. See now ss. 157 and 167 of the Act of 1959.

Case Stated by Woking, Surrey, justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Woking, Robert Mossop, clerk to the C Woking Urban District Council, the respondents, preferred informations against Walter George Tarrant, the appellant, that he, between June 16 and July 31, 1913, unlawfully and within the district of the respondents (i) constructed for use as a carriage road a new street, known as Hockering Road, intended to form the principal approach and means of access to certain buildings, so that the width of the carriageway was less than two-thirds of the entire width of such street, and so that the footway on each side of D such street was of a width less than one-sixth of the entire width of such street, contrary to byelaw No. 7 of the byelaws made on Sept. 13, 1905, by the respondents acting as the urban sanitary authority, and confirmed by the Local Government Board on Oct. 16, 1905, and contrary to the form of the Public Health Act, 1875, in such case made and provided; (ii) constructed a new street known as Hockering Road without providing that one end at least thereof should be open from the ground upwards to the full width E of such street contrary to byelaw No. 8 of the byelaws and statute; and (iii) laid out and constructed a street known as Hockering Road, and executed other work to which the byelaws relating to new streets and buildings in the district applied and received from the respondents' surveyor a notice in writing, dated Nov. 13, 1913, specifying that, by erecting piers and gates at the western end of the street, he had not provided that one end at least of such street should be open from the ground upwards to the full F width of such street, and had thereby contravened byelaw No. 8 of the byelaws, and requiring the appellant within fourteen days after the receipt of such notice to remove the piers and gates, and the appellant did not within the time specified by such notice comply with the requirements thereof, contrary to byelaw No. 112 of the byelaws and statute.

The following facts were admitted or proved: The byelaws were made by the re- G spondents under s. 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and duly confirmed by the Local Government Board on Oct. 6, 1905. The acts of the appellant which were alleged and which were held to have been infringements of byelaws Nos. 7 and 8 were that he had, on a date between June 16 and July 31, 1913, erected piers and gates across the western end of Hockering Road, which was a road intended to form and in fact did form the principal approach to the houses abutting thereon. The act or omission of the appellant H which was alleged, and which was held to have been an infringment of byelaw No. 112, was that, after receipt of a notice in writing from the respondents' surveyor, dated Nov. 13, 1913, requiring him to remove the piers and gates, he had failed to remove the same. The piers erected by the appellant were four in number, and their total size was such that, at the western end of Hockering Road, the carriageway was occupied by the piers to the extent of 8 ft. 8 in. and the footway to the extent of 8 in., leaving the width of the I road available for use as a carriageway when the gates were open 18 ft. 8 in., and as a footway 6 ft. only when the gates were open. The gates were four in number, two of which extended across the full width of the roadway, and the other two across the full width of the footways on each side of the carriageway. Hockering Road was laid out and constructed in the years 1904 and 1905 by certain persons known as the Smallpiece Trustees, the predecessors in title of the appellant, under and in accordance with plans submitted by the predecessors in title of the appellant to and approved by the respondents in 1906. It was 40 ft. in width, with a carriageway of the width of 26 ft. 8 in. and a footway of 6 ft. 8 in. The whole of the road was laid out and constructed by the appellant's predecessors in title not later than June, 1905. It terminated at its eastern end in an arable field. By an agreement dated Oct. 1, 1909, the appellant agreed to purchase certain land called the Hockering Estate, including the whole of Hockering Road from the Smallpiece Trustees. By an indenture dated Aug. 2, 1911, the estate was conveyed to the appellant, but the portion of the road on which the piers and gates had been erected was not included in such conveyance, and that portion of the road had never, in fact, been conveyed to him, although under the agreement the appellant had power to call for such a conveyance. An extension of Hockering Road was laid out and constructed by the appellant in accordance with plans submitted to and approved by the respondents between May and November, 1910. On Nov. 18, 1910, the appellant agreed to purchase the adjoining estate, called Round Hill Estate, and, in order to develop that estate, he constructed, in accordance with plans deposited with and approved by the respondents in February, 1911, an extension of Hockering Road terminating in a highway on the eastern boundary of the Round Hill Estate. No portion of Hockering Road had ever been dedicated to the public, and the expense of the upkeep of the road had been entirely defrayed by the appellant. The neighbourhood generally was of a residential character, and the appellant had erected several houses standing back from the road. Through traffic, including heavy motor lorries, had made use of the road as a short cut between the highways surrounding the Hockering Estate and Round Hill Estate, and the appellant, at the request of the residents on the estates, erected in June and July, 1913, the piers and gates complained of.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the appellant, by erecting the piers and gates in question infringed byelaw No. 7 as regards the width of the carriageway, and byelaw No. 8 in not providing a proper entrance at one end of Hockering Road. The appellant infringed byelaw No. 112 in that, after he had been served with formal notice of his breach of byelaw No. 8, he had not complied with the notice and was liable to an additional penalty as for a continuing offence against the byelaw by reason thereof. On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the erection of the piers and gates was no evidence of the construction of a new street by him, that byelaws Nos. 7 and 8 only applied to a person constructing a new street, and that there was no evidence of his constructing Hockering Road at the dates alleged in the informations. He had not constructed Hockering Road, or that part of it alleged to have been constructed contrary to the byelaws, and he had not constructed any part of it contrary to the byelaws. Hockering Road, or that part of it which was alleged to have been constructed contrary to the byelaws, had not been constructed by the appellant, but by other persons, and was bought by him after it had been constructed, and it was not, and there was no evidence that it was, a new street or constructed as a new street by him. In the facts and circumstances of the case, he was entitled to erect the piers and gates and they were not an infringement of the byelaws. Byelaw No. 112 did not create a separate offence, but only made the continuance of an offence against the other byelaws a continuing offence for which there might be a further penalty.

The justices were of opinion that the appellant, by erecting the piers and gates, had constructed a new street within the byelaws and statute, and, in so constructing the new street and in not removing the piers and gates after he had received notice so to do, he was guilty of the offences alleged in the informations. They accordingly convicted the appellant on each of the informations. The appellant appealed.

By the byelaws of the Woking Urban District Council:

"7. Every person who shall construct for use as a carriage road a new street intended to form the principal approach or means of access to any building, shall comply with the following requirements: (a) He shall construct the carriageway of such street so that the width thereof shall be two-thirds of the entire width of the street. (c) He shall construct on each side of such street a footway of a width not less than one-sixth of the entire width of such street. . . .

"8. Every person who shall construct a new street shall provide that one end, at least, of such street shall be open from the ground upwards to the full width of such street."

Macmorran, K.C., and Latter for the appellant.
Moresby for the respondents.

LORD COLERIDGE, J.—The question that we have to consider is whether the justices were right in convicting the appellant on the facts stated by them in the Special Case, of an offence under byelaws 7 and 8 of the byelaws drawn up for use in the urban district of Woking. In 1905, a portion of Hockering Road, which ran from east to west, was laid out and constructed as a new street. The plans were approved, there being no infringement of the byelaws at that time, and the street was constructed in accordance with those plans. In 1910, there was a slight intermediate extension, and in 1911 a further extension of the road was made. On each occasion plans and drawings were deposited, approved and carried into effect without any violation of the byelaws. Therefore, in 1911, Hockering Road had, by three separate processes, been joined together into one road, and at that time all the byelaws had been adhered to, and there was no sort of suggestion that any offence had been committed. In 1913, two years after the last portion of the road had been laid out and constructed, the appellant placed certain gates across one end of Hockering Road, the road not having been dedicated to the Public but still remaining a private road. The question before the justices was whether, by the erection of these gates and gate posts, which undoubtedly did limit the passage way of the road in question to an extent which would, primâ facie, have been an infringement of byelaw 7, and which possibly would have made it at that time, when the road was originally laid out, an offence against byelaw 8, the appellant constructed Hockering Road at the point in question as a new street. If he had done so, the only question which would arise would be whether the supposed violation of the byelaw in 1913, would be too late, and whether it could be then said that the matter had been concluded in 1911 and that it could not be a continuing offence under the byelaws. But the main question is whether or not in 1911 the Hockering Road was constructed as a new street or was in course of construction as a new street, and whether the erection of these gates and gate posts was a violation of byelaw 7.

There is no question that, if there had been a byelaw saying that no one shall obstruct the passage of a new or an old street, there would be an offence against such byelaw. But the question is whether the erection of piers and gates is, in the existing circumstances, the construction of a new street. We are clearly of opinion that there is no evidence on which the justices could decide that that portion of the road where the gates were constructed was a new street in 1913. The byelaws certainly seem to contemplate a particular time when a new street shall be completed, especially when you have regard to byelaw 115, which provides that:

> "Every person who shall lay out or construct a street shall, within a reasonable time after the completion of the laying out or construction of such a street, deliver or send, or cause to be delivered or sent, to the surveyor of the council at his or their office, notice in writing of the completion of the laying out or construction of such street, and shall at all reasonable times, within a period of seven days after such notice shall have been so delivered or sent, afford such surveyor or his duly appointed assistants free access to such street for the purpose of inspection."

That clearly has in view the construction of the street at the time it is laid out, and, when it has been completely laid out and constructed, it is difficult to see that it contemplates anything as an infringement of the byelaws that takes place after that date. In these circumstances, it is difficult to see how a matter of this sort can be an infringement of the byelaws unless the offence takes place at the time and is subsequently a continuing offence, which it may be if the law so regards it. In this case the particular portion of the road on which the gates were placed was completely laid out in 1905, and even the two additional pieces of road were laid out and constructed and finished in accordance with the byelaws in 1911, and it is impossible under these circumstances for us to hold that an erection of gates in 1913 across a road which was laid out and constructed in 1905 was a construction of a new street so as to bring the reduction of the passage width of the road into violation of the provisions of byelaw 7. For these reasons, we are of opinion that this conviction cannot stand and must be quashed.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion. Counsel for the respondents has endeavoured to support the decision of the justices on the only ground on which it can be supported—namely, that there was a finding of fact by the justices, that the whole of Hockering Road coloured brown, yellow, pink and green on the plan, was one continuous street from public highway to public highway, and was a new street within the meaning of the byelaws. He contended that that was a finding of fact with which this court could not interfere. I very much doubt whether, if it had been necessary, the court might not have interfered, seeing that that finding of fact, is to my mind, quite inconsistent with the statements of fact in other parts of the Special Case. I doubt whether it was competent for the justices to find as a fact that, in 1913, the whole of the portions coloured brown and pink was one new street at that time. Even if counsel had been right in saying that we were bound by that finding of fact, we should still have to decide as a question of law whether the appellant, by any act that he has done, can be said to have constructed a new street in 1913. The only act that he has done which is alleged to amount to the construction of a street is the erection of these piers and gates at one end only of the road. It appears to me to be almost a contradiction in terms to say that a man who has obstructed an existing street is thereby constructing a new street. Even if it is not, in my opinion, this street coloured brown, on the facts as found by the justices, including the portion at the point where the gates are now erected, was constructed in 1904 and 1905. It was constructed by persons other than the appellant, and, although it may be advisable that the attention of the legislature or of those who have the power of making byelaws shall be directed to the advisability of making a byelaw providing that when once a street has been constructed in accordance with byelaws it shall not be altered without the consent of the local authority so as not to be in accordance with those byelaws, we have no right here to say that the existing byelaws have to be constructed in such a way as to give effect to such a provision. Therefore, in my opinion, the justices were wrong in the conclusion they came to, and the appeal ought to be allowed.

ATKIN, J.—I agree. In my opinion, the finding that the roadway was a new street within the meaning of the byelaws and the Public Health Act, 1875, is an irrelevant finding if all it means is that, before the erection of the gates in question, this street was a new street. The only question that appears to be relevant is whether this act of the appellant was a laying out or a construction of a roadway so as to create a new street. The justices have found facts which I think amount to this, that the alteration of the street was an alteration of such a kind that, if the street was then constructed so as to be a new street, it would be a breach of the byelaws. But it appears to me that the effect of the alteration by the erection of these gates and gateposts does not amount to the construction of a new street. In other words, there appears to be under the byelaw power in the land owner who owns the soil of the roadway to make alterations in the street which would not have been permitted if they had been made at the time when the street was originally constructed. Whether there ought to be a byelaw to prevent such alterations being made is a question of expediency for the legislature, and it must be remembered that these streets are not public highways and that the landowner still owns the soil and presumably has the right, subject to his contractual obligations, to prevent this road from being continued to be used as a road or street in the future. In these circumstances, I agree with what my brothers have said. I think that there is no evidence here of the construction of a new street, and that, therefore, this conviction was wrong.

Appeal allowed.
